OR, THE SAN JACINTO IN THE SEAS OF INDIA, CHINA, AND JAPAN.

By WILLIAM MAYNE WEST, M.D., U.S.N., Late Surgeon of the Fleet to the United States East India Squadron, Author of "Wandering Sketches in South America, Polynesia, &c."

12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

"The veteran surgeon of the United States Fleet recording the expedition to Siam, here presents an interesting record of his experiences in the waters of the East. His volume contains several graphic episodes illustrative of life on board ship, together with a great amount of information concerning the manners and customs, political condition, and religion of the many countries it enters. In which his official capacity gave him intimate access. His style is pleasing, and his book will be found to be of considerable utility, although not remarkable for literary excellence. In addition to the topics which naturally fall within the compass of his narrative, Dr. Wood presents an elaborate comments on the naval discipline and traditions with which many years' service has made him familiar. They are brought forward with tailor-like frankness, and man-of-war life in lift all its coarseness and whole-souledness appears fervently with Herman Melville's Sea Sketches."

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 25.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

SEWING MACHINES.

PRICES GREATLY REDUCED.

Office 505 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

NEW YORK PURCHASING AGENCY.

W. M. LAPSLEY, No. 25 Nassau Street.

Persons desirous of making purchases in New York of any articles, large or small, of use or luxury, from a block to a steam-engine, a thread to a shroud, can have their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, by the above responsible party. Reference to C. S. Sampson, Esq., Customs-Long Island Bank, Messrs. John Jacob & Son, Hutchinson, Kissam & Co., New York; J. D. Dunscomb & Co., Newcastle.

SENT FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

OUR DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, containing all the new Publications of the day, also great variety of Books, being more than ever before offered at Low Prices.

Address EVANS & CO.,

617 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK.

WHOLESALE BUYERS

For Cash and on Short Time,

Are invited to examine the New and beautiful Stock of the Subscribers, consisting of RIBBONS,

DRESS TRIMMINGS,

and LACES,

including a handsome line of

LACE MANTILLAS,

all of the best qualities and of their own importation.

MITCHELL & McLINTOCK,

259 Broadway, New York.

A few doors below Houston.

WANTED!

AGENTS EVERY WHERE, to sell the Best Book; laborers, mechanics young men having a small capital can in this very pleasant business realize a profit of from Three to Five Dollars a day.

Our publications are adapted to the wants of every family, and are of a character to suit the most intellectual character. For full particulars address

HEARY & GETZ, Publishers,

No. 324 North Second Street, Philadelphia.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure Assignments and Foreign Patents. Pat. Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

THE LIVING AGE,

Having largely increased in circulation the past year, the Publishers are enabled to appeal the new and attractive features of a series of

LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC PORTRAITS,

engraved on steel, each of which will be accompanied by a

BIOGRAPHICAL MEMOIR,

thus furnishing to its readers not only the cream of the best Periodical Literature of the World, but also a complete

ILLUSTRATED GALLERY OF FAMOUS CHARACTERS.

The number for the present week contains the Portrait of W. H. Prescott, with memoir, which will be followed by those of Hugh Miller, Professor Wilson, Charles Lamb, Oberlin, Humboldt, &c.

THE LIVING AGE is published TWO weeks; Yearly subscription, $6—prepaid to any address. Subscriptions for the last period, 13 weeks, "Gay Mastodon" and the "Bride of Lammermoor;" being the fullest edition of the Novels ever published. The notes are at the foot of the page—a great convenience to the reader.

The following is a list of the Novels.

WAVERLEY, 2 vols.
GUY MANNERING, 1 vol.
THE ANTIQUARY, 2 vols.
ROB ROY, 1 vol.
OLD MORTALITY, 2 vols.
BLACK DWARF, 1 vol.
LEGEND OF MONTROSE, } 2 vols.
HEART OF MID-LOTHIAN, }
BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR, 2 vols.
IVANHOE, 2 vols.
THE MONASTERY, 2 vols.
THE ABBOT, 2 vols.
KENILWORTH, 2 vols.
THE PIRATE, 2 vols.
THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL, 2 vols.
PEVERIL OF THE PEAK, 2 vols.
QUENTIN DURWARD, 2 vols.
ST. RONAN'S WELL, 2 vols.
REDGAUNTLET, } 2 vols.
THE BETROTHED, }
THE HIGHLAND WIDOW, } 2 vols.
THE TALISMAN, }
TWO DROVERS, }
MY AUNT MARGARET'S MIRROR, } 2 vols.
THE TAPESTRIED CHAMBER, }
THE LAIRD'S JOCK, }
WOODSTOCK, 2 vols.
THE FAIR MAID OF PERTH, 2 vols.
ANNE OF GEIERSTEIN, 2 vols.
COUNT ROBERT OF PARIS, 2 vols.
THE SURGEON'S DAUGHTER, } 2 vols.
CASTLE DANGEROUS, }
INDEX AND GLOSSARY.

☞ Copies will be sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of price.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for them admirable Machines—it has trebled within four months—indicates the evidently prosperity of the company. Many of our Machines have been greatly reduced.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

WM. ROWE, JR.

CARPETS, OIL-CLOTHS,

CHEAP, FOR CASH.

No. 257 Hudson River Rail-road Spring,

New York.

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS.

Complete in two large quarto volumes, printed from engraved plates, and pronounced the most elegant specimens of music-printing ever executed. Bound in cloth, embossed and lettered. Price $10.

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

NEW WORK FOR AGENTS.—THE LIFE, SPEECHES, and MEMORIALS of DANIEL WEBSTER. Containing his State and Congressional Orations, a Selection from the Eulogies delivered on the Occasion of his Death, and his Life and Services. By GEORGE TICKNOR, A.M.

This splendid work is just published, in one large volume of 750 pages. It is printed on fine paper and bound in beautiful style; contains excellent but illustrations of his Birthplace and Mansion at Marshfield, and a full-length, life-like, Steel Portrait. The Publisher offers it with confidence to the American public, and is convinced that it will supply an important want in American literature. No work can be obtained at Booksellers, but will be presented, within a compact and convenient compass, the chief events in the life of the great Statesman. But one remarkable intellectual effort, and the most valuable and interesting, is omitted in this volume, and that is offered in a series of his works, published by Little, Brown & Co., of Boston.

Terms to Agents, and a specimen of the volume at a very reduced price, will be sent on application. Address, subscription price, in cloth, $1 75; handsomely embossed leather, $2 25.

Persons desirous of becoming Agents for this valuable work, will address, for full particulars,

J. E. DANE BUILDER, Publisher,

23 South Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Clergyman's Testimony.

Fayetteville, Onondaga Co., N. Y., 1858.

I hereby certify that my hair having become quite grey, I used Professor Hall's Coloring Compound by W. E. Hagar, of Troy, N. Y.), for four weeks, and my hair was in like manner restored to its natural color. I can fully recommend the article to be all it claims.

WM. CROSLEY,

Pastor of the Baptist Church, Fayetteld, Vt.

Remember to order the genuine, prepared by HALL'S RENEWER. Including, the original and only reliable HAIR DYE.

Price 50 cents a bottle. Sold every where.

R. P. HALL & CO., Nashua, Troy, N. Y.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

In the whole history of medical discoveries, no remedy has performed so many or such remarkable cures of all diseases of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest; of Colds, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Asthma, Pain in the Side, Back, or Loins, and the distressing tract, and justly celebrated Balsam.

Be sure and call for "WISTAR'S," and see that the written signature of I. BUTTS is on the wrapper. Prepared by I. BUTTS, M.D., and Sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

CONSUMPTION.—Not Only Relieved, but Cured, and Consumption.—Rev. Dr. LYMAN BEECHER, New York, says: "Gentlemen:—I have used your Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam myself, with benefit, in catarrhal coughs and colds, and have known it to be used with good effect in the early stages of Pulmonary affections in families around me."

Owing to an unprecedented sale and popularity of over thirty years' standing, there are many counterfeits and imitations against which the public are cautioned.

Sold by druggists generally in the cities.

"VEGETABLE PULMONARY BALSAM."

Prepared only by JOHN F. HENRY, Lowell, Mass.

BARNES & BAILEY, Agents, New York.

NOTICE.

MESSRS. TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, beg to announce the Completion of their

"ILLUSTRATED HOUSEHOLD EDITION OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS"

In 50 Volumes.

The concluding Volumes, 49 and 50, will be published on the 10th of March, and complete sets may then be had of all the Booksellers. Any of the Novels can be had separately, at 75 cents per Volume. This Edition is universally pronounced by competent authorities the best one. The paper is of fine quality; the stereotype plates are entirely new; the type having been cast expressly for this edition; The Novels are illustrated with 100 fine engravings, on plates engraved in the best manner, after drawings and paintings by the most eminent artists, among whom are Birket Foster, Darley, Billings, Landseer, Harvey, and Ford. This Edition contains all the latest notes and corrections of the author, a Glossary and Index; and some curious additional matter, viz: "Gay Mastodon" and the "Bride of Lammermoor;" being the fullest edition of the Novels ever published. The notes are at the foot of the page—a great convenience to the reader.

☞ Copies will be sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of price.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The new FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are attracting universal attention. In all essential good qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURED BRUSHES, at the Booth Warehouse, No. 329 Pearl Street, Harper's Buildings. Brushes of every description, for sale at the lowest rates. All the latest prices. A Silver Medal was received from the American Institute, in 1857, for superior Brushes.

JOHN K. HOFFAT.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 98 pages—and from one-fifth to one-sixth more reading matter than any other of the series.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

FOR MARCH.

The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of valuable and attractive reading than will be found in any other periodical of the day.

At no period since the commencement of the Magazine have its literary and artistic resources been more ample and varied; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the furnished for the past as the best guarantee for the future claims upon the patronage of the American public.

MOUNT VERNON AS IT IS.

Illustrated by Seventy-nine Engravings.

CROTON WATER AND ITS INHABITANTS.

Illustrated by Numerous Engravings.

JOY TO THE BRIDE.

By MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

Illustrated by Twelve Engravings.

TWILIGHT.

SINGLE LIFE AMONG US.

WHAT WE EAT.—A MYSTERY.

THE SILENT SPECTRE.

MY DEBUT AS AN ACTOR.

MY VALENTINES.

A MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH.

THE NEST OF NIGHTINGALES.

MR. BIGELOW'S BOY.

WANTED—ST. PATRICK.

EDITOR'S LITERARY NOTICES. By W. THACKERAY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Going's Friends.—Bon Jour, mon ami.—Contentment.—Cupid Outwitted.

CHAPTER LXII. In which the Prince marches up the Hill and down again.

CHAPTER LXIII. Aztec Virginus.

CHAPTER LXIV. Conclusion.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

SUBSTANCE AND SHADOWS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Puppy's Guilty Past.—An Asp.—A Mushroom.—A Crocodile.—An old Goose.—John Bull and his Friends.—Uncle Sam and his Gifts Bottle.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Morning Dress and Children's Toilet.—Ceiling Ornament.—Skirt Supporter.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Five Copies for One Year (each) $1 60
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together one year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid by the Subscriber at the Office where it is received. Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

[From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 13, 1859.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty-seventh number of attractive and entertaining publication, issued during the past year, has been published in a new dress, volume, and now that we men together, we are surprised at the fact that we have not noticed it before. Harper's Weekly is a publication worthy of careful and specific review of the year—there are ample dissertations on the leading topics—but many of these topics (not always very trivial) however, but profoundly instructive) of the Lounger—at the end of the week, and the Editor's Easy Chair—every day, &c.—there are the records of jokes, new and old—but above all, there are those striking wood-cut representations of contemporary men and things, of follies and of fashions, and of customs and countries—all combined within a single volume, and to be had for a song. It is a great publication, and we are glad to see that it prospers. Its country, its style, and its general character, are such that every family may be interested by it—and we hope that every family will, and very, the man of business, the child and the woman.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
One Copy for Five Years 5 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Postage Twenty-six Cents a Year, or Fifty Cents a Line.

☞ Letters intended will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names at the Office, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.

"Alice Learmont" for the Juveniles.

NOW READY,

By the Author of "John Halifax,"

ALICE LEARMONT.

With Illustrations from the best London edition.

16mo, handsomely bound, Price 50 cents.

MAYHEW & BAKER,

Publishers,

Boston.

IN PRESS.

MATRIMONIAL BROKERAGE IN THE METROPOLIS.

By a Reporter of the New York Press.

Illustrated. 300 pages, Price $1 25.

The author of this remarkable book has devoted several months to the investigation and exposure of this nefarious business, and his startling revelations are no little blight of fancy, but must be strictly regarded as facts.

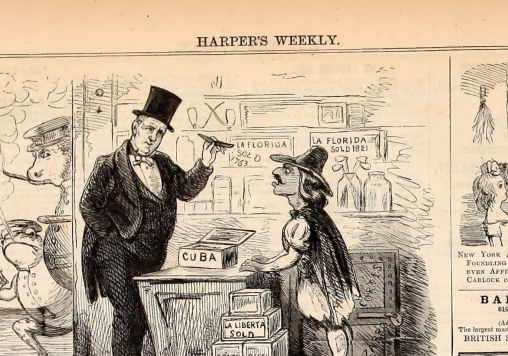
THATCHER & HUTCHINSON, Publishers,

No. 253 BROADWAY.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The new FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are attracting universal attention. In all essential good qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.



SHOCKING AND INTOLERABLE INSULT.

Mr. B——N. "The fact is, my dear Sir, my Doctor says that my health absolutely requires me to use these Cigars. I will give you as much as thirty cents a piece; but I really must have them."

SPANISH DON. "If you insult me again by offering to buy, I'll call my friends outside to help me thrash you."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Gifts! Gifts!! Gifts!!!
EVANS & CO.
OFFER GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO BOOK BUYERS THAN ANY OTHER HOUSE IN THE COUNTRY.
OUR NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, OF SIXTY PAGES, CONTAINS
A larger and better selection of Gift Books than ever before offered, and bindings of unsurpassed style and every value or interest published in the United States. All books furnished at publishers' prices, with
A GIFT ACCOMPANYING THE BOOK
at the time of sale.
The most liberal inducements to clubs, surpassing those of any other house, for particulars of which, see page 5.
New Catalogue; also great commissions allowed to agents who are willing to devote their time to our business. Particulars sent on application by mail.
Send for a Catalogue, which will be mailed free to any address in all parts of the world.
EVANS & CO., Publishers,
As extra Gifts we will present to any one sending an order for ten books.
The following is a Schedule of Property which will be given to the Purchasers of Books at the time of Sale.
Worth from
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever and Lepine.....$30 00 to $100 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jewelled, Hunting Cases, open face and cylinder escapement.....12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, four glasses and two glasses with spring—large variety of patterns.....2 00 to 12 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Florentine, Pebble, Lava, Goldstone, Garnet, and Coral sets of Pins and Drops.....5 00 to 15 00
Ladies' Gold Guard Chains, Neck Chains, Chatelaines.....8 00 to 16 00
Gents' Fob and Vest Chains.....10 00 to 30 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns.....12 00 to 50 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Coral, Garnet, Chased and Plain Oval Brooches.....2 00 to 10 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles.....50 to 4 00
Gold Pens and Pencil Cases.....50 to 2 00
Pearl and Morocco portemonnaies.....50 to 2 50
Toothpicks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides.....1 50 to 2 50
Gold Cravats, studs, sleeve buttons, and lacqs.....1 00 to 2 00
Besides other Gifts, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.
One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold. An equal proportion of the whole will be given with each $5,000 worth of books.
Address all orders, letters of inquiry, etc., to EVANS & CO., Publishers, Broadway, New York City.

LIGHTE, NEWTON & BRADBURY'S
LIQUID PORTER.
281 and 283 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.
HENRY H. GOOFREE, Jr., Agent.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S ROSEMARY.

is the best dressing for the hair known. Rosemary will restore hair to bald heads.
The Rosemary will remove dandruff.
The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.
The Rosemary has not been and can not be excelled for the toilet, as all a clean, healthy and beautiful hair.
The Proprietor can furnish proof to enable the assertions above. Those will not admit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.
Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 21 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.
Sold by Dealers generally.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.
BY THE
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S LIGHTNING RUN.
Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A.M.; 3.15, 4.30, and 8.30 P.M.
Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and do not lie over or stop at any point.
The regular time by the Fast Line is

To Chicago	36 hours	Dayton	in 30 hours
" Cincinnati	" 36 "	St. Louis	" 74 days
" Cleveland	" 34 "	Louisville	" 36 "
" Columbus	" 32 "	Indianapolis	54 hours

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in like good time.
Goods for points on Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, Kansas, &c., will save time by shipping by our line.
Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.
WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.
TUESDAY, MARCH 1st,
We shall Publish
THE METHODIST;
OR,
INCIDENTS AND CHARACTERS FROM LIFE, IN THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.
BY MIRIAM FLETCHER.
WITH AN INTRODUCTION,
By REV. W. P. STRICKLAND, D.D.
In Two handsome 12mo Volumes. Price $2 00.
From Dr. Strickland's Introduction.
"We have perused these pages with an absorbing interest, and frankly confess that no work of fiction we ever read possesses half the charm which this does; and when it vastly better, it can not fail to awaken the purest emotions and improve the heart."
For Immediate Publication.
PICTURES OF COUNTRY LIFE. By ALICE CARY. 12mo. Price $1 00.
TEN YEARS OF PREACHER LIFE. By Rev. W. H. MILBURN. Price $1 00.
ACADIA; or, A Month among the Blue Nooze. By Prof. T. C. Haliburton. Price $1 00.
SPREAD-EAGLEISM. By GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN. Price 50 cents.
NEW STAR PAPERS (Religious Series). By Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER. Price $1 25.
Copies of either of the above sent by mail, post paid, on receipt of the price.
DERBY & JACKSON,
Publishers,
New York.
SOUTHWOLD—A Novel.
By MRS. LILLIE DEVEREUX UMSTED.
One volume 12mo. Muslin. Price $1 00.
"Southwold is a fiction of much more than ordinary merit. It has power enough to make the fortune of half a dozen fashionable novels. * * * * As a society novel, it is, with hardly an exception, one of the most commendably managed and alluring books which we have ever read."
Sent by Mail, post paid, on receipt of price.
REDFIELD, Publisher, CLINTON HALL PUBLISHERS,
110 Grand Street (near Broadway), N. Y.

P. P. P.
PARR'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.
They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the congested imperfect secretions; they assist the system; they impart strength; they are divided in sections, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous; all impure excretions pass off, and they can not become offensive, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster, and we cheaper as 25 cents than others at 12½. Prepared only by PARR, Druggist, Boston. For sale by persons, public speakers, delicate females, or any affected with side, chest, or back pains, should try them. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a medallion head and our Signature.
BARNES & PARR, 12 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.
JOHN D. PARR, Cincinnati, Ohio.

ANDREWS'
EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER.
EVERY CAREFUL housekeeper should have a good YEAST POWDER, which they can rely upon in case of an emergency, when they want Cakes, Bread, or Tea Biscuit, &c., BEAUTIFULLY LIGHT AND WHOLESOME at a moment's notice!!
THOMAS ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER is the most valuable preparation ever invented.
The ingredients are strictly pure, nothing being used but the best materials, and the compound is so perfect, that NO PERSON can fail to have great success in its various applications in domestic economy.
The best TEAS throughout the Union sell our YEAST.
Andrews' Yeast Powder, and do not take the counterfeit nostrums which are sold cheap, and are good for nothing, and obscure injurious to health! Our Sales are 1500 cases per day, and we have the gratification of knowing that the Excelsior Yeast Powder is the best in the world!
Ask your Storekeeper to get you one.
ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER, and take no other, for you want the BEST! Ask for it, and get it.
For sale by the most prominent Trade in every City, and at 56 Dey Street, 156 and 158 Cedar Street, New York.
THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.

Important to Consumptives!
DR. CHURCHILL'S DISCOVERY!
WINCHESTER'S GENUINE PREPARATION OF THE HYPOPHOSPHITES,
A SPECIFIC TREATMENT FOR THE CURE AND PREVENTION OF CONSUMPTION!
The remarkable success attending the use of this remedy in the incipient stages in all inveterate cases of pulmonary Consumption, and its extraordinary curative powers in the last and third stages of the disease, promise to render this hitherto fatal scourge of our race as completely within the control of this medicine as any other of the various "ills that flesh is heir to."
To present the thousands of sufferers against being deceived by impure and deleterious preparations claiming to be Dr. Churchill's remedy, I refer to the following
TESTIMONY OF DR. CHURCHILL.
"TO BE USED WITH EFFECT, THE HYPOPHOSPHITES MUST BE PERFECTLY PURE; otherwise they may, in many cases, appear altogether INERT, or even INJURIOUS. IT WAS CARE OUT OF THIS DIFFICULTY FINALLY SOUGHT IN PURE IN PARIS, UNDER THE NAME OF HYPOPHOSPHITES, AND ACTUALLY PUT FOR RELIEVED IN USE.
TESTIMONY OF DR. CHILTON.
"I have carefully analyzed samples of the Hypophosphites of Lime, Soda, and Potash from which Mr. J. F. Winchester manufactures his Genuine and Improved Solution of the Hypophosphites, and find them to be PERFECTLY PURE, and of the highest grade. I have had many opportunities of testing the medicinal virtues of the articles which he uses in compounding this NEW REMEDY FOR CONSUMPTION, and having a personal knowledge of its accuracy and integrity, I feel that I can assure the Profession and the Public that the PREPARATION OF THE HYPOPHOSPHITES can be relied on.
"JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
"New York, Feb. 8, 1859."
You who are suffering, or predisposed to a fatal disease, remember that while you are delaying the malady is making silent but sure progress, rendering cure more difficult, death more certain. This remedy offers you an almost sure relief, and, if used in time, a restoration to health.
Price $1 per bottle for $5, ready for use, with ample directions. Each bottle of "WINCHESTER'S GENUINE PREPARATION OF THE HYPOPHOSPHITES" has a fac-simile signature. Be sure to purchase and use no other.
Sold Wholesale and Retail at the sole general Depot in the United States, No. 48 John Street, up stairs. Circulars and all necessary information sent gratis to all inquirers who will enclose a Postage Stamp.
Address J. WINCHESTER,
American and Foreign Agency,
49 John Street, N. Y.

NEW YORK ALMS-HOUSE NURSE TREATING A FOUNDLING WITH "SWEET KINDNESS AND EVEN AFFECTION." [See the evidence in the CARLOCK CASE.]

BAILEY & CO.,
819 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia,
(Adjoining L. J. Levy & Co's.)
The largest manufacturers of
BRITISH STANDARD SILVER WARE
in the United States.

Guaranteed to be of the above quality. All Silver Ware bearing our Trade Mark, viz., the letters B. & Co. engraved by J. L. Heath, are of the U. S. Standard.
DIAMONDS, PEARLS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, PLATED WARES, BRONZES, &c.

FRED. S. COZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,
Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of his own importation.
RARE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
72 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair one native how still and dry soft and glossy for several days. It is contended to be the best and only true Tonic and Restorative Hair Dressing in the World.
Prepared by BURNETT & CO., Boston.
For sale by dealers generally, at 50 cents a bottle—containing three times the quantity.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS
Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all species of Vermin dead.
The importance of a reliable article of this kind is indisputable. In warm weather all nature teems with these annoying foes. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. Discovered by a botanist, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while making the tour of Asia, observed that the Persians kept upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This plant was found to be the basis of this powder, from them introduced. Specimens of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to retain the effect of age and climate. Lyon and Lorton Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and several medical and horticultural colleges and societies.
Letter from the President of the U. S.
"EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1853.
"MR. EDWARD LYON—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, descriptive of which I have seen specimens.
The above was accompanied by a certificate of FRANKLIN PIERCE.
IT IS FREE FROM POISON.
NEW YORK, October 1st, 1853.
"MR. E. LYON.—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to warm and cold blooded animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.
"JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
"LABRANCE REID, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital."
Mr. JOHN L. HAYES, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, roaches, beetles, &c., with a Powder, and found it of immense value."
Every housekeeper and housekeeper must have a direct interest in an article of this kind. Reference can be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Mason, President of the Jeweston Institute; James Gordon Bennett, Gen. Winfield Scott, Cyrus W. Field, N. Y. Herald, of the Five Points House of Industry, &c., &c. Judge Mason says, "This discovery of Prof. Lyon is of national importance." The Farmer's Club have tested it thoroughly. It will destroy lizards, grasshoppers, crickets, ants, cockroaches, worms, &c. Where plants can be preserved, and houses made pure. Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price. Address EDWARD BARNES & PARR, of New York, to have it sold throughout the United States. Liberal discount to dealers. Be cautious!
"NEW YORK, November 5th, 1853.
"I am retiring from business, and will sell my Lyon's Powders and Pills, Letters-Patent, and the secret preparing therefor, to Messrs. Barnes & Parr. This powder is a discovery made by myself, and brought from the interior of Asia, and is unknown to any other person. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name.—E. LYON."
Rats and mice can not be reached by a powder, and so killed by a Magnetic Pill. Order them through any Druggist.
Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
But Lyon's Pills are mixed for rats and mice.
Sample Flasks, 25 cents; regular size, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions. Use freely and thoroughly.
BARNES & PARR,
12 and 15 Park Row, New York.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS
HAVE just issued their SPECIAL TRADE LIST TO DEALERS for the Spring Sales, with the additional DIAMOND Early orders solicited.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 115.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE proprietors of Harper's Weekly beg to state that the regular edition of the paper exceeds and that it is the best and cheapest advertising medium in the country. No existing advertising sheet meets so many eyes, or circulates among so select a class of readers. Its circulation is widely diffused throughout the country, North and South; it is read from New Orleans to Quebec, and from Minnesota to Florida.

75,000 COPIES,

The proprietors believe that the large circulation which the Weekly has obtained is due to the fact that it is the best illustrated and family newspaper in the country. They intend that it shall continue to improve.

TERMS.

One copy for one year	- - - -	$2 50
Five copies, " "	- - - -	9 00
Twelve, " "	- - - -	20 00
Twenty-five, " "	- - - -	40 00

THE GOLDEN RELICS.

[A woman was lately found dead in the basement of an unfinished house in New York, having evidently perished from starvation; upon her shriveled finger was a gold ring, and carefully sewed in her under-garment was a little golden cross.]

STARK in a basement dreary,
Starved in the winter's cold,
An outcast, worn and weary,
Was laid in death's grim fold,
And on her shriveled finger
Shone a simple ring of gold.

And the women who prepared her
For the shroud, upon her breast
Found a little golden cross there,
Neatly sewn within her vest;
And the cross and ring together
The woman's tale confess'd.

For the one told of a mother
Who had taught her first to pray,
At the evening's solemn closing,
And the opening smile of day;
Yes, this to thoughtful spirits
These golden relics say.

And the little ring, still clasping
Her frozen finger, said,
That in the happy years agone
Her virgin heart was wed
To one who loved her dearly!
Ah, days forever fled!

And these precious golden relics
By her had been prized more
Than the life she might have cherish'd
Had she sold her darling store.
Thus love in Woman's bosom
Triumphs for evermore.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Reception of the Princess Clotilde—A lost Letter—Last Charms—Grand Diplomatic Dinners—Ball to Dine—Painful Story of an unfortunate Marriage—Mrs. Mason's Ball—Hon. Mr. Preston and Family in Paris, etc., etc.

PARIS, February 10, 1859.

MY last letter was sent off to the sound of the trumpets and the roll of the drums which were called forth by the entry of Prince Napoleon and his bride; and there were the only demonstrations that greeted them, for from among the crowd assembled there was not a single acclamation of welcome or congratulation—a silence intended to mark the universal disapprobation of these warlike projects of which this Sardinian Princess is supposed to be the pledge and the victim. Poor little thing! She is far from pretty, and looked very sad and weary with this hasty wooing and rapid journey from Turin to Paris. There have been superb fêtes at the Tuileries to present the newly-married to the Court and diplomatic circles, and there is to be a great ball at the Hôtel de Ville next week in her honor.

My time for the last few days has been taken up in endeavors to trace and recover a letter intended for me, but with my name so imperfectly spelled that my concierge refused it. I heard of this, and knowing whence the letter came, went immediately in pursuit of it; but here there is so much form and suspicion that it is difficult to regain any missing article. The questionings I underwent about this letter at the Post-office; three different papers I signed, reclaiming it; three times I took that weary journey to the Rue J. J. Rousseau; and three days I lost in this way, until I became quite desperate, and almost inclined to take by main force a letter extremely important, and which I could see, but which the tiresome official would not give into my possession.

I once lost a watch-chain at the Opera. I saw it advertised, a few days after, as "having been found, and being at the Police-office." I went there, and having with much trouble discovered the proper bureau, I stated my errand, when the presiding official, without looking up from his writing, said, gruffly, "It is not your chain that has been found." This was to disconcert me in case I was claiming what was not my own; and it was only three weeks afterward that I received it, and then after going through so many forms that I almost regretted ever having heard of it. All this is fretting and vexatious, and seems a useless degree of caution; but perhaps without it the army of Government employés could not even find the excuse of any thing to occupy their office hours.

Lots of time is a serious matter at this season of the year in Paris, where only to attend to keeping up one's social position is a sufficient occupation; and then to read a little, and to breathe a little in the Bois de Boulogne, and the day is gone. I have dined out six days in succession, lately, and mostly grand diplomatic dinners. I owe I do not like merely French dinners, and can not think they are to be compared in excellence with that admirable mixture of French and English cookery which you meet with now in the good houses in England. I hate game which has been mariné (cooked in vinegar) until it has lost all taste, or dried by the fire until it is more chippy than chips. I dislike a cold-looking apple (rub with jelly) when my stomach is expecting something comfortable; and I feel indignation in the glaze of a cherry pudding. Then there are often no vegetables but, perhaps, half a chou-a-la-crême, just to show the variable dessert of sugar-plums and chestnuts glacés. No, this is not to dine according to my ideas, and Voltaire well knows that I am not stand it long, and was not surprised when I said, yesterday,

THE LAST HOURS OF CONGRESS, MARCH, 1859.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"Comte, I shall dine at home to-day. Give me a good tapioca soup, a fried sole, roast beef, and a tatter pudding, at six o'clock."

And partly served and excellent it was; and, with two or three glasses of sherry, I entered that evening upon the usual routine, feeling more like a man than I had done for some time before. And my duties were heavy last night—two visits for the Empress St. Germain and two balls, one at the American, another at the Wirtemberg Embassy.

But, first, I have a mind to relate how my time was employed before my visit to Voltaire's office of Paris society, and to enforce a favorite theory of mine, which is that marriages should only be contracted between those of the same nation, as alone furnishing that sympathy and similarity in habits, tastes, and sentiments which is the best security for domestic happiness. I shall be careful, in telling my painful story, to avert any chance of identifying the actors in it, at the same time that the facts are precisely as stated. A friend of mine—rich, well-born, good-looking, and noble-hearted —fell in love, some two or three years ago, with a very beautiful girl of Spanish race, who was, I am not so rich as himself. Adele (as I shall call her) is the only daughter of a widowed mother, and my friend's proposals were received by her and all the family with a delight which quite overcame all scruples as to the Protestantism and high aristocracy of the intended husband. Charles * * * was already too much in love himself to take any advice for me to give it with sincerity, or with any chance of being listened to; and the marriage took place, amidst congratulations and enthusiastic comments upon all sides, and the young couple were installed in Paris, and surrounded with every kind of luxury which wealth can nowhere so well procure. This, too, was against my advice, which had been that they should travel for a time, and visit England, with occasional visits to Paris. But Charles could witness nothing for a time but the eyes of Adele not to leave "dear mamma alone," though I thought I could, even then, read in the large dark eyes a still more energetic remonstrance against such an exile from Paris and its untried pleasures. And so it went on; Adele growing more enamored of her beautiful and captivating wife, and submitting but too willingly to all her caprices and wishes.

With this note as avant, or preamble, I will proceed with my story. Last evening I was in Voltaire's office dinner, enjoying the quiet of my friends, and reading the evening paper, when Dumont entered with a note, which he said "must have an immediate answer." I opened it. It was in the well-known writing of Madame S——, my friend's mother, and contained these words:

"Come, I implore you, this instant to speak to me!"

I was alarmed, for I knew Charles was absent upon business in England, and I thought nothing had happened to him. So I gave up my arm-chair, put off my slippers, and went to the residence of Madame S——, in an adjoining street. I found her pacing the room, with an open letter in her hand; and when I asked what was the matter, she muttered,

"Read this!" she said. It was a note from Charles to her daughter. So this effect:

"DARLING.—I have just arrived, having finished my business two days sooner than I hoped for. I hear you are dining with your mother: so shall not see you till you I am going to the club for some dinner, but shall come back as soon as possible, and be with you. I love. I have been for one instant to see baby asleep.

"Your darling."

"Do you know where Adele is?" said her mother.

"Can you give no guess?"

"Oh! Monsieur, save her! save my unfortunate child!"

I reflected a moment, and felt that I had no difficulty in divining with whom Adele probably was at that moment.

"I will do my best to find her," I said, and hurried to a cabriolet, got into the first that drove to the lodgings of one of the young heroes of the day, Count W——, "the best waltzer," "the best rider," etc.

The concierge said he was out, she knew not where; nor would an offered louis tempt her to her admit that he had gone out with a lady, or to give me any clew as to where he might be found. I was puzzled for a moment, but not discouraged; and I drove to Very's restaurant.

"Has Count W—— dined here to-day, I asked.

"No, Monsieur," was the prompt answer.

I then asked for the garçon who served the private rooms.

"Tell me," I said, "if Count W—— is here."

Again I was met with a positive denial, though again I offered gold for the truth. It was refused; and then I said,

"All I want is that, if he is here, you should go to him and say there is danger."

I then returned to poor Madame S——, and fully shared her misery and anxiety. Very soon we heard a carriage stop, and Adele glided into the room.

"What is the matter, mamma?" she said. "I heard (turning to me) that you were inquiring for me."

Her mother gave her her husband's note.

"Oh! this is indeed serious!" she said. "Monsieur, you have saved me!" she added, with emotion. "And, then, I must answer this note." And she sat down and wrote:

"CARO MIO.—I shall be at home before you are, I dare say; but if I am a few minutes after, pray do not wake up baby, as it will make him so cross. An revoir et tout à vous. ADELE."

She tossed me the note to read, sealed it, and said,

"Now," she said, "I must go back to my dinner."

We both exclaimed against such imprudence and nothing remained for her.

"It is not fair," she answered. "You have both dined; and I am very hungry, and shall get nothing at home. The Champagne at Very's is happy, and the dinner well-ordered."

"Adele," I said, "you shall not go, or I will tell all to your husband."

"Oh no, you will not. Why should you destroy his happiness, and make him flow out his own brains, and ruin me? No, you are too good." And she left me with a smile, and we heard the carriage drive off.

There was nothing more to be said; no I took leave of Madame S——, who seemed profoundly humiliated, and came home to dress. I saw Charles and Adele at one of the balls I went to, and thought he had been at home before he was; and he looked so happy that I felt that, indignant as I might be, I could not and shall not disturb "his fool's paradise."

Mrs. Mason's ball was cheerful and pretty, and the benevolent politeness of that whole family makes it a pleasure to go to the house. I think I never saw a countenance so troubled by kindly feeling as that of Mr. Mason. I saw there Mr. and Mrs. Preston, the Queen's Master of Ceremonies, very pleasing persons. Mrs. Preston was absolutely dressed, and is handsome, looking very much like the picture-gallery Marie Antoinette, with a much prettier mouth. Mr. Preston is interesting in conversation, and seems extremely well chosen for his mission. But I was at the end of my paper, and you will be so weary of hearing of these endless balls as I am. An revoir!

THE CLOSING HOURS OF CONGRESS.

WE engrave on the preceding page the last hours of Congress, on the night of the 3d of March. The meetings were characterized by no discreditable scenes such as have heretofore attended the night session at the close of Congress. The picture fully describes the scene: "Members are constantly going to and returning from the refreshment-room, and some have retired to sofas to sleep. The galleries, which early in the evening were crowded, have thinned out. Those principally now left are tired and fifty persons present, about a dozen of whom are ladies."

There was more excitement in the Senate. The Washington Star thus portrays the scene:

"The Senate was crowded beyond excess at nine o'clock. Every available nook and corner was filled. The aisles and passages were choked to the doorways, and even the gallery lobbies were crowded by eager listeners, who failed to get a glimpse of the Senate. There appeared one entire mass, rising in tiers to the walls. The large attendance of ladies presented a scene unusually brilliant, while the perpetual motions of the thousand and one fans set up quite a current of the heated air to and fro the walls, another light feature in the scene worthy of calling.

All at once many eyes were turned toward the eastern entrance of the chamber, caused by the entrance of a tall, well-looked man, with a bundle in his hand, and he at once spoke the stranger. Instantly a large number of Senators rushed over to him, and Messrs. Mason grasped him by the hand; Douglas took it next; while Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Hammond, and others gave some among the gentlemen, some introducing new-comers and giving room to others.

"That's Smith O'Brien!" said some in the gallerios.

"Who is he?" said others.

"That is Richard Cobden, the English statesman, Manchester politician, great free-trader, and ex-member of Parliament," said a knowing one near us, with such a long list of prefixes that at once placed the stranger as a man of standing. Senator Mason started off and found Senator Simmons, type of an American factory boy, and introduced him to Cobden—Cobden—Cobden—who went from the Manchester factories to Parliament, where, for nearly ten years, he led the free-trade party."

JUDGE NOT.

"The greatest of them is charity."

BRIDLE your virtue,
Tether the tongue;
Pity the fair
Blighted so young!
Why not the tomb?
Sad, shattered life;
Think of her doom—
Widow, yet wife!

Tears like and rivers
Roll through all time;
In his breast
Forred for its crime.
Billows of soil
Swell o'er his rest;
Pleading with God—
There let him rest.

Still to another
Life is as death!
Home and its idol
Gone with a breath!
Blood on his hands,
Stain on his bed:
Pity them all—
Living and dead!

Thou whose life-current
Flows calm and quiet,
Whose love and whose passion
Never ran rich,
Judge not too harshly;
Few fall by design:
Pray for the erring—
Their fate may be thine!

Bridle your pressure,
Tether the tongue;
Charity's blessings
Ever are young.
Have in thine temptation
Who measures the sin;
May His mantled mercy
Shield all of our kin!

C. H. WEBB.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1859.

THE HOMICIDE AT WASHINGTON.

THE public mouth is still full of stories about the lamentable affair which took place at Washington on Sunday last. The excitement which the public are, it seems, can not be satisfied with details of the catastrophe. As chronicles of political crime we devote a large portion of our space to the affair.

Assuming that Mr. Sickles was well founded in his assumption that a guilty intrigue had taken place between his wife and Mr. Key—a fact of which it appears that there can be no doubt—the justice of Mr. Sickles' course will justify him in killing the man who had dishonored his bed. There is no need of sentimental appeals to the feelings of humanity. It is not necessary to draw harrowing pictures of the scene of the fatal deed before the public. All this is wide of the question, or at least superfluous. The fact is, that if Mrs. Sickles was guilty, her husband held the life of her seducer in his hands.

This has been the law and the practice from the earliest periods of which we have any historical record. Under the Jews, and subsequently under the civilized nations of the ancient world, the offender might forfeit life by not to death if he were caught in the act. In those days evidence was doubtful, and trials were many unnecessary delays or forms. The law assumed that where a guilty intrigue existed, and came to the knowledge of the injured husband, he was justified in killing the guilty parties in flagrante delicto. In those days conviction was more difficult than it is now. Juries were easily commanded, and bribed, gossip was universal. The wife of a leading citizen of Jerusalem, Athens, or Rome, was known to be under suspicion, and the man by which she lived. If she went wrong the whole city was aware of it. Her offense could not be hidden. There was no room for doubt, no house so secluded, but that her incomings and outgoings were certain to be watched. Hence the publicity of the trial, and of eminent ancients of both sexes; and hence, as a natural consequence, the execution of the right of vengeance on the husband who took the simple (vou-like to make sure of the facts. Every lawyer who takes the trouble to compare the old rules of evidence in cases of adultery with those which obtain in the present day will at once recognize the truth of our views.

In modern times the prudent rule of the old law has been relaxed. It is not now necessary that a detect in the act should exist which leaves no room for controversy. Society will accept evidence of guilt without prying into the secrets of the bedchamber. But when the evidence is conclusive, according to the social canons of the day, the injured party will be allowed the benefit of the old principle.

In a word, where a reasonable ground for assuming guilt exists, the party injured will be justified in revenging his injuries in his own way upon the party who has injured him. He does so at his own risk; it is murder if he be wrong. If he is right, that is justifiable.

Nor can this rule be fairly impugned. An injured husband has but three ways of meeting the injury. He may laugh at it, or he may challenge his enemy; this is the French method. The first is impossible to a man of sensitive nation, and requires unusual philosophy; the second may approach physical to moral injury. He may sue to obtain redress through the law of the English plan. It involves patience, delay, exposure, disgrace. It parades the injured party to the eyes of the world. It seldom yields substantial profit; and when it does, it must be painful to use money obtained at the cost of the honor of a wife. Finally, the injured husband may take the life of him who has injured him. This is the American system; and latterly it has been followed in many parts of Europe. Terrible as homicide is, this method must, on the whole, be admitted to be the most effectual, the wisest, and the most natural revenge of an outraged husband.

There can be no excuse for the adulterer. He commits a three-fold crime: a crime against the woman whom he misleads, a crime against the man whom he dishonors, a crime against society which he disorganizes. Each of these calls for condign punishment. In these latter days experience proves that in all such cases society will justify the infliction of it last penalty by the husband. Whatever may have been the character of Mr. Sickles, he is not a jury in the United States or in Europe which would convict him even of manslaughter. In the days of the Greek and Roman republics, is it worth while to argue further on the question?

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AND HIS POLICY.

THE English journals are once more furious with the Emperor Napoleon; and, as usual, with a quiet and unobtrusive moderation of example. The Englishmen call the French Emperor the usual hard names, and charge him with designing to dismember Europe and destroy the peace of the world to gratify his own ambition. This charge servile and ignorant journals in the United States seem only too ready to echo.

It is difficult to reconcile the abuse and denunciations of the British journals with its facts. No one, he he even an English journalist, pretends that the state of Italy as solitary, or even as early, Naples is calculated to a grieving despotism; Rome is garrisoned by French troops; the legations and the Milanese are imprisoned by Austrian troops; Austrian Tuscany is overawed by Austria; Piedmont is in a state of extremely menacing revolutionary effervescence. A state of war is in the center of is Old World, and in such a condition as this one, not certainly, be said to be in a safe or settled situation. And it is unreasonable, to say the least, to accuse Napoleon, whose interests are eminently conservative, of desiring to be in such an ambition when he looks forward to some radical change in Italy.

Rumor has it that we have reason to believe with good foundation—that the Emperor of the French has proposed to the Emperor of Austria to vacate unconditionally Italy and the Milanese, and to allow the Italians to make more effort to govern themselves. To this proposal the Austrian court is said to have replied in the negative. Under the circumstances, can the Emperor be blamed for expressing his disconcert Austria's refusal to do justice to Italy, or from giving every moral aid and countenance to the only Italian power which does not sink in the moment of its first success?

British prejudice is equally deaf to argument and blind to facts. Because Napoleon has occasioned a general fear that he may decide to be English, therefore—so the English reason—he can mean nothing right, and can seek nothing but wrong. The Englishman is so accustomed to that Italian conquest is the last thing he can desire. He might have insisted on territorial reward for the part he has played in the war; or it would have been an excellent thing for Savoy if he had, but he had the wisdom to perceive that the old theory of conquest is fallacious, and that to annex a Turkish province would be to annex a loss. Just so with Italy. If Napoleon wanted to conquer or annex a part of Italy, Austria would only be too happy to be rid with and of Italy, however, Napoleon foresees the expense and peril, and he does not see the gain, of the operation; and he will best minding to do the Italians a service by giving motives may be, his policy is clear: he seeks the reorganization of Italy on an Italian basis, and in this, if he succeeds, he will have the gain and approval of every lover of order and good government, and of every hater of tyranny and revolution, throughout the world.

A man of Napoleon's calibre is not to be diverted from his purposes by the brawling of British tradesmen who fear commercial panics, or by the tirades of British journalists who live only just got over the belief that wooden shoes and fried frogs were the staple manufactures of France. Whatever his design is, the world may rely upon it that he foresaw the obvious difficulties in the way, that he knows how to meet them, and that he will persevere in its course. Assuming that he has a perfectly there ought to be, about this time, a political upheaval of some kind or other in Europe. Under a re-cast map of Europe, we can see it in Paris, ending in an overthrow of the reigning dynasty. Under Louis Napoleon, it may or seem a concession to Italian liberty, in which whatever the British publicists and politicians may say, liberal men in England, as elsewhere, can not help but sympathize with the crusaders.

THE BUSINESS OF AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

A WRITER in the New York Times takes the journal to task for illustrating the more shocking events of the day, such as the Gossip murder, the murder of the dead and dumb boy at Utah, and the Sickles affair. He protests against such "prostitution of the fine arts" demands, indignantly, "that great side's such pictures" hold up?" and pathetically " ures us to devote our whole paper to "scenes of beauty and joy and love."

We apprehend that our critic is under a slight misapprehension. This is a newspaper, not a nursery tract or a child's hymn-book. There are plenty of publications exclusively devoted to "scenes of beauty and joy and love;" they may be had at very moderate prices from the booksellers. They are evidently the sort of reading suited to the stomach of "J. C. H.;" and we devotedly wish he may be able to find them.

For us, our purpose is to present our readers with an illustrated account of the events of the day by day we like them. If the world around us but "scenes of beauty and joy and love," then our pictures shall reflect those pleasing themes; and surely, if, on the contrary, crime, violence, and wrong continue to constitute a large share of the mass of daily events, then we shall illustrate them too. For, in the first place, we have undertaken with our subscribers to furnish them with an illustrated history of the times in which we live, and this we could not do if we chose to neglect the leading events of the day—such as the Quaddy and the Sickles tragedies. And, secondly, we hold, in opposition to our critic, that pictures of terrible scenes of bloodshed and violence are calculated to do more good than harm. We do not believe that crime is stimulated by light, and that darkness and secrecy are necessarily favorable to virtue. We can not admit that newspapers are agents of evil because they publish full accounts of terrible crimes, with or without illustrations. We have never supposed that sons would be induced to murder their fathers by the sight of the Gould picture, or that the dreadful spectacle of the homicide of a young and promising man like Key was likely to enlarge the circle of adulterers. On the contrary, we are quite satisfied that the tendency of such pictures is to lead the erring to pause; to warn the wayward youth of the road to which he is tending; to remind thoughtless women and eager men of the terrible consequences of guilty love; to drive home in human minds the principle and morality can but mildly urge. If this strife such a bad world, the sooner the veil is drawn from it the better. Let the whole truth be exhibited without inspiring in the minds of its spectators a desire to commit murder likewise; then only can we claim the right to, for our part, have faith enough in the right instincts of mankind to think that the sight of such a picture as is published to-day will do good, and would tend to prevent its recurrence.

That this view is not confined to ourselves any candid inquirer may readily ascertain. Thirty pictures which have agonized the tender breast of any coward—the murder of the deed and dumb boy by Cavaignac, the death of the earnest request of an officer of the United States Army whose name, we dare say, would not be withheld if desired. And he wrote us:

"A most cruel murder has recently been perpetrated by the Mormon Danites. . . . The criminal has escaped, and is now in this city. It has been suggested that the most vivid way of bringing them terrible outrages before the eyes of the American people is through the pictorial influence of Harper's Weekly. I therefore incline," etc., etc.

We are very happy to be able to add that there is a reason to hope that the very publication of these two heart-rending pictures in this journal will be the means of causing the murderers to be brought to justice. A day or two after the appeared, orders were transmitted to-day from Washington to vindicate the law at any cost.

We have not time or space to notice the nonsense that is occasionally printed about the "prostitution of art," etc., etc. Pray what did the ancients paint, and shall we imitate them? Lascoon? There is an old story which some of these critics should remember. When Michael Angelo had finished his Last Judgment, he exhibited it to the Pope. His Holiness was not pleased, and next day a message was received by the painter to the effect that the Pope's modesty was hurt by the want of clothing on some of the principal figures, and he wished the defect corrected.

"Tell the Pope," replied the furious painter, "to reform men and women, and my pictures will then reform themselves."

THE LOUNGER.

THE WASHINGTON TRAGEDY.

CAN any of us be surprised by the recent murder of Mr. Key in Washington? When the newspapers declare, and private testimony asserts, that the capital in the world is more rotten than it, it remarkable that a wife should be faithless and her husband should have an affair? When it is perfectly well understood among intelligent people that corruption of every kind prevails in Washington, reaching even to the bribery, or the pecuniary persuasion, of the men who make the laws, which the rest of us are punished if we do not obey, shall we turn pale and profess to be horror-stricken by a crime? If a whole system of practical politics be a conflict of jobs and jobbers, of curses at the very centre of the struggle there will be no social honesty, no individual honor left.

A man who is false or corruptible in politics is false every where. There is only one kind of dishonesty in the world, as there is only one kind of darkness. A man who will tell lies in a political speech will tell lies in his business, in his family, in all his other relations of life, when the temptation is strong enough. A man who puts his conscience in his pocket in political matters will not take it out to the detriment of his private affairs. Every lie a man tells in a drop of water helps in making every subsequent falsehood slip more nimbly over. If he be elected, for instance, as the representative of the interests of all the people, and sell himself to promote measures of a merely private nature, with regard to the public advantage, or directly against it, he is as much a swindler as any other public thief, and would steal spoons when our society were different.

If politics and political society are where are carrying, it is no wonder that crime is everywhere. Why should we expect a man who is not loyal to his own conscience to be loyal to his friend, or to the wife of any other man? Private infidelity and public falsehood are Siamese twins. Washington, of course, is an exceptional city. Society is probably no worse there than in every large city in the world. But it is corrupt. It is. Certainly virtue is not. And does any American citizen, however hurt, however shocked, however ashamed he may be, profess to be surprised by any kind of iniquity in Washington?

Not at all. The fact that one man has been shot there this winter, but that a dozen are not shot every winter. And the moral is, that so long as men are elected or appointed to the service with, not regard to their private characters—rather in open disregard of them—the most extraordinary evil so long private decency and public order will be constantly and flagrantly outraged.

But we must take Washington as a representative city. It is, in a certain sense, an epitome of the moral condition of the whole country. The work of the late tragedy is not the individual adultery or murder; it is a secret tendency in the popular mind to justify the one and excuse the other. And while that is the real public sentiment—while it is generally held that the law is made for the weak, the highest possible principle that can regulate human action may be properly set aside—so long Christian civilization is not safe. The most unlimited indulgence of the meanest passions will continue, because the unbridled indulgence of what we call the highest is justified.

But if there be any such thing as character or conduct in the world, if there be any slighest sentiment or truth—if there be any right and wrong at all in human relations, then the Washington tragedy is chey to come into play, except in precisely such cases as this, in extreme cases of every kind?

Of course in the ordinary course of transactions, and extenuations, and anger that conquers the will and the unbridled indulgence of what we call the conscious fury. But ought it to do so? Ought a man to be negatively praised for losing his moral control? Do we not, in fact, praise a man for slightly, precisely the worst ayes of all? The moral sense of every man tells him that for those very reasons—for the trials that tear at his heart-roots. That reason may be overcome, and the man commit a crime as violent as that which he condemns, but he is then not a man to be pitied as if he were a victim of fate. He is a man to be shot as he is a crime also.

Do you say that it is idle to talk, and that men will always revenge such wrongs in blood, and the world will excuse them?

What of that? The slaughters rend the hand that is raised against their cubs. So the Mohammedan, "Do not injure the dog that watches an eye for an eye. What we say is, that no gratification of any kind is justifiable which is not in accordance with the highest principle. Those men who profess to derive their religious law from another source than Mohammed, and who hold to a society separate from that of Christ, have a distinction system of morals is either practicable to the human nature as it is, or to be conceived. Whatever that do we mean when we say that a seducer is served right by being murdered on the spot? If we do not mean that, why do we praise Washington?

If men will always revenge such crimes in such ways then they will always be much more savage than they ought to be. For such revenge is not lovely, it is brutal. The revengeful man is in his nobility of nature, his character, his morality: just his savage is in his nobility of nature, but brutal. When a man loves a woman with his whole heart and she betrays him, the woe that quarters him is not that she has dishonored his bed, blood or by that of any one else. In the degree that he is a man, he feels that love is forbidden possible in the world. Grief may madden him; but with what or whom is he indignant? With a woman for preferring another man, or a man for enjoying and promoting that preference?

Suppose the woman to be his wife. It makes the grief more bitter, but it does not change its nature. Would any man assert a right in any woman which any other man could violate, except what her love gave him? Wedlock is love and law. A man has the individual affection in her as her husband, and if his legal rights are infringed he has a legal remedy. But the substance and soul of their relation is love, and when that is gone on either side, from whatever cause, the survivor may be justified in whatever he may do to what purpose or with whom shall be he angry?

In fact, it is hardly a question that the feeling which prompts revenge at such a time is simply rage at the scandal which the husband forces in the world; and this was eminently the case in the present instance. This is the "dishonor" which is talked about. For of course it is not dishonorable in a man that his wife is false, however terrible it may be.

It is really, therefore, the impulse of his own selfishness, and not the overmastery of his love for his wife, which leads a husband to murder her adulterer. It is as far from a genuine manly instinct as any other angry action. If a man swear, with set teeth, that he will shoot any man who tempts with his conjugal honor—who believes any the more that he is a loving, loyal husband? There is not an unfaithful husband in the world who would not, probably, say and do precisely the same thing—a man that he who loved and respected his wife least would be most likely to do it, by way of keeping his "honor" bright—his "honor" requiring him to kill another man for doing what he does not hesitate to do himself.

Of course there is a point of the same crime; and the murder of Mr. Key is not to be classed with that of Col. White in Salem, thirty years ago, who so coolly killed in the duel with Cooper. Nor is it to be held that the murderers in each case ought to receive the same fate. It is true, under the legal, aspect of the matter with which we are concerned, that the law is the same—but there us not forget that crimes are still crimes, however sharp the provocation.

And while we remember that we may have charity without sentimental sophistication; charity over the head of crime, over the criminal, and, above all, over the real victim of the tragedy, "Let her up tenderly" in your thoughts, all gentle souls! The accusations that you plead for the murderer are themselves eloquent for her—so young, so friendless, so rich a wild, fiery, wayward girl fascinated to her ruin. If you hasten to pardon crime to him who sins through hatred you have no excuse to be one in all this through love. Tenderly, tenderly, pious souls!

"Owning her weakness,
Her miss fortunes,
But leaving with weakness
All the rest of her human."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"TOM LOUNGER—In the Harper's Weekly issued February 5, 1859, I find, in the article, Punctuation, the note: County, Tennessee, who wishes to know if it is grammatical to say 'I will send either of the following (publisher's name) will send either of the following works,' etc., you say that the publisher is quite correct. Is this one of the points on which Lindley Murray, and those of some very respectable grammarians, is wrong?

"'Either' should be used when either is taken separately, and signifies the one or the other. 'Take any 'Either of the two,' 'either of the three,' etc."—BROWN & LINDLEY GRAMMAR, page 219.

"'Either' should be used when either of things taken separately, and signifies the one or the other. "'Either of the three' is ungrammatical, and should be 'either of the three.'"—KIRKHAM'S GRAMMAR, page 190, Distributive Pronouns.

"'Either relates to two persons or things only, taken separately, and signifies the one or the other. We may say 'Either of the three' is incorrect."—SMITH'S GRAMMAR, page 94, Distributive Pronouns, Note 14.

"'Either refers to two objects taken separately.'—COBB'S GRAMMAR, Distributive Pronouns, page 129.

"The pronominal adjectives either and neither relate to but two objects."—BULLION'S GRAMMAR, page 220.

"Either and neither are not properly to applied to more than two objects. "Either of the three" should be "Any of the three."—BUTLER'S GRAMMAR, Pronouns, pp. 115, pages 129.

"In Tower's English Grammar," an excellent work published by Harper & Brothers, I find, "Either has sometimes been used of one or another of many objects, as, "You may take either of these ten books." This use of the word should be avoided. Instead of either, the phrase any one or the word any should be employed."—Page 179.

"This last is the only authority for the use of the word either in reference to more than two objects that I can find; and Professor Fowler says that this use of it is not to be encouraged." Mr. Lounger will you please give me other authority for the use of either in the latter sense; or direct me to some one or the readers of Harper's Weekly who can? Also, that those interested may furnish me—a constant reader of your valuable paper—with the correct reference, if I am not in error, in the sense we, either may refer to any one of several classes, as in the Elder Book of Harper, page xviii.: 'Either to be making, or to be pointing,' etc. In this sentence is not either a conjunction, instead of a pronoun, and used in an unusual sense?

H. C."

Different construction.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

HINTS FOR THE MONTH.

IT was promised that the "Hints" published last week would be followed by others.

Examine pits of ruta baga turnips. If there are signs of decay, the good should be separated from the bad. Feed the latter, fit for animals, forthwith. Store the others where they will be free from frost. Those intended for the table ted ruta bagas last year. The winter was very mild, and an excess of covering withheld moisture to cause their decay. Not so this year. When feeding ruta bagas do not forget such oxen as have to take an active part in the spring work. Feed them those poor fellows, and don't have them lying down before the plow and harrow.

Hay stacked in the fields should be drawn home in dry and calm weather.

In bad weather, for out-door work, have harness cleaned and repaired. Examine old collars and get them ready for use. Working animals will perform their labor with much greater ease with well-fitting collars. Horses with galled shoulders are restless, fretful, and can not pull well. Before the plow they shrink from steady draught, and an ill-shaped, badly-made furrow is the consequence.

Top-dress grass and clover land with manuring and, old headlands, plaster of Paris, wood ashes mixed with two or three times their bulk of damp soil to prevent the lighter portions from being blown away; muck prepared with the salt and lime mixture, etc.

Use the lifting subsoil plow on hide-bound land; if moss-grown, harrow freely, and cut sod on bare places.

We have seen excellent results from running the subsoil lifter through winter and spring grain before sodding down. It mellows the soil for grass and clover roots.

Sow clover on rank land for soiling. In hot weather it will be ready for cutting in six weeks, and it prevents the necessity of giving them large quantities of water. Feed it to them in the stables, and your horses will be in better health than is looked for all over a field. There are many farmers who have no small grassable lands, and consequently a fence of the dwelling-house, and not provided with soiling to be fed in cool stables, have to go a long distance to get pasture for working animals at noon-time; they have to be caught, sometimes no very job, before their noon-feeding can begin. In the pasture-field they rock a shaky place rather than feed, and are fretted, irritated, and made feverish by the attacks of insects. In small, level land, and Scotland grows the value of clover grown for soiling. There is no country in the world where the clover plant grows better than America. A crop as ordinarily grown to be saved for winter feeding is not what is wanted for soiling, and, therefore, the cutting of clover from a common hay field is a very exceptional, and not answer the best purpose because it is not rank and juicy enough, and you have not a succession of crops the same season, as would be true of a piece of very rich land heavily top-dressed or treated with liquid and manure after each cut. Various oats are good for soiling, and in some cases Indian corn, Hungarian grass, barley, etc.

Brush land should be cleared for oats. The ashes from the burning of it will be good manure. Burn over and rake off the surface of stony piles-hills having a southern exposure. Sow none but the best seed. If in burning it does burn like chaff or mill-seeds than good, heavy, plump grain, and that you are compelled to sow it for want of better, give it a thin sowing. Where practicable, to take out seeds of weeds and the lightest of it, which will float off in the water. Soak the seed in the best, and in the finest condition, but it can not grow a healthy plant unless the life-giving power be in the seed. In every, if possible, calm water will float it. If the land be in seven-acre ridges, cut the seed with both hands, after the fashion of sowers. Double the quantity of work may thus be done, and we have always found the crop of oats so understood his business—in better manner.

Hot-beds should be well cared. See that they are properly covered with mats against late frosts and lifting frosts. In fine weather give the plants plenty of fresh air; aside, words, from the subject, telling the way to make and care them, may probably be referred to with advantage. Do not forget that tomatoes need a deep and copious mush heat, and the former good ventilation.

Cold frames for hardening off plants will soon be upon us the weather. On a fine spring's day we often think of what Dodd called "Obadiah" should never sleep while the sun is up."

Sow spinach as soon as possible; it is an excellent vegetable for early use. A little bed of spring rape, sown thickly, to be used as greens, will be valuable for variety's sake, and may be used up to the time of early cabbages.

Plant peas in rows two inches apart, and leave a space of two feet, or a little more, between every three rows. According to this plan two rows of stakes will do for every three rows of peas. Use the T-shaped marker, with teeth at proper distances apart, to mark out the rows.

Start Lima beans in inverted sods within doors, to be put out in mild weather. The young plants are tender and will not bear much cold.

Sow early turnip, rooted and long blood beets, carrots, parsnips, onion-seed to grow for next year, lettuce and radish-seed, and early horn carrots.

Do not plant potatoes, even for early use, except very few, until the weather shall have unmistakably lost all wintry character.

Transplanting of trees started during winter should be taken out before they begin to grow.

As soon as the ground is in good condition plant seeds procured through the winter intended for seed. Sprouts are apt to be broken off in the handling, thus devoting the seed-products power of the roots; they should therefore be planted before they sprout much.

Examine all seeds on hand as to quality and quantity; select very carefully to avoid loss of soil, waste of time, and loss of labor, and disappointment. Fork in manure spread on asparagus beds in the fall. Do not weed the plants. Top-dress with salt to fertilize them and keep down weeds. A rich soil will be conducive to its highest flavor. Flavor occasionally, and apply liquid manure in the absence of rains.

Clean drawer-beds, fork the ground, and replace the mulch, especially beneath choice vines.

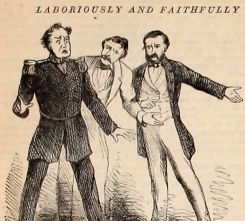
Manure quince-trees; a top-dressing of the salt and lime mixture will be conducive to the quality and quantity of the fruit.

Loosen the ground about grape-vines. Plant grape-cuttings at an angle of 45° or thereabouts, leaving two eyes out, to rows eighteen inches apart, and six inches apart in the rows. Cuttings made in the fall, from the middle of October to the last week in November, are better than those cut in the spring; the latter having been dried by the sun and winds of winter, and are, therefore, not in condition to strike soon as readily as those kept plump in damp sand, free from frost, in a cellar.

Loosen the ground about grape-vines. Plant

Yᴱ STORY OF Yᴱ NAVY YARD Wᴴ IS AT BROOKLYN.

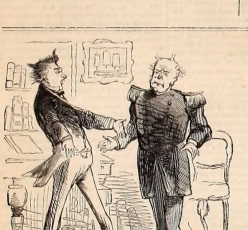
LABORIOUSLY AND FAITHFULLY COMPILED FROM Yᴱ RECORDS OF Yᴱ INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE, 1859.



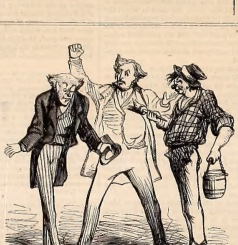
Yᵉ members of Congress from yᵉ city of New York demand that the Commodore at yᵉ Navy Yard shall instantly give employment to their "friends."

Said friends being part thieves, part knaves, part fools, all drunken, all ignorant of yᵉ duties required of workmen at yᵉ Navy Yard, but all capable of voting many times on election day, of driving peaceable citizens from the polls, and of bullying primary conventions.

Yᵉ Commodore declaring that under the circumstances he can not give employment to yᵉ drunken, thievish, and rowdy "friends," yᵉ members for yᵉ city rush in wrath and tears to yᵉ Sec. of yᵉ Navy, and weep bitterly at yᵉ neglect with wʰ their friends are treated, cursing yᵉ Commodore up yᵉ hill and down yᵉ dale.

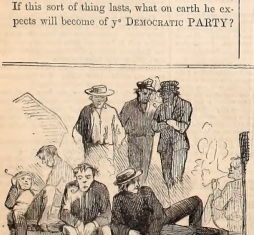


Yᵉ Sec. of yᵉ Navy sends for yᵉ stiff-necked Commodore and asks him, in sore distress and wrath, If this sort of thing lasts, what on earth he expects will become of yᵉ DEMOCRATIC PARTY?



Yᵉ Commodore being thus brought to reason, a member of Congress presents a "friend" to yᵉ master painter, and requires that he be employed—otherwise he will "prefer charges." Yᵉ master painter employs yᵉ friend directly.

Yᵉ workmen at yᵉ Navy Yard wʰ is in Brooklyn, get up a "voluntary subscription" to purchase a watch and chain for their "friend," yᵉ member of Congress, Mr. ——, in recognition of his patriotic services. Yᵉ method employed with yᵉ stiff-necked workmen.



Orders are received at yᵉ Navy Yard to fit out nine ships for sea, and yᵉ workmen have very hard work indeed. Yᵉ "friends" laboring "with a will."

Yᵉ Commodore, in despair, abandons yᵉ attempt to have work done, and throws himself on his country.

MORAL.—Yᵉ national vessel Arctic is fitted out to catch yᵉ British cruisers, takes eighteen days to sail to Cuba, breaks down twelve times on yᵉ way, and is finally towed into port by a friendly British craft.

THE EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER "PRINCESS" AT CONRAD'S POINT, ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

EXPLOSION OF THE "PRINCESS."

We give herewith an illustration of the fearful catastrophe which took place at Conrad's Point, on the Mississippi, on Sunday, 27th ult. The steamboat Princess, from Vicksburg to New Orleans, exploded her boiler at an early hour on Sunday morning, and burned to the water's edge. Four hundred passengers were on board at the time, two hundred of whom are lost and missing, mostly residents of Louisiana and Mississippi. A large number of those on board were ladies

Those known to be killed are, J. W. Seymour, of Baton Rouge, Louisiana; Mr. Calhoun, of Maysville, Kentucky; the pilot and assistant engineer of the Princess; H. B. Murphy, of St. Louis; J.

PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM, OF PRUSSIA, PRESENTING HIS BABY TO HIS HOUSEHOLD.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Hodges, of Mississippi; and three whose names are unknown.

Among the missing are Charles Bannister and L. Howard, representatives from New Orleans to the State Legislature, Joseph Clark, several clerks and Samuel Wartz, of Virginia.

No other Northern or Eastern names have as yet been ascertained. A large number were badly scalded and otherwise injured.

The loss of property are a total loss. The former was one of the finest on the river.

A late dispatch from New Orleans says: "A local arrival from the wreck of the Pocahontas brings a number of the wounded. It was foggy at the time of the explosion, and the Pocahontas, being behind time, had too much steam on."

A Baton Rouge dispatch says: "The engineer is reported to say he would reach New Orleans certain on time or blow up. The engineer was cut in two. About a hundred passengers were wounded, and many of them are in a dangerous and dying state. It is impossible yet to ascertain the number of the lost. Several boats have saved many lives. There is much excitement here, and all along the river. Numerous unrecognized bodies are being found."

PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM AND HIS BABY.

We have already chronicled the birth of the son and heir of Prince Frederick William of Prussia. As, under the circumstances, the little stranger is an object of more than usual interest to the world even in the United States, we give on the preceding page an illustration of a scene which took place the day after his birth.

At eleven o'clock in the morning of the day following the accouchement of the Princess, we are told that the father summoned all the members of his household into the nursery and the mother confined to them. The baby was asleep, but the daylight of the attendants, which could not be repressed, soon awakened it. The Court Gazette stated that he is said by his grandfather to be "as lusty a recruit as you would wish to see."

Courtiers are already at work proving that the Prince must have a brilliant destiny.

The celebrated astronomer and natural philosopher, Dr. August, writes to the Vossische Zeitung: "While the last piece of the planetary ring is descending to Heaven, the constellation known to the astronomers under the name of 'Frederick, Prince of,' and baptized in the harmony of old Prints of Prussia, stood in the zenith of Berlin. This extraordinary conjunction of the heavens took place at the exact moment of the birth of the young Prince. Half an hour later, another constellation, 'Sirius Storm and Sword,' culminated to the over Berlin." Now, if horoscope-taking be worth a great, this infant must at least be destined to become an Alexander."

LITERARY.

MR. J. M. ESTEBO MILLER, an artist of fine talent, has produced an engraving which is worthy of special notice even in this day of fine art works. Mr. Miller has designed and executed it himself, and as an illustration of a high order of art, done with the pencil as the graver, it may be considered unsurpassed in recent productions. The design of the engraving, which is of the largest size, is to represent the great facts in the history of America. The composition is remarkable, introducing an immense number of figures, but with great judgment and good effect. The first prominence is occupied by the Norsemen on the right and Columbus and his followers on the left. These are boldly drawn, in fine position, and with careful study of costumes and countenance. The figures are large, but these are often seen in the distance. The Norsemen, especially, are introduced admirably, and this portion of the engraving is one of the finest specimens of work we have ever seen. Beyond these are the Pilgrims of New England and other emigrants, and the third prominent group in the edge embraces the scenes of the Revolution, battle and death on one hand, and, on the other hand, the great people assembled in mass under the flag of the country. A symbolical representation of the Union, with a statue of the Father of his country, the crowning idea of the composition. Notwithstanding our extraordinary habit of dishonoring monuments, we can not but feel with this of Mr. Miller's. It is a most artistic and interesting engraving, which we are persuaded our lovers of fine art will find a graver will enjoy. It is curious in being entirely done like a map, and we do not find any single work on this immense sheet. Unlike other fine works of art, which may be enjoyed for their beauty and then forgotten, this is a study for hours, and will hang on the wall, will be a subject of new discoveries of interest and historical instruction for years.

It is a great pleasure to announce the publication of such works as Allibone's DICTIONARY OF AUTHORS, of which we have received the first volume from Childs & Peterson, Philadelphia. The full title of the book is "A CRITICAL DICTIONARY OF ANY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, and British and American Authors, living and deceased; containing thirty thousand Biographies and Literary Notices, with forty Indexes of Subjects, by S. Austin Allibone." The title promises much, and we have a very careful examination of the volume before us, we are bound to say that the book, thus far, excuses up to the promise. Emphatically no man can do without it who wishes to have at hand a great source of literary information, and a constant and safe reference for books, authors, and subjects.

The industry which Mr. Allibone has displayed deserves the hearty thanks of the American and English literary world, and will receive it. Every man who has written and published a sermon, or a tract, or a song, in English, between two covers, is here catalogued and indexed. When we have tried the volume by our own literary, and not nothing which has escaped the diligent research of the author. Errors and omissions there may be, and possibly are; but the volume is a curiosity of patience and perseverance, and one which library shelves can not afford to do without. We suggest to the editor that some of his sketches of biography are of greater length than the general reader of the book demands. They are readable portions of the book, indeed; but does any one expect to find readable matter in these volumes? and will they be read, except by critics to be criticised? An obvious exception is the sketch account as to Bishop Berkeley, the personal recollections of Mr. Tickner and Mr. Everett form deeply interesting pages which justify the lengthy sketch of the author. The sketch the first portions might have been well condensed. The article on Irving, it is to be hoped, is a specimen of our remark. But this is no blemish on the book, and the reader will perceive that the author plainly has a purpose in giving us no more or no more. We would direct the attention of the book-hunter and book purchaser to this dictionary, to which we shall hereafter refer as occasion serves. The general plan and execution of the volume are admirable, opened a list of his published works with the year of publication; and in most instances, where possible, add a brief estimate of the man's ability, either from contemporary critics or by the editor.

TICKNOR, literally translated by Henry Thomas Riley, and the same considers in George Colman's much verse translation, by Dr. Dio Lewis, and some of Harper's "Classical Library." Here, for seventy-five cents, any one may own the best of Horace, and for the same price, in the same book, may read in letter English—if blank verse to better—the comedies of the Cothurnus, which are the wit well worth reading; and if the scholar, who prefers the original, desires a cheap text for his study, he will do well not to disdain Mr. Riley's admirable renderings.

"What is that and emphatic title for a book is this? "BOOK," by Newman Hall, published by Carter & Brothers. The man is a preacher of the ordinary good novels of the same author. The scenes are more powerfully outlined, and the men and women more vigorously drawn than in "Margaret Maitland" itself. Here, for example, is the scene in which the father's confession of error of England, of the sheriff's officer, commanded to arrest the body of the old Laird of Lochlee, during his dead and in the hearse on the way to burial, and actually seizing the dead body and stopping the funeral. The scene of the arrest, and the indignation of the sons of the dead man, and the rebuking effect, form a fine picture of the book in point of color. The pathos of many scenes, too, is worthy of any writer; so that we are confident in placing the book before all among the novels of the season.

(Harper & Brothers, publishers.)

"CHAPTERS, LETTERS, AND LANDSCAPE, IN AFRICA, is a very pleasant book, from James Challen & Son, Philadelphia; which, although it is travel over the usual route, is unpretending, simply sketchy to be agreeable, and gives so much pleasant travel in the beaten track as to make the reader the most betraveled reader will enjoy it. The external style of the book is artistic.

Author by Peter's new poem, THE GOLDEN AGE, published by E. Goodenough, in this city, lies on our table. Mr. Peter, choice in the matter of appearance in a story around which he throws the charm of verse. He writes with enthusiasm, and this is one of the strong points of the poet. He thinks gracefully, and graceful thought is by no means a unconsiderable requisite in the novels of the imaginations are of the purest order, and the purity which characterizes the poem is one of its greatest ornaments.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 28th February, in the Senate, after another refusal to take up the Homestead Bill, the Committee of Conference were appointed to meet similar Committees of the House on the Deficiency Bill, consisting of the amendments to the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, and Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bills. Senator Mr. Houston made his farewell address to the Senate, in which he expressed his regret at leaving the body of congress. The Post-Office Appropriation Bill was then taken up, appropriating $8,000,000, was then taken up, appropriating $8,000,000, was then passed. Mr. Houston moved to take up the Homestead Bill, which was rejected and indefinitely postponed. The Post-Office Appropriation Bill was then taken up. Mr. Phelps asked leave to report a bill to revise the postage-rate and to abolish the franking privilege in certain cases. He then moved to go into committee on the General Appropriation Bill, which was done. A motion to strike out the Coast Survey appropriation was unsuccessful. The amendments of the committee were then put upon the accounts of the late Superintendent of Public Printing, and the House adjourned, having passed the bill.

On Tuesday, 1st March, in the Senate, the credentials of Mr. Pugh, Senator elect from Ohio, were presented. The Post-Office Appropriation Bill was taken up in Committee, and a debate was appended similar to that on the Post-routes Bill, raising the rate of postage to five cents, and abolishing the franking privilege. It was agreed that the Post-office advertising should hereafter be done only in the two papers of the largest circulation in each State, and two in Washington City. A motion by Mr. Bigler, that Mr. Brown, formerly a printer and contractor, be allowed to carry the mails by any route he may choose, provoked a long debate, in the course of which it came out that the letter by that conveyance would probably be done to sixty dollars. The amendment was rejected. The Post-Office Bill, with the amendments, was then reported to the Senate, and the latter were subsequently acted upon by the Senate, and most of them agreed to. One of long reduce the contract of Butterfield & Co. The Bill was finally passed. Up to 12. The Naval Appropriation Bill was taken up at 10 o'clock at night.——In the House, the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was finally passed, after action on the Senate's amendments. The Ocean Mail Appropriation Bill, after debate, was passed. The Senate's amendments by the House, by 11 majority. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up.

On Wednesday, 2d, in the Senate, the Post-Office Appropriation Bill was then passed. A great number of the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up. Mr. Bigler moved to take up the Homestead Bill, which was rejected. Mr. Houston then spoke in opposition to the Homestead Bill, illustrating the President to issue Treasury notes for twenty millions, which was rejected. The Senate then adjourned, 24 to 19. There was no Session.——In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill, authorizing the President to confer on Commodore Paulding a vote of thanks, were taken up. The Naval Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and the Senate's amendments were agreed to. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were acted upon. The House refused to concur in the Senate's amendment to the bill of the St. Clair Flats was passed by 95 majority. The Ocean Mail Appropriation Bill was then taken up for discussion. The President was requested to communicate any information in his possession with regard to the difficulties in the late treaty with that country which discriminated against American vessels in favor of those of England or against in Switzerland. A great deal of conflicting information was presented by members on the contradictory motions; but finally the Senate's amendments were concurred in. The House then went into Committee of the whole on the Naval Appropriation Bill, and after inserting the vessels for the Paraguay Expedition exploring the Dead Sea, the Committee rose and the bill was removed; but finally the appropriation for the Expedition was given, and the Bill finally passed and concurred. The Senate Post-route Bill was allowed to lie over for the present.

On Thursday, 3d, in the Senate, the House bill providing for the erection of the Custom-House, considered. Committee, was passed. The Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was then taken up in private session, and discussed at great length. An additional appropriation of $1,000,000 was made for the Post-Office Bill. The Senate then went into Executive session, and soon adjourned. An appropriation of $178,000 for four years was made for the Light-House Board, to complete the work in the Gulf of Mexico. An appropriation of $500,000 to complete the Treasury. The sum of $1,000,000 was granted for further discussion, and amendments proposed and lost, and the Bill passed 24 to 19. The Post-Office Bill, from the President, appealing to Congress to preserve the peace with Mexico, was read. The Speaker of the Chair of Congress, and there is no appropriation yet to pay the expenses of the Commissioners to Mexico. The Senate's information submitted by the Secretary of State. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up, and the final year nearly eighteen millions will be expended, with a corresponding reduction of the force of the harbors ports, and no means to meet them. Thus the continued policy of the Democratic party. Thus it is impossible to avoid this catastrophe unless provision is made against it which can be remedied by action of the present Congress. If this was the first instead of the last session of Congress, it would be a matter of little moment, but if it transcended to-morrow thirteen States will not be represented in the next Congress. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Senate's amendments to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, and non-concurrence of the House, were then taken up with much earnestness. The Senate refused to recede from their amendments which were not satisfactory to the House. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up, and a hearty concurrence, as it involved the sacrifice of the Post-office Appropriation Bill. Mr. Phelps, of Vermont, declared that he would insist on having the amendments to that bill voted upon separately. After a long struggle, Senator Broderick gave way, and the House agreed to the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill. The Senate's amendments to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill were then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Post-office Bill was last.——In the House, the Deficiency Bill was then taken up, and the Senate's bill by the Chairman and adopted. The House then decided that the reference of the Senate's amendments to the Post-office Bill was then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Senate's amendments to the Post-office Bill were then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Senate's amendments to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, and after some debate, a resolution offered by Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, was adopted, that the Senate's amendments, to be returned to the Senate, as the proposed increase of the Post-office Bill was unconstitutional, which can only originate in the House, was adopted, by a vote of 116 to 71. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill, being a similar proposition, were then dropped, and the Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Senate's amendments to the Post-office Bill, to carry into effect the treaty with China, was passed, and concurred in by a vote of 116 to 71. The Senate's amendments to the Deficiency Bill were then taken up, and the House refused to concur. The Senate's amendments to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, and after some debate, a resolution offered by Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, was adopted, that the Senate's amendments, to be returned to the Senate, as the proposed increase of the Post-office Bill was unconstitutional, which can only originate in the House, was adopted, killed about twenty-five years ago in a duel with Middlemass Sherburne, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

A London newspaper has it that Mr. Henry T. Tuckerman is in that city, just from New York, with a view of courting Dickensites the United States, and Mr. Arthur Smith will accompany him. Mr. Albert Smith says that Mr. Hiley Bond, an old friend of his, is a gentleman and positively not an acting, and that it is just possible that he may become the lessee of a theatre in the Strand. On the evening of January 24, the Hon. John Cochrane, a great dinner-party at Washington to the ex-President of the United States, Secretary of State, Governors, Ringgoes, Simmons, Shaw, Colright, Hart, Billings, and other Washington notabilities, and the richest himself inferior eloquence. He comes of the old Livingston stock.

A letter in a Boston newspaper says that the visitation number of the Cow Chapel will be preached on the 31st of the Rev. Dr. Oggins, by the Rev. Mr. Hedge, who is to take for his text, "If we are not mistaken, a few of a new kind is already in the pasture." The Rev. Mr. Longfellow, of Brooklyn.

Samuel T. Gallagher for the town of Wallkill, New York, has attached, and offers for sale, "A pair of blooded horses, the property of Mr. Bowne." The book, in satisfaction for taxes due said town by the land owner.

The Washington correspondent of the New Orleans Bee says that Lord Lyons has presented a copy of Mr. Mr. Corcoran's son-in-law, that a member of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet has refused to be invited to dine at a brilliant a member of the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan's successor.

Miss Bet. Sturgeon has abandoned the contemplated trip to America certainly for the present year.

A little gentleman, aged fifteen years and a little lady, aged fourteen years, who were at school together at Alsager, arrived at an Union on Sunday morning last, having eloped from home with the intention of being made one flesh. The father of the boy followed them, and on coming into communion, and took the couple home, where the young gentleman was shut up in his bedroom on bread and water, and the young lady was thus brought to a sense of her duty.

Rebecca Argyrotti, late of Bologna, was executed by being shut down by a dog while walking in the street a few days ago, and on examining the animal's mouth a ring in it has not been able to leave the house since, or still to be, from physical impossibility, as large as the moon. A similar accident in the hall of the Astor House was described for some time by a gentleman named lawyer, Nicholas Hill.

Sir Gerrard Ryglin, of Rhode Island, after an honorable public career, has returned to the practice of law. The present Chief Magistrate of the United States, Governor Dye, has declined a commission for Governor. He has been succeeded by Mr. Jeremiah Clemens, who has become a merchant and resides in Huntsville, Alabama.

Two young ladies belonging to Newburyport, a few days since, wishing to go "down to the beach," purchased skates and the Merrimac to the cars and railroad, and made their passage of two miles in twenty minutes. The same portion of the way there was a strong head wind, or the feat might have been performed in less than half.

The rumor which has been going the rounds of the press, that Lord Justice Turner intended to retire from his judgeship in the Supreme Court of the United States, for Privileged Orders from the Presidency, is wholly without foundation, and Lord Justice Turner does not intend to resign his judgeship for many years to come.

"A Hurdet Bull" was recently given at Chicago, at which no gentleman was admitted without some hairy lamer to the floor. At the close of the evening the beautiful ageshes demonstrative of shaving, was the following:

"Mary—Always, Lambs, Lambs, Lambs, Lambs, Lambs, Lambs: no noble to be hardened, no perfect to be botched by the bandage of blazers."

The entertainment closed with the "Bearded Quadrille," a dance made for the occasion.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

A LION AT LARGE ON BOARD SHIP.

The Himalaya, screw troop ship, Commander John Sconce, arrived at Spithead on Sunday last from Montreal. She left Montreal on the 24th ultimo, and Tuesday on the 25th, having passed Quebec, had to stop a number of presents to her majesty the Queen of Great Britain. The Duke of Newcastle, the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Lyons, and Lord Palmerston, the last with his wife, two Arab horses, and six ostriches, together with several cases of valuable merchandise. But the most alarming incident occurred on the Himalaya's passage home. On the 3d inst., when the ship was steaming on the part of his keeper (a Moor), the lion, a fine full-grown animal, burst through the bars of his cage and speedily cleared the main deck of human beings. As may be imagined, the animal's appearance on deck caused no small alarm to the ship, and the passengers and crew rushed pell-mell down the companion ladder, the lion making savage in the rigging of the vessel. The king of the beasts, however, soon found his way down again to the lower accommodation, for the hatches were quickly battened up in an adjoining stall, and the latter showed fight by making a spring at the hatch, and had it not been for the attack by tearing his opponent with one stroke of the paw. The lion, it is said, kept watch over the dead for some time, until a rope was thrown over his head and hauled taut. The animal struggled for a few minutes, but his legs were secured, and he was hauled back to his den. As for the carnage and carnage of the lion's victim, the cook of night have occurred; as it was, the lion was not secured until he had received a severe wound from an axe blow with a meat-chopper.

ELOPED WITH A POLICEMAN.

Lately one of the guardians of the lives and property of our kingdom's subjects in the metropolis was guilty of a breach for a couple of days. He proceeded to Dorchester, where he soon saw the object of his affections. Nothing was unbroken. He was not content with. Now the scuffle was over, and the lion was secured. Miss Sharp said to her, "Is he aimed at nothing less than Miss Sarah, a rough old gentleman, who had left his uncle in a suspicious state of health, and had gone to Friday night. They staid all night at a relative's, and started early morning for Gravesend. The young lady's father learned their whereabouts, and pursued them. He said, in hurried tones to the lady, "Your mother is in hospital to Lavender, where the runaways were married. "I am afflicted beyond measure," was the reply. "I am your mother Miss ——?" She replied, "Yes." "Then I must inform her decease." "Mother dead!" "Yes, Mr. Policeman No. —, here interposed, and asked, "Where was the marriage?" "Gravesend." "Then I must get a license." "Where?" "Dorchester." "Let's be off," and he said the official. "Spend a police-officer from Gravesend," shouted the lady. "Police-officer! Police in charge." This staggered the official, and he was by-and-by to start any how. The young lady's father understand; a license, and not a warrant, was procured, and he followed the fugitives to Dorchester. The lady appeared in charge of her captor, before the parsons, and not the magistrate, and she was bound "to love, honour, and obey" Policeman No. —.

A LITTLE OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

The Literary Gazette publishes a letter lately addressed by Mr. Landor to the editor of Morning Herald, which is as follows: "As they were at one time great friends, but, on meeting in Paris after seven years, the gentleman accused the other that Landor's conduct in his late quarrels with a woman had not been creditable, and he "cut" him. So much for Paris.

Mr. Lord.—Now I am recovering from an illness of several months' duration, occasioned no little by your nobody's rude reception of me, I am desirous to inform my family and of numerous Florentines, I must request you in the gentlest terms of the occurrence. It was the only personal indignity I ever received. We had been, my lord, and varying on deceptitude and indecision, for my sole might have occurred; as it was, no language I am unobservant of distinctions. You, by the favor of a minister, are Marquis of Normanby; I, by the grace of God, am Walter Savage Landor."

FRANCE.

HOW THE PAY OF THE DEPUTIES WAS SETTLED.

The correspondent of the Daily News writes on Wednesday: "A very extraordinary circumstance occurred to-day. The pay of the deputies is fixed at 2,500f. per month, and the ordinary duration of the session is three months, in which case the pay would be 7,500f. But the Senate, which is composed of 150 members, and which has been grouped for a day or two without any apparent reason, has resolved on enabling the Ministers to touch a fourth month's pay as a reward for docility. This resolution was carried by 130 to 120 votes. Eleven of the seven Bureaux sent in their respective committee-rooms for the first time this session, and the result was a decision by a leading majority to appeal to answer an official question whether they would or would not receive their pay. The vote was 11 to 1, and the sum accepted of 2,500 francs per month. The deputies were, however, unanimous in their resolve to do their work, and, if possible, to do it without injuring their own personal interests. They would like very much to get rid of 10,000 francs, but they would not like to have it thrown to them, and they think it highly indicative that the Senate should have had the tact to divine precisely how much of the bureaux refused to answer the question. In the Corps Législatif, on the 1st inst., there was a similar resolution: 'Whereas, under existing circumstances, the pay cannot be refused to the Corps Législatif in a positive sense the bureau passes to the order of the day.' I have not yet been able to discover a clause of appeal, and, therefore, I can hardly suppose that it can have been carried."

THE PRESS AND THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH.

The Times correspondent writes: "The Government papers of this morning are, as might have been expected, brilliant, for there were plenty of subjects who had no other than to be so. The Constitutionnel is full of praise of the young Serdinian Princess—or, as the organ of Paris, the Pays, calls her, the Princess Clotilde. The Bonaparte Company, who have always ready for imperial visits an air of welcome, have been preparing for the arrival of the Princess, and are glad to spread their velvet out to intercept the blisters of the Princess's feet. Her arrival at Paris is to be on Saturday next, and the marriage is declared, because then the saint pulled out the pedigree of the Princess, and found her to be legitimate. Perhaps in the rest of the route not a sound of welcome was heard but from the mouths of the police. At Lyons, at Dijon, at Bastia, where an immense crowd of work-people were expected, there was not a single workman present. Some of the artelier, but as the last carriage rolled by an ouvrier in a blouse cried out, 'Vive la Pologne!' The cry was responded to by another ouvrier across the road: 'Oh! you are a fool! Don't you see that it is the Princess?' The Princess Clotilde is not more popular than the rest, knowing that she is to be the wife of Prince Napoleon, and that by his face. The gentleman walked away with it all of a man who could not see it in it."

THE EMPRESS AND CLOTHIER.

"You have no business and published the pretty little speech of the Emperor to the Mayor of Chambery accompanying a ring, and you have probably received it. The Empress has also received a present, accompanied with the usual speech. The Empress, it is said, on Majesty opposed it to the last, and only consented to receive it because it was the wish of the Emperor. How much it must have cost her to pen the lines referred to, together with the sacrifice of her self-denying objection, both than herself established in a court alongside of her, and which was not to be refused. It is said that she had the spectacle of the Princess Clotilde on her knees before her father, and the Princess Clotilde and the Empress Eugenie to like manner before Napoleon plead, and that the Empress, in the midst of her tears, was heard to say to the pope of the monarchies on whom tears fell without. Such is the story told in the world of Paris, and it would have been a touching picture. Some people accepted the Empress Eugenie to make a sacrifice of her personal feelings to the interests of her family, and to the excellent maxim, that Whatever one is compelled to do, it is best to do with a good grace."

LOVE IN A CONVENT.

An advocate of Rouen, M. René de Malherbe, who died in 1855, left a widow, Madame de Malherbe, and children. Soon after after a Count d'——, much her senior, fell in love with her, and she with him. Her children, however, were opposed to the match, and placed her in a convent at Nantes to avoid him, she ended by respecting the wishes of her children. The count, in the meantime, the convent she gave him several meetings, and that an intimate connection was established between them. Not after a while her conduct became known to the superior of the convent, who, in order to put an end to such a disgraceful state of affairs, she confessed her intimacy to her husband's nephew, M. Ernest de Malherbe, who was living with her family at Rouen. The Count followed her there, and a marriage was arranged, but the Archbishop of Rouen and Church was celebrated between them. Subsequently the Count de Malherbe, the husband's nephew, commenced proceedings before the Civil Tribunal of Rouen to compel her to some other persons. The consequence was that the family commenced proceedings against the Count de Malherbe family, assembled, and decided that for her misconduct she should be deprived of the guardianship of her two children. The civil tribunal of Evreux, before which the appeal was brought, confirmed it. The case was lately appealed to the Imperial Court of Rouen and the decision was reversed. The court, in its judgment, severely blamed the conduct of the guardians, and declared that the mother may be deprived of the guardianship only when she has proved of the guardians, and that, therefore, it therefore quashed the first decision.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

The Siecle says: "A case of spontaneous combustion has taken place, which, if it be confirmed, will be, it is alleged, sad forty-six, named Henriette L——, who worked in a shop in the Rue Saint Honoré. She was accustomed to the use of spirituous liquors. As she had not for some days been seen at her work, her fellow-workwomen went to her house, and, finding the door locked, went to her room, but the master thereof was not there. They then went to the house of the deceased, and, at a little distance, two feet, and a slight, but the business to which she belonged. There also stood near a chair and a table, and the latter had upon it a glass in which some spirit remained. It did not appear that any fire had been lighted in the apartment, but the police were inclined to suppose that the spirit with which her system was impregnated caught fire from burning a candle with a hook."

A MADMAN MURDERER.

A horrible event took place at Remonchamp (Vosges), on night or two ago. A man, named Nicolas Jacquot, aged of age, had questioned signs of madness, and on the night in question, when in bed, he threatened to strangle his mother, who slept in an adjoining room. His wife, being alarmed at his violence, ran to her mother-in-law's room, and, on returning with her, found her husband in the act of strangling his mother. She urged on the assistance of neighbors. When she returned she found, to her horror, the dead body of her mother extended on the floor, and by its side the corpse of two of her children; like, that the third child was in a similar state, and was lying in the garden. Paroxetine had killed them all with excessive violence. The wife of the murderer escaped, and captured when standing before the church, and placed in confinement. A few days before this event it appeared that he had wounded his wife in three places, though not seriously.

A PLEASANT CHOICE.

A M. Feuillet was travelling in the neighbourhood at a time when an explosion took place. M. F. was terrified by the sight of a woman who was near him. She went in at the embankment, and passed out to the back, so that there were three feet of the spit in front and three feet of the spit behind. M. F. was exposed to the mercy-shock. His position demanded all the resources of art. A surgeon was accordingly called for, who, on examining the patient's pulse, and asked him where he was suffering.

"In the abdomen," replied the wounded man.

"Then," said the surgeon, "you have a choice."

The patient thereupon detailed the sad incident of his being thrown. The surgeon shook his head, and replied:

"Are they subject to this accident, Sir, in your family?"

"No," replied the patient, "not that I know. My father and mother are very old, and have never been spitted. So with regard to my brothers and sisters, and my children and aunts."

"Very well, Sir. I required that information in order to ascertain your chance. You experience, I suppose, considerable difficulty in lying on your back?"

"Yes, I do, indeed," was the reply.

"It is not of course possible for you to lie on your stomach?"

"I experience great difficulty in doing so."

"Then, Sir, I regret to say that I cannot for you to lie on your side?"

"That is the only position I can lie in."

"That will suffice, Sir. It only remains to determine upon the operation. Here the indications are very precise: either we can leave the spit—but then you will have to remain in bed for the rest of your life—or we can pull it out, but then it is not probable that you will survive the operation. Which, Sir, do you prefer—to live in bed, or, possibly, you must decide for either one treatment or the other."

MONDINE'S LAST GAME.

The Express correspondent writes: "M. Delouney is a French gentleman, who has been for many years a student of the Chinese language, and who has reached a certain degree of proficiency, and who, moreover, is a good player, M. Arnous de Rivière, a gentleman who has also studied the language of a years and a half, and who, only a few days ago, I also de Rivière lose five seconds' time in a game of chess. The Chinese gentleman was often played with the famous Labordonnais, the best player of his time, and the French gentleman was always constantly holding up on his miracles who would have been the best player of his time. Labordonnais for years or more all this pother about what he might call the Chinese gentleman, but M. Delouney, not content with vaunting the defeats of Labordonnais, challenged Mondine to a game of chess. The Chinese gentleman said to give him, the aforesaid Delouney, the odds of a knight, but this he would not consent to, and offered a similar bet. Mr. Morphy's means having been mislaid by the Paris police, M. Delouney's friends sent word to M. Delouney that he would play him a few games, and that he, M. Delouney, would receive the odds of a knight. Before the first sitting commenced, Delouney said to Mondine, 'Now, you must play your best, for I shall play my best.' Mondine replied, 'Oh, I always play my best.' Score of the games:

Morphy, M.	1
Drawn, 0

PRESENTATION OF AMERICANS AT COURT.

The Express correspondent says: "On Tuesday evening a large number of the Paris and Parisian world of the Tuileries, after which a ball, in honour of the Princess Clotilde and Prince Napoleon, was given in the evening in the palace. The ladies and gentlemen presented had been invited to be at the palace by half-past eight o'clock, and the Emperor, with the Empress, proceeded to make the acquaintance of a few American citizens. Mr. Mason, the American Minister, and gentlemen presented to their Majesties on Tuesday night:

Mr. and Mrs. Mason, Mr. and Mrs. Belmont; Mr. and Mrs. Michel Heine, New Orleans; Mr. and Mrs. Leland Loudon; Mr. and Mrs. Bayard, Mr. Browne, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. James Codman, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Lowell, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Ward, Mr. Bell, Boston; Mrs. C. A. Canonidge, Boston; Miss Bell, Miss A. J. Lowell, Miss Ward, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Cosset, New York; Mr. De T. Taylor, New York; Mr. and Mrs. S. Thorndike, Philadelphia; Mr. and Miss S. Bunny, New York; Mrs. C. and Miss A. J. Lowell, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham, Mrs. William Biddle, Pennsylvania; Hon. Judge Lyon and Miss Bayard, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Bayard Clarke, Baltimore; Hon. H. S. Russell and Mr. J. Parker, Boston; Dr. Mrs. Bowditch, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Bowditch, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Bowditch, Boston; Mr. and

THE SICKLES TRAGEDY AT WASHINGTON.

We illustrate this week, as chroniclers of passing events, one of the most awful tragedies that ever occurred in this country—being nothing less than the homicide of the District Attorney of the District of Columbia by a member of Congress for the city of New York. To render the painful story thoroughly intelligible, we must go back a few years.

Six years ago Mr. Daniel E. Sickles, then a prominent New York politician without office, married Teresa Bagioli, the daughter of an Italian music teacher residing at New York. Mr. Sickles is a good-looking man, as his portrait testifies; he was fond of gayety, and had been charged with undue fondness for the sex. Rumor was busy with his name not only before but at the time of his marriage; but it is not worth while to repeat the scandals which were current in reference to himself and the family into which he married. Suffice it to say that the lady he married in 1853 was seventeen years of age, very pretty and girlish, and extremely attractive in manner; well educated and charming in every way. Mr. Sickles was appointed Secretary of Legation to Mr. Buchanan, Minister to London. He took his bride with him, and both husband and wife were well received in the aristocratic society of England. Mrs. Sickles, especially, was vastly admired by the English; her society was courted by the greatest people of the land.

Returning to this country before the Presidential election, Mr. Sickles exerted himself actively in favor of Mr. Buchanan, and was elected Member of Congress at the time his patron was chosen President. Since then Mr. Sickles has resided partly at Washington and partly in New York. When here he occupied a cottage on the Hudson, near the extremity of Manhattan Island, whom his wife dispensed hospitality in a most gracious manner. At Washington he lived in the most fashionable quarter, on Lafayette Square, within a stone's-throw of the President's house. Here, too, his hospitalities were liberal and graceful. Every Tuesday Mrs. Sickles had a reception. Every Thursday Mrs. Sickles gave a dinner. At intervals during the season they gave balls, which were always crowded by the best people; and though Mr. Sickles was not supposed to be wealthy—he had no apparent income but that which he derived from a legal practice which was obviously limited—his balls were as perfect as those of the opulent Senators and Cabinet Ministers with whom he vied. Of these entertainments Mrs. Sickles was the soul and the charm. There was something inexpressibly fascinating and delightful about her fresh girlish face, and her sweet, amiable manner. She was so kind to a raw boy just let loose on society as to a Secretary of State; great and small, rich and poor, Democrat and Republican—she treated all with the same unvarying gentleness and lady-like amiability. No wonder she was a favorite at Washington.

For some months polite society at Washington—which has been greatly exercised in reference to the flirtation of a great foreign Minister—has been scarcely less troubled about the relations between Mr. Key and Mrs. Sickles. They were always together. At balls, at parties, in the street, at receptions, at theatres, every where, Mrs. Sickles was invariably accompanied by Phil Barton Key, District Attorney. Mr. Key was a man of fine presence, tall stature, and winning manners. His family was good; his father had been a prominent man in his day (he composed the "Star-Spangled Banner"); for nearly half a century the family had been settled at Washington, and moved in the best circles. About sixteen years ago Mr. Key married a Miss Swan, of Baltimore. After bearing him four children this lady died, some six years ago; since when Mr. Key has remained unmarried. Before his marriage he was renowned as a lady's man; and as a widower his ancient prestige returned to him. No man in Washington was more popular with the ladies, or more redoubted as a rival than Phil Barton Key. When, therefore, he abandoned the society of the heiresses and belles of the capital for the companionship of Mrs. Sickles it was natural that gossip should talk. It would appear, from evidence recently produced, that neither Mr. Key nor Mrs. Sickles acted with ordinary prudence; that their signals to each other were frequently noticed. In such cases prudence seldom holds out against the impulse of guilty passion.

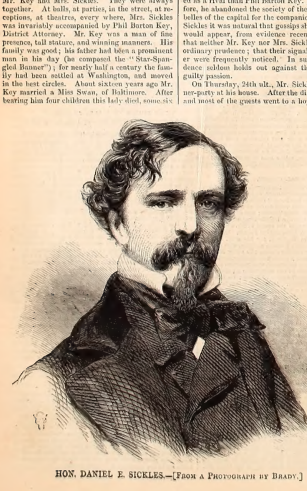
On Thursday, 24th ult., Mr. Sickles had a dinner-party at his house. After the dinner the hosts and most of the guests went to a hop at Willard's hotel. As he was leaving his house Mr. Sickles received a letter, which he thrust, unopened, into his pocket. On his return home he opened this letter, and found it to be anonymous; it stated that a guilty intrigue existed between Mr. Key and Mrs. Sickles, and added that they were in the habit of meeting at a house leased from a negro, the location of which it specified. Mr. Sickles spent a sleepless night, and early next morning dispatched a friend to the locality in question, to watch. The friend saw nothing. But from the inquiries he made he ascertained that a lady resembling Mrs. Sickles had, in fact, been in the habit of meeting a gentleman in the house designated. Armed with these presumptions, on Saturday evening Mr. Sickles charged his wife with adultery. She exclaimed, "Oh, I see I am discovered!" and confessed her guilt, imploring her husband to spare her. He declared that he did not wish to injure her, but she must put her confession in writing. This she did in the presence of two females, who signed it as witnesses.

The remainder of the melancholy tale is so well given in the language of our Washington correspondent that we transfer the task of narration to him. He says:

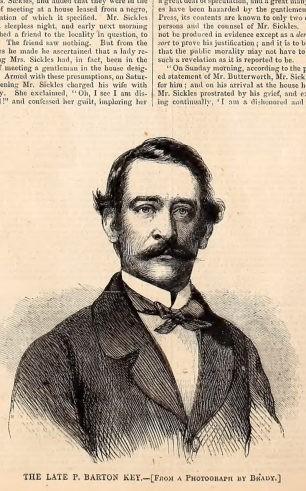
"From the declarations of the most prominent actors in the sad affair we gather the following narrative. Mr. and Mrs. Sickles have been married six years—the anniversary of that event occurring last Tuesday. They have one child, a beautiful little girl between five and six years old. The marriage was not the result of mercenary motives, as has been falsely stated by some of the sensation paragraphs which have been sent over the wires, but it was brought about by a mutual love of no deep and abiding a character for the events which have recently transpired have been most fearful from the great love which these persons mutually feel, but which, of course, must hereafter be only painful reminiscence, for there is no shadow of possibility that Mr. Sickles will ever be reunited to his wife. During their connection the most perfect harmony has prevailed—except on one occasion, about a year ago, when charges of impropriety were brought against Mrs. Sickles and Mr. Key; but after careful investigation Mr. Sickles was convinced that there was nothing wrong. This home, however, instead of teaching prudence, seems to have drawn Key and Mrs. Sickles toward each other more than ever, for from thirty days that time they have been almost inseparable; and so marked were his attentions that, on several occasions, mutual friends have remonstrated both with him and with her; and so lately as within two or three days of the tragedy he received a strong caution in writing. Engaged in political matters, Mr. Sickles spent much of his time from home, and professes to have been without suspicion of his wife's infidelity up to the evening of the 24th ult., when he received an anonymous letter containing such full and precise information that he was forced to the belief that there might be truth in it. After revolving the matter in his mind for a few hours he wrote to a friend in New York, begging him to come immediately, but not assigning any reason for the request. Business compelled this friend to reply by telegraph that it was impossible for him to leave; and here was the starting-point of the subsequent tragedy. If the gentleman referred to could have been present, it is altogether probable that his relations to the parties and his own nature judiciousness would have enabled him to control Mr. Sickles's passion, and so to prevent any bloodshed. Failing in this, Mr. Sickles had resort to the employment of an agent, who, after investigation, reported that he had ascertained the guilt of the parties beyond any question; that, besides his residence on C Street, Key had rented a house in Fifteenth Street, and that he and Mrs. Sickles were accustomed to meet there frequently; that when parties got to wearing apparel were exhibited to the neighbors they were immediately identified. Subsequently he obtained a written statement from his wife; but with regard to this document, while there has been a great deal of speculation, and a great many guesses have been hazarded by the gentlemen of the Press, its contents are known to only two or three persons and the counsel of Mr. Sickles. It will not be produced in evidence except as a dernier ressort to prove his justification; and it is to be hoped that the public morality may not have to endure such a revelation as it is reported to be.

"On Sunday morning, according to the published statement of Mr. Butterworth, Mr. Sickles sent for him; and on his arrival at the house he found Mr. Sickles prostrated by his grief, and exclaiming continually, 'I am a dishonored and ruined

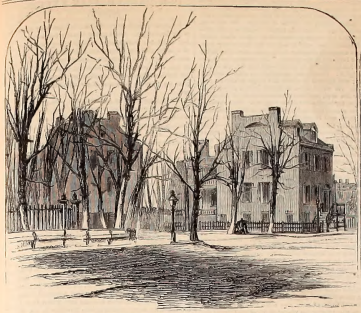
MRS. DANIEL E. SICKLES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]



HON. DANIEL E. SICKLES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]



THE LATE P. BARTON KEY.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]



SCENE OF THE HOMICIDE, WITH THE CLUB-HOUSE IN THE DISTANCE.

LAFAYETTE SQUARE, SHOWING MR. SICKLES'S HOUSE.—[FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY BRADY.]

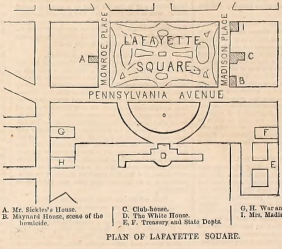
man, and can not look you in the face!" Butterworth says he counseled moderation, and at least a delay; that he left the house for a few minutes, and on his return was informed by Mr. Washbridge, who was in the library, that during B.'s absence Key had twice passed the house, waving his handkerchief three times as a signal. What followed is best stated in Mr. Butterworth's own language; and the annexed diagram will help the reader to an idea of the localities:

While conversing with him Mr. Sickles came into the library and said that he had "seen the scoundrel making signals;" and he added, "My God! this is horrible!" I said, "Mr. Sickles, you must be calm, and look this matter square in the face. If there be a possibility of keeping the certain knowledge of this crime from the public you must do nothing to destroy that possibility. You may be mistaken in your belief that it is known to the whole city."

He instantly replied, "No, no, my friend, I am not; it is already the town talk." I then said, "If God be so there is but one course left for you, as a man of honor—you need no advice." After a few moments' silence Mr. S. said that he "was satisfied that Mr. Key had been in the habit of making his signals from a window of the Club-house opposite; and what surprised him very much was that his wife strenuously denied this, though fully confessing her guilt." He then walked into the hall, and said to me, "Come, go over with me to Stewart's room in the Club-house, and he may be able to inform me whether Key has a room there, and for what purpose he uses it." I assented, and walked out into the street, suggesting that Mr. Sickles was following me. I left the house for this sole purpose.

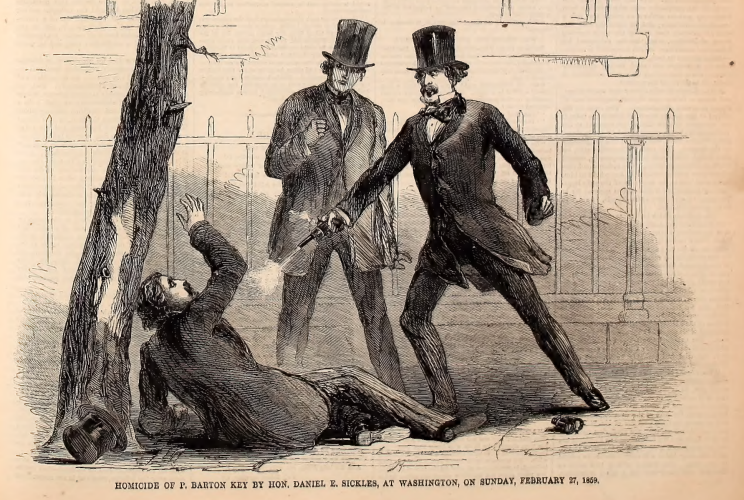
When I left Mr. S. in the hall I am satisfied he had no weapon on his person. He was without his overcoat. He said nothing to me about weapons, or the probability of encountering Mr. Key. I walked slowly down the Avenue, on the north side, to the corner, and as I was crossing the street I saw Mr. Key advance a few steps toward me. He inhaled me, saying, "Good-morning, Mr. Butterworth. What a fine day we have!" I responded, and said, "Have you come from the Club?" He said, "I have." I asked, "Is Mr. Stewart in his room?" He answered, "Yes: and he is quite unwell." I then said, "I am going to see him. Good-morning," and turned to leave him. As I did so I saw Mr. Sickles, for the first time after leaving his house, coming rapidly down Sixteenth Street, on the side next the square, and then near the corner. I had walked about thirty feet on my way to the Club when I heard Mr. S. exclaim, in a loud voice, "Key, you scoundrel, you have dishonored my home—you must die!"

I turned immediately, and saw Mr. K. thrust his hand in his vest or side coat-pocket, take a step in the direction of Mr. Sickles, and simultaneously I heard the discharge of a pistol. Mr. Key then rapidly advanced on Mr. Sickles, seized him with his left hand by the collar of the coat, and seemed to make an effort to strike with something in his right hand, which I then supposed to be a weapon. Mr. Sickles backed into the middle of the street, when he succeeded in extricating himself from Mr. Key's grasp, drew a pistol from his overcoat-pocket, presented it at Mr. Key, who retreated backward up Six-



A. Mr. Sickles's House.
B. Maynard House, scene of the homicide.
C. Club-house.
D. The White House.
E, F. Treasury and State Depts
G, H. War and Navy Departments.
I. Mrs. Madison's House.

PLAN OF LAFAYETTE SQUARE.



HOMICIDE OF P. BARTON KEY BY HON. DANIEL E. SICKLES, AT WASHINGTON, ON SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1859.

terrific Street toward the Club, and threw something at Mr Sickles. Mr. Sickles followed, and when within ten feet, fired. Key said Mr. Key was wounded, he staggered toward the sidewalk, saying, "Don't shoot me!" He leaned for a moment against a tree, when Mr. Sickles advanced upon him, cocked a cap, and then fired a third time. As Mr. Key was falling Mr. S. frequently exclaimed, "You villain, you have dishonored my house, and you must die!" He uttered these words again while standing over Mr. Key with his revolver in his hand. I took no part in the contest.

I believed them both to be armed. When I left Mr Sickles's house I had no thought of witnessing a scene of blood. Mr. Key, upon being told to visit Mr. Stewart, I had no error with me. I did not know Mr. Sickles intended to take arms with him. He left the house after me, and without any suggestion from me came toward the Club, on the north side of the street. When Mr. Key walked out I did not know Mr. Sickles was approaching, nor did I see him until I heard the shots fired. I did not see Mr. S. shoot Mr. Key after his fall, nor public his pistol in contact with the wound. I saw Mr. Sickles after I first advanced and took Mr. Sickles's arm, and walked with him up Madison Square, and advised him to go to his house or to the Attorney-General's. He did so. I returned to the scene, and came up to Madison Square from the middle of the street, and gave it to Mr. Sickles. This is the whole of my connection with the unfortunate occurrence. It is not true that I either sought or de sired Mr. Key. He first addressed me, and I knew that view did not hate one minute. I have known the late Mr. Key, in New York and in Washington, for many years, and our relations have ever been of the most friendly character. I did not anticipate a difficulty on the Sabbath, though I did not doubt but that it would take place at an early day.

SAMUEL F. BUTTERWORTH.

"By a reference to the diagram of the localities it will be seen that a signal from the house of residence could be easily discerned from the windows of the Club-house, with the aid of an opera-glass, such as proved to have been in the possession of the deceased.

"After his arrest and conveyal to the District Jail, Mr. Sickles maintained a perfectly calm demeanor, conversing with his friends, and freely stating the particulars of the case. He also told Key to be his duty to deprive his wife of certain tricks, art and of her writing to him, and expressed regret that he should be protected from any appearance of a disposition to palliate her offense, he consented to give the letter to Mr. Hale, and Mr. Key, understanding that he might dispose of it in any way which (without injury to Mrs. Sickles's name, especially against his wife) might serve to abate her grief, which had become so violent and remorseful as to threaten her life. The conversation with Mr. Haley with the matter has been that of a religious character, dealing entirely with the spiritual aspects of the case. At the suggestion of a friend, Mr. Haley, whose residence is very near the jail, went there to offer any facilities for spiritual comforting or sleeping accommodations, the prison being, privately, one of the worst conducted and most miserably arranged in the country. He was afterward employed in passing between Mr. and Mrs. Sickles the greater part of Friday night and the whole of Monday. His interviews with the latter were in private as spiritual consultations would permit; but where a constant throng of people was brought into the space of a small room, some few matters were overheard, and all that he may become public. Mr. Haley has had a very difficult and delicate office to perform, and he believe has, through the whole matter, acquitted himself very creditably. He has been greatly annoyed by inquisitive men who have sought to be dogged by persons anxious to intrap him into a breach of confidence, and we have had to give reasons for knowing that during the early morning hours of Monday, when, having exhausted his means and resources, he was compelled to suspend his journeys on foot, he was followed for some Yonw by a mulatto fellow, having a white woman, even a worse design, but by active exertions he managed to throw off his pursuer.

"Mrs. Sickles is only twenty-two years of age, and seems to us a person of great simplicity and of a very confiding temperament. The news of the arrival of her mother was very harrowing indeed, but not more so than that which occurred at the jail when the latter, accompanied by her father and Collector Hart, was brought into the presence of Mr. Sickles. Even his interview with his own father, which occurred subsequently, seemed to affect Sickles much. The extreme and sole of this poor woman completely overwhelmed her, and forced him to the utterance of the only impatient or desperate words he has spoken, for in his agony he exclaimed to his friends, 'I did hope to be spared this trial.'

"The attitude which he has assumed toward his wife has gained him a great deal of sympathy. He does not consider the continued love for her as one while firmly insisting upon a divorce, he bestows upon her all the pity she needs. His forbearance in this particular is remarkable. With reference to the deceased, he seems to feel that he could pursue no other course, and that no satisfaction to his law could give would redress his wrong. He declined to allow his counsel to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, with a view to obtain his release on bail, and has waived an examination, hoping to obtain a speedy trial and to relieve the public and the recital of the harrowing details. His counsel are confident of his acquittal on the ground of insanity, too. The Criminal Court meets next Monday, and should the Grand Jury take up the case on that day, the trial will probably be begun on the Wednesday.

"The friends of Mr. Key are taking active measures to enforce the letter of the law. It is understood that, in rebutting the plea of justification, they will endeavor to show that there were certain physical reasons to make any recent criminal intercourse on the part of the deceased impossible; and to prove that the past life of Mr. Sickles has not been blameless, they are preparing testimony in New York and Washington. The President has not yet nominated a successor to the office of District Attorney, but it will very probably be offered to Mr. Olds. The funeral of Key took place on Tuesday, and there was but a small attendance. His four children remain with the family of his brother-in-law, Hon. Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio.

"The President has not called on the jail, but sent a message of condolence to Sickles; several members of the Cabinet have been to see him. Mrs. Sickles has had but few calls from her former friends. The house on Fifteenth Street has become one of the lions of Washington. It is visited by hundreds. On Monday morning Mr. Sickles's carriage drove rapidly up, and a lady whose countenance could not be seen hurried toward the house, and after remaining a short time returned. The physicians say that Mrs. Sickles's condition is quite impossible that it could have been her, or that the mystery seems to deepen. Since the birth of her child, some two years ago, she has lived much in the house. Reports of Mr. Sickles's attempting to shoot Key in Washington, and all without foundation; he is positively aware of his sad situation, but has never manifested any sinking of spirits.

In order to complete the ad but interesting history of this case, we append a few extracts from the correspondence and reports of various journals:

THE PREVIOUS RELATIONS OF THE PARTIES.

[From the Washington Star.] "In Re Forney's Press of yesterday—Mr. Forney being as intimate with Sickles and his family as Mr. Hakin or Mr. Butterworth—is it said:

"It is but just, however, to say that the intimacy between Mr. Key and Mr. Sickles has been remarked in Washington circles for a year past, and has been the occasion of more than one disagreement in the families of the parties. During the last Congress notes passed between Mr. Key and Mr. Sickles, and these notes were followed by a complete reconciliation, and Mr. Key's friends, at the house of Mr. Sickles, on Saturday dined with him at a large party not more than two days ago.

"In explanation of this paragraph, we may add that it is currently stated here that on the reconciliation referred to both Mr. Sickles and Mr. Key promised Mr. Sickles and his wife an account of her intimacy with Mr. Key were to cease entirely.

THE STORY MRS. SICKLES COULD TELL.

"It is very certain that Mrs. Sickles can tell a story that will throw some light on the affair. We have no faith in the account that the confession obtained from her was voluntary. Surrounded by strangers, prostrated and weak, she must have known that it was a death-warrant, so far as her own life was concerned, should she recover. She can doubtless tell, too, whether her husband's conduct has not been such as to make the confession obligation that he had a right to protect his 'marital honor' by taking the life of the seducer. Her version of the affair from the present inscrutable position of Mrs. Sickles would be interesting.

"Mr. Sickles has addressed several letters to his little child, which are said to be full of affection, similar to the epistles from his wife.

"The published statement that Mrs. S. is enceinte is untrue."

WHO WROTE THE ANONYMOUS LETTER?

We read in the Philadelphia Press: "The last time Mrs. Sickles and Key had been at this house was on Wednesday, the 24th of February, when Key went to the back way, through an alley-way leading from Stewart's premises.

"On this Wednesday night there came along a man named Scott, who was on his way home, and seeing a standing on the pavement whether the house was then occupied or not?

"Yes, Sir, was the response.

"Very well, thank ye," said the mysterious gentleman replied, and, turning around, walked away in the direction he came.

He was observed, however, to hang around the neighborhood for a short time, and when Mr. Secretary Key was seen to leave the dwelling; and the stranger, nothing his feet of Key, spoke a few words to Key, and then hurried off. It is supposed by many that he was the author of the anonymous letter."

THE SCENE AT THE PLACE.

A correspondent of the Tribune writes: "Having been a fellow-townsman of the unfortunate gentleman whose life was taken by the cowardly assassin, I had the curiosity to visit the house in Fifteenth-st. where Mr. Key lived three months ago at $50 a month. Having heard a description of the house and the locality, I was surprised to find that it was built of substantial brick, and stood directly in the street. It is a genteel building, two stories in height, narrow, with a roof slightly sloping toward the sidewalk, a small yard, and a balcoming back to a muddy alley.

"A wealthy colored man lives next door. A man, who was grooming a horse in front of it, said that he had almost every morning a glimpse of Mr. Key's face. He was known to know by sight, enter the front door of the brick house, and disappear from view, but was unacquainted with the building his two-grey to a convenient post. Others had seen Mrs. Key go in at the same door many times, but never had. This tallies with my information from another quarter.

"It seems that Key was in the habit of signifying his presence in the house by a red ribbon hung from an upper window in the rear, which can be seen from the crossing of Fifteenth and Vermont streets and Fifteenth-st. and Sixth-st. Stuart, which is nearest her house, but quite out of sight of the solemn signal, would dart between the two lots, on the blind alley, along one of which there runs a path, comparatively dry, and by a back gate would reach the tempting prize. Sometimes she was in her morning dress, sometimes disguised, often with her face enveloped in a close hood.

MR. KEY'S CHARACTER AND HABITS.

"According to the most trustworthy accounts, it would seem that Mr. Key was not thought to be a libertine, as has been charged, by those who knew him best. His health was such as, in their opinion, would preclude such a life. His nerves were shattered partially, it was then believed, in consequence of grief for his wife's death, five years since, but doubtless almost altogether by his dissipated habits. The condition to which he had been reduced forced him to give up drinking latterly. He was a man of very hard, cool and calculating nature and his natural talents for success at the bar. He was what some may call a "free-and-easy," ready at a joke or a frolic, and an excellent story-teller. And, what would be singular, I am sorry to say, to the case of any man, and is especially singular in his case, his stories rarely if ever trenched on his chastity. My informants say that in all his intercourse he never heard him tell one of that description. His official conduct was characterized by the same; was smooth in speech and rough in address purposely. He would come to the point in a rolling style that was peculiar, and was sometimes seen in the street wearing top-boots and leather leggings. Notwithstanding these peculiarities he was universally respected, who stood well in our resident society, such as Mayor Seaton, Mr. Corcoran, Mr. Gales, Mr. Force—whose carriage followed the hearse to-day—and was always at home in local matters. He was a man, with a large share of fashion, who dared to be unconventional, and was able to be successful in doing so. Mr. Key's habits, if his friends are undoubted, but his career as District Attorney is principally remembered for his activity in this city, by his failure to convict in the case of the California Herbert-a-fled for killing a man in a duel, and by the fact that it was upon which boarders at a Washington hotel are indicted by his name. Mr. Key's friends have always refused to dwell on home-life, and would often hire a carriage—here, where cars are plenty—to take him a single square.

MR. KEY IN HIS COFFIN.

"I took the pains to look at the murdered man as he lay in his coffin. His eyes were closed. They must have been more than six feet tall, and very well proportioned. His features were full, and with vivid coloring. The face was calm in expression, and still were the sandy mustache and whiskers of the living. He appeared to have a muffle crowd—boy and man, rich and poor, black and white, free and slave—pressing forward anxious to take a glimpse of the corpse. Only when the clergyman took their places did the spectators—few in number, for the mother of the dead man, two grown and twenty years of age, who assume the violent death of the third of her sons, he is supposed to have met with his end.

MR. KEY ON FRENCH INTIMACY.

"The crime of adultery seems to work upon the imagination and to fire the blood of a romantic young Italian, such as Sickles is said to be. The husband sus-mer—wire, although to one intimate with him, did not appear jealous. Mr. Key, in his letter to Mr. Forney's friend. A fig for common license! French intrigue and romance, with a good spice of danger in it!

A BOY LOVES OR HATES, ACCORDING.

"That the intimacy between Mrs. Sickles and Mr. Key was brought to a close by the discovery, a year ago is known. A Mr. B., of New York, whose name it is unnecessary to give, had been a friend and correspondent of Mrs. Sickles before her marriage, and had been a visitor at the house. Mr. Sickles, who was always free in manners, and flattered by devotion, as was natural in a man of his temperament, was a District-Attorney Key, and watched him. At length he found what would be called sufficient basis for his suspicions. It came to his knowledge that the guilty pair were to go to the theatre together on a certain night, and he, I believe, for two hours. He communicated this fact to Mr. Buchanan, who, it is said, was thoroughly assailed him with abusive language, and forbade him his presence thereafter. Mr. B. was a member of the Secret-fallen, and Mr. Key remained master of the field, he pretending to be intimate with both man and wife, as heretofore.

THE STORY OF THE WEDDING RING.

"As much curiosity has been enlarged in regard to the return by Mr. Sickles to his wife of the wedding ring, the following detail may prove interesting:

"It appears that Mr. Sickles was called upon by a clergyman, and the interview was carried on in a great mental agony, and under extreme mental suffering, and that he was in a state of nervous excitement that he would probably end in mental aberration or perhaps self-destruction.

"It was under such circumstances that the appeal was made to him by the wife of Mr. Sickles for the wedding ring which he had taken from her hand on the day of the tragedy. Mr. Sickles said, in response, that under these circumstances he could not resist the appeal in behalf of one he had so long cherished with such deep affection, and that while he was willing to do all in his power to their former love and union, he returned the ring broken —never to be worn. She had been informed that it could be upfilled too effectively ever to be repaired, and while he bestowed no further comment, he was manifestly determined never to see her more."

GONE TO SEA.

THERE sailed a brig of a thousand tons,
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
She was provided for the outings of twenty guns,
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
Her persons were set, and the wind was fair,
And the brig swept out with the ebbing tide,
And every eye with the landsmen stood
Watched her sail with a swelling pride.
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
The mother has bidden her son farewell,
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
She smothers the tear on the hares them tell—
Yo! Heave merrily, O!—
That the brig is as stanch as stanch can be;
That her men are picked for a fearless crew;
And so she is starting on her voyage to sea
The glorious brig that onward flew.
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
The brig has rolled in the Bay of Biscay,
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
Her timbers are tough, and her crew are brave,
Yo! Heave merrily, O!
But the winds were sweeping the face of the deep,
While the waters gaped for the staggering craft;
And the brig was tossed like a cockle-shell
While the storm above them howled and laughed.
Yo! Heave terribly, O!
What ens of all that wondering crowd,
Yo! Heave terribly, O!
Who sang the song of the brig aloud,
Yo! Heave terribly, O!
Hath bidden his friend the long farewell—
The word he would speak before they died—
The day he watched the waters swell,
And the brig swept out with the ebbing tide?
Yo! Heave terribly, O!

OUR DAGUERREIAN EXPERIMENT.

I THINK we had more trouble with the baby than with the others. During the ten short months of her existence her general behavior had been that of a lady, and her disposition seemed amiable and docile; and now, when grave things were expected of her, she destroyed the pleasing illusion created by her previous life by conduct so unwarrantable that we were on the point of abandoning our project.

On the morning in question my wife, who has been for a number of days preparing costumes which she thought would show well on the children, had dressed Master Harry in a crimson velvet blouse, Harry, aged six, and the second born, Carolus Augustus, aged four, in a Highland costume for his age, which only covered four summers—and then began on the baby. A gorgeous blue dress, adorned with a profusion of flounces and infantile ornaments of "habitant pearl and gold," at a cost of $3 50 per yard, was the result. Unfortunately plumed hat were all carefully put on by mistake, when then placed the baby on the floor for a moment to tie the shoe of Carolus Augustus (which had a way of losing always untied), when the misfortune occurred. A little bit of mud, which the brothers had just performed their ablutions, and suddenly went in, head first, with all his finery.

It was a mercy she was not drowned, or, at any rate, that she was not killed. Master Harry, who first perceived her danger, dragged her from the tub by the skirts of the cloak, and handed her, in very tender mood, to the nurse. The unfortunate drowning — started with us and her brothers for the main street of the unknown town in which we lived. We carried the infant up stairs to the studio of one of the rival Daguerreotype artists of the place, and on reaching this abode of high art, we discovered that Harry and C. Magnus, who had evidently followed us to the lower door, were missing.

I found them in a confectioner's, bargaining for candy—for the cook, learning that Caroline was going down among the sheep, had placed in his pocket certain moneys previously saved by me, and deposited with her for security. On the way to the artist's Caroline had revealed to Harry the existence of this treasure, and the cook, not having vanished to invest it, and were in loud argument as to what sort of sweets to buy when I found them and took them away.

And then it was that their unfortunate sister was suddenly overcome by a fit of sleep, and that she gently went at it, and wouldn't be awakened at all. It was useless to struggle against fate—she must be pictured sleeping.

The grouping was a work of time; for the artist, like most country Daguerreotypists, had never studied that important branch of his profession. I know he was doing it all wrong, but what could be deemed so posterity, with my family, in the most distorted manner, provided the thing might be well got over with?

At last my wife and I were seated side by side—she with the baby slumbering in her arms, and Harry kneeling stiffly at her feet—Caroline Magnus was then placed in my lap, the usual instrument of torture was brought forward, and the artist so perfectly erect and unwavering, and we were all utterly commanded to look at nothing else, and then the man looked at us through the camera, to be sure we were all right before he let on the sun, when Caroline the Great, who had sat still as a mouse all the while, and was about to shout him, wriggled himself out of my lap, walked up quietly to his mother's feet, and, groveling on the floor, lifted up his voice and wept. He was pacified, and lay down on the carpet between us, and the nature partook more of the spy-glass than the cannon, and he was then caused firmly to be held down by force, and excited, anxiously watching the operation, and exhibiting signs of sudden and extreme affection for his mother, which ended in clinch over the baby into her arms, falsely thinking he was safer there than with me.

The man now seized his chance and "took us." As he was going into a dark closet with the plate, I whispered to him that I reserved to myself the right prove, it was mine at his own price, and that I peremptorily refused to take a penny of my wife or offspring to do for another that morning.

I placed the Daguerreotype in my pocket, with the remark that it was rather singular that I should say wife off with the promise that she should see it when we reached home, and then, without waiting to see the result of the colum, started. How well they all behaved going home!

As for the picture—which now hangs in a retired spot in an upper chamber, and which I always malignantly point out to my friends as a specimen of the propriety of again obtaining the portraits of the children—it is one of the most curious specimens of use of one means to accomplish an end. To say nothing of the despairing object I make on the plate, the mother of my babies, seemed to my heart, and never glare sternly from the countenance. This mercilessly Caroline Magnus, who, after leaning from my embrace toward her mother, had left vague indications of his features on half the surface of the picture, in a manner which looked quietude, been depicted, in an indefinite way, just in front of the baby—consequently, does not appear at all, or so blended and mixed with her brother, that she, or rather both together, resemble some horrid dream or monstrous relief of the woman of Christian parents.

From the first week of preparation until we again arrived at the domestic fireside it was six hours. The result, in my opinion, did not justify so great an expenditure of time and cash, despite all objections I have ever since, with more than Pagan firmness, steadily refused to sit to the sun again.

A WATERING-PLACE HUSBAND.

IT was on a fine morning, in the middle of September, in rather a second-rate hotel at Leamington, that a sociable enough party had been assembled for three weeks. It had become pretty well known a week before, that two gentlemen had arrived—young gentlemen, for they were both certainly under thirty-five—and one of them had at once proceeded to throw out, in an easy, indifferent manner, hints as to the position and importance of the other. The friends were Mr. Fortescue and Mr. Thompson. The former, a man of considerable means, seemed to have no condition or intention of his own. He was simply Mr. Thompson's friend; he belonged to that class who neither have nor desire a position, and who enjoy life all the more that they do not seek to make any permanent appropriation of its component parts—birds of passage, who descend to peck here and there any sort of morsel, and who live a sort of cuckoo-like existence very near of their own. He had the easy, assured air of the rare of which he was a somewhat prominent specimen. Mr. Thompson, on the contrary, was stiff, formal, and silent. You could not call him awkward, but he had the air of a man on his good behavior, and as if an explosion might take place if he should at any time forget his lesson. He committed no overt act that could be called ungentlemanly, and yet you would have demurred to calling him a gentleman. He was rather tall and stout; regular enough features, a red-and-white complexion, a sort of nervous twitching of the eyes, and dark, strong, curly hair. His tailor had fitted him as tightly, but he seemed to consider his own clothes; for instead of being a subsidiary affair, the clothing was the most important part of the man—as if Mr. Thompson had ventured on a signed and sealed compact with his tailor not to disgrace him before all his backs. To puff the wearer into a state of equality with these exquisite habiliments was the special mission of Mr. Fortescue—"a mission he fulfilled to perfection. Nothing was overdone; he only said enough to invite inquiry, and to set the wearer's mind into a frenzy of curiosity. If a person of importance were named, he would say: "I must introduce him, by the bye, to my friend Thompson does," without appealing to him, although he was close by. He would begin to say something about Thompson's property and its possessions, and then slide off to another subject in a careless, dreamy way. He would refer to him in their rambles to look at a plant, he said: "It's the same, I think, Thompson, you have in your-so-and-so drop-in your-so-and-so in the window-in-a-bubble. One young lady declared it was "quite an Kensington. Another, on hearing a name, said it was "at Camden Town." Thus gently and warily hoisted into notice, and covered with a delicate veil of mystery, Mr. Thompson lay waiting. He had taken no enactel the small part that remained for him. When the bustle was at its fullest he would look at those of Mr. Fortescue, who served him up with derivations to the assembled guests, who again perused the countenance of the man with a view to probable prepossessions. His stiffness was dignity; his awkwardness was modesty. His almost morbid reflection, the nervous twitching of the eye indicated a quick sensibility; a slightly provincial accent gave hope of a certain originality, as opposed to foreign. Not but that there still remained some considerable prejudice against him. Provincials were only embers, however, and easily quenched. Why did Mr. Thompson never say any thing's not for. Fortescue to the contrary notwithstanding, to decorate name, and Thompson as decidedly plebeian, but Mr. Fortescue was evidently the acknowledged sor of high people in general but with some reference to Mr. Thompson. Mr. Thompson had come from London first, and Mr. Fortescue had followed from his thoughts then failing to love. What's to love to a single man of forty? The main occupation of life is to buy and to sell and to get gain? Mr. Thompson may have heard—we know not whether he did or not—that love was a thing of the soft and hearts, but was ignorant of the precise position of the heart, which, in general, existed by dint of what the eyes of a charming little fairy. She was one of those provokingly attractive creatures who can not choose between the two, and who do not care. She had that exquisite, coy grace which defies at once description and analysis. She was fair and gay, humorous and pathetic. Any dress became her, every situation suited her. The songs she declined with the most fascinating reluctance, went off as well as the last practiced one. She was admired under the most opposite of women, from a very few, acknowledged their power. It was a great treat to see Mr. Thompson in love: were we to attempt to describe it, we should be afraid of our readers to deny the few signs of independent existence to feminine ingenuity, and the delicate touches or diverging into convulsive and grotesque forms. How he hushed himself up into a sufficiently demonstrative lover, and how he fell back into himself forever a mystery. She made no revelation. The accepted lover was allowed to be demonstrative, to did ask her three several times, and that it was only after the last refusal he found himself the accepted lover of the charming girl. He received a three daughters of a small proprietor in an adjoining county—a man of limited means. Before Caroline was all over then—there was to be no more perplexity or excitement. Mr. Thompson had gone for a week to bring matters to a climax. He must retire and leave no open field. The very next day the young lady received a telegraphic dispatch with them Mr. Thompson. What became of Mr. Fortescue it is not for us to divulge; doubtless he went to his friends as friendly as ever.

It was soon announced that the wedding was to take place in the country, and numerous attendants were put in the hands of hot-house growth, forced on by high-pressure flues, and brook not long exposure to the free current of air. Mr. Thompson, as it came to pass that on a sunny morning in October, in the parish church of —, this man and this woman" performed the last act of their masquerade by kneeling before God's high altar, and swearing to love each other until death should part.

A short honey-fortnight was spent in dawdling through the country on the way to London. Mr. Thompson's business in the city could brook no further absence of its chief, and had to be attended to. Upon their arrival, a cold, clear, starlight night in October, Laura arrived at her future home in a most joyful mood. She was about to be, with its blazing fires and brought her attendants, among which were many tasteful articles presents, to the house of her husband, and the occupations of woman. Mr. Thompson left early in the morning to the city, and returned late in the evening to dinner. When it began to dawn on Laura that she was not particularly wanted by her husband, she began to try to realize the condition into which she had been whirled, during the previous six weeks, and to look behind. Where were Mr. Thompson's relatives? Why had none of them been to see her? Where was that truest of friends, Mr. Fortescue? When she would have given audible vent to these inquiries, Mr. Thompson was not present, and he did not wish to be too curious, but glossed the matter over to herself; when she pressed him for news by, she drew from him such a sad account of removals to a better world, and to remote parts of this one, that she was quite sorry she had so wounded his feelings. Laura was in no want of society, for her own friends and relatives were always welcomed by her husband; they might remain for days or weeks, it was all the more agreeable to him. One day she began to inquire into the precise nature of his business, but he interrupted her by some trifling remark in an embarrassed tone, and she felt increased twitching of the eyes. Tears ended her first attempt; and the second, for which he was evidently prepared, only elicited that it was a sort of commerce she could not understand, even were he to explain to her. In what street? was her next question. He stammered out a name of which she had never heard; but then there were so many streets in the city, this was no wonder. So all passed off, and time flowed on again in a quiet current. In the course of three months after the wedding, and Laura had not only little to complain of, but she had reached the acme of happiness. Harry, and might have continued so, but for her persevering and womanly weakness for knowing "all about it." She was seized with one of those unconfessible fit of curiosity that she resolved to be masters of her own secret. She would find out how him into the city; she would see the place where he carried on his business; and if no outward circumstance should lead to it, she would set to for tatore and wary inquiry; nay, what would mother her, unknown to the world but to herself, the truth from some one on the spot? Her resolution was taken.

The very next morning, after taking early with her husband, and bidding him good-by when he set out for the city, she dressed in her shawl and bonnet, adding a thick veil, and in an instant was on the road in secure sight of the poor unconscious Mr. Thompson. What if he should look back or jump into an omnibus? She knew he sometimes did the latter, and generally walked. What if he should stop to speak to some friend or acquaintance? She must then tack about, which would be awkward; if he were doing so stopped to speak, and then Mr. Thompson had no friends or acquaintance. For a time all went on in the most prosperous way. Mr. Thompson walked on, and Laura, with some trouble to his partner; but as he appeared to be the city he so quickened his pace that poor Laura was ready to die with fatigue. Heated and flurried, she sometimes lost sight of him, and then would make a rush forward till she found herself almost touching him. When he got to the most crowded part of the city, Mr. Thompson more thickened his pace, then quickened it, casting stealthy glances around him, which made Laura cower back and double her veil. At length, assuming to the corner of one of the many streets branching off from the Strand, Mr. Thompson suddenly darted down it, and disappeared within a door that seemed to have been open to receive him; when instantly it was shut, and all the windows in doors in a pantomime. Overstrained by the hot pursuit, the tension of mind caused by her curiosity to be satisfied, and the fear of being discovered in such a discreditable situation, Laura would have made to the ground had she not leaned for support against the wall of a house nearly opposite. There she stood, in a sort of blank stupor, for a minute or so, might be twenty, when the door at which Mr. Thompson had entered slowly opened, and three little children came out. One of them, a little girl, bored and shabby-looking, she instantly recognized as Mr. Fortescue. Mr. Thompson's friend, in fact, had so successfully pulled Mr. Thompson up to the pitch matrimonial. The second her eyes fell on the had never seen him, she felt sure. The two supported between them a wretched figure maimed and infirm. He seemed to be grown to legs, at least she saw nothing under the knees. The arms hung so loose it seemed a doubtful case whether the encumbrance to the trunk of the person did not cause a total rupture. She was about to exclaim what, at the distance, appeared to be a scar or mark of some kind on the pale face, when the face itself— Oh, horror! No, it could not be! Laura gasped for breath—her veil—she turned herself away her eyes as if she could turn away the truth; for all other signs of identity might be deceived her; but the strange nervous twitching of the eyes, evidently produced by simulating blindness, proved the awful fact. It was her husband! Mr. Thompson was a beggar!

PARISIAN ECHOES.

"HAIR OF THE SAME DOG."

WHEN the supremacy of one of the two great schools of medicine, Allopathy and Homeopathy, shall be established we are not sure that it will determine; but certain it is that, until that climacteric of squabbling is reached, the unfailing sneer of the Hippathist will be directed at the infinitesimal character of the doses administered by the disciples of the great Hahnemann.

The last joke of the sort we give as it comes to us from Paris.

A rich financier, a dignitary of the Bourse, being lately troubled with a very severe cold in the head, called in a homœopathic physician, who, for all treatment, made his patient inhale the odor from a vial which was almost as imperceptible to the eye as its extreme cure to the nose.

But for more than a week our banker's "cold in the head" obstinately refused to yield to this inappreciable treatment; his nose's be continued to pronounce like O's, his r's were transformed into l's, and his l's into palatals—in a word aggravated state of disorder. At last, when the patient's patience had run out, he sent for the doctor, and, without consulting him with the customary and catarrhal "Good-morning," the amount of his impertinence, the disciple of Hahnemann demanded five hundred francs. The banker, who was a man of wit as well as riches, made no remark, but that evening quickly passed it under the doctor's nose, and then put it back in his pocket-book again, saying, as he did so,

"I pay your bill as you have treated my cold—with a smell of the remedy; you have no right to be more satisfied than I am cured."

And that was the end of it, though we may be permitted to doubt that even this vial treatment merited such an au-fin-ing return.

COMPOSING COMPOSITORS.

The secrets of the printing-office are no longer in danger of being brushed about should the plan adopted by a German philanthropist (of which we find an intimation) succeed; the columns of a late French journal) no more generally put into practice.

M. Theodore Helgrand, of the town of Zablagen, in Wurtemberg, a man who has taken a deep interest in the condition of the deaf mutes of his own country, after much deliberation fixed upon a plan by which he could secure to them a lucrative occupation—viz., as compositors in a printing-office. He at once began to put his idea into execution; and now employs in his new establishment, in his native town, one hundred and sixty printers, of whom seventy-five are deaf mutes. Of these one is deaf and dumb, and have learned of M. Helgrand himself, or his expense, the trade of compositor, at which they acquit themselves marvelously well. The Government has thought this benevolent undertaking worthy of encouragement, and of which is to procure work and bread for a whole class of unfortunate beings, has granted to M. Helgrand a pension; and we thing he has sent to the director of this new and strictly silent printing-house a large gold medal as a mark of high royal appreciation.

PREMATURE BANKRUPT.

On this topic our favorite French philosopher, Alphonse Karr, has the following suggestively, which we translate:

"Adolescence is a word which formerly signified the springtime of life—a spring full of promises and beautiful flowers. It is now a word which will soon fall into disuse, since the thing which it denoted no longer exists. The youth of the present day have thought to show their maturity by being in a hurry—hurry to live. They have come to maturity. There are no fruits which have not been produced by forcing; if you wish to eat peaches in May the flowers fall in spring it will bring forth no fruit in the autumn."

A HINT TO REVOLUTIONISTS.

The cap of Liberty needs but the addition of a few bells to make it the cap of Folly.

SATURDAY NIGHTS.

A singular plan for the considerable limiting of the rouge et noir temptations that await the traveler at the various spas and baths of Germany has been imagined by a young Parisian, the hero of the following remarkable story:

A young Frenchman, designated by the letter X, that unknown quantity which so conveniently stands for the hero of every novel, arrived not last summer, as usual, traveling in Germany. His voyaging desires were, also as usual, circumscribed by the narrowness on the purse, and even when the green cloth of the gaming-tables is only spaniel in evidence, it has a way of fascinating all looks.

Now the flesh of Monsieur X is weak to the temptations of roulette. For him the green board has irresistible attractions; and often has he been known after fasting his unfortunate self for days—a sum which might easily disappear before the croupier's rake in a single sitting at the green board, were the whole amount in the possession at once.

The essentiality, then, was to so place "the needful" that it could not be at his easy disposal. M. X accordingly reversed not a few Louis for his excursions, and with the remainder of the fund bought eighteen gold watches!

So, instead of carrying the customary gold or bank-bills, he this time starts off upon his journey with a dozen and a half of chronometers safely packed away in his trunk.

When the few Louis which he had allowed himself at starting were reduced to the last silver, a watch, pays his hotel-bill, and tranquilly continues his journey. At the next green board of his accompanied by plays until he has lost the money remaining to him from the sale of his first watch, and then sells another, pushes on to the next, and so on and so forth.

Three commercial operations serve as rings to the extravagance, since they take time in the execution, leave him leisure to reflect, and effectually prevent him from losing all his money at once.

To be sure the proceeds arising from the sale of watches do not quite equal the original investment, but the slight deficiency is nothing compared to the enormous sums that might otherwise be swallowed up in the vortex of Fortune's wheel.

Then to sell a watch is not a very agreeable piece of business to a man of the world, and especially to one at which he is in some measure ashamed. This makes him particular as to his terms, and however more grasping a customer

Again, he can not sell several watches in the same place, without fear of its appearing singular or exciting suspicion; so that he is obliged to abstain from a long sojourn in the dangerous localities.

This necessity for the frequent changing of his quarters, yet fractional expenditure of his funds, enables him to complete his summer tour without pecuniary catastrophe. Thus, in spite of cards and dice, his journey lasts—in the circumstances of watch-selling—as long as he had in the beginning intended.

To travelers "troubled that way" the expedient may well be worth remembering.

THE INQUISITION'S GALA DAY.

In examining a rich library at Seville, in Spain, the word INQUISICION on the back of a little dried-up, colorless, cracked duodecimo, with the date sixteen hundred and eighty, Amsterdam, on the title-page, attracted my eye. I opened it, and found it was a collection of narratives of Inquisition imprisonments in Seville, written by one Serafin de Ciezel, who escaped from Triana or Holland, after having been condemned and punished for heresy.

I took out my note-book and wrote down a few facts from this rare and curious book; from which, by the aid of memory, I have since put together, in the following narrative of the Inquisition ceremonials with all their horrid semblance of religion and mercy:

Ciezel was a goldsmith in the Sord's Street, Seville, and was accused on the same day with the sixteen hundred and eighty, at ten o'clock in the evening, as he was finishing a gold necklace for one of the maids of honor. A week after his first arrest Ciezel was examined. In an auto-room, says he (I give it, as far as I can remember, in his own plain touching way), a smith frees me of my irons, and I pass from the auto-chamber to the Inquisitor's cabin, in the small inner court-yard. It is hung with blue and citron-colored taffety. At one side, between the two grated windows, is a gigantic crucifix, and on the central estrade (a table fifteen feet long surrounded by arm-chairs) with his back to the crucifix, sits the secretary, on my right Francis Delgado Gonsalvo, the Grand Inquisitor, who is seated on a high chair. The Inquisitors had just left; but the ink was still wet in their quills, and I saw, on papers before their chairs, some names marked in red ink. The secretary was a low stout opposite the secretary. The Inquisitor asks my name and profession, and why I come there, exhorting me to confess as the only means of quickly regaining my liberty. He hears me, but, when I fling myself weeping at his knees, he coyly coutts me is no hurry about my case; that he has many prisoners, and many more waiting (the secretary smiles), and rings a little silver bell which stands beside him on the black cloth, for the official, who takes me down a long gallery where my chest is brought in, and an inventory taken by the secretary. They say how I am to keep my eyes every thing, even to my ring and gold buttons; but they leave me my beads, my handkerchief, and some money I had fortunately given me in my garters. I am then led barefooted into a cell, and left to think and pray for three days, when they bring me supper.

The prisoners are seldom put together. Silence, perpetual and strict, is maintained in all the cells. If any prisoner moans, complains, or even prays too much, the jailers watch the unhappy night and day warn him through the grating. If the offence is repeated, they storm in and beat him with blows to insensibility. No other prisoners, who in the deep grave-like silence, hear your every cry and every blow.

Once every two months the Inquisitor, accompanied by his secretary and interpreter, visits the prisoners, and asks them if they have been through them at regular hours, or if they have any complaint to make against the jailers. But this is only a parade of justice; for, if a prisoner makes complaints, them are treated as mere ravings and fancies, and never attended to.

But these severities are trifles in comparison to the tortures some of my fellow-sufferers were put to, because their crime of heresy could not be proved without their own confession.

The water torture consisted in passing water down the wretch's throat till he almost burst, and then fastening him in a sort of vice, and applying him on a pole that almost broke his spine.

In the fire torture they set some flame from them tarded the prisoner's naked feet and held them for nearly an hour toward the flames, till he intreated like that devil them, or confessed and testified the implanted himself.

In the rope torture they tie the man to a horizontal rope by his hands, which are tied behind his back; they then raise him in the air, and noiselessly let him fall with all that distance and half his joints and makes him utter torturing cries. The only persons present are the Inquisitor, seven or the stolid Inquisitors and the bishop, the grand vicar, or his deputy. There are never more than two lurid torches, which show the executioner, who are clothed in black robes and black hood, that hide all the face but two holes for eyes, nose, and mouth. They strip the prisoner to his waist hand; and, if he faint, the doctor of the Inquisition comes in to pronounce how much more suffering the tortured man can bear.

If all this fail, and the man and body are both of steel, the Inquisitors try scarce. They put apothetaxis into the bruised man's cell, who comfort him and complains of the position we are in, and the great and scourges with which God ever allowed man to be inflicted. The Inquisitors, too, pray with the touched with their sufferings, to wish their conversion rather than their hurt, and to pray them to make even the slightest confessions, that they may be kept an inviolable secret, and will restore them to their last liberty.

One Saturday, when, after my meagre prison dinner, I gave my linen, as usual, to the jailers to send to the wash, they would not take it. It was a great, cold breath whispers at my heart—a one-how is the Auto-da-fé. Immediately after the vespers at the cathedral they rang for matins—which they never do on the rejoicing eve of a great feast—and I knew that my horrid suspicions were right. Was I glad at my escape from this living tomb, or was I paralyzed by fear, at the pile, perhaps, already hewn and stacked for my wretched body? I know not. I was torn in pieces by the devils that rack the brains of unhappy men. I refused my next meal; but, contrary to their wont, they pressed it more than usual upon me. To give me strength to bear my torture? Do God's eyes not reach to the prisons of the Inquisition?

I was just falling into a sickly, fitful sleep, worn out with conjecturing, when, about eleven o'clock, the great bolts of my cell ground and jolted back, and a party of jailers in black—in a flood of light, so that they looked like demons on the borders of heaven—came in. The sleuth threw down by my pallet a heap of clothes, told me to put them on, and held myself ready for a removal summons. I had no tongue to answer as they lighted my lamp, left me, and locked the door behind them. Such a trembling seized me for half an hour that I could not rise and look at the clothes, which seemed to me shrouds and coffin-clothes. At last I rose, threw myself down before the black cross I had scrawled with charcoal on the wall, and commended myself, as a miserable sinner, into God's hands. I then put on the dress, which consisted of a tunic of red long, loose, and yellow, with a cross on it in black serge, striped with white.

At two o'clock in the morning the wretches came and led me into a long gallery, where nearly two hundred men—drifted from their various cells, all dressed in black—stood in a line, facing each against the wall of the long, plain, cold vaulted corridor; where, every ten feet, a lamp burned, swung a huge brass lamp. We stood silent as a funeral-train. The women, also in black, were in the neighboring gallery, for sex of course. The sad glimpses down a neighboring dormitory I could see more than this. Some, like me, were in tunic alone, paced backward and forward. These, I afterward found, were men doomed also to be burned, but for mistrifles—men for the most part under the that of the Jesuits. Whether I was to be burned or had till not was what I had to learn. Whether my dress was like that of the rest, and the monsters could not dare to put two hundred men in one into one row. Among the rest I had also two doll-idols and lying miracles.

Presently the gallery was still and silent, jailers came round and handed us each a long yellow taper and a yellow scapular or tabard, crossed with a cross and a label on each breast of Saint Andrew. There were the Sanbenitos that Jews, Turks, sorcerers, witches, and heretics of all kinds, from the non-Catholic Church are compelled to wear. Next came the gradation of our ranks. Those who had relapsed, or who were convicted, during their examinations, were the Sanbenito, which is gray, with red St. Andrew's cross, and the pointed cap, and the buttons, and all round, reversed flames, and wings of and sweet black devils horrible to behold. There were twenty others, were there; and I lost all hope. My blood turned to ice. I could scarcely keep myself from swooning. I felt my brain reeling, they brought us, with hard, mechanical regularity, pasteboard conical mitres (corrochas) painted with flames and devils, with the sanbenito cross and mitre we written round his rim. Our feet were all bare; the jailers, who had lighted their tapers, began to weep, and kept their faces covered with their handkerchiefs, round which the beads were twisted. God only—they speaking from heaven—could save them. A rough, hard voice now told us we might sit down on the ground, and we obeyed. Then the old man and the boys smiled as they eagerly sat down. The dreadful relief came to them with the refreshment of a pleasure.

At four o'clock they brought us bread and figs, which Spaniards eat with their wine, as a most delicious meal. It refused mine, but a guard prayed me to put it in my pocket, as I might be in need of it. It was as if an angel had comforted me. At five o'clock, at daybreak, it was a ghastly sight to see those, who, in the dim corridor, on our pale, livid faces. Yet not one but felt an undercurrent of joy at the prospect of any release even by death.

Suddenly, as we look at each other with ghastly eyes, the great bell of the cathedral tolled slowly, with a funeral knell, long and slow. It was the signal of the burning of the Auto-da-fé. This the signal for the people to come to the show. We were filed out one by one. As I passed the gallery-like to the auto-room, I saw, on the tables, pens and stern, in his black robes, throned at the gate. Bonnets have been substituted for the hats of the citizens of Seville in his very, twitching fingers. The room was full of the anxious, frightened longing for the show, or their relations. Every one, as I once passed through, moved to his trembling side to serve as a support for the Auto-da-fé. The honest men shuddered as they took their place in the horrid death procession: the time-serving men looked as if they were performing a solemn duty. This was thought an honorable office, and was sought after by gentlemen and suspected men afraid of the Church's sword.

The procession commenced with the Dominican, whose standard initiated the ceremonial. Then them thundered the banner of the order, representing the Inquisition enthroned, and the sword and olive. It shines like a mirror, the frocked saint, holding a threatening sword in one hand, and in the other an olive branch, which the dove, descending, holds in its eye. God of love, what a mockery of thy attributes! Behind the Dominicans, two Inquisitors, in their yellow scapulars, holding their lighted torches; their feet bleeding with the stones, and their face frightfully contracted with the fatigue of pain and ruff, tripping along by their side, holding their handkerchiefs to their eyes. The street and windows were crowded with careless eyes. Children were held up to excrete us as we passed to our places. Behind the Inquisitors came the rest of the holiday sight to the craftsmen and apprentices: it was more than a holiday to them—it was a relief to the touch of tragedy about it. Our procession, like a long black snake, wound on, with its banners and crosses, its shaven monks and mitred barefooted prisoners, through street after street, heralded by soldiers who ran before to clear a way for us—to stop mules, displace fruit-stalls and street performers and their laughing audiences. We at last reached the Church of all the Saints, where, tired, dusty, bleeding, and faint, we were to hear mass.

The church was magnificent, but, oh, was dreadful as a charnel-house. The great altar was veiled in black, and was lit with six silver candles, whose flames shone like yellow stars, with clear twinkle, and a soft halo round each black, fringed wick. On each side of the altar—that seemed to bar out God and his mercy from us, and to wrap the very sun in a grave-cloak—were two thrones, one for the Grand Inquisitor and his counsel, another for the King and his court. The one was filled with wretches like myself; the other with jewelled and feathered men.

In front of the great altar, and near the door—where the blessed daylight shines with hope and joy, but not for us—is another altar, on which six gilded and illuminated missals lay open, these books of the Gospels, too, in which I had once read with tears and prayers for forgive as we are to be forgiven; Faith, hope, charity: these three, but the greatest of these is charity. Near this altar stand the executioner and his assistant, a half-naked gallery with bare touches, on which sat the criminals of their yellow and flame-colored tabards, with their godfathers. The doomed ones came last; the nones innocent first. Those who entered the black-robed church first, passing in secret to the altar, sat there, either praying, or with their heads covered in meditation. The trembling living corpses wearing the yellow and red mitres, came last, preceded by a gigantic cross, like the dead coming to judgment.

Immediately following them poor mitred men came servitors of the Inquisition, carrying the human effigies fastened to long staves, and four sheets containing the bones of those men who had died in the cave of the Inquisition before the fire could be got ready. The coffers were painted with flames and devils, and the inscriptions round them. Behind mitre and the crimson and yellow shirt all the faces with typical grins. The Inquisitors and times represented were tried for heresy since their death, and whose estates had since been confiscated and their effigies exposed to the contempt of coming fire no one within their reach to differ in opinion with the Inquisition.

Every prisoner being now in his place—godfathers, torchmen, pikemen, musketeers, inquisitors, and standing crosses—the Grand Inquisitor, who has mounted the pulpit, followed by his ministers, the bishop, and the grand vicar, commences his long sermon, half an hour long (it seemed a month of anguish), in which his "burning eloquence" compared the Auto-da-fé to the fire of hell, with this difference, that there animals who entered it burned for ever and ever, but that the mercy of the blessed Inquisition had, by God's blessing, the power of changing those its walls once had shut in the flames of eternity. He then read the edict against him; so tranquil and devout—these who had been born cruel as wolves, and savages and daring as lions.

This cruel, mocking sermon over, two readers mounted the pulpit to shout the list of the names of the condemned, their crimes (now, for the first time, I heard mine), and their final sentences. I grew all ears, and trembled as each name was read.

As each name was called the aleaid led out the owner of it from his pen to the middle of the gallery opposite the altar, and left him standing, trembling, taper in hand; after the sentence, he was led to the alter, where he had to put his hand on one of the missals, and to remain there till all was over.

At the end of each sentence the reader stopped a moment, and then, in a voice of the most hypocrisies of faith, which he exhorted us (the guilty) to join in with heart and voice. Then we all repeated the Credo in a loud voice, the reader having spoken latterly of the Inquisition, and called a creature of God's love. I, who, had therefore, declared excommunicated, my goods confiscated to the King, and I was banished Spain, and condemned to the Havana galleys for five years, with the following penances: I must repeat seven all Friday's for three years, the seven penitential persons; I must, for three years, confess and communicate three times a month; I must recite Ave Maria a day for three years, the Ave Maria and Maria in honor of the Five Wounds; I must hear mass on my knees every Sunday for three years; and, above all, I must guard carefully the secret of all I had said, heard, or seen in the holy cities (which only, as the reader will suppose, I had carefully kept).

The sentence once read, and the wont known, even the condemned seemed happier; and every one felt to eating the figs and bread he had no appetite for. It was the morning! See the sun rise, and with our long fast.

The bishop then quitted his seat, resumed his robes, and, followed by twenty priests, each with a staff in his hand, he passed into the middle of the church; and, with divers prayers, some of the were relieved from excommunication, each of the wearing a taper, and kneeling before the bishop as insult would have seat the blood in a rush to my head, and I had dust but I had given a return my save, as the bishop, with contempt, struck it to make into tears.

All this time the fussy, frightened citizen who served as my godfather had not dared even to give me a pinch of snuff or to answer any of my answered, but now, as the ceremony was concluded, he bowed, chatted, and handed me his snuff-box, which I refused with courtesy and indignation, but he only shrugged his shoulders and stammered an apology.

Then, one by one, the condemned, faint and staggering, were brought in to hear their sentence, which they did with a frightened and unnecessary devoutly touching. A devil would have shed tears to see them; but the Inquisitors were gossiping among themselves and scarcely looked at them, so surfeited were these priests with their enemies' blood.

Every sentence ended with the same cold, mechanical formula: That the holy office, being unhappily unable to pardon the prisoners, on account of their relapse and impenitence, found itself compelled to leave them with full power to the secular law, and therefore delivered them with regret to the hands of secular justice, praying it to use clemency and mercy toward the wretched men; saving their souls by the punishment of their bodies, and recommending death, but not the effusion of blood. Hypocrites!

At the word blood the justice hangman stepped forward and took possession of their bodies; the aleaid first striking each of them on the chest to show that they were now abandoned to the rope and fire.

A month before this auto-da-fé the ministered the Inquisitioff, preceded by their banner, gorgeous and luminous with sacred symbols, had gone in ravishes from the cathedral of the Holy Cross to the Cathedral Square and proclaimed the ceremony with drums, trumpets, and clashing of irons, to the great crowd that thronged to hear the proclamation.

Our present auto-da-fé was to celebrate the king's marriage, and was to be followed by great and lights. Every prisoner had his own separate great theatre, fifty feet long, raised to a level with the king's balcony. All round ran an ample theatre of thirty rows, for the Council of the Inquisition and the king's ministers. Above these, and higher than the king's seat, was the Grand Inquisitor's place, under a gilt and crimson dais. On the left of the theatre was a second amphitheatre, where the criminals were to be marshalled. The fire alone on their pale faces. In the midst was a smaller one, filled with two cages, the armed-up criminals to hear their sentences in. Here were in front of this special chairs for the prosecutor and readers of the sentences; and near these chairs was a temporary altar hung with black.

The king had the queen on his left hand, and the queen's mother on his right. The court ladies filled the rest of the balcony, which, with their flowers and dresses, seemed as if heaped with roses. There were the ambassadors, the city and the ambassadors, the city judges, and the guards.

The procession consisted of first, one hundred charcoal men, in black, with red caps and red, and laden with billets of wood; then the Dominicans carrying a white cross; then the Grand Medina Cœli, bearing, as is the hereditary privilege of his family, the sacred broad-sword of the Inquisition, which has an open sword between two green olive-branches, on the other a naked sword thrust through a laurel wreath. Next came the royal standard of the black, followed by nobles and familiars of the Inquisition dressed in black, with white and black crosses, edged with gold. The standard carried by fifty halberdiers, or Guards of the Inquisition, clad in white and black, and commanded by the hereditary Protector of the Inquisition in the Archbishopric of Seville.

The standard and cross were fixed above the royal seat, and the Dominicans, who had been all night singing the office of the dead, in a choir loud, drew up in line, as the king and ladies at that moment appeared on the balconies, in a blaze of color and splendor, like a sun-burst.

This was at night o'clock. The charcoal-burners were placed on the left of the king's box, the guard on the right. The great pasteboard effigies were then transported at one end of the amphitheatre. Next filed in, and took their seats, the persons condemned to the fire; curls round their necks, the three-feet high sugar-loaf hats (coroches) round their feet bare; the torches shaking in their trembling hands.

Next, each led between two familiars, came the comunted; and, last of all, the innocent. Some of the condemned had gags in their mouths, to prevent any outburst of blasphemy, and they were all of them surrounded by four or five friars, holding crucifixes to them, and exhorting them, angrily and noisily, to repent.

Having passed round in a balcony, and then round the amphitheatre, they were placed on the left hand of the amphitheatre between the familiars and the priests, who exhorted them assiduously to repent.

Next arrived the banner of the parish of Saint Sebastian, the Inquisition Council, the Inquisitors, the Qualifiers, with a long procession of secular and religious dignitaries, who themselves seated on the right side of the theatre, surrounding the Grand Inquisitor's chair. Then the Grand Inquisitor and Inquisitor, robed in violet, attended by the President of the Council of Castile—who is then he (the archdevil) took his seat, the President bowed profoundly to repeat.

Then mass was again said, and the priest, leaving the altar, sat down; upon which the Inquisitor-General, putting on his pontifical robes, went first to the altar, and then to the king; and, ascending the steps of the throne, a servitor bearing the cross, read the edict of faith. Then the King of Spain had bound himself to protect at all hazards, even to the loss of his kingdom and his children, to extirpate heresy, and to support the Inquisition. Then the king, taking off his hat (the great sword held unsheathed by a chamberlain at his side), swore to observe the oath.

The Inquisitor-General and resumed his place, while the same oath was administered to all present. Next, there was a sermon by a Dominican, praising the Inquisition, and condemning heresy, and the procession moved toward the piles, now fully piled and decked with wood billets and faggots.

A few horrid moments of riveting collars, blackets: a twist or two of the garrote for the least guilty: a shrug of agony, and all the miserable hell, soon stifled by cruel howls and driving blows. The fire was set to the piles, and crackled up in noxes got greater and greater. The fans agitated to black waves; the silk dresses too, waved like flowery meadows in the March winds. But no pity: not a tear. The flame raged with cruel leaps and mounts: it drove up in great quivering pyramids that the wind now and then drifted out in horizontal banners, showing black bodies, black burning stakes, and thin hands clasped together in prayer. Higher and higher mounted the great burning columns, and the people rose standing and racing masses of living fire, furiously, wrathfully, and gluttonously hungering for victims.

SKATING AT BOSTON.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

SKATING AT BOSTON.

THE engraving on the preceding page is made from a sketch kindly sent us by a correspondent residing at Boston. The Bostonians are better skaters, as a rule, than New Yorkers; living in a climate which enables them to enjoy the sport much oftener and longer than we do. We are told that every body in good society skates in Boston; that it is quite common to see Mr. Everett performing "the outer edge," and Mr. Emerson making "a figure of eight." While he is, we can only say we should like to be there to see.

THINGS WISE OR OTHERWISE.

A well-known gentleman of Winchester, in the State of Virginia, is the habit of retailing an amusing anecdote on the great love that the Americans have for naval titles and military ones. Creating the Potomac flotilla, he, with his horse, is Ferry-boat, the ferryman said:

"Mars', I reckon you would laugh to see your ferry-wharf."

He immediately did, observing to the man:

"I am not a major, and you need not call me one."

"Then the ferryman replied:

"Well, Kernel, I see your jokes, and I'll not call you no more."

Having arrived at the landing-place, he led his horse out of the boat, and said:

"My good friend, I am very plain man; I am neither a colonel nor a major—I have no title at all, and I don't like them. How much have I to pay you?"

The ferryman looked at him, and said:

"You are the first white man I ever crossed this ferry with that wasn't jist nobody at all, and I near I'll not charge you nothing."

1st. Choose the path of virtue, and imitate a high pattern.

2d. Do all the good in thy power, and let every action be useful.

3d. Cultivate thy mind carefully—it will be a store of pleasing reflection.

4th. Be diligent in thy business, and strictly upright in thy dealings.

5th. Investigate affairs closely, and engage in them cautiously.

6th. Lay thy plans with prudence, and be prepared for unexpected events.

7th. In all difficulties be patient, and overcome them with perseverance.

8th. Live first, always, which also means sleep most.

9th. Have a place for every thing, and every thing in its place.

10th. In all things be accustomed without measure, and combine activity with diligence.

At a recent fire in Fall River two Irish laborers, who had behaved gallantly in attempting to subdue the flames, were sought by a dangerous performance of saving part of the house fell in, and that under which they were seated lay tottering above them.

The younger attempted to fly from the spot, but was overtaken by the falling mass, and very severely injured. The other, resting on upon door in the lane of the house, escaped with a few contusions and a severe shock or ride. His companion, next day, consulted a lawyer, a cage, and he should return thanks to Providence for his preservation.

"Och! then," said Dermot, scratching his head very much puzzled, "it is thankful to Providence I ought to be, it was very manifest to me; but, Sir, unsure I 'atisfy cide aisy?"

A correspondent writes: "In your notice of Jacob Little you could have anecdote, which I consider an addition to the list of 'Wall-street stories.'

"Jacob and Commodore Vanderbilt were in the latter limited divine entered, with the remark that it pleased him to call and see his flock, he being a member of one of his parishioners. After a few words the Dominie, who was in the habit of observing of the ups and downs of life was considerable of a financier, remarked that he was short, and wished to borrow five hundred dollars. Jacob said it gave his pleasure to accommodate him for that on a future occasion he might ring equally as short, and The Doctor said he would, then, prefer one thousand, to which Jacob replied, 'Call at my office to-morrow, and I will see what I can do.' Doctor's wrinkles, full of intelligence, then, give him a check for a thousand dollars.' The Doctor was about to bow to them; and Jacob only lost outsiders on security in hand."

In Texas courts are method of charging juries in for the Judge to give written instructions—and so will, in his opinion, meet the various points in the case. In some instances, however, the instructions have been given their functions in as lucid and satisfactory a manner as could be desired. The following charge is reported verbatim from one of our main pillars of justice organs thief, or at least explains why it is not to be Shelby:

M. CLOSEY'S ADDR.

Mr. Foreman and

If the jury believe, from the evidence, that T. Clow, the plaintiff, sold any property in Texas to one of the M'Clusky sold that to William Odum, and took a note to himself, and afterwards sold that note to W. Howard, got a note of his own, and W. W. Howard paid that note to him, or something else; and W. W. Howard paid that note and nobody knows where the land or other property is; and M'Clusky is dead, and Clow himself has commenced on his estate is on both sides of the suit; then the jury you think it is time to make out their case and find for the defendant; if not, surrender the case, and it thinks it does, then they will find for such a sum as they think is the client.

A young attorney, with a huge bundle of papers in hand, appeared for the first time in Judge J.'s court in St. Louis to move for a writ of habeas corpus in a case. Handing the papers to the judge, he very modestly explained his business to him. The judge looked over the papers, and then shoving them snugly aside, and looking the young man full in the face, inquired:

"Sir, do you take me for a fool?"

"Well," replied the lawyer, "this is the first time I have had the pleasure of seeing your honor, and therefore I am not say from my own knowledge whether you are a fool or not."

His honor was somewhat taken aback by being thus bearded, and said, in milder tone, "Why, sir, is not the Legislature of the State of Missouri for fools then, Sir?"

"Well, sir, that's the impression abroad, but as to telling personally about any of them, your honor, but, from what I have seen of you, I am inclined to think you are from such a source that they ought to be, and perhaps, your honor, that is your case, and you are a fool, but not the whole of it, but vanquished, and picked monkey as a lamb to his victor.

Neighbor Dorne was a very fine old gentleman, but rather too fond of the "mental glass." He was married, and a few of his friends rode down on horseback to one of their "gatherings" who lived a mile or two off. In the course of the evening the proprietor brought up some good liquor and the glasses went round, where it was free to all. All the "friends" took a little, but neighbor Dorne took a little more than a little. In the course of time they were all ready to go home, and could not get on their horses. All got on but neighbor Dorne, who, when he was getting on, slipped off the other side. One of the company asked him if he was "not on yet?" "Yes," replied neighbor Dorne, "I am on, and more too."

A French doctor has discovered a new mode of disposing of injured limbs—instead of cutting them off he pulls them out by methods. He has invented a machine for this purpose, and the operation is said to be painless. Who wants to try the machine?

Every man in Chitta must pay up his debts at the beginning of the year, and also at the time of a religious festival about the middle of the year. If unable to pay at these times, his business stops until his debts are paid.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

TESTIMONIAL.

BOSTON, July 19, 1857.

MESSRS. J. BURNETT & CO.—I am not refute to state the salutary effect in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil—(Cocoaine).

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain corpusive spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation: in three or four days the inflammation and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain corpusive spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation: in three or four days the inflammation and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I could not touch it without pain.

Yours, very truly,
URBAN R. POPE.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair one mother how afraid they are and grow in a few short days. It is conceded by all who have used it to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

For sale by dealers generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

MESSRS. RUDD & CARLETON

TO THE BOOK TRADE

That they this week remove their place of business to the large house fronting on the park, No. 130 Grand Street, corner of Broadway, known as

GRAND'S BUILDING,

where more convenient and capacious accommodations, with greatly facilities for handling their large and full supply, not only of their own publications, but a complete stock of every thing in the department of literature.

Special arrangements with the principal American publishers, and shipping by the first steamers, enable them to sell always at PUBLISHERS' PRICES.

Booksellers throughout the country will find that all orders will be promptly and economically attended to.

Their announcements are offered for the Spring Trade Literature, to whom liberal inducements will be made.

List of our Recent Publications.

MILES STANDISH. Illustrated. 4to.....$1 00
ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE for 1858.....1 00
RABBI BELL. By B. Aldrich.....1 75
BUCKLAND'S CURIOSITIES of Natural History.....1 75

The New Novels.

SOUTHWOLD. By Miss Dorothy Untell.....1 00
EDITH; Or, Little by Little.....1 00
LOVE AND LABOR. By Mrs. Sweet.....1 00
VERNON GROVE. By Mrs. C. H. Glover.....1 00

We would call the Booksellers and will be sent by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers and Booksellers,
No. 130 Grand Street, corner Broadway, N. Y.

DUPUY'S

NEW PERFUMES.

"The Mount Vernon Bouquet."
"The Perfect Love."
"The Washington Nosegay."
"The Nice Jockey."

Essences of Fragrant Flowers, 40 Varieties.
Perfume Sec, Pomades, and Toilet Soaps.
EUGENE DUPUY, Perfumer, 62 Broadway.

FOUR STERLING AND SUCCESSFUL BOOKS,

PUBLISHED BY

C. SCRIBNER, Broadway, Grand Street, New York.

DUST AND FOAM;

Or, TWO CONTINENTS AND TWO OCEANS.
Being Wanderings in Mexico, & America, Sandwich Islands, China, East and West Australia, Java, Arabia, Polynesia, &c. By T. B. Waskom. 1 vol. 12mo. $1.25.

Extract from a Recent Review in the New York Tribune Primeur, Esq.

"I can express heartily my pleasure that I have received from its charming and spirited pages. The style is vivacious and graphic, and abounds in touches of wit with the bright coloring of the tropics. I particularly admire the fine discrimination of character which carries you through all your difficulties and perils."

"Mr. Waskom will really, this time, be the author of

PEASANT LIFE IN GERMANY.

By Auerbach. 1 vol. 12mo. $1.25.

The London Literary Gazette says: "It is a clever book. We give the author the highest credit for having written an excellent and riveting work."

THE CONSTITUTIONAL

TIMOTHY TITCOMB'S LETTERS

TO HIS YOUNG FOLKS. By Holland.

1 vol. 18mo. $1.00; in extra gilt, $1.50.

"Timothy Titcomb's Letters have no blood humor with seriousness, with wit pathos, the counsels of wisdom and morality with the innocent amusements of every day. We trust that his times ten thousand will enjoy the book."—N. Y. Independent.

6th Edition of BITTENBENDER.

A POEM. By Timothy Titcomb. 1 vol. 12mo, 75 cents. FIFE SAILORS SAY: "I know of no long poem of American origin that I can place before it. In saying this I do not forget the productions of Longfellow, so deservedly popular."

☞ These books sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

PIANO FORTES, MELODEONS, AND HARMONITUMS of first-class makers at the lowest prices. J. M. PELTON
841 and 843 Broadway, N. Y.

F.Y.S.

BALLOU'S FRENCH YOKE SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway,
Premises Shirt Manufacturers.

Shirts made to order from Scientific Measures, of the best materials, sewed by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the ordinary prices.

BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

Genin's Hat Store,
Removed to 507 BROADWAY, adjoining
GENIN'S BAZAAR.

FRED. S. SOZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of his own importation, viz:

BARE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
73 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

U. STATES JUVENILE WAREHOUSE,
No. 260 Broadway, up one St. Nicholas Hotel.
Parents are invited to the above establishment, where Ladies' and Children's Clothing of the Newest Style and best material and workmanship are always on hand.

"Time saved is money gained."

Booksellers' and Newsvenders' Agency.

ROSS & TOUSEY

Would respectfully invite the attention of Booksellers, Dealers in Cheap Publications and Periodicals, to their Wholesale Agency, which they have just established at No. 121 Nassau street, corner of Ann, where they will receive promptly and dispatch. All books packed with the greatest care, and forwarded, in all instances, by the very earliest conveyance following the receipt of the orders, accompanied by the remittance. Sole Agents for Frank Leslie's publications, and single numbers of Books, &c., also procured, promptly packed, and forwarded by express. Regular publications saving time and extra expense. Orders solicited.

ROSS & TOUSEY,
No. 121 Nassau Street, N. Y.

☞ Refer to the principal Booksellers and Publishers of New York and Brooklyn.

CHRISTIAN INQUIRER.

THE CHRISTIAN INQUIRER is published weekly in the City of New York, under the editorial charge of the Rev. A. Livermore, assisted by the most eminent writers of the Unitarian denomination. It is designed to be fresh, free, and reverent; a Family Religious Newspaper of liberal thought, and the most decided character. It is furnished to subscribers at $2 00 in advance, by mail, or carrier. Address

CHRISTIAN INQUIRER, 111 Broadway, N. Y.

It is full of life, learning, and liberality.—Sunday School Gazette.

The independence and vigorous earnestness with which it discusses the religious questions of the times, make it a powerful auxiliary to those who are striving for the attainment of a vital piety. Its selections are eminently judicious, and those of us who are fortunate as to be subscribers among its patrons have proceeded to them, in its well-filled pages, the gems of thought stored by the most eloquent and profound religious thinkers of the age.—The Reformed Church Messenger, Philadelphia.

The earliest and able organ of the Unitarian denomination in this country.—The Independent.

A model paper.—Boston Journal.

One of the ablest religious newspapers published in America.—Western Herald.

The ably-conducted organ of our Unitarian fellow-Christians.—Montreal Herald.

One of the ablest Unitarian Journals in the country.—N. Y. Daily News.

WM. ROWE, JR.
CARPETS, OIL-CLOTHS,
CHEAP, FOR CASH.
No. 297 Hudson street, near Spring,
New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The new FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are unrivalled in simplicity. In all essential qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

LIGHTE, NEWTON & BRADBURY'S
PIANO FORTES,
291 and 293 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.
HENRY H. HOOPER, JR., Agent.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for "LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION." In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1500 beautiful Illustrations. To Agents of good address, liberal terms will be given, each of whom a special District will be given. Apply, by discreet and the country. Applicants should name the County or Counties in which they prefer to labor. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

HEAD QUARTERS OF BON TON.

122, 138 and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

ODE TO STRANGERS.

Those mansions of marble, oh say if thou knowest,
Over which the gay standard of Elegance's unfurled,
Where the welcome is warm, and the prices are lowest,
And the CLOTHES are the CHEAPEST and BEST in the world.

Hie—and say at once! To Smith Brothers besides you,
They but have an order you to hear and your place;
For they either have got or will speedily make you,
THE VERY BEST OF CLOTHES EVER SEEN UPON MAN!

All Freight Forwarded with the Greatest Speed,
BY THE
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S
LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave the Hudson River Depot at 6.45 and 11.30 A.M.; 3.15, 4.30, and 5.30 P.M.

Freight Forwarded by Express Passenger trains, and do not lie over or stop at any point.

The regular time by the Fast Run is

To Chicago	in 40 hours	To Dayton	in 38 hours
" Cincinnati	" 37 "	" Toledo	" 34 "
" Louisville	" 74 "	" Detroit	" 36 "
" Columbus	" 33 "	" Indianapolis	in 54 hours

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in like good time.

Goods for sale on Mississippi and Arkansas River Steamers, &c., will save time by shipping by our line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

PHELAN'S IMPROVED BILLIARD TABLES AND

COMBINATION CUSHIONS,

PATENTED FEB. 19, 1856; OCT. 28, 1856; DEC. 9, 1856; JAN. 13, 1857; JAN. 13, 1858.

NOV. 1 MBER 15, 1 5 8.

For sale only by the manufacturers,

O'CONNER & COLLENDER, 51 and 53 Ann Street, And the patentee,

MICHAEL PHELAN,
782 and 784 Broadway, New York.

PICTURES FOR ENGRAVING AND COPY published by E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway, New York.

Who forward them, post-paid, on receipt of price, and special directions how to paint, to any address. Send for a list of other interesting goods.

Dealers and Teachers supplied.

"MASSER'S"

Patent 5 Minute Freezers.

OPERATION SIMPLE. RESULT CERTAIN.

The increasing demand and the unrivaled popularity of "MASSER'S" CELEBRATED FREEZERS prove them to be the best Ice-Cream Freezer in use.

Purchasers and Dealers are cautioned against imitation Freezers that are offered in place of the above. Of "H. B. MASSER'S" Freezers, it has been long thought by many of the best Ice-Cream Freezers in use.

Sole Agents, E. REYCRAFT & CO.,
Manufacturers of Japanned and Planished Tin Ware,
No. 97 Fulton Street, New York.

THE NEW YORK OBSERVER.

IN A NOTICE OF

THE METHODIST,

says:

"Not to Methodists only, but to all religious readers, these two volumes will be highly entertaining. They are full of striking incidents, some of them tender, some exciting, some amusing, all of them readable. The work are chiefly laid in the midst of Methodism, and will therefore be more familiar to readers of that communion, but they will be eagerly surveyed by thousands of others."

THE METHODIST.

By MIRIAM FLETCHER, with an introduction by the Rev. W. F. Strickland. 2 vols. 12mo. Price $2.

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

The Copartnership heretofore existing between the subscribers, under the name and firm of A. S. Barnes & Co., is this day dissolved by mutual consent.

A. S. BARNES,
H. L. BURR,
S. A. ROLLO.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1st, 1859.

S. A. Rollo, having retired from the late firm of A. S. Barnes & Co., will continue the PUBLISHING, BOOK-SELLING, and STATIONERY BUSINESS, at No. 29 Park Row opposite the Astor House, under the name and style of

S. A. ROLLO & CO.

NEW YORK, Feb 1st, 1859.

The subscribers, having newly fitted the store No. 29 Park Row, are now prepared to offer the trade and to the general public a large, fresh, and well-selected stock of School, Classical, Theological, Medical, Standard, and Miscellaneous Books and Stationery. Blank Bookwork by the latest and quickest Steam and Hand Power Printing, Ruling and Machine Stapling, &c. &c.

Every inducement, so far as regards prices, terms, quality, and quantities, will be offered to first-class buyers, either for cash or credit.

S. A. ROLLO & Co.,
Publishers, Booksellers and Stationers,
No. 29 Park Row opposite the Astor House),
New York.

ONE HUNDRED COMIC SONGS.
Music and Words. Price Fifty Cents.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S
CLOTH
TOURNURE CORSET.

This article combines in one garment a CORSET of SUPERIOR SHAPE and FINISH, and a BUSTLE of PERFECT MODEL, insuring free and healthful action in the lungs, and comfortable support to the spine. It has been pronounced by all who have seen it (among whom are several eminent members of the Medical Faculty), to be the only Corset without an objection, either artistic or physiological. For sale by all retail dealers in D. & S. skill manufacture their well-known

CLOTH SKIRT.

Also the celebrated

MATINEE SKIRT,

which for COMFORT and ELEGANCE is unsurpassed, together with every recently other different styles, all of which are for sale at all the principal stores in the United States and Canada. All articles of their manufacture

ARE STAMPED WITH THEIR TRADE MARK.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

SEWING MACHINES,

PRICES GREATLY REDUCED.

Office 505 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

NEW YORK PURCHASING AGENCY.
W. W. & H. HALSEY, No. 198 Nassau Street.

Persons desirous of making purchases in New York or elsewhere, large or small, of any kind, will find the Book & Stationery, a Shoe & Leather Depot, on Ann street, between Nassau and William streets, a convenient and safe place to call. Refers by permission to G. T. Sampson, Esq., Castleton Long Island Bank, Messrs. John Jewett & Sons, Hastings, Phillips & Co., New York; J. D. Dameron & Co., New Orleans.

WANTED!

AGENTS EVERY WHERE, to sell the best and cheapest Family Machine ever offered. Will sell a small capital can do this very pleasant business and make from $5 to $10 per day. Call and see us.

Our Instructions are so plain that a child can learn to operate, and of the highest moral and intellectual character. For full particulars address

LEARY & GETZ, Publishers,
No. 724 South Second Street, Philadelphia.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

"THAT STANDARD MEDICINAL AR-TICLE, The Vegetable Discovery discovered by the well-known druggists, Messrs. Reed, Cutler & Co., of this city, is, we have authority for stating, one of the best remedies for Coughs, Colds, and all Pulmonary Complaints, ever offered to the public. It has stood the test of all tests, time, and has sustained its position from year to year.—Sunday Times.

Physicians of the highest respectability prescribe it, and the people, who have proved it, pronounce it a standard article.—Sunday Mercury.

Inquire for the article by the WHOLE NAME,
"VEGETABLE DISCOVERY, MANUFACTURED."

Prepared only by REED, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Boston, Mass., and for sale by all Druggists.
BARNES & FAIR, Agents, New York.

"HARD TIMES NO MORE."

ANY PERSON (male or female) can engage in the United States, possessing a small capital of from $5 to $25, can enter into a safe, honorable business, by which from $5 to $10 per day can be realized. For particulars address (with stamp), W. E. ACTON & CO., 41 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

Facts Stranger than Fiction.

MATRIMONIAL BROKERAGE IN THE Mail.—SECRETS is now ready, and is going like wildfire.

For proof of the remarkable incidents contained in this book, see the Spirit of the Evening Post of Oct. 31st.

Price One Dollar.

THATCHER & HUTCHINSON,
No. 623 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel.

Unity Fire Insurance Company of London.
(INCORPORATED UNDER THE ACT OF PARLIAMENT, 7 AND 8 VICTORIA, CAP. CXI.)

United States Branch, 58 Wall Street, New York.

Authorized Capital, Two Millions Sterling, or $10.000.000 00.

Available Assets, $4.520.951 16.

Statement of New York Branch,
For Thirteen Months, ending 31st December, 1858.

Gross amount of Premiums.....$100,615 19
Losses, Taxes and Expenses, Commissions and Re-insurances paid $50,937 77
Surplus in hands.....41,787 33
Loss subject to Liabilities.....1,004 25

Deposit Fund in the hands of Trustees.....150,000 00

GEORGE ADLARD,
Manager and General Agent for the United States.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines—it has trebled within four months—indicates the increasing popularity of the country. The price of our Machines have been greatly reduced.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

HOWE'S PATENT ELLIPTIC SPRING
BED is, without doubt, the most perfect and deserving article ever brought before the public. It is within the reach of all, and, as a matter of economy, to say nothing of luxury, must be universally introduced. The cost is from $10 to 60 dollars. For sale by all first class dealers, or may be obtained direct from the company. Address

GEO. F. GRAY, Sec'y,
Elliptic Bed Spring Co.,
378 Broadway, N. Y.

Send for Circular.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANU-
FACTURED BIBLES, at the Bible Warehouse, No. 129 First Street, Harper's Buildings. Bruhns of Leipsic, Germany, and Self, Paris, and for sale at the lowest prices. A Silver Medal was received from the American Institute, in 1845, for superior Bookbinding.

JOHN E. HOFFEL.

BUCKLAND'S CURIOSITIES
OF
NATURAL HISTORY.

12mo, Muslin. Illustrated. Price $1 25.

We will send a copy of this book. The notices of it in the English Reviews had prepared us to look for a rare treat, and we have not been disappointed. The jury has published, and we have not been disappointed. The author, the son of the late Archdeacon Buckland, is a close observer, and gives his anecdotes of life in a lively, pleasant style.—Portland Transcript.

Sent by Mail, postage free, on receipt of price.
REDFIELD, No. 110 Nassau Street,
120 Grand Street (near Broadway), N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—
The Original and Genuine Article. Prepared prior to 1846 by Dr. SANDS, the taste, composed of purely Vegetable Extracts, and may be taken at all seasons with safety.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

BULWER'S NOVEL—COMPLETE.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?
By Pisistratus Caxton.
IN TWO VOLUMES.

By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart,
Author of
"My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c. &c.

8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.

[From the Troy Budget.]

The Siege of Corinth.

It is said that one of the former political divines of Troy, is about to publish a Treatise on the same plan in hand.

"The fuse that he singly kept at bay,
Outnumbered his thin hairs of Silver Grey.

Should he reach for the Pen of the Ink, but ex Dono that, under the effects of applications of Heintzeet's famous Hair Restorative, "Silver Grey" rapidly becomes in appearance at least members of "Young America."

Price fifty cents per bottle. Sold by all druggists.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

BEAUTIFUL NEW PICTURE.

MADONNA DELLA SCALA.

From the Great Painting by Carpaggio, on tinted paper, similar to Engravings of Double Elephant and Engravings, size 22 by 28 inches.

Price, per copy, $1 00. Sent, on receipt of price, by mail, postage paid.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

Agents are also supplied at Trade Prices.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just issued their SPECIAL TRADE LIST to DEALERS for the Spring Sales, with the additional Discount.

Early orders solicited.

PITS! FITS!! FITS!!!—The Number of persons performed by DR. HARRIS' VEGETABLE ESSENCE in lately astonishing. Epileptic Fits, Neuralgia, Convulsions, and Nervous Debility, are immediately relieved, and eventually cured, by this truly valuable medicine. Sold by druggists generally, price $1 per bottle. Sent by express to any part of the U. S. Address CHARLES H. HALLS, 54 Walker Street, New York, General Agents for the U. S.

A PRIZE FOR EVERYBODY!
WHO SUBSCRIBES FOR THE NEW YORK WEEKLY PRESS.

It is one of the best literary papers of the day. A large Quarto containing TWENTY PAGES of SOLID COLUMNS, of entertaining matter; and ELEGANTLY ILLUSTRATED in every week.

A GIFT WORTH FROM 50 CENTS TO $1000 60 WILL BE SENT TO EACH PERSON OR AGENT ON RECEIPT OF THE SUBSCRIPTION MONEY.

TERMS—IN ADVANCE:

One copy for one year, and 1 gift.....	$2 00.
Three copies one year, and 3 gifts.....	5 00.
Five copies one year, and 5 gifts.....	8 00.
Ten copies one year, and 10 gifts.....	15 00.
Twenty copies one year, and 21 gifts..	30 00.

The articles to be distributed are comprised in the following list.....1

1 United States Treasury Note.....	$1000 00
5 do. do. do. do.....	500 00
5 do. do. do. do.....	100 00 each
10 do. do. do. do.....	50 00 each
10 Patent Lever Hunting Case Watches	100 00 each,
50 do. do. do. do.....	50 00 each,
100 do. do. do. do.....	25 00 each,
150 do. do. do. do.....	15 00 each,
200 Ladies Gold Watches.....	20 00 each,
250 Silver Hunting Cased Watches.....	20 00 each,
1000 Gold Pens.....	$10 00 to 25 00 each,
1000 Gold Guard, Vest, & Fob Chains	10 00 to 20 00 each,
1000 Gold Rings, Studs, Lockets.....	2 50 to 10 00 each,
Gold Lockets, Bracelets, Brooches, Ear Drops, Breast Pins, Fine Cutlery, Ambrotypes, Rings, 30-hr. Brass Watch Keys, Gold and Silver Thimbles, and a variety of other articles, worth from 50 cents to $5 00 each.

On receipt of the subscription money, the subscriber's name will be entered on the books and the gift to which he is entitled will be sent to him, by mail or express, post paid.

☞ All communications must be addressed to

DANIEL ADEE, Publisher,
311 CANAL STREET, NEW YORK.

THE LIVING AGE,

Having largely increased in circulation the past year, the Publishers are enabled to append the new and attractive feature to a series of

LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC PORTRAITS,

engraved on steel, each of which will be accompanied by a

BIOGRAPHICAL MEMOIR,

thus furnishing to its readers not only the cream of the best Periodical Literature of the World, but also a complete

ILLUSTRATED GALLERY OF FAMOUS CHARACTERS.

TERMS—Single numbers, 12 cents; Yearly subscription, $6—prepaid to any address. Subscriptions for a less period, if desired, and for back numbers, to booksellers, and clubs.

DELISSER & PROCTOR, No. 568 Broadway,
Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy Machines of Agents which will not perform the work that is pretended for them, will find at the Office of the Inventor a Machine never fail to do any kind of work. No one is ever disappointed in these machines.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

THE MISSIONARY IN MADAGASCAR.

Now ready, with Map and Illustrations from Photographs. 8vo, uniform with Livingstone's Travels. Muslin, Price $2 00.

THREE VISITS TO MADAGASCAR,

During the Years 1852—1854—1856. Including a Journey to the Capital. By WILLIAM ELLIS, Author of the South Sea Islands, &c.

History of the Country, and of the Present Civilization of the People. By Rev. WILLIAM ELLIS, F. R. S., Author of "Polynesian Researches."

The spirited manner in which this book are of such public interest at present that we can not err in predicting for it a favorable reception.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"Journal." We commend our readers, architectural, botanical, geological, to its contents.—London Literary Gazette.—Athenæum.

A work exhibiting a matter of extraordinary interest, which a long period of travel in a most interesting land can be considered scarcely only in importance to that of Livingstone. Mr. Ellis's volume is enriched and adorned by notes in himself the missionary, the man of science, and the man observer of nature, and a philosopher and the person, we should think, for spreading, with a knowledge of the language, the solitary arrangements of European civilization.—Chambers's Journal.

Mr. Ellis's volume is replete with interest.—Literary Gazette.

For deeply affecting accounts of the simple piety and heart-felt gratitude of many of the Malagasy who were once to slavery, torture, and death, we must refer our readers to the volume itself. It is a most valuable addition to all our readings who take any interest in the progress of Christ or the spread of Christianity in the world, who will not make themselves acquainted with the contents of this excellent volume.—Illustrated London News.

It is well written, and abounds with information by many highly characteristic engravings taken from photographs. Mr. Ellis has also written two very full and valuable historical works as yet published on the subject of Madagascar, and all his readers will welcome this new and attractive work as yet published on the subject of Madagascar, and all his readers will welcome this new and attractive work as yet published on the subject of Madagascar.—The Press (London.)

The people were better qualified for this visit to Madagascar than Mr. Ellis.—The Spectator (London.)

Mr. Ellis is a modern missionary—an active, intelligent, observant, and enterprising man, a philanthropist and a lively, interesting, and unaffected writer. In his handsome volume we have a full and interesting account of three several visits which he paid within the last five years to the island, and visit principally to the capital of Madagascar. He took with him a camera, and his book is illustrated by a number of portraits and views of scenery of whose accuracy we are assured by their being from photographs taken on the spot. Mr. Ellis is accustomed to keep a journal, in which he noted down everything that he saw and heard, and that journal, which he has published in a separate form, furnishes the materials for the present volume. It is a readable book. It takes us into unbeaten fields; and the people is characterized by truthfulness, simplicity, and a pleasing but perfectly unobtrusive earnestness.—Spectator.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 00.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD.

"R. F. Williams's Compound Syrup of Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potassium" is a popular remedy for Scrofula, Tetter, Ringworm, Blotches on the Face, Inflammation of the Kidneys, Leucorrhœa, and like affections—and is a valuable remedy. I have seen the most wonderful cures effected by it in lumbosine style. Physicians recommend it, because they are aware that it is a

W. S. & C. H. THOMSON'S
NEW SKIRTS FOR 1859.

THE INDESTRUCTIBLE
DOUBLE EXTENSION SKIRT,
WITH PATENT EYELET FASTENINGS,
Made without Sewing.
Universally pronounced "the most perfect Skirt ever made."

THE GOSSAMER EXPANSION,
The lightest and most graceful Skirt ever produced.

THE PICCOLOMINI!
By means of clasps—this beautiful and economical garment can be taken to pieces, washed, and put together again at pleasure.

All the above have Thomsons' celebrated patent Watch Spring Bustle, and are stamped with our name and trade mark (the crown).

ALSO,
NELSON'S SKIRT SUPPORTERS,
By far the best Skirt Supporter yet invented.

For sale by the principal retailers every where.

W. S. & C. H. THOMSON,
233 Broadway, New York.

Alice Learmont—38 Cents.

By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX."

A HERO,
BREAD UPON THE WATERS,
ALICE LEARMONT.

Tales by Miss MULOCH,
Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," &c., &c.

Complete in one vol. 12mo, Muslin, price 50 cents; Paper Covers, 38 cents. New Edition. (Originally published in 1853.)

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under $300 inlet, on receipt of Fifty Cents.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 20 to 50 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
FOR MARCH.

The Publishers desire to state that Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of matter than any other publication in the world, and is by any other periodical of the day.

At no period since the commencement of the Magazine have its literary and artistic resources been more ample and varied; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the Periodical for the past as the best guarantee for its future claims upon the favor of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER! $2 50 A YEAR.

[From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 13, 1859.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty-two numbers of this attractive and entertaining publication, issued during the past year, have been gathered into a single volume, and form a book of 832 pages, large in size and weight, in variety, the agriculturists, and the value of the contents. There is complete history of nearly all the public events of the year—there are ample dissertations on the leading topics of the day—there are stories, poems, and sketches of every description—there are many of the best engravings, however, but professional artists of the day—there are portraits of distinguished statesmen, Bishops, Theologians, Authors, Actors, Generals, and Admirals—and, above all, there are those striking wood-cut representations of the contemporary modes of dress, or fashions, and of costume and countries—all combined with a wealth of humor to be had for a trifle. It is a grand picture-book of the human life of the nineteenth century, and will be invaluable fifty years hence. Every class of readers, moreover, may be interested by the articles which are specially adapted to the tastes of business, the child and the women.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Week.....	$ 0 08
One Copy for Four Weeks.....	0 30
One Copy for Three Months.....	4 00
One Copy for Six Months.....	2 00
Twelve Copies for One Year.....	10 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year.....	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or over.

☞ Persons living in the CITY OF NEW YORK wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names at the Office of the Publishers, or communicate by, to the Office of PUBLISHERS, POSTMASTERS

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS
Franklin Square, New York.

"PRETTY! SIGH, AINT IT, CHARLEY, TO SEE THE YOUNGSTERS ENJOYING THEMSELVES."

Gifts! Gifts!! Gifts!!!

EVANS & CO.

OFFER GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO BOOK BUYERS THAN ANY OTHER HOUSE IN THE COUNTRY.

OUR NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, OF SIXTY PAGES, CONTAINS

A larger and better selection of books than ever before offered, embracing the choicest and literary fruits of interest published in the United States. All books fur-nished at publishers' prices, with at the time of sale.

A GIFT ACCOMPANYING THE BOOK

The most liberal inducements to clubs, surpassing those of any other house, for particulars of which, see page 3. New Catalogue; also great commissions allowed to agents who are willing to devote their time to our business. Particulars sent on application by mail.

Send for a Catalogue, which will be mailed free to any address to all parts of the world.

Books sent safely without damage.

Twenty dollars' worth of books presented to any one sending an order for his book.

The following is a Schedule of Property which will be given to the Purchasers of Books at the time of Sale.

	Worth from
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever and Lepines	$30 00 to $300 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jeweled, Hunting Cases, open face and cylinder escapements	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, four glasses to contain hair, Medallion Style—large and small size, with rings	2 00 to 12 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Florentine, Painted Lava, Goldstone, Garnet, and Coral sets of Pins and Drops	5 00 to 25 00
Ladies' Gold Guard Chains, Neck Chains, Chatelaines	8 00 to 18 00
Gent's Full Jewelled Vest Chains	10 00 to 50 00
Sets Cameo, Goldstone, Painted, Mosaic, Garnet, Onyx, Engraved and Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons and Bosom Studs	2 00 to 16 00
Gold Pencil-cases, Plain, large, medium, and small size	3 50 to 7 50
Silver Pencils, with Gold Pens, large, medium, and small size, double and single extension	2 00 to 6 00
Gent's Heavy Signet Rings, Ladies' Gold, Cameo, and Plain Rings	1 00 to 7 50
Gent's Gold Breast Pins, Cluster, with Opal, Brief Pins, Onyx, Garnet, etc.	1 00 to 5 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns	12 00 to 50 00
Gents' Morocco, Cloth, Garnet, Chased and Plain Gold Vest Buttons	50 to 2 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles	37 to 2 00
Gent's Pen and Pocket-knife	1 00 to 3 00
Pearl and Morocco porte-monnaies	1 00 to 2 50
Toothpicks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides	1 00 to 2 50
Gold Crosses, small, medium, and large	2 00 to 7 00

Besides other Goods, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold. An equal proportion of the whole will be given with each $1,000 worth sold.

Address all orders, letters of inquiry, etc., to EVANS & CO., Publishers, 677 Broadway, New York City.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,

822 Chestnut Street,

Opposite Girard House,

Philadelphia.

Fine Watches,

Rich Jewelry,

Silver Ware, Sterling,

Clocks and Bronzes,

Chiefly of our own importation and manufacture.

Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

IMPORTED CHEMICALS.

50,000 KEGS NEWCASTLE BI-CHLORIDE SODA of extreme strength, now in store and for sale.

500 casks 65, 112, 168, 224, and 3 lb. papers, as low as 10, 15, 20, 25, 30 cents per lb. by the cask.

500 casks crystals CREAM TARTAR, prime, in store, and to arrive; also, as powdered in our own mills.

PERFECTLY PURE.

for Medical or Family Use. Our CREAM TARTAR is unexcelled.

SODA ASH—150 tons here, 750 tons to arrive—Newcastle 56 Soda of the best brands. Also 1000 kegs, from 112 to 140 lbs. always on hand.

SODA ASH—100 tons H. & E., 60 tons Evans' & McBryde, 25 tons Chance, and 25 tons Alkali of the white.

For sale by THOMAS ARNOLD & CO.,

Importers and First Hands, 120 and 138 Cedar Street, near West, New York.

TIME ANNIHILATED!!!

Cream Actually Frozen in Three Minutes.

NOW

TORREY'S

4 Minute Freezer.

PATENT APPLIED FOR.

The subscriber, after careful study and various experiments, has succeeded in constructing a Freezer, which for simplicity, durability, rapidity, and quality of its production, is unequaled, and can not fail to become a universal favorite.

To satisfy the incredulous, there will be weekly public exhibitions of this Freezer, at No. 9 Platt Street, to prove its ability to do all that is claimed for it. Store from 8 to 20 quarts.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR & C.

This undersigned will dispose of his stock of MASSEY'S FREEZERS, now on hand, upon favorable terms.

E. P. TORREY, Manufacturer,

No. 9 Platt Street, New York.

Also, Manufacturers' Wholesale Agent for the celebrated "Old Dominion" Coffee and Tea Pots, and "Arthur's" patent Self-sealing Cans and Jars.

"GET THE BEST."

WEBSTER'S Quarto Dictionary.

The entire work Unabridged.

"SAVE THE BIBLE,

Webster's Dictionary has received more special commendations of its high practical importance than any other book in the world. The author is acknowledged to be the greatest lexicographer the world has produced. No more is needed on this point than to put over his title. No family or public library is complete without a copy of Webster's Dictionary. It is a library of itself, and no man is too poor to own one. We could not get along a day without it.—Phrenological Journal.

Published by G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass., and for sale by CARLTON & PORTER, New York, and all booksellers.

J. W. NORCROSS & CO.,

IMPORTERS OF

DRUGGISTS' FANCY GOODS,

No. 91 Fulton Street, New York,

31 Milk Street, Boston,

Sole Agents for the United States,

FOR

Messrs. Yardley & Sheldon's (London) Sunflower Oil, Honey, Glycerine, and Marshmallow Soaps, Pomade, Toilet Powder, &c.

Edward Taylor's (Manchester) Surgeons' Lint, Surgical Stockings, Asbestos Plaster, and Oriental Tooth Paste.

S. J. Lewens & Co's (Montreal) Arctizana, or Real Indian Balm.

Beebe's Celebrated Hair Dye, the best in use.

Johnson Johnson Fluctuat Nec Mergitur Soaps, Sponges, and other toilettes.

Lental Elastics and Metallic Syringes and Breast Pumps.

Dr. Vidaud's Celebrated Surgical Instruments.

A complete assortment of Combs, Brushes, Perfumery, Toilet Articles, Chamois Skins, Sponges, and French Bosoms, Catchers, Flasks, and all articles usually kept in Druggists' Fancy Stores, to which we invite the attention of trade.

Orders received for the importation of all kinds of European Goods in our line, on the most favorable terms.

J. RUSSELL & SUDING'S

ROSEMARY,

is the best dressing for the hair known. It promotes luxuriant growth of hair to bald heads.

Rosemary will remove dandruff.

Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.

The Rosemary has no sediment, and can not be surpassed, according to taste, healthy odor and beautiful lustre.

The Proprietor can furnish proof to sustain the assertions above. Boots will not admit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you have not subscribed, try it.

Each genuine, genuine, has the signature of the sole proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 31 Tremont Street, Boston. Sold by Dealers generally.

$1300 A YEAR. Peddlers Wanted.

The article is light, easily carried, and required in every store and family. Our Agents are making from $4 to $6 a day profit. Any person sending us 25 cents in stamps or currency will receive a sample of the article worth that amount and all necessary information.

Address VAN DELOFF BROTHERS,

Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y.

P. P.

PARR'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the congested impurities and soreness from the system; they relieve promptly; they are divested in action, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous, all impure excretions pass off, and they are not lessen effensive, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any. Price, 25 cents each. Sent by mail, post paid, for 30 cents.

Dr. Parr's Blue Plasters are, pain cuts and cures. Price, 25 cents each. Sent by mail, post paid, for 30 cents. Filled with old, chronic, and acute pains, should try them. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. Dr. Parr's Plasters Cure. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp and our Signature.

BARNES & PARR, 13 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.

JOHN D. PARR, Cincinnati, Ohio.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, &c., and prevent the Ravages of Moths.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is indisputable. In warm climates it is a necessity with those conveying fees. This powder is the only article ever discovered that will destroy insects. Its power is derived from botanical, not mineral substances. Its effects are so manifest the form of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon it would lose all kind of spinal vigor soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night couges from insect intruders. Specimens of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insecticide. After very experiments, it is made up in a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to resist the effect of age and climate. Medals and diplomas have been also obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, Austria, Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous mercantile and horticultural colleges and societies.

Letter from Lieut. Maury, of the U. S.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1859.

DEAR SIR: Please send me by express, as soon as convenient, to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

MILLARD FILLMORE, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

NEW YORK, October 1st, 1858.

"MR. E. LYON.—Dear Sir: We have employed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.

Yours, respectfully, JOHN HANCOCK.

"Lieutenant Maury, U.S.N., Observatory, N. Y. Hospital."

Mr. John L. Jones, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says: "We have exterminated all the bugs, ants, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powder, and finds it of immense value."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in the use of this article. Reference can be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Mills, Secretary of State, Governor Bullitt, James Gordon Bennett, Gen. Winfield Scott, Commodore Van Brunt, and Lieut. Maury, of the U. S. Navy, &c. &c. Judge Mills says, "This discovery of Prof. E. Lyon is one of great value to the world, and should have been found thoroughly." It will destroy ticks, dogs, roaches, ants, moths, bugs, and all vermin.

Sold by druggists and country merchants generally.

Agents wanted in every town in the United States.

Agents and juice can not be reached by a powder, and are killed by a Magnetic Fan. Order them through any druggist.

The Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice.

But Lyon's Fills are mixed for rate and mice.

Lyon's Patent Magnetic Powder, size, 50 cents and $1 00. Fulton's Fan, 50 cents. Sent free of charge.

BARNES & PARR,

13 and 15 Park Row, New York.

SELPHO'S PATENT ELASTIC ANGLESEY LEG AND HAND—Combines new and valuable improvements to all the various kinds. For circular address WM. SELPHO, 910 Broadway, N. Y.

SPRING FANCY GOODS,

L. J. LEVY & CO.,

Nos. 809 and 811 Chestnut Street,

Adjoining Bailey & Co's,

PHILADELPHIA,

Are now opening a large and very choice assortment of

NEW GOODS FOR SPRING,

Selected for the most part in Paris and Lyons for the RETAIL SALES from the choicest productions of the looms of FRANCE.

They invite the inspection of Wholesale as well as Retail customers to one of the most beautiful assortments for its extent of new fabrics for which can be found in this country.

LADIES' SPRING DRESSES

In all the richer articles of DRY GOODS, such as

INDIA CASHMERE SHAWLS,

CHOICE SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS,

PARIS PRINTED FOULARDS,

SUPERB ORGANDIE and BAREGE ROBES,

NEW SPRING and SUMMER SHAWLS,

their assortments are constantly being increased by the arrivals of the Steamers from Europe.

PHILADELPHIA, February, 1859.

Coughs.

Coughs.—The administration of medicinal preparations to the throat, by means of Lozenges, or of troches or cakes, is a mode of treatment especially adapted to relieving Throat Diseases. Brown's Bronchial Troches or Cough Lozenges, allay irritation which induces coughing, having a direct influence to the affected part.

Colds.

Colds.—You are aware of the importance of checking a Cough or Cold when you have it. The first stage, by which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if neglected, must attack the lungs. "Brown's Bronchial Troches," containing demulcent ingredients, ally Pulmonary Irritation.

Asthma.

Asthma and Pulmonary.—In spasmodic affections of the Bronchial Tubes, which are covered with a dry, tenacious phlegm or mucus, "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will cause easy give immediate relief. If of long standing, persevere with them, and relief will generally ensue.

"An old lady friend having tried many remedies for a Cough with Asthma, found relief from the Troches."—Rev. D. Lutes, Frankford, Pa.

Catarrh.

Catarrh.—A form of Chronic Throat Disease, resulting in inflammation, which begins behind and a little above the palate, and then descends. Those who use "Brown's Bronchial Troches" have proved very effectual in relieving this complaint. No sufferer from Catarrh should be without them.

Influenza.

Influenza.—The great and sudden changes of our climate are fruitful sources of Pulmonary and Bronchial Affections. Experience has proved "Brown's Troches" a remedy of great efficacy in relieving Influenza.

Public Speakers and Singers.—"Brown's Bronchial Troches" contain ingredients admirably adapted to relieve Hoarseness, and to strengthen the Vocal Organs. Many of the most eminent Clergymen, Lecturers, and Singers, frequently use them when relieved either from cold or excessive exertion of the Vocal Organs, to clear and distinct enunciation.

Consumption.—Consumption, before the system, they can be taken as freely as requisite for clearing and strengthening the voice.

"Pronounced by the first and best."

Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I recommend their use to Public Speakers."

Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, NEW YORK.

"I have proved them excellent for Whooping Cough."

Rev. H. W. WARREN, BOSTON.

"Great benefit in spasms of the Bronchial Organs."

DR. J. F. W. LANE, BOSTON.

"A simple and elegant combination."—DR. C. E. BLAKE, BOSTON.

Sold by Druggists every where, 25 cents per Box.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 116.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

Of the last number of this journal

120,000 COPIES

were sold.

A careful perusal of this journal will keep persons living in the country thoroughly posted on the news of the day.

No other publication gives so much and so choice matter, or so fully illustrated a history of the times in which we live.

More money is paid to American Artists and Engravers for illustrating this publication than for illustrating any other paper in the United States.

This is the cheapest and best family illustrated newspaper in the country.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because they meet the eye of more people throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West—than advertisements in any other publication.

We refer families to our printed list of terms on the fifteenth page of each paper. By forming clubs, people in the country can obtain the paper on very advantageous terms.

WITHOUT AND WITHIN.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

I.

'Tis night in dark, and the winter winds
Go stabbing about with their icy spears:
The sharp hail rattles against the panes,
And melts on my cheeks like tears!

'Tis a terrible night to be out of doors,
But some of us must be, early and late:
We needn't ask who, for don't we know
It has all been settled by Fate?

Not woman, but man. Give woman her flowers,
Her dresses, her jewels, or what she demands:
The work of the world must be done by man,
Or why has he brawny hands?

As I feel my way in the dark and cold,
I think of the chambers warm and bright—
The nests where these delicate birds of ours
Are folding their wings to-night!

Through the luminous windows, above and below,
I catch a glimpse of the life they lead:
Some are, some sing, others dress for the Ball,
While others (fair students) read.

There's the little lady who bears my name—
She sits at my table now, pouring her tea;
Does she think of me as I hurry home,
Hungry and wet? Not she.

She helps herself to the sugar and cream,
In a thoughtless, unshalmed way.
Her hands are white as the virgin rose
That she wore on her wedding-day!

My stubbed fingers are stained with ink—
The badge of the Lodger, the mark of Trade;
But the money I give her is clean enough,
In spite of the way it is made!

I wear out my life in the counting-room,
Over day-book and cash-book, Bought and Sold:
My brain is dizzy with anxious thought,
My skin is as sallow as gold!

How does she keep the roses of youth,
Still fresh in her cheeks? My roses are worn:
It lies in a nutshell—why do I tell?
A woman's life is her own!

She gives me a kiss when we part for the day,
Then goes to her music, stilths as a bird:
She reads it at night, and the language too,
Though I know never a word!

She sews—a little: makes collars, and sleeves;
Or embroiders me slippers (always too small);
Sets silken purses (for me to fill)—
Often does nothing at all.

But dream in her chamber, holding a flower,
Or reading my letters (she'd better read me!);
Even now, while I am freezing with cold,
She is easily slipping her tea!

If I ever reach home I shall laugh aloud
At the sight of a roaring fire once more:
She must wait, I think, till I thaw myself,
For the usual kiss at the door!

I'll have with my dinner a bottle of port,
To warm up my blood, and soothe my mind:
Then a little music, for even I
Like music—when I have dined!

I'll smoke a pipe in the easy-chair,
And feel her behind me patting my head;
Or, drawing the little one on my knee,
Chat till the hour for bed!

II.

Will he never come? I have watched for him
Till the misty passes are roughened with sleet!
I can see no more: shall I never hear
The welcome sound of his feet?

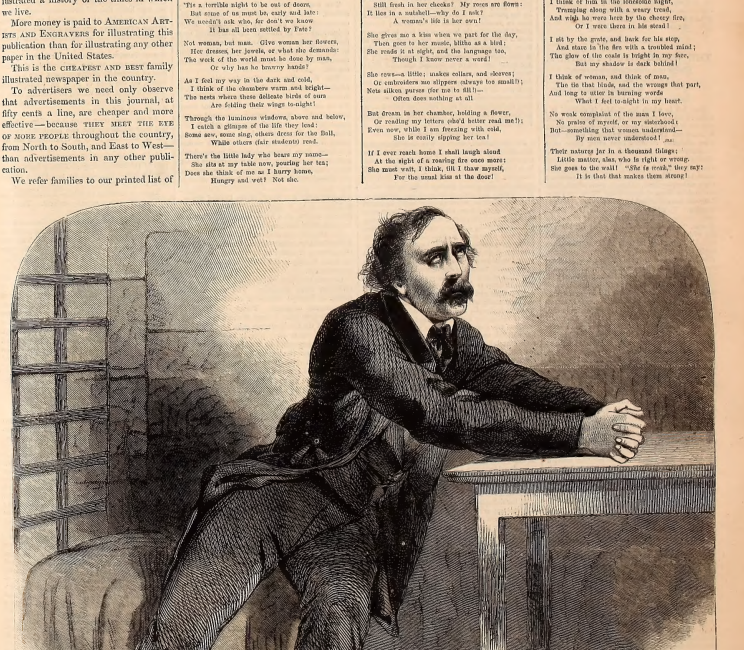
I think of him in the lonesome night,
Tramping along with a weary tread,
And sigh he were here by the cheery fire,
Or I were there in his stead!

I sit by the grate, and look for his step,
And stare in the fire with a troubled mint;
The glow of the coals is bright in my face,
But my shadow is dark behind!

I think of woman, and think of man,
The tie that binds, and the wrongs that part,
And long in utter in burning words
What I feel to-night in my heart.

No weak complaint of the man I love,
No praise of myself, or my sisterhood;
But—something that women understood—
By men never understood!

Their natures jar in a thousand things:
Little matter, alas, who is right or wrong.
She goes to the wall! "She is weak," they say:
It is that that makes them strong!



HON. DANIEL E. SICKLES IN PRISON AT WASHINGTON.—[See next Page.]

But great un-cook-ja in truth we are
In our love for them I, they should make us strong?
But do they ? Will they ? "Wonga is weak."
To the burden and strain of their song!

Wherein am I weaker than Arthur, pray?
He has, as he should, a sturdier frame,
And he labors early and late for me,
But I—I could do the same!

My hands are willing; my brain is clear.
The world is wide, and the workers few:
But the work of the world belongs to man,
There is nothing for woman to do!

Yes, she has the holy duties of home—
A husband to love, and children to bear:
The softer citizen, the social arbiter—
In short, a well-trained cur!

So our masters say. But what do they know
Of our lives, and feelings, when they are away?
Our household duties are petty tasks,
Say they nothings that waste the day?

Nay, what do they care? 'Tis enough for them
That their homes are pleasant; they seek their ease:
One takes a wife to bear his pride,
Another, to keep his boys!

They say they love us: perhaps they do.
In a measure they do: so they love their wine:
But the soul of a women needs something more,
Or it suffers at times like mine!

Not that Arthur is ever cabled
In word or deed, for he loves me well:
But I fear he thinks me weak as the rest—
And I try not to, who can tell?

I should die if he changed, or loved me less.
For I live at best but a restless life:
Yet he may, for all the kindest men
Grow tired of a sickly wife!

Oh, love me, Arthur! my lord, my life,
If not for my love, and my womanly fears,
At least for your self! But I know you do—
He must not find me in tears!

THE WASHINGTON TRAGEDY.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WASHINGTON, March 11, 1859.

THINGS IN THE WASHINGTON JAIL.

The jail in which Mr. Sickles is confined building which is entitled to the immediate attention of Miss Dix, or some other philanthropist. It combines all the disadvantages which have been gradually removed from every other place of confinement in Christendom. It swarms with vermin; it has no sewerage, no bath-room, no ventilation; and frequently contains twelve prisoners in one close, narrow cell. The prisoners have no employment, although some of them are confined for terms of three or four years; and they drag out their miserable lives in dirty idleness and sleeping. To add to all its beauties, it is miserably insecure, and the hangman of one of the guards, "any smart mechanic could cut his way out with a jack-knife." The guards are compelled to take their meals at their cells, which are ready for use, in case of an attempt to break out. It requires great courage to refuse a writ of habeas corpus, with the prospect of release from such a horrible place; and yet Sickles has resolutely resisted upon taking the regular legal course, or though the first night he spent in his bathroom place he was found covered with bedclothes so as to be literally black with them. This, it is only justice to say, arose from no fault of the warden, who was utterly unacquainted with the existence of such a state of things in that particular cell, and had taken every precaution to preserve its cleanliness; but the building is old, worthless, and overrun with these pests to such an extent that all the labor in the world can not all the vigilance, can not prevent their coming. When it was found how completely the enemy had possession of the Jail Mr. King very kindly gave up his own room, and there Mr. Sickles has been confined ever since. This is a much more cheerful apartment than the cavernous-looking dungeon which some of the enterprising newsmen, who are "indebted to their imagination for their facts," have depicted. Still it is a room in a prison, and the iron bars are not ornamental. The worthlessness of the prison is perfectly poisonous; and to remedy this in part a tin ventilator has been inserted in place of a pane of glass, and this and a few lamps up a merry rattling, which would almost lead one to the belief that the dungeon is part of an immense train jogging comfortably along at the rate of twenty miles an hour.

MR. SICKLES EMPLOYS HIMSELF.

Contrary to our preconceived opinions, time does not hang heavily upon the hands of the prisoner. He sleeps much of the day, or sits moodily with his eyes refreshed, takes a sponge-bath, makes his toilet with as much scrupulous exactness as circumstances will permit; and then, after breakfast, sits down to read the pile of letters received the previous night. Soon visitors begin to arrive, and counsel come for consultation; and as the day wears on appear another relay of visitors on various errands. Then more friends; and when these have all gone one generally remains until he is ready to retire. All this fills hours enough both to amuse and to oil a large book; political enemies have written most hearty epistles of confidence, and personal enemies have published articles justifying the deed. The New York Times is a case in point, for a more fair and impartial editorial has not been published than the leader in the organ of the Wood Democracy of the 3d instant. Indeed it has been rather a hopeful exhibition of the humanity and generosity of American character that, with one or two unimportant exceptions, the criticism of the press has been entirely unbiased by partisan or personal motives.

DEPARTURE OF MRS. SICKLES.

Mrs. Sickles, accompanied by Madame Bagioli and two or three gentlemen, started from Fredericks, and Mrs. Sickles, left Washington for New York at six o'clock on Thursday, the 10th instant. Madame Bagioli arrived here ten days previously, intending to return to New York with her daughter within a day or two; but the terrible grief of the latter brought on an attack of illness which rendered it impossible for her to leave her room—for the day on which she started. Mrs. Sickles took for a long time been afflicted with a functional disorder of the heart, which, under the present excitement to which she has been subjected, became very alarming in its effects. And never did a house from the time of the offering itself to entered the carnage which was to take her to the depôt. Although frequently importuned to allow Mrs. Sickles a visiting interview, Mr. Sickles has uniformly, with kindness but resolution, refused to see her, feeling that such an interview would only inflict torture upon all parties. He has given to M. and Madame Bagioli the use of every comfort and accommodation so long as Mrs. Sickles shall remain under their protection, and has allowed his mother-in-law every privilege in the charge of his little daughter, in order that his wife, while enduring the first severe pangs caused by their separation, may have the help of their child's society to console her.

MR. SICKLES'S DEPORTMENT.

Mr. Sickles has maintained a very proper deportment ever since his incarceration. He has talked freely with all who have visited him, preserving much composure without being cold and by word and look showing that he is painfully conscious of his awful position. Occasionally relapsing to mere whining lamentations. His spiritual adviser visits him every evening. He evidently feels most profoundly for the circumstances which, in his judgment, forced him to the deed, but has not yet expressed any full-toned regret as the the propriety of his course under the circumstances. In the prison he is treated with as much consideration as possible, but aside from the fevers having placed himself in the hands of the law, he seems to regard himself as entirely at the disposal of its officers, and asks for a shovelful of coals or a pitcher of cold water as respectfully and meekly as if he had never been a member of Congress. Of his wife he always speaks with a tenderness which is dashed with a sadness regret that is all that can be a wife no longer. To the many offers of service—some of them from those who, heretofore, have been his bitterest and most relentless foes—he only answers, "I leave every thing to my counsel and to the law."

VISIT OF THE CHILD.

On Wednesday, when it was ascertained that Mrs. Sickles would be able to take the train for six o'clock the next morning, Mrs. Bagioli carried Miss Laura Sickles to see her father. Up to this time one of the ladies in the house with whom she would find him would create a terror in her mind. Mr. Sickles refused to let the child approach to him, but when he found she was about to leave, and that having been kept under the impression that she was to go to New York she was going, and that arriving there and not finding her father she would experience a sad disappointment, he finally gave orders to have her brought to him, expressing, at the same time, a fear, which afterward proved to be a well-founded one, that the excitement she wanted to see the child, would result in the formation of some gloomy recollection in her mind. Brought down in a carriage on a bright beautiful day the little girl passed, in a few moments, from the clear cool air into the prison, through halls barn whitewashed walls and a brick floor; at first the fog of smoke, and the darkness of the corridors, but soon the strange appearance of things excited her childish wonder. In one corner she found the jail cooking-stove, a few old utensils belonging to the jail and now superseded by the more efficient stove-ware of the civilians who are now in charge; in another corner was a narrow cot for sleeping; a pose-looking affair like the others, and in the centre of the room the two lowers there was a row of iron bars and, altogether, she was evidently at a loss to know what to think of it. Her mother explained to her, but fully convinced that it was all very queer. She was shown to her father's room in the prison house, and was told that he had a great deal of work to do, and could not leave it at present; then she taken to the cell where she was to sleep that night; in another corner was a narrow cot for sleeping; a poselooking affair like the others, and in the centre of the room the two lowers there was a row of iron bars and, altogether, she was evidently at a loss to know what to think of it. Her mother explained to her, but fully convinced that it was all very queer. She was shown to her father's room in the prison house, and was told that he had a great deal of work to do, and could not leave it at present; then she taken to the cell where she was to sleep that night; in New York in the morning, and was answered that he was coming in a very few days. Then the little daughter again soon. A hundred questions such as a puzzled and excited child would naturally ask, were answered, and all apparently satisfied; but at last some dark foreboding seemed to fall upon her childish soul, as if the impression that a prison and criminals shocked the purity which could not even comprehend the meaning of crime, and suddenly her little face became troubled, and her beautiful large dark eyes filled with tears that weighed down her long lashes. She trembled, and, when the fountain was exhausted, were replaced by sobs. She could give no answer to the many soothing inquiries as to what made her weep, and her grief was so great that she was at last taken from the room which caused the outburst, and a little bit of her bed and wept the most bitter tears he has shed since he has been in prison.

THE CODE OF HONOR.

It is evident that many of the journals which are discussing this matter are not thoroughly acquainted with the usages of the "Code of Honor." According to the universal interpretation of that sanguinary legislation, if, instead of yielding to the sadness occasioned by the appearance and signals of Key, Sickles had challenged him, the former, on the first shot, must have been dead in the air, or have been forever disgraced. Before a cool, skillful marksman the fate of Key would not have been very doubtful. It is reported that he had gone constantly armed for six days previously, and his instinctive and rapid thrusting of his hand into his breast pocket has caused a surmise that, in changing his coat, he accidentally omitted to transfer his pistol to the pocket of the garment he wore. The position of the parties on each other, at the last fatal arrest, the chances were at least four to one in favor of his having the first shot at Sickles, in which case he might have added to his former wrong the death of the man he had injured.

THE LAW.

It is considered quite probable that, aside from his treasonable prosecution, the action of Key when Sickles addressed him, while the latter had his back turned to him, will be construed either, and the former made a rapid movement which required the latter to turn around, will also be alleged in drawing something that looked like a pistol, will be construed into a justification of the firing. The ruling of the Judge in the Herriott case seems to more than favor this last construction. The Grand Jury is composed of very respectable and upright men, but by some chance a relative of Mr. Key is included in the panel.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1859.

THE POST-OFFICE QUESTION.

CONGRESS has adjourned without making any provision for the Post-office deficiency. It is the intention of the President to construe the omission as a rule of conduct, and to reduce the Post-office expenditures as nearly as possible to the limits of the receipts of the Department.

The consequences will, of course, be very serious. The delivery will be left partly by the contractors, and partly by the public. Large reductions will be made in the allowances now made to steamers and railroad carriers, and, in many parts of the country, it is probable that unproductive mail-routes will be altogether cut off.

The Post-office question in this country needs thorough ventilation. As an important subject is unnamed, the Post-office costs the country five or six millions a year. It does not carry letters safely. Money letters, registered, are exposed to the great risks in the Post-office. To speak only of what we know, about two in three letters mailed in this city to stolen from letters addressed to one business firm in this city. The mail travels much more slowly than it might, and the express, an active traveler can give the mail twenty-four hours' distance on a journey of six or eight hundred miles. The mail is the United States, and lent it to a dead certainty. Under the present system, in a word, the mail is neither a safe nor a reliable system. It is a cumbrous system. As civilization has developed, the Post-office revenue became important, and the Government kept up the service as a political machinery. To this day the Post-office yields a large revenue to the Governments of Great Britain and France.

When our Government was first established it was suggested that the carrying of letters was not a proper function of Government, and the framers of the Constitution, however, had so many radical innovations to occupy their mind that this suggestion escaped them. The Post-office Department was left in statu quo. It has now worked eighty years—to the infinite disadvantage both of the public and the Government.

It answers no useful purpose whatever. It inflicts three distinct injuries. Money is stolen, carried safely or swiftly, and thus the public are injured. The annual deficit in the revenue is made up from the General Government, and thus raised. The appointment of postmasters on political grounds tends to demoralize citizens throughout the country, and then it works mischief among the most active class of the people. Here are three arguments—each of which is conclusive—against the system. The subject may vainly be searched for a single solid argument in its favor.

If the postal service were thrown open to the public the express companies would at once undertake it. Letters could be carried as safely as cheaply as at present; and in case of loss, the amount lost could be recovered from the carrier. Competition would secure speed in transmission and exactness in delivery. The Government—that is to say, the tax-payers—would save five or six millions a year. Express companies could serve, without loss, postrooms which cost the present Postal Department a large sum annually; they would make enough on freight to reimburse them for any loss on letters.

The arguments in favor of the change are, in fact, so overwhelming that nothing can prevent its speedy realization but the basic desire of politicians to keep up the present patronage of the Department—to which, more than to any other single cause, the demoralization of our politics is due.

THE POLICE AND NAVY YARD SCANDALS.

The Tory papers of England and the organs of the Continental despotisms will have a rare feast over the reports of the investigating committee into the New York Police Affairs, and the Brooklyn Navy Yard. With what relish will they roll their tongues over the savory scandals of republican administration! How lustily the rascals will howl over the evidences of decaying democracy! How triumphantly will they prove that, because Commissioner Nye coquetted with benefactions, and our estimable townsman, John Cochrane, insisted on his election, therefore "liberal" Police Affairs in the Navy Yard, therefore popular government is a failure, and the American people must, if they wish to save themselves from utter ruin, straightway proceed to establish a hereditary aristocracy, a solid vineyard, and a crown of thorns every woolsack! Since the absurdities of the European Democrats of 1848 the Tories never had such a windfall.

Let them rave. We, who have a better chance than they to see things as they are; we, who have no personal love for any head that of seize good government, and sound administration; we, who know that all governments are a choice of evils, and that the wisest political methods temporary expedients, not necessarily perfect, but the best, under the circumstances, that can be devised; we, in a word, who believe simply, by the disgust inspired by the corrupt proceedings of our politicians, or the melancholy shortcomings of our police and municipality, into a system which, on the face of it, is an outrage upon common sense, and which, in practice, must be abused as a matter of fact and can only be exceptionally decent and defensible.

At the same time there is no disguising the fact that while the Police and Navy Yard exercises of the ruling party at Washington has rendered the Navy Yard at Brooklyn an intolerable nuisance, the Police Commissioners on the part of the ruling party at Albany have caused equally grave disorders in the Police department of New York.

There is nothing to choose between the two parties. Both are equally at fault. The head eyes of both are blind corrupt.

Thirty years have elapsed since General Jackson set the final example of converting the public of fices a reward for political services. The plan has been maturing ever since. It has now reached, and the fruit of it is seen in the shape of incompetent public servants, degraded Congressmen, rampant corruption, drunken and disorderly policemen, rowdies in the guise of mechanics at the Navy Yard—on every side great incapacity, fatal shortcomings, and general demoralization. It remains to be seen how long the people of the United States will submit to an abuse so flagrant, and how long a period will elapse before a man will arise with the courage and nerve enough to select public servants not on the ground of political fidelity but on that of fitness for their office.

THE LOUNGER.

PUBLIC BEHAVIOR.

"MY DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I observe that you have a word to say now and then about the conduct of individuals in public conveyances, and I make bold, therefore, to tell you of the difference which I lately remarked between the behavior of an omnibus in New York and one in Boston. Nobody need fly into a passion in advance, and so I will not anticipate any warning, not a hundred years ago, I went to the Exhibition of Declamation at the Boylston Hall of Harvard College. The exercises were held in Nible's Saloon, which was crowded by a throng of ladies and gentlemen (at least so they seemed to me), when the speaking began on the platform it began throughout the audience. The loud noise of talking, and that one of my children took part, but as a friend of education and of youth), was perfectly astounding. I was disgusted.

"My young friend, Mr. Emerson, was indeed listened to, as he deserved to be. But he had the good luck to come first on the programme; and so my other young friends, Mr. Lowell, Mr. Peirce, Mr. Greenwood, and Mr. Pell were vociferously applauded—but not much heard. In fact, it was Babel; and I was glad to hear President Felton assure the indecency of the incessant talking among the audience.

"But it did no good. They talked on louder than ever. When they applauded, it was done with such gasping and shouting that there is not a circus in the world that would not have been disgraced by it; and the President, with just severity, cried indignantly, 'I call upon the students of the colleges to separate themselves from those who come here to make a ruffian noise!'

"The whole thing was a noisy row. The applause indicated no intelligence and no appreciation, but simply a foolish determination to make as much exhibition as possible. The most intelligent audience of apparently respectable people; and if the offenders were only to be punished by them, they would have been well punished.

"The next morning business (W. I. goods) took me to Boston. I arrived at evening, because I had arranged to see a dealer at Hartford and sat at Worcester until an hour to give the day to travel: walking around to see how I should amuse myself, I observed a notice of a concert at the Music Hall, and hurried 'event.'

"It is a noble hall, and at least three thousand people were packed into it. The conductor was a German, of which I was glad enough, for I have long wanted to have the taste of Trovatore taken out of my mouth. [Poor Verdi—sometimes one has a great lover of Trovatore, and think me a barbarian. Well, think on. A man would not be sensitive about the Trovatore would have just cut enough to abuse me for liking an entirely German concert. I prefer to be abused for liking Handel to your thin, sweet wine-whey, and goose-berry-wine at that. No—Handel is not to be likened to Yongest: wish you much pleasure with your sweet slops. Day! day!]

"The thing is that the audience was magnificent in numbers and in conduct. The performance was admirable. There was an overture, written by the hands of Weber's Invitation to the Waltz. It was by Otto Dresel—a pianist whom New York lost; and, losing, lost the most refined and delicate player in the country. Dresel played with three others, Mr. I. C. D. Parker, violin, who for the first time it went splendidly. The next, obeying a determined encore, it fell out of time a little. But, on the whole, it was an admirable concert. There was no piece too long, nor were there too many pieces; and when the thousand people applauded, they did not bang their heels and sticks and umbrellas against the floor—they did not yelp and howl! Ha! ha!—they did not make the noise of a cold clapping of hands, uninterrupted by a single call, not only made the hall resound, but showed that it was the applause of people worth the pleasing.

"I take the liberty to prefer that kind of audience, gathered to hear music, to the one I encountered in my native city at the opening of the oratory. The Athenians behaved with dignity and self-respect, and a profoundly intelligent and appreciative enjoyment. The Bostonians behaved like circus riders, rowdies, and children. I know what Boston has of excellent in it, and have actually seen that yellow State House—yellow enough to give all Massachusetts the jaundice.' I am fully aware of the Puritan origin of the other difficulties. I reflect with pardonable pride upon our nine millions less, and our free population upon a little city so handy that a man needs less than an hour to reach his home from his office.

"But I must acknowledge that the Boston bears up bravely under its airy and shady Common, its clean streets, and its magnificence. I grant that it has grown somewhat sober in the effort to sit upon three hills at once; and I see that the stretching, with the most rapid of growth, is already laid its head in Roxbury, and its finger-tips in Cambridge and Charlestown. But I am not prepared to believe what I lately saw in the Springfield Republican, that the Atlantic Ocean rises in fifteen hurricane and three months.

"There are things that naturally make a wise man—[You do indulge in self-praise, don't you, reader. But, settle then how he will, he can not deny that the behavior of a Boston audience is superior to that of Hibbins.

"Yours respectfully, Mr. Lounger,

"HANS VAN THOMP."

A FAIR BUSINESS TRANSACTION.

One French friend, late of Leicester Square, London, and the nephew of the late Count Molé, of Second France and the world that "the happy union of my well-loved cousin Mlle. Augustine with the daughter of King Victor Emanuel is not six of those unusual facts to which some hidden reason must be attributed. It is the result of consequences of eminently of interests of the two countries and of the friendship of the sovereign."

Douglas Jerrold was of the opinion that impudence is the master key of success. His temporary Majesty of France surely agreed with him. There is something ludicrously preposterous in the affability with which a man of the most ancient antecedents of the hand of a princess of an old royal house, and complacently informs mankind that the marriage of a commoner is a matter of state, and not—his sacred for it (see his oath as President of the Republic)—distasteful to the people of France.

There is no need of supposing that Louis Napoleon is any fuller or shallower than most other men who have climbed from obscurity to conspicuous position. It is a journey during which they all need, and big, and sacrifice, and the first consideration of their ambition the maintenance of public order. It is a principle, upon which the gambler stakes everything, that the chances are 100 to one that it it be wrong for a private gentleman to break a promise which he has made to his constituents, it is right for Mr. Louis Bonaparte to break his oath which he made to his country and the world.

And therefore it is that we regret to observe in a recent "Mount Vernon Paper" an effort to excuse the conduct of the present French Emperor. Unquestionably he is a man of genius, and Count Malmesbury does not hesitate to say that he holds European peace and war in his hands. But what thoughtful man does not feel that he is, after all, an adventurer, and sits as insecurely upon his throne as a monarch can? Who believes that his infant son is going to slip smoothly into his father's seat?

The question for a public moralist to decide is, whether the oath of a public man, publicly uttered in the face of Heaven and mankind, is not to be as sacred as the word of a private man in unimportant relations? Louis Napoleon was not obliged to return to France, nor to accept the Presidency, nor to break that oath. But, as the writer in Mount Vernon Papers' insists that "Louis Napoleon did but anticipate a decree of the Chambers in declaring himself." But he does not state the occasion of that movement, which was based upon the suspicion of his treasonable intentions—suspicions in the Chambers then thought, amply justified, and history now seems to have fully confirmed.

Besides, granting that the Chambers were false to their oaths, what then? Mohammed Ali assumed that title in Egypt, and Mamelukes went to massinate him—as they undoubtedly did—and he evaded them by escape. The Cæsars broke their oath under a fair pretense, and his guard shot them all down except one, who leaped his horse over a wall. Will is a good deal—depth—yes, fortunately, but slightly hurt—and galloped off to tell the tale. Mohammed Ali, as a matter of fact, was a thriving man his comrades, but his morality any communication for the wholesale murder of the Mamelukes. He was, unquestionably, the best governor of Egypt has known for centuries. Does that fact excuse his crimes? Or does the fact of his crimes excuse his wise and excellent rule?

The gentlemanly, against the tendency to judge within one side public sent by any other standard than that of simple honesty. What right has any man to "anticipate" what the "Mount Vernon Paper" calls "venal demagogues," if, at the same time he breaks his oath to the people? Where are the limits of the country?" "What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Louis Napoleon is as much a criminal in the eye of simple morality as any convict in the dock. The man who steals from the penny at Faro and the man who wins a fortune differ only in luck, not in principle or conscience. The man who, picking a poor pocket of a red bandana handkerchief and the one who swindles the government of millions of dollars are both thieves, and the size of the sin does not improve its quality.

SHALL WE RIDE ON RAILS?

HOWEVER inevitable the taking of Cuba may be, there is no doubt of the inevitability of a railroad in Broadway. There are the coal railway, and quarrels, and indignations. But they must all settle themselves in the end. The world is a long thoroughfare choked more and more every year by vehicles, and those vehicles mainly the private carriage.

The omnibus must go. It smells of the old stage-coach, and is built on it. It would have, however, let it dwindle by soft degrees. First it shall fade into the chief sloo-shovers, then into the sloo-shovers and the sloo-shovers altogether.

Fine equipages must also go. They no more belong in Broadway than stagnant water does in Wall Street. They must roll their unjarring springs in streets of lesser renown for show. Even now private carriages are largely stringed—and none not to go below certain streets far above the Park. Reform is coming, and the omnibus, and the right no private carriages at all in Broadway, or at their own peril.

Broadway is used by gentlemen going to and from business—by ladies going shopping—and by merchandise in transit. Railways will accommodate the first, and carts the last. The great artery of passage will be relinquished to cars and carts—and to cars only. The cars will run from Broadway, and you have gained space enough for a proper footway for all. Then, and not till then, are carriages will be generally withdrawn; and when you have taken out the omnibuses and carriages you have relieved Broadway of nine tenths of its crowd.

Conflicting interests will have their various elaborate pleas to urge against, and certainly will undoubtedly gain by the change and somebody lose. One point is clear, that whoever has the right of laying a railway in Broadway will make millions. I make terms with the omnibuses so that they may retire handsomely, and with the cars so that great public can be only gainers by the change. There are brave men at this very moment engaged in making applications for grants. They come at a most respectable accuracy who have been doing the same thing from time immemorial.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—AN ENGLISH CLERGYMAN has used to contribute to the English papers of a hundred years ago (at least the signature is the same), answers more fully the question about the hue of Dr. Garth's:

"To die is not to land upon some silent shore"
"The worst of it is, the doctor's dead, and the people is found, where few would look for it, in a burlesque poem, entitled to its day, the 'Dispensary,' by Dr. Garth, in the Tiral Canto.

"The whole passage is as follows:

"'To die is not to land upon some silent shore,
Where illness never break, nor tempests rear:
Are happy to the blest that for in time endeavor.
The wise through thought th' hostile of death defy:
To fear, brave spirits, is to suffer twice.
'Tis what the guilty fear, the pious crave:
Sought by the wretch, and vanquished by the brave.
It cases lovers, eets the captives free;
And, though a tyrant, offers liberty.'

—TORBO, Blacksburg, Virginia, says that a little sarcasm may be found lurking somewhere in the following note. Where can it be?

"Perhaps you are annoyed by such questions as, 'Who wrote this motto?' 'Who first said so?' 'Who first gave to the world this brilliant sentence?' 'Who was the author of Dick's works?' And 'who was the father of Zebedee's children?' etc., etc. However, as I am an American citizen, I claim the right to ask one question, and I do hope that it may receive your calm consideration, and a correct answer in the end.

"Is the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, in the author of this sentence, and where can it be found?"

—T. I. C. DOOLEBEEK, writes a piteous appeal, describing a shameful calamity. Brown, who graduated at a American college, maintains that the long Latin i has the sound of the modern Italian e, which he says is that of e; and that he was so taught in all the Universities here and on the Continent of Europe.

Smith, English, on the contrary, maintains that it has the sound of the long English i, as in fire; and that it is taught in all British Universities. And that such intonation is more consonant with the grand, characteristic dignity of the ancient Romans. Imagine, says he, a Cicero, or a Brutus, in presence of the assembled Senate of Rome, rendering the famous dispatch of Cæsar, "Veni, Vidi, Vicebo, Vecevi!!"

The case is without comfort. The pronunciation of the Latin is lost with the song the sirens sang. Modern nations generally follow the text analogy of their language. The Germans, for instance, pronounce what we call Cicero (as if spelled Sisero) Kitsero, and the Italians pronounce it Chichero. The best rule is to adopt that style which is most familiar in the country where you are. If you speak of Kicero in Italian University you will probably not at first be understood, and when you were, you would be laughed at. And perhaps Cicero might laugh at all the Universities in Christendom if he heard them pronounce his name.

—RADIX says:

"I find in 'The Table Book,' edited by W. Hone, in London, 1827, the following anecdote of the illustrious Washington and the celebrated Admiral Vernon:

"When the latter was attacking Fort Bello he observed a fine young man in appearance, who, with the most intrepid courage, directed the fire of a cannon. Vernon was always in that part of the ship which was most exposed to danger, and having lost count the Admiral sent his captain to request the young man would stand upon another side, which he complied with, and the Admiral, entering into conversation, discovered by his coarse and provincial dialect he possessed more shrewdness than fall to the lot of mankind in general. Upon his asking his name, the young man replied, 'My name is George Washington; and the Admiral, on his return home, strongly recommended him to the attention of the Admiralty. This great man, when he built his house in Carolina, called it after his benefactor, naming it 'Mount Vernon,' and at this moment it is called so.

"Is this statement authentic?"

The Lounger would humbly ask if any thing can be so dreadful as that last word? This story itself is what Dick would call a duck. Either Hone is a jester—or Radix is.

—E. S., Attleborough, is in some perplexity in his admiration of the late Countess Oneili, born Margaret Moore. He prefers the affectionate and noble woman to the Minerva that he conceives the girl to have been; and he exhorts all young women to imitate the Countess Oneili. Certainly, above all, to beware of overlooking the graces, knowledge, confidence with feminine grace. He approves. In his own words, "he believes himself to be equal to the zesty enjoyment of such conversation. The fair lady may prefer the society with "the beautiful stories connected with the names of the Countess Oneili," with mixed society they must not converse about "parallax, refraction, and the spheres." "It would mortify you beautiful Oneili to talk to you of the most common things of literature which you could not appreciate." In fact, he means than it would mortify the wives to find an equal ignorance in the husband, E. S.; and that is quite as likely. Margaret Moore was a noble and heroic-hearted woman, because she had a higher ideal of life than pleasing some imaginary husband.

—SPOON-HATER writes an indignant note against the newspaper correspondent who gently shoved the Princess Frederic William; and says, in a postscript, "I suppose this interesting event was happy." The hypothesis is too late. The baby is born. And whenever a prince marries a princess, though he may go to Prussia and hide in rural castles, there will jackdaw be—studying the bride's blushes and the groom's beaming—taking his observations into touching epistolary form for all mankind, which will devour them with the greatest relish.

—L. E. G., Little Falls, New York, is thanked for his tender little dirge, "Angeline," for which the Lounger wishes he had room. This is the last stanza:

"When I chance to meet at play
Those children of Angeline,
Beating hearts, unknowing mine,
Then to me am no joy way,
Asking, where is Angeline?"

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Saturday, March 12, 1859.

THE week which ends to-day has not been marked by any particular activity in the commercial or financial world. The work of recovery progresses slowly; but we are happy to say that thus far it has continued to be real. Nearly all branches of the importing trade are prosperous, and there seems to be a prospect that the cotton shippers will do better than they have done heretofore.

Money is again worth less than four per cent. on call on good securities. Short first-class paper, which is very scarce, is done at five; long paper at 6 @ 7 8 according to quality. Exchange on Europe continues to rule above the specie shipping point, and we are losing to Europe rather more than our receipts from California.

Stocks are lower. There is no speculation outside of the board-room, and the fluctuations which succeed each other from day to day are too insignificant to notice. As the spring advances, a speculation in the best of the Western railways is not improbable.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, March 12, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been less active for the principal kinds of foodstuffs, the advanced claims of owners checking quotations.....Cotton has been very freely dealt in at improved prices.....Provisions, Groceries, Hides, Sola Leather, Dry Cuddish, Pickled Mackerel, Pickled Herring, Tobacco, and Wool have been in fair demand at no revised quotations.....Naval Stores quiet and steady.....Coal and Ice at fixed rates.

The movements in Dry Goods have been restricted, the jobbing trade being unusually dull, and the sales by auction of moderate dimensions. Imports of foreign fabrics rule very large. The value of those entered at this port for the week ending March 8, 1859, amounted to $1,782,758 the same week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $6,784,284 against $10,784,284 the same time in 1858. The movements in other commodities have not been productive of any remarkable change. We append a revised list of the closing quotations of the leading articles:

Sea Island Cotton, per lbs.	14	@ 15
Superfine to extra State, per barrel	5 40	@ 6 70
Superfine to extra Western, per barrel	5 40	@ 6 70
Extra Western, per barrel	6 60	@ 8 75
Superfine to extra Genesee, per barrel	6 60	@ 8 75
Extra Canadian, per barrel	6 65	@ 7 25
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	6 65	@ 8 75
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 70	@ 4 50
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 60	@ 4 00
White Wheat, per bushel	1 48	@ 1 60
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 35	@ 1 40
Mixed Western Corn, per bushel	68	@ 72
Yellow Corn, per bushel	70	@ 72
White Corn, per bushel	70	@ 72
Brewery Oats, per bushel	60	@ 65
Mess Pork, per barrel	15 00	@ 15 50
Jersey and Penn. Cuts, per bushel	13	@ 14
Western Cuts, per bushel	13	@ 14
Cutts, middlings, per pound	14	@ 14½
Prime Pork, per barrel	17 62½	@ 18 12½
Prime Pork, per barrel	12 50	@ 13 25
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	8 50	@ 9 00
Cut Meats, per pound	9½	@ 10
Hams, per pound	11	@ 12
Rum Barrels, per barrel	1 40	@ 1 50
Western Butter, per pound	11	@ 19
Ohio, per pound	14	@ 19
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 25	@ 4 25
Tallow, per pound	8½	@ 9
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6½	@ 8
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	29	@ 32
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	6½	@ 8
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	30	@ 40
Hyson Tea, per pound	35	@ 55
Young Hyson Tea, per pound	25	@ 45
Gunpowder Tea, per gallon	30	@ 55
Java, new, per pound	10	@ 13
Rio, fair, per pound	10	@ 11
Hay, per 100 pounds	80	@ 90
Straw, per 100 pounds	50	@ 60
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	3 87½	@ —
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	44	@ 45
Tar, per barrel	2 31½	@ 2 75
Pitch, per barrel	2 31½	@ 2 75
Linseed Oil, per gallon	66	@ 68
Whalebone, per pound	50	@ 55
Sea Lead Tobacco	6	@ 8
Spanish Leaf Tobacco, per pound	30	@ 35
Havana Tobacco, per pound	35	@ 75
Am. Yellow Brownie, per pound	38	@ 44
Mixed Eagle Brownie, per pound	37	@ 41
Live Geese Feathers, per pound	42	@ 44
Dry Cod fish, per hundred weight	3 75	@ 4 00
Large No. 1 Mackerel, per barrel	16 00	@ 16 25
Medium Herring, per barrel	5 00	@ 5 25
Smoked Herring, per box	18	@ 20
Ice, Hoods, compressed, per ton	15 00	@ 15 50
Am. Hemp, dressed, per ton	170 00	@ 180 00
Am. Hemp, undressed, per ton	90 00	@ 100
Tarpaulin Sail, per bolt	3	@ 3 50

Quotations of several Articles in New York Market, March 14th.

	1858.	1859.
Ashes, barrels	5,000	5,000
Coffee, packages	59,778	79,944
Cotton, bales	12,000	100,661
Dyewoods, tons	2,816	2,902
Fish, quintals	5,000	5,000
Hemp, bales	29,160	56,667
Hides, number	130,000	45,315
Leather, Sole, sides	378,600	68,400
Leather, Upper, sides	60,000	60,000
Molasses, Cuba and Sundry, hhds.	8,671	6,000
Molasses, Foreign, hhds.	14,879	24,262
Naval Stores and Rosins	20,000	20,858
Rice, tierces	11,028	4,186
Salt, bags	5,078	—
Sugars, hogsheads	12,183	14,876
Sugars, tierces	2,000	2,500
Sugars, bags	1,013	10,473
Tobacco, Cuba, hogsheads	1,042	1,000
Tobacco, Crude, bales	5,338	12,835
Turpentine, Spirits, barrels	—	2,000
Turpentine, Spirits, barrels	—	12,000

The Live Stock Markets last week on Wednesday were moderately active for Beeves.....Milch Cows were plenty, and at a stock decline.....Veal Calves, Sheep and Lambs, and Swine were in fair request.....The reported receipts of the Live Stock during each of the last two weeks have been as follows:

	Week ending March 7.	Week ending March 14.
Beeves	6,663	6,462
Milch Cows	140	140
Veal Calves	781	404
Sheep and Lambs	6,413	6,413
Swine	9,068	8,490

The range of prices yesterday in the cattle market of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to Premium Beeves, per pound	5	7½ @ 8 12
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	19	00 @ 45 00
Veal Calves, per pound	6	00 @ 8 00
Sheep and Lambs, per pound	6	@ 12
" " per head	4	00 @ 6 00
Live Swine, per pound	6	@ 6½
Dressed "	6½	@ 8
Fattening Pigs, each	3	00 @ 4 00

The Country Produce Markets have been rather quiet. Prime, however, have not varied remarkably.

DOMESTIC MARKETS AT WHOLESALE AT THE LATEST DATES.

Apples, new, per barrel	$2 50	@ $ 3 50
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 00	@ 2 50
Hickory Nuts, per bushel	1 75	@ 2 00
Potatoes, per barrel	1 25	@ 2 50
Potatoes, sweet, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Onions, per barrel	2 50	@ 3 50
Beets, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 25
Carrots, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 25
Beets, per barrel	87½	@ 1 12½
Turnips, per barrel	87½	@ 1 12½
Cabbage, per 100	4 00	@ 6 00
Cranberries, per barrel	4 00	@ 5 00
Celery, bunch, per dozen bunches	1 00	@ 1 50
Celery, Boys, per dozen bundles	15	@ 30
Parsnips, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 25
Parsley, per dozen bunches	25	@ 50
Garlic, per 100 bunches	3 00	@ 4 00
Squashes, per hundred	1 00	@ 1 50
Egos, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	17	@ 18
Chickens, per pound	11	@ 12
Fowls, per pound	8	@ 11
Geese, per pound	8	@ 11
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 14
Ducks, per pound	12	@ 14
Ducks, black, per pair	1	00 @ 1 25
" widgeon, per pair	75	@ 1 00
" canvas back, per pair	2 25	@ 2 75
Pigeons, per dozen	2 25	@ 3 75
Partridge, per pair	87	@ 1 00
Rabbits, per pair	25	@ 37
Venison, per pound	6	@ 10

THE NEW YORK METROPOLITAN POLICE.

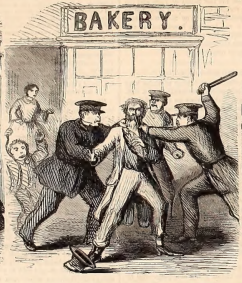
A PICTORIAL ANALYSIS OF THE REPORT TO THE LEGISLATURE.

1. These gentlemen, finding the garroting business on the decline, resolve to become guardians of law and order, and enter the Metropolitan Police.

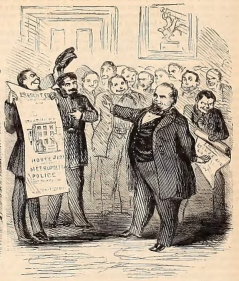
2. Policemen are but men, and when young and fascinating women happen to get into the police-stations, who can blame them if they are civil and gallant?

3. As to poor devils, houseless wretches, with no good looks, and steeped in poverty and misery, can a high-bred policeman be expected to cringe to such as these? No, no; let them eat the bread of sorrow.

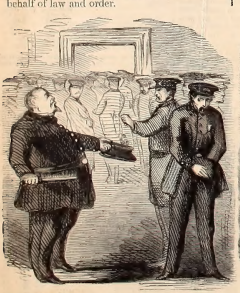
4. If a rowdy who votes with the Republicans happens to stick his knife into his neighbor's midriff, the judicious Metropolitan policeman instantly discovers a fight between two small boys at the next corner and hastens to interfere on behalf of law and order.



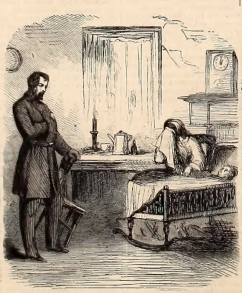
5. But if a poor wretch of a Democrat steals a loaf for his starving family, the zeal and fury of the Metropolitan police know no bounds, and the fellow is lucky if he be not brained on the spot.



6. A high-minded Commissioner scorns the idea of accepting a house bought by the members of the force; but somehow the house is bought, and the title-deeds are slipped into somebody's pocket without his knowledge and tremendously against his will.



7. The powers that be ask no favor: but when they want new clothes a friendly captain goes round with the hat, and as for the patrolman who declines to put in a quarter, he had better emigrate to California by the next steamer.



8. The consequence of which is, that the poor patrolman is unable to procure the food which his sick wife requires, and his children go without stockings and without new frocks.

9. The police service continues, however, to be admirably efficient, and quite a number of hack-carriages are actively employed on pressing police duty, as above depicted.

VIEW OF THE BATTERIES AT HUMAITA, ON THE PARAGUAY RIVER.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.

THE accompanying view at Humaita, on the Paraguay River, and map of the Paraguay, are from sketches sent us by our special correspondent with the expedition to Paraguay. They will be of great value as soon as news reaches us of the commencement of operations; our readers are advised to keep them.

The scene is thus described in letters to the Herald:

"After passing the confluence of the rivers Paraguay and Parana, at Tres Bocas (Three Mouths), there is, at a little fortress of inconsiderable note. A short distance up the Paraguay, however, there is a range of defence of more note, which are intended to command the river. The batteries extend along the shore for a mile and a half, and mount about one hundred and fifty guns.

"The breast-works are built of timber filled in behind with clay. The bank is fifteen feet above the water at this point. All the guns are unsheltered except the middle battery of thirteen guns, which is covered in a brick building. The customary leveling of the port-holes is made from the outside instead of within, as usual, in consequence of which the walls are very weak. A large clearing has been recently made on the other side of the river, and it is supposed that as our expedition sails up it may fall in with guns on both banks. Bridges, the river is very narrow, and the channel narrower, so that the fort will be within a stone's-throw of any ships passing up the river. Should the Paraguayans be suspicious, this point might be found a dangerous one; but the latest news from that quarter is that the secret river fleets have so undermined the sheltered battery that it has been dismantled. The river has long been approaching the clay bank of that battery; but below the fort, on the same side of the river, little patches have been cleared in the forest. Back of the defenses, on the river bank, irregular breast-works have been erected and pointed up and down the river, to be used in case of an attempt to land. There are 12,000 soldiers within easy call of the fort, of the best troops in South America. They will be certain not to run unless ordered; and the plentiful infusion of Indian blood makes them much more formidable in battle than the pure Spaniard. There can be no doubt that if the Paraguayans desire it, they can make an obstinate fight here, as the ships can not see the fortress until nearly abreast of it. The cleared patches are supposed to be intended for the planting of temporary batteries, to annoy the shipping in case any attempt is made to bombard the fort from a distance. The Paraguayans are not skilled in the use of heavy guns; and though they have succeeded in employing foreign instructors to teach them, these prudent teachers expressly contracted that they would not engage in actual conflict. It is supposed that Judge Bowlin will, however, be compelled to wait below Humaita until negotiations are made with Lopez. But if he should pass Humaita, he will have obtained possession of the key to Paraguay."

Another writer says, referring to a plan published in the Herald:

"You will perceive that it confirms the report made in the United States as to the number of guns. The fortifications, as represented in the plan, are, however, of a different construction from what they were supposed to be. Instead of a solid fort commanding river and land, they seem to be a succession of batteries defending every approach by water, but unprotected in the rear except by the land force. The largest of these, it will be seen, is a casemate battery of fourteen guns, whose range extends some distance down the river, but being of brick, they may be demolished without great difficulty. The others are en barbette and embrasures. The army around Humaita is supposed to be 15,000 strong, while an equal force defends Assunden. Such numbers will have to stir up the best blood of the marines and soldiery, while consummate skill will be required to fight such batteries with success from the water. It is a satisfaction to know that our naval armaments are the most superior in the world. Among the minor obstructions it is probable that a chain has been stretched across the river at this pass. Those who are best informed seem to be convinced of the fact. If it be so, the motive power of the steamer, or, what is still more certain, a shot, will easily remove the difficulty; and this is certainly the most liberal view of the defences of Parmagga and the cavalier of the most excellent President."

PLAN OF THE PARAGUAYAN FORTIFICATIONS AT HUMAITA.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. M. C. T. F. R. L. M. Martyr's Chess Club (Salt) meets, J. L. Lowell. Your solutions to Dr. K.'s pretty Problem, No. XVIII., are quite right. Very many others received are erroneous.——JACOBUS. Your last little skirmish just finished—with our limits this week. (We have several longer ones on hand, the examination of which is postponed—that to W. F. K. and G. B., of Brooklyn.) Your Problem, we doubt not, will be served up in due season.——"A. WALKER" (Johnstown College, Md.). Your one game match when ended is a thing belonging to the past, and if another is agreed upon, you must again draw for first move.——Dr. R. (Charleston). Both letter received and this letter just in time to prevent the notice which the former would have received.——"STRAY." and many others shall hear from us next week.——From a communication signed "Inquirer" we subjoin as follows, and in accordance with his request we publish the position to which he refers: "In your Magazine of 1846 you published a game between Staunton's brothers in the matter of two Chess-players of both friends of which, as to the move-ward questions. The first of which, as to the necessity of castling, was given as passed, when there is no other legal move, but been settled your way. How about the other? It would afford much pleasure to many if Chess world if you would republish, in an early Harper, the diagram and the short (and easy) solution and report opinions of your learned readers thereon."

PROBLEM XIX.

BLACK.

WHITE.

Can White checkmate in five moves?

Game lately played between "JACOBUS" and another strong player:

King's Knight's Opening.

BLACK (Mr. R.)	WHITE (" JACOBUS.")
1. P to K 4	P to K 4
2. K Kt to B 3	Q Kt to B 3
3. B to B 4	B to B 4
4. P to Q 3	Kt to K B 3
5. Kt to B 3 (2)	Castles
6. P to K 5	P to Q 3
7. P to Q 4	P to K 5
8. K to Sq (3)	Q Kt to K 2
9. Q Kt to K 2	P to Q Kt 3
10. P to Q 4 (c)	B P takes P
11. Q Kt takes P	Kt takes K P
12. Q to Q 2	P to Q 4
13. B to Q Kt 3	P to B 3
14. P to Q B 3	B to K 3
15. Kt to K 2 (4)	K P takes Kt
16. Q to K 4	B takes K Kt (c)
17. Kt P takes B	Q to K R 5
18. K to Kt Sq (5)	B to K 3
19. Q takes B (g)	Kt to K B 5 (ch)

And White mates in two moves.

NOTES.

(a) Sublime recommends R to K sq, followed by P to Q B 3.

(b) Lolling.

(c) An attempt, by which Black loses an important Pawn.

(d) A somewhat curious move, as it brings White's B into useless play.

(e) The winning move.

(f) 19. P takes Kt, White mates in three moves.

White.	Black.
15. K to B 3	Q Kt to Q 4
16. Q to K 2	B takes B
17. Q takes B	K Kt to K 4
18. P to B 3 (h)	Kt to K B 5 (ch)

White mating.

(g) 19.—

19. K B P takes B	Q to K 5 (ch)
20. K to B sq	Q takes B P (ch)
21. K to K 2	Q to K 5 (ch)
22. Q to K 3	K Kt to K 6
23. Q takes Q	Kt takes Q
24. K takes Q	Kt to K B
25. B takes Kt	And White wins.

(h) 18. P to K 5 (ch), Kt to K 3; 19. Q to K 4, Kt to K B 5 (ch); 20. K to K 2, Q to K 5 (ch); 21. K to B 3, Q to K 4 (ch); 22. K to Kt 3, Q to K 5 (ch); 23. K to B 3, Q to K 4 (ch); 24. K to Kt 3, Q to K 5 (ch); 25. K to B 3, Q to K 4 (ch); 26. K to Kt 3, Q to K 5 (ch);

having any particular lover, but last week he found among her papers, in one of her drawers, a note addressed to a certain Dr. Bulow, a German, residing at the corner of Liberty and Nassau streets, appointing a rendezvous with him at the Post-office on the following Sunday. On that day the husband employed one of his agents, Gen. Jacobs, who went to the Post-office and found the Doctor at the appointed place, and walk arm in arm with him for several squares, leaving him near the corner of Seventh and Plum, and return home. Immediately a little after the Doctor left the side of the friend and the apprentice were in the shop, the husband proclaimed in the wife full knowledge of her guilt and infidelity, at which, as usual, she became indignant, and replied bitterly. The next day she went to see her mother, with whom she remained, but as all that was said was in the presence of the servants, it was not known if the husband, however, from fear of a scandal, has not only not consulted her rendezvous with the Doctor, and the letter which he found in her drawer, but has remained startled, but not overcome. At first she could not find the letter, but after a long search she found it, and now, and here signified with a strange fire. She is not 25 years old, and is very handsome. Last night, at the room, took down a double-barrel pistol hanging on the wall, and cocking it, put the muzzle to her head, pulled the trigger, and fell at her husband's feet, who, seeing her purpose, had run to disarm her, and received a ball in her head. The wound is not dangerous, but will leave a deep scar.

BEGNOLI'S CONQUEST.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia (Boston) Journal of Music says: "Begnoli is so pleased with this town, that he has no idea of returning to Europe. He got into Steinway's $1500 a month, a vast deal more than it ever got on this or any other continent. He has also a common several hundred love-letters sent him by his friends, and has received so many invitations to dine that he finds it a severe labor. He has also a place picked out, but now contents himself with reading them, feebly hinging and adding them to the collection. He has given them to a friend he does it with quite a Don Juan air, and looks Leporello's catalogue complete."

PERSONAL.

The Independence Belge announces that a daughter of M. Morin, American Minister at Paris, is soon to marry M. Hippolyte Lebeau of the Belgian Legation.

The $6.8 raised some time since, in this city, for a monument to Francis Fontaine, a native of France, and famed to an association at Cooperstown, to aid in erecting a similar monument to Fenimore Cooper, whose ashes were buried.

Judge Douglas is represented to be in Philadelphia and New York in the course of next week. Mr. Vice-President Breckinridge will probably be expected to leave to Kentucky, where he has important law business. Mr. Roberts will make the Philadelphia visit with Mr. Douglas, and will be accompanied by the Hon. J. C. Whitman, of Maine, who is also a guest of Mr. Roberts.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer, writing from New Orleans, says: "I am sorry to inform you that Jacob Town, formerly of Philadelphia, but for the last few years of New Orleans, had his arm broken by the upsetting of his carriage last Tuesday. He got out of the wreck alone, but my informant stated that, at the time of his departure, the old gentleman was suffering severely. Mr. Train has been looking at the sewerage of Jersey by Lord Clare. Mr. Train is also trying to get up a new Madam Rumor, to purchase a residence in San Antonio, and eventually become a Texan Senator."

From now, who are to be found in the Washington City Directory? Mr. Buchanan, of course, and a number that may not be compatible to some of the Democratic members.

The Rochester Union says that Governor Morgan has ordered Captain Ely, the commander of the steamer which is the real "observing of Moses" in the Auburn prison, the feeling against him now running so high among the prisoners that it was not safe to have him among them.

A man named David Agnew, of Mobile, Alabama, and Dublin, one day last week, asking to be taken care of, as he had no nourishment on his stomach, and was under a person arrived in search of him. From this city he went to Canada.

The Paris correspondent of the Milwaukee Wisconsin writes that Bulwer's business in that city and him exactly that she would come to the United States next week.

Two men, Fleming and O'Leary, were hanged in Tipperary on the same time, on the charge of murder. They both confessed themselves guilty of the crime for which they suffered.

A lodge of the Court of Oddfellows was held in Philadelphia, a few days since, took umbrage at something said by a brother and resigned, when he rose down from his bench and thrashed the lawyer.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT—PEACE OR WAR IN EUROPE.

LORD PALMERSTON called attention to the subject of the Italian difference, and inquired if anything had been heard from Austria in relation to the proposition to submit the matter to a European Congress. He hardly believed the present position of Europe, pending on the warlike preparations every where in progress, and averse of his inability to discover any reasonable ground for either that the long-existing jealousy between France and Austria, with regard to Italy, would be brought into more active operation by the joint occupation of the Duchies by troops, and which could not but lead to a collision by a simultaneous withdrawal by these powers of the Legations. He trusted that the good sense and moderation of the Government and their good offices to bring about such a result, would be exercised in the present crisis.

Mr. Disraeli expressed his regret that the present peace had no wish to disturb the settlement of 1815, although there were circumstances which he was not included to recite apprehension.

The Government, in view of the warlike preparations going forward, had not been able to be insensible to the anxiety which existed upon the subject of peace, to which they stood with both France and Austria, and he hoped would remain so long as that feeling existed, and he hoped to be retained both by France and Austria, and that, too, without any compromise of the honor of Government. He might add, that the Lord Privy and Queen on a mission, the object of which was to express the wish and, of course, hope, that peace might be maintained. Under these circumstances he appealed to the House to postpone further discussion on the subject, and to the earnest efforts of the Government to preserve peace, and promote the general prosperity of Europe."

Lord John Russell expressed the satisfaction which he derived from the statement, and his hope that every effort would be made by all parties to promote the maintenance of peace.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH TO BE REVIVED.

The regular annual general meeting of the Atlantic Telegraph Company was held in London on the 23d, when the report given in will show that the operations which were published at the recent extraordinary meeting. It says the cable remains in precisely the same state, and that no efforts have been made to reconstruct it, owing to the lack of funds. The directors are not without hope that it may yet be rendered available.

The Chairman, the Hon. C. S. Wortley, in moving the adoption of the report, entered at length into the position of the Atlantic Telegraph Company. He stated that the Government has positively refused to give an unconditional guarantee, but will grant a loan of £600,000 sterling for the laid just received intelligence of the most satisfactory character which did not appear to offer any insurmountable difficulties. The Government had consented to give a guarantee of eight per cent, on the new capital of six hundred thousand pounds sterling. They, the Board, were not prepared to enter into particulars or recommend any definite course of action to the meeting. Whatever decision might be popularized by reducing the price of the shares, or by issuing new shares, or by any other means, would be taken without the authority of the shareholders, another meeting of which would be called for the purpose of receiving a report adopted by the Board of Directors re-elected. The shares of the Company had fallen from £100 to £3 10s. each since the last meeting.

At a lecture in London, by Rev. Walter Mitchell, on "The Statistics of Valentines," he stated that the sum of 1,000,000 stamps had been issued in London alone, and about 60,000 were rejected. The number of letters passing through the Post-office in Great Britain and Ireland is computed at 53,000,000.

THE DOUBLE BURGLAR.

A gentleman living in the fashionable neighborhood of Belgrave was aroused in London, having left his wife at home in the country. He was in bed, and, hearing a noise in the room, struck a light, and saw a man coming down on a rug at the bell, and a young woman, rushed into the room, and, seeing the man, rushed into his arms, and begged for sale. The servants very foolishly shuttled her into the kitchen to wait for the police, and returned to the dining them to make some purchases, and before leaving begged their mistress to remain. The man and the large store explained to get something for her, and while he was engaged in the room, the man and the poor boy ran her and turned the key. The housemaid, whom eyes were opened by the noise, had descended to the cellar, attempted to release her fellow-servant, but the woman, who was a stranger to the house, had left the key on the gas-way-cock, and the man, who had taken off his shoes her hands and feet withsome cord which she produced from her pocket. The lady, who was a woman of extraordinary helpless, she silenced her captive, when she attempted to cry out for assistance, by threatening to murder her if she moved or made the least noise. The whole of the garrison, being in the neighborhood, the business burglar being in complete command of the house, she proceeded to ransack it at her leisure, and was only called to her apprehension.

A GIRL EATEN BY A PIG.

An inquest was held at the Mullingar workhouse, Ireland, by J. Cooper, Esq., Coroner, on the body of a young woman, named Eliza Fagan, aged 21 years. It appeared that a woman, who resided near the workhouse, left in her father's cabin, at Tubbon, while her father was at his work as a laborer, and on her return found the house on fire, to which and complaint she had been for many years subject, and that the pig had eaten the greater part of the body, and in her struggles one of her legs reached the fire-place, and was burned to a cinder. The pig was in the habit of sleeping in the room, which was the only room in the wretched cabin, and, attracted, no doubt, by the smell of the burning leg, the animal had eaten the unfortunate girl, covering the half-roasted limb. A man who was passing on the road saw the smoke issuing from the thatch and windows of the ferocious brute, and went in to the rescue of the unfortunate girl, but was unsuccessful in preventing the Mullingar workhouse, where every attention was bestowed on her, but she died in consequence of the injuries received by her nearly a month, when death terminated her sufferings. A verdict was returned to the Coroner, accidental death.

A DUELIST REWARD FOR GALLANTRY.

"The gentleman who rescued two ladies from insult some time since in Dublin, has received the thanks of the latter being addressed to him at the office of Saunders's Newsletter. The ladies, who are sisters, are introduced in The Times, as in Saunders's Newsletter and Constitution, and refer to the gentleman who rescued them as a resident both in London and Dublin. The incident is one of more consequence than it appears, as it is said to have caps a gentleman of this city had the honor and the pleasure of knowing, and who, we are informed, is a member of the Legislature of Ireland. It is a pleasant incident of a person in the garb of a gentleman, and of giving him the gentlemen of the Irish Parliament. We are glad to see he had almost forgotten the circumstance, he received through an anonymous letter, and remembered the handsome diamond ring, with an intimation that it is designed as a token of the writer's appreciation of conduct on the occasion. What adds to the interest of the story is that the gentleman who rescued the ladies was one whom the ladies know not the name of their deliverer, nor is the gentleman aware to whom he rendered the service, as shown so delicate and tasteful a remembrance of the service as that of a ring to the ladies."

FRANCE

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.

Another circular has been issued by the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects of the Department, the purport of which is to call upon the Municipal Councils to "aid in withstanding the Emperor's desire to maintain peace, should his hopes in that respect be frustrated by the opposition and devotion of the French people."

The Minister of War has issued an order that he is ready to the forced insertion and the night blouse.

The Municipal Council of Paris has been requested to join the Legislature.

Immense quantities of lint have been sent to Lyons.

All the regiments of the Imperial Guard and Guard are to be supplied with rifle cannon, on a new plan.

THE BALL AT THE HOTEL DE VILLE.

A Paris letter says: "The ball given at the Hotel de Ville on Monday night was exceedingly brilliant. The decorations and supper were on a scale of the most magnificent description. The famous wedding-cake, which is always the principal ornament of the table, with fruits, and the imposing fountain of punch, which is always placed in the centre, the chased piece with a power of magic never surpassed. The supper consisted of 1,500 covers, and cost the modest eight thousand in a very large average number. The Emperor and Empress, with the Prince Imperial, the Princess Clotilde arrived at eleven o'clock—an hour somewhat late considering that the cards of invitation were issued for half past eight. For upward of two hours the company promenaded in the grand ball-room remained standing in a crowd, the supper-room being filled to overflowing, and the ball-room being kept reserved to pay visit their arrival. The state quadrille, which, quoted the ball, was at length formed, the Princess Clotilde dancing with Baron Haussmann, Prefect of the Seine, and Prince Napoleon with Madame Haussmann. The Empress and Prince Napoleon remained at all through the contre. It was much remarked that the Empress, instead of giving her his arm, walked before him."

FIFTY OF THE PRINCESS CLOTILDE.

The Princess Clotilde is said to be remarkable for attachment to the duties of religion. Immediately after her arrival at the Tuileries she attended the celebration of a mass in the chapel of the palace. The Princess being from her infancy been accustomed to attend the divine service every morning. Prince Jerome has ordered a small chapel to be fitted up adjoining the apartments of his daughter, in addition to that which forms part of the Palais Royal.

THE BALL ON 22D FEBRUARY.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The ball which is to be given on the 22d, in honor of the birth of Washington, and for which the tickets are to be issued to-morrow, will be the most brilliant of the season. The arrangements of the season will probably be the result. American beauty will be conspicuous, and the Imperial and Royal of the English. With all that charm of competition which the Empress Eugenie possesses, and which the ladies of United States undoubtedly excel their courses of the Old World, it will be a matter of difficulty to say which is possible to distinguish them from French women, whether in dress or manner. The Empress Eugenie, however, is herself independent of this, their manners and conversation leaving little to be desired. Everything is proper to this ball, and the Empress has taken care of the vestiges but into the very seat of British ladies for whom every other ball-room would be too crowded, as the French say, with the all-pervading but no fete, a thousand times more brilliant than the English. American woman is approachable on all subjects—occasionally a little too approachable—but she will always English, and that full of esprit. For this reason it is that the moment the ball is announced was talked of applications from French cavaliers for tickets become so numerous.

THE PRINCESS CLOTILDE.

The Times' correspondent says: "I have had occasion to speak of the Princess Clotilde when first I was in this winter an augmentation in rotundity. The ball of the Hotel de Ville, however, confirmed the first impression of fashionable season. At the same time there is a tendency to embonpoint, which is not unbecoming to her. Her face, which has been rosy than reached the limits of propriety. There is nothing in the Princess's manner which betrays individuals especially distinguished strangers, there is no need of showing us that. They look at this point Princess Clotilde's dress was remarkable lastly suggested that these deplorable exhibitions of the ball-room are to be given on the 22d of February by the gentlemen's fair. Certain it is, however, that the Princess Clotilde was dressed in white satin, and had not in height of shoulders so that the epaulettes, of which there is a fall, were almost fitted round the arm. Virgins rising out of sea-foam—and a long way out of sight—are represented in white satin."

A PLAY WRITTEN BY A DANCER.

M. Michel Masson, manager of the Folies Dramatiques in company with some dramatists, when, as the Figaro says, "he has not to pay for the talent of literary professors—that of writing for the stage, or guiding milliners, and the rest of the paraphernalia of the theatre, and in order to get out and to look to the profits. Last week M. Millaud went to work at once, with the production of a piece written by a dancer. The piece is called the Folies Royal Theatre, and was not only not hissed, but received with applause. It is called "Les Mots Pour Mes Cœurs"—"My Nicce and My Boat"—and style its author's name. It is said that the piece is full of totally unbelievable how a money-changer could find so much time to write a play.

NEW CHARACTER-DANCES.

The rage is for novelty in the production of character dances. These are principally dances brought to Paris by the Emperor's return, and the various nations which are most frequently to be seen are those of the Countries. The Spanish dance, which was first introduced by Princess Colette, etc. At the Russian Embassy they were in vogue, and a position on all the Russian dances directed by the nephew of the Princess and by the Prince Imperial, who is very fond of dancing. The Spanish dance is the most graceful of all the national dances and is through all the movements of the dance without spilling a drop. The Russian dance is the most remarkable for the extraordinary feat of dancing the Prisia with a full champagne glass in each hand. The Hungarian dance is the fan to prove and declare it a stupid dance whenever it is the proper time to be the witness of the dance. A several American knows—at Mr. Jerome's, of New York, and Mr. Corcoran's, of Washington—that they have fashionable Prue à quatrille—the Prince Imperial—a favorite dance with the Lancers.

LES BOTTES DE BASTIEN.

A Paris correspondent writes: "Everybody knows the origin of a popular song which now makes the echoes of every street in Paris. The moment that a sentry sees the Prince Imperial, while out with his nurse, was struck by the magnificent appearance of the boots worn by the Grenadier who was on guard at the palace. Upon listening to the Tuileries, he noticed that his magnificent boots were the most peculiarly smitten by the sentinel seen, whereupon he exclaimed, with true childish delight, 'Ah! les belles bottes!' The fact of the meeting of this was explained to the Emperor, and the final fiat was so pleased that he reported his son's words to several members of the household. In a few hours all the boots in the palace were in the hands of the cobbler every one was in ecstasies at the sprightliness, wit, and talent, evinced by one so young. The Emperor, however, declared the Palace walls in a very short time, and soon after the Prince Imperial was out with his nurse, he was followed by a crowd of people, who, as soon as they saw a blue days' wonder, and how soon died out! but the boots were not to be forgotten. And that was as soon as was published, and consequently spread all over Paris in a few days, and the Grenadier who had been the hero of the Prince Imperial's boots, and how soon died out! but the boots were not to be forgotten. And that was as soon as was published, and consequently spread all over Paris in a few days, and the Grenadier who had been the hero of Lotin sang it in chorus at the Odeon. Perceiving the notoriety of the boots so much of so small a matter, the prohibition was afterward revoked; but the popularity of the boots was not to be stopped. Every boot-maker in Paris at the top of his voice, and a fierce relief "Les Bottes de Bastien" was to be rehearsed at the Folies Theatre.

MR. FELIX BEALY AND HIS SCHEMES.

Mr. Felix Bealy left Southampton 17th February, by the steamer Pacific, for Havre, where he has made his acquaintance of the execution of the canal in the presence of the President, Louis Napoleon, and the Prince Imperial, on the purpose on the 27th of March at Elvas. Mr. Bealy was accompanied by Mr. Lavasseur, the well-known banking his secretary, Gerard M. Lavasseur, formerly French Consul at Southampton.

Mr. Bealy's scheme is to connect the Red Sea with the corps of engineers.

The Emperor Napoleon, in refusing the departure, says it is all probably a great surprise in Paris. He will not be most likely to be looked upon with indifference at Washington. The Emperor's manipulation will be very chary of investing in the enterprise.

PRUSSIA.

PROPOSED VISIT OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

A Berlin correspondent writes: "Count Persenbach, the standard-bearer on a recent occasion to London to notify officially the birth of the young prince, has just received orders to proceed to the Court of Coburg, to announce that both the Queen and Prince Consort have promised on the occasion of the christening of the Princess Victoria that their arrival will take place about Easter, till which time the preparations for the reception will be finished. Later in the season—probably in May—the Prince and Princess Frederick William will pay a visit to England. Great activity is perceptible in the bureaux of the different sections of the War office, the object of which is to place the army in an efficient state, to be prepared for any contingency.

PRUSSIA TAKING GROUND ON THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

The Prussian Gazette, the official journal of Berlin, expresses the opinion that, in consequence of the active exertions of the great powers, the Prussian and English Governments have succeeded in bringing the two parties to smooth down difficulties, removing just causes of complaint, and remaining within the limits of treaties. The visit of Count de Persenberg will not, it may be hoped, have to support the steps taken by Prussia and England. The Emperor Alexander and Prince Gortschakoff have taken the most energetic steps with France to put an end to the military occupation of Rome. The Pope's territories are to remain under the Papal Guards, will be received in Paris in the same spirit of conciliation that has dictated them.

ITALY

THE EXCITEMENT IN LOMBARDY.

At Venice contracts have been entered into for the construction of new forts, to be completed in six weeks. It is said that 5,000 men are employed on the work of fortifying the Austrian fortresses are already occupied on the work. The latest telegram from Berlin says that the Prussian Ambassador has resigned.

MARRIAGE OF THE KING OF PIEDMONT.

Count Cavour announces that he can rely on it as positive that Victor Emanuel's Queen will be delivered of a child in June or July next. Princess Marie Benedictine Leuchtenberg's eldest, the Grand Duchess Constantine, is the parent of whom Count speaks. I did not notice to aware that a morganatic marriage with a Count Stirpum, and that the Queen of Piedmont was not married to her daughter—Marie Mastmilianowna, born October 4, 1841—Constantine, born May 21, 1858. It is said that the real widower of Paris has sought and obtained. Already the Queen of Piedmont has with one exception, the highest rank in Europe. This event puts the crowning finish to the defeat of the Austrian party at the Court of Piedmont. Victor Emanuel's marriage secures the favor of continental Europe, with this comparatively trifling loss of blood. It may be confidently predicted that immense developments awaits it."

AN EXCLUSIVE CORRESPONDENT.

A Paris correspondent of the Boston Post, dating, dispatched to Milan by the Paris journal La Presse, has been arrested by the Austrian police. He was in the act of writing a letter, being caught red-handed in the act, and inciting a French correspondent to rebellion against the Austrian Government. In reply to the charges against his benefits, he had complained of a slight oppression on the part of the police. He was, however, immediately released on his promising to be more circumspect in future.

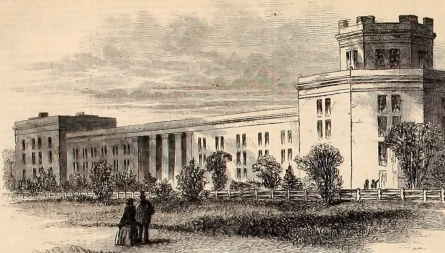
MODESTY OF THE KING OF NAPLES.

The Paris Presse of the 22d says: "I went the other evening to the San Carlo Theatre, at Naples, to witness the Neapolitan ballet. As the curtain rose it was dark as it is, save on the stage. The stagers sang and danced in the dancers showed a most remarkable degree of modesty. Suddenly, and then the people applauded heartily, or hissed, or hooted, according to the remarkable degree of merit. This was to me, so fondly-loving. I was Thursday night, and I was astonished to find that the King was in his box in the bottom. The night was first night in honor of the new ballet. The King, who is somewhat of a connoisseur, has no applause, to witness sur le one—all dandyism of the kind is out of fashion at the Neapolitan Court. Ferdinand is a model of modesty in fashion. The King forbids applause or disapprobation in the theatre. Whether the ballet be good or bad, the audience is forbidden to express it. I was very much struck by the severity of the things. I asked several persons around me why the applause of a man is so hated of all his subjects—but very suggestive of something else. Ferdinand is the only King of Naples who has Queen Victor Cullings, and won't let the world see the pretty female. I have it from the best authority in the world. The King, while I am under him, orders us all to get gently, if we wish to remain in Naples. Such is the effect of the two successive Bourbon King of the Two Sicilies, out of the Two Sicilies, and the Two Sicilies, and the Two Sicilies, and

A VISIT TO THE LUNATIC ASYLUM ON BLACKWELL'S ISLAND.

NOTHING could have been more lovely than the morning on which I started in company with the artist, Mr. L——, to visit the Lunatic Asylum on Blackwell's Island. The thermometer stood at about 90°; but the sun was bright and warm, the air was buoyant, and after a walk of a mile or so we felt capable of any exertion.

Five years ago I visited the institutions on Blackwell's Island, and published the account of my visit in the Herald. On that occasion I crossed the arm of the East River which separates Blackwell's and Manhattan Islands in the "Doctor's boat." That institution has now ceased to exist—the fire last winter consumed its spirit, if not its substance—and we crossed this time in the "ferry boat," the common property of all the benevolent and penal institutions of the island. I may observe, en passant, that this boat, like Dr. Ranney's, is rowed by lunatic convicts, who are compulsory inmates of the Blackwell's Institutions. The ferry-boat is manned by convicts. Care is taken, I am told, to assign to the boat none but steady men whom sentence is about to expire. This precaution is the more easily understood when it is borne in mind that nothing but their own scruples prevents the boatmen from making their escape when they land in New York, which they do twelve or fifteen times a day. In point of fact, the Penitentiary on the island, like the Penitentiary Hospital, is used as a temporary poor-house by many poor fellows, who find it difficult to obtain a livelihood, and who desire a few months repose from anxiety; and this class of persons, who are naturally selected as boatmen, are safe not to run away. One of the men who rowed us across asked me, on arriving, for "the price of a plug of tobacco," alleging that the tobacco supplied them on the island was "not fit to smoke, much less to chew." On inquiry I discovered that he was a Vermonter who had been crippled by the accidental fall of a tree. He had come to New York in search of employment; finding none, and winter coming on, he had requested Justice —— to have the goodness to commit him to Blackwell's Island. The Justice thoughtfully asked him how long he would like to be imprisoned? The Vermonter calculated how long it would take for the warm weather to return, and specified a term which would secure him a restoration to liberty at a genial season. He was committed accordingly. On the whole, he did not complain of his treatment. His bed, he said, might be softer; but he confessed that it was warm and dry. He had meat three times a day, and good coffee and bread, etc., etc. He thought it hard that, three times a week, he was expected to eat salt meat. When I observed that I frequently eat corn beef as often as three times a week, he seemed to regard me in the light of a self-constituted martyr.



VIEW OF THE LUNATIC ASYLUM ON BLACKWELL'S ISLAND.

Dr. Ranney's boat, on the same principle, is manned by lunatics. We are enabled to give a very faithful picture of his boat's crew, taken from a careful photograph. One of these men is an old privateer—some say pirate, but of this nothing is known; at any rate, he served in some wars or other thirty or forty years ago, and got, in some sharp fight, a cut on the top of his head, which upset his reason. His head is of extraordinary shape; extending diagonally across his forehead is a large scar, apparently the result of a sabre cut, the arch over the right eye projecting an inch farther forward than the left, which gives a very peculiar and not particularly pleasing expression to the face. Madame Romer reports that his life has not always been so quietly passed, but that he has mingled in scenes of a far different character. In the morning he goes daily to the top of the central building, walks three times around the stairway with great precision, descends flight by flight to the basement, on each story making the same number of rounds. Although entirely obedient to the commands of his superior officer while on duty, he regards no orders, even from the physician, until this regular tour has been made. He is a gray-headed man, the normal from the left in the lower row in the picture. Another of the Doctor's crew labors under the delusion that Dr. Ranney is the Pope of Rome, and that if he were to disobey or deceive him his eternal damnation would follow as a matter of certainty. A third is satisfied that Prince Albert of England is an impostor, and that he (the boatman) is the lawful husband of her Majesty Queen Victoria, who, faithless creature, avails herself of certain legal quibbles to defraud him of his legitimate marital rights. The other boatmen are subject to similar delusions. Insane as they are, however, they perform the specific duty assigned to them with fidelity and dispatch. Nervous persons might feel tremulous at finding themselves in the middle of the East River in company with seven incurable lunatics. But not an accident ever happens.

THE SHAKSPEARIAN ACTOR.

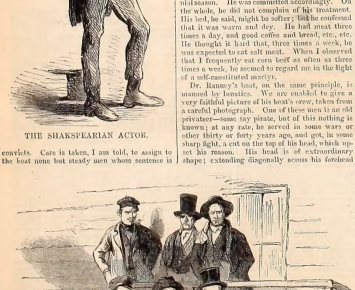
We, who crossed in the common ferry boat, were safely landed on the island; and after passing the inspection of certain hazy-looking and rude officials, who gave us greasy tickets certifying that we were authorized to visit the lunatic asylum, deputed on our way rejoicing.

Blackwell's Island itself will some day be a perfect garden. There is a luxury of fencing and a prodigality of agricultural labor which rather confound the common visitor. It is not till one realizes that convict labor costs nothing that the mystery of the elaborate cultivation and the labyrinthine fences is understood. The officials certainly have something to show for the animal power under their control.

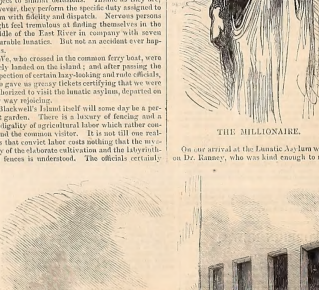
The burning of the old Penitentiary hospital was a clear gain. It was a miserable building. It is now being replaced by a fine stone edifice, built by convicts, of stone quarried by convicts from quarries on the island. The cost will thus be moderate; and the experience of the island officials is likely to insure the construction of the new building on the soundest architectural principles. The visitor is rather astonished at first at the quiet, steady manner in which the convicts work at the quarries (one Branch was among them for some days); he asks himself why these stout fellows, with heavy hammers and drills in their hands, don't rise in rebellion and make their escape; no inquiry, however, he learns that individuals who seem to be spectators, and lounge around within easy distances of each other, are all keepers well armed, and quite prepared, in case of insubordination, to shoot down half a dozen convicts.

THE MILLIONAIRE.

On our arrival at the Lunatic Asylum we called on Dr. Ranney, who was kind enough to make us



THE DOCTOR'S BOAT'S CREW.



DEMENTED PATIENTS.

MRS. BUCHANAN.

welcome, and, after lunch, to accompany us on a tour through the institution.

I should say here that the Lunatic Asylum on Blackwell's Island is supported by the city of New York; its average number of inmates is 600, of whom four-fifths are foreigners; it was established in 1839, and costs about $70,000 yearly to sustain it.

For the benefit of my readers we may say that madness is divided by doctors into two varieties or stages, called respectively dementia and mania. Mania is the violent stage; dementia the quiet, weak, resigned, semi-idiotic form of insanity. Most lunatics go through both stages, commencing with the first. Some are cured while "maniacs," and never enter upon dementia. A few become demented without having been maniacs. Naturally, in all well-ordered asylums, maniacal patients are separated from those who are demented. On Blackwell's Island, the main building, of which we give an illustration, is devoted exclusively to the demented patients; a separate edifice, securely girt round with strong iron bars, is the home of the unfortunates who are classed as maniacs, and who are so violent that it would be unsafe to mix them with the victims of the milder disease.

Our first visit was to the wards in the main building, appropriated to demented patients. Of these there are four besides the work-rooms. Two are for females, two for males.

No patient is kept confined in the wards if his condition is such that he can be safely employed out of doors. A large number of the demented males, for instance, are employed in agricultural labor. They are quite capable of working with their hands; it is only when you touch their reason that you discover they are lunatics. One to whom I spoke—a stout, fine-looking old Englishman—was, I was told, a first-rate hand with a spade; he informed me, confidentially, that California was all a humbug, that no gold had ever come from thence, that all the gold in the world had been made by chemical processes, and that the secret of making it had been lost; but that in a short while he would discover it. Another, an Irishman, had been probably converted by the boatman I have mentioned; he was fixed in the notion that Dr. Rhinny was the Pope. Nothing—neither commands, threats, nor entreaties—could prevent him kneeling to the Doctor for a blessing whenever he saw him.

The women whose lunacy does not entirely deprive them of the faculty of working are generally employed in knitting, in making gloves and quilts, and articles of clothing for the establishment. We went through the rooms in which these poor creatures are employed. I have seen many work-rooms in factories where the girls seemed less orderly and less assiduous. Here and there, of course, a poor creature attracted attention by some peculiarity. One or two were hysterical, and, after welcoming us with frantic bursts of laughter, burst into agonizing floods of tears. I was struck by the appearance of a very pretty-looking girl of about fifteen, who had gone mad in consequence of functional derangement. She was working quietly and silently, and would not reply when spoken to. I was glad to hear from Dr. Ranney that in a few months, in all probability, the poor child would recover her reason. Her brother, he added, had been under his care, ten years ago, for some months, and had enjoyed sound reason ever since. The women in the work-rooms make all the stockings and gloves, and a great part of, if not all, the clothing required in the establishment. They work, on the average, nearly as well as sane persons.

The demented patients who, from physical or mental infirmity, are incapable of working, are confined in "the wards." These are long, well-ventilated, very clean corridors, with large, airy bedrooms or cells on either side. Light and fresh air abound. For those who need warmth, heat is amply supplied. The bedrooms are miracles of cleanliness and comfort. Very few sane persons inhabit more healthy and convenient chambers. I remember, when a boy, having been taken to visit an insane asylum, in which the patients groveled in filth, darkness, and cold. If the report presented to the State Legislature by the Commissioners last session tell the truth, such establishments still exist, even in the enlightened State of New York. But the Asylum on Blackwell's Island is, throughout, perfect in respect of cleanliness, order, and comfort. If it were possible, one might almost envy the objects of so judicious and so tender care.

In reply to my inquiry, Dr. Ranney stated that the bulk of his female patients were immigrant girls (chiefly Irish), who had been deluded, seduced, cheated, and otherwise ill-used on arrival here; and who, on realizing their miserable condition, had gone mad from the shock of the disappointment. I noticed in the wards several who belonged to this class. They presented no striking features. Some were sullen and melancholy; others quiet, with a vacant, idiotic stare; a few rather talkative, and given to sing old songs in a dreamy, unconscious way. Many female lunatics had gone mad from religious excitement. These generally become what is popularly called "melancholy mad." One whose portrait, together with that of her mother, is given herewith, fancied that she was the Messiah. Her mother, a skinny, wrinkled, nervous old beldam—who is also mad—contrary to general experience—shares her daughter's delusion. She assured me that her daughter was the Messiah whose coming was prophesied in the Old Testament. I observed that, if so, the fact ought to be made known. She concurred, and the daughter, desiring to convince me that she was in fact the Messiah, snatched a "Protestant Bible" from under her mother's shawl, and read to me, volubly but clearly, the 49th chapter of Isaiah; observing at the close of the chapter,

"Now, don't you see I'm the Messiah?"

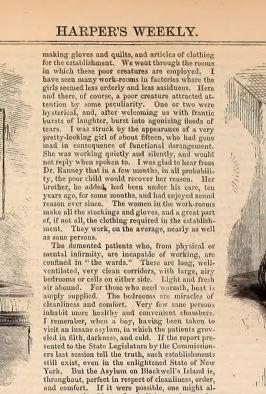
This poor creature is the victim of a double delusion. She had no sooner extorted from me a reluctant assent to her divine pretensions than she broke out:

"I'm the true wife of George Calvert. I'll never leave George Calvert. Won't you take me to him? I'll never leave George Calvert; for I'm his wife, you know, and I'll never desert him. He is mine, and I am his. I'll never give up George Calvert."

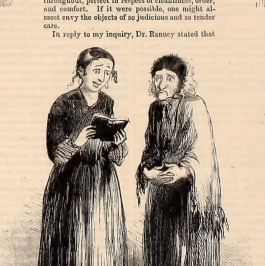
Whether there ever was such a person as George Calvert, or, if such a man exists, whether this poor woman ever knew him, is a matter of doubt; the doctors seem to think that she takes every good-looking man for her "dear husband, George Calvert." The delusion in her case is duplicate.

Generally speaking, Protestants are far more liable to insanity from religious enthusiasm than Catholics. But I conversed with a French Catholic girl in the womens' ward who had gone mad from this cause. When I addressed her in her own tongue, she cried out in French:

"Oh, Sir! when I was dying, they wanted to bury me without giving me the Holy Sacrament—"



CRAZY MOTHER AND HER DAUGHTER.



THE MESSIAH AND HER MOTHER.

FEMALE MANIACS.

MALE MANIACS.

And she went on in such a piteous flood of complaint that we were moved by her grief; and were not a little consoled when a convulsive burst of tears put an end to her discourse, and afforded kind Dr. Kenny an opportunity of saying that he thought she would get well in the course of a few weeks.

Most people have heard of Mrs. Buchanan. She is one of the incurables—a poor old lady—Scotch, I imagine—who has been an inmate of female asylums for years. Her delusion has been described in the papers. She believes she is the wife of the President, for the time being, and discharges her conjugal duties with such success that she bears a large family to each incumbent of the Presidential chair. Strange to say, the offspring of her lofty amours are usually dull. She had the misfortune of stroking the back of President Buchanan's eldest son, who carried it through his life half in political dilutions to disturb his repose. Mrs. Buchanan has beguiled her leisure by the composition of an elaborate diary in extenso descriptive of her matrimonial experience. President Pierce figures therein rather the quiet, easy husband, who is wise in making a graceful bow to a stout rooter which stands, I was told, for Mr. Buchanan. Undeniably are various outsiders cast in the shade by those of a London lineage. Her delusion consists in believing that she was born in St. Andrew's Square, which edifice belongs to her, and that her wealth, of which she has been sadly defrauded at, can only be counted by millions of pounds sterling. Could she but escape from her present bondage none could so well fill the throne. She is, in most of the inmates, when I spoke to her she inquired anxiously whether I had come to take her away?

I replied that, under certain circumstances, it would give me pleasure to do so.

"But," said she, "are you a man of honor? have been so often deceived."

I protested that my honor was above suspicion, and remarked that it only remained to obtain the Doctor's permission to make the desired abduction.

"Oh no," said she, quickly. "He will not consent. You see, I have a million worth of property under my bed, and we must take that with us."

I remarked that so large a sum would be more than we could all carry. But with a contemptuous laugh she assured me she had often carried a million about her, and that, therefore, there was no reason in the establishment whose she had secured.

Some one inquiring about "her diamonds," she privately confided to me that she had left her jewel in diamonds so accurately concealed about her person that no one could find them. Here was a curious patient. Her language betokened a person of good education. She was draped in a sort of cloak made of patchwork, which, when excited, she would throw round her like a tragedy-queen. Her head was likewise adorned in a bit of lace. Her eyes were venerable and severe. Her eye was searching; and when conversing alone with me her extraction not "to desire" was not alone apparent, but in deception I was practising. A portrait of this poor lady will be found on page 184.

Another patient whose case interested us much was a poor woman whose intellect is hopelessly gone, and who has found a permanent asylum for herself and her child in the Asylum. The child, a bright-eyed, good-looking little girl, is the idol of by-same. A kind tenderness on the part of the inmates of the establishment has kept her in total ignorance of the fate of her mother. Indeed, she is so far believed that she is the daughter of the King of Bedouin, and that, having been stolen when an early youth, she is continued to Blackwell's Island from political reasons. It is likely that her little child has been taught to share the delusion. One of the matrons, a lady in whose face gentleness and firmness were happily blended, took a very particular fancy to this little girl; she is, no doubt, well cared for. But what a variety of life is childas a ward full of lunatics! Will no great and rich lady of Fifth Avenue stretch forth a kindly hand, and rescue this sweet-looking little creature from the contagion of lunacy?

From the female wards we passed to those of the males. As a general rule, these latter are uninteresting and often repulsive. A large proportion of the male lunatics become simply imbecile and brutish. One of our engravings will give a fair idea of these lower creatures. Fancy shut up the base together, leaning against a wall, sunning themselves, and looking less intelligent than the beasts of the field. Among them incurables are enormously the fruit of physical and sensual, as among the women they are of moral excesses and imprudence. They are loathsome objects, and generally incurable; fortunate—poor creatures!—to have been sent to an asylum while they are not dreadful to helpless isolation and body-death. Here and there we saw one or two who, by the mercy of God, are recovered or recovering. Such a one, a young man, was pointed out to us by the Doctor as he was walking down the floor at the window, running hither if he ordered, refused to that at this public request of the Doctor, reserving that at his age he was entitled to enjoy his ease. He had, he told us, commanded a regiment in the Revolutionary war. He was observing that he bore his years well, and that I should never have taken him to be so old, he said:

"Oh! them yea, I am several thousand years old. Ye've heard of Marshal Turenne?"

I replied that I had occasionally read of him.

"I'm Marshal Turenne. Did ye ever hear of Hannibal?"

I again admitted that the name was familiar to me.

"I'm Hannibal. I was Pericles in Greece. I've had many names, but am always the same man."

I congratulated him on the enlarged field of experience he had enjoyed; to all which he replied nothing, but looked at me with that keen, close stare which seems peculiar to Scotchmen.

After having the wards we entered the drawing-room. This is a well-furnished, handsome apartment, exclusively appropriated to the use of the lunatics. On the occasion of my last visit a very pretty-looking girl (as mad as a March hare) was playing a few tunes on the piano. The occupant of the room was a long-haired, not ever wise-looking gentleman.

"How do you do, Mr. ——?" said the Doctor.

"I'm well," gruffly replied the person addressed.

"Would you like to play a few tunes for the ladies on the piano?" inquired our cicerone.

The lunatic rose from his seat down, and played the overture to Fra Diavolo with great skill and feeling. While he was playing the Doctor explained that previous to his insanity he was a person who had gone mad from intense study. He had, for example, committed to memory a dozen languages in his cell. He read all the modern languages with perfect ease, and could "Paradise Lost" in the original. He was master of several Oriental tongues. He was a perfect musician, and could play Thalberg's most difficult pieces at sight. In a short time, the Doctor hoped, he would be well enough to go at large. He was applauded with them when he had concluded his performance; but though he replied politely to my remarks, he seemed indisposed to enter into conversation.

Presently there appeared a negro in full fig—a good-looking fellow, in fine dress-coat, and showy jewelry generally.

"Dose gentlemen," said the Doctor, addressing him, "are anxious to hear you sing some of your fine tragic parts. Will you gratify them by giving us 'King Lear'?"

The negro, nothing loth, took up a position in the middle of the room, and began to declaim. His accession was not a happy one, however. He could not make out his words. Fancying that the Lear was in a key, I drew nearer the performer, and listened attentively. He was uttering gibberish. Most of the words he pronounced were really English, but they were so jumbled together that I gave it up.

"Dose gentlemen," said the Doctor, addressing him, "are anxious to hear you sing some of your fine tragic parts. Will you gratify them by giving us 'King Lear'?"

The negro, nothing loth, took up a position in the middle of the room, and began to declaim. His accession was not a happy one, however. He could not make out his words. Fancying that the Lear was in a key, I drew nearer the performer, and listened attentively. He was uttering gibberish. Most of the words he pronounced were really English, but they were so jumbled together that I gave it up.

Before passing to the building which is appropriated to women, we passed through the kitchen, through the museum—a room full of curiosities of various kinds. The most interesting of these to me were specimens of the work of lunatics. Some ingenious fellow had contrived a model of the Crystal Palace in a large bottle, and we entered the corridor of the furious female lunatics.

They were not permitted to look at. Some were a sleepy aspect. Some looked venomously at us. A few remained indifferent. Two or three of them sprang at my throat, I recovered courage, and followed the Doctor quickly. Another, a jealous little Irishwoman, with clear eyes and auburn hands, asked me some question about her husband. I answered her, and passed on.

The sound of my voice seemed to rouse them. The latent energies were being kindled between voices, and my interlocutor—the little Irishwoman—burst into perfect frenzy. She began by assuring me that my face to the next world would appear as a very uncomfortable basis: that in this world she was a dangerous, nay, savage lion. And she almost set to such language, and with such action, as proved her to be a mistress of the Five Points vocabulary.

Warming with her theme, she rose. I don't think she rose more than an inch from the floor, but female gentle, fearfully deprived of its young, can rest be much more terrible than that maniac crouched.

I looked round for the Doctor. He and my companion were many yards distant, and were laughing through the corridor, with their backs turned to me. I would have run to join them had I not been afraid that my sudden flight would have precipitated a collision. So, affecting perfect coolness, I turned my back on the lioness, and walked slowly toward my friends. The lioness followed me. I could distinctly hear the sound of her feet on the floor. I knew that to show fear was to be her last. I expected every instant to feel her claws in my back. I walked on, and did not cease to show ease in the fiercest language. Her curbs served not to rouse her companions. They looked on pleased, and fired skimmers' shots at me as I marched between them. I felt that nothing but the interposition of Providence would enable me to gain the end of the corridor without a death-struggle with some of them. As for the Doctor, he—hard-hearted man—never once looked round.

I think I must have looked rather exhausted by the time I reached the end of the corridor; for the Doctor, with a smile, reminded me that he had cautioned me from the experiment, and inquired knowingly whether I would not be satisfied with an inspection of the male maniacs through the grated door?

I at once replied in the affirmative, and we proceeded to the door. While our artist was sketching the scene I gazed at the inmates. My eye fell upon a wild face.

"That," said I, "is a Celt, I suppose?" "It is a Belgian, a very furious fellow." I agreed with the peculiar interest. The Belgian fought my eye. He was, indeed, a Celt. Unlike the women, he did not utter a word. He fixed his eye on me, and followed me with a glance of fire.

Presently there appeared a negro in full fig—a good-looking fellow, in fine dress-coat, and showy jewelry generally.

"Dose gentlemen," said the Doctor, addressing him, "are anxious to hear you sing some of your fine tragic parts. Will you gratify them by giving us 'King Lear'?"

The negro, nothing loth, took up a position in the middle of the room, and began to declaim. His accession was not a happy one, however. He could not make out his words. Fancying that the Lear was in a key, I drew nearer the performer, and listened attentively. He was uttering gibberish. Most of the words he pronounced were really English, but they were so jumbled together that I gave it up.

Before passing to the building which is appropriated to women, we passed through the kitchen, through the museum—a room full of curiosities of various kinds. The most interesting of these to me were specimens of the work of lunatics. Some ingenious fellow had contrived a model of the Crystal Palace in a large bottle, and we entered the corridor of the furious female lunatics.

They were not permitted to look at. Some were a sleepy aspect. Some looked venomously at us. A few remained indifferent. Two or three of them sprang at my throat. I recovered courage, and followed the Doctor quickly. Another, a jealous little Irishwoman, with clear eyes and auburn hands, asked me some question about her husband. I answered her, and passed on.

The sound of my voice seemed to rouse them. The latent energies were being kindled between voices, and my interlocutor—the little Irishwoman—burst into perfect frenzy. She began by assuring me that my face to the next world would appear as a very uncomfortable basis: that in this world she was a dangerous, nay, savage lion. And she almost set to such language, and with such action, as proved her to be a mistress of the Five Points vocabulary.

Warming with her theme, she rose. I don't think she rose more than an inch from the floor, but female gentle, fearfully deprived of its young, can rest be much more terrible than that maniac crouched.

I looked round for the Doctor. He and my companion were many yards distant, and were laughing through the corridor, with their backs turned to me. I would have run to join them had I not been afraid that my sudden flight would have precipitated a collision. So, affecting perfect coolness, I turned my back on the lioness, and walked slowly toward my friends. The lioness followed me. I could distinctly hear the sound of her feet on the floor. I knew that to show fear was to be her last. I expected every instant to feel her claws in my back. I walked on, and did not cease to show ease in the fiercest language. Her curbs served not to rouse her companions. They looked on pleased, and fired skimmers' shots at me as I marched between them. I felt that nothing but the interposition of Providence would enable me to gain the end of the corridor without a death-struggle with some of them. As for the Doctor, he—hard-hearted man—never once looked round.

I think I must have looked rather exhausted by the time I reached the end of the corridor; for the Doctor, with a smile, reminded me that he had cautioned me from the experiment, and inquired knowingly whether I would not be satisfied with an inspection of the male maniacs through the grated door?

I at once replied in the affirmative, and we proceeded to the door. While our artist was sketching the scene I gazed at the inmates. My eye fell upon a wild face.

"That," said I, "is a Celt, I suppose?" "It is a Belgian, a very furious fellow." I agreed with the peculiar interest. The Belgian fought my eye. He was, indeed, a Celt. Unlike the women, he did not utter a word. He fixed his eye on me, and followed me with a glance of fire.

Another Belgian was in a cell secluded with cast-iron bolts, that I felt a momentary thrill, and took a hasty survey of the strength of the bars which separated us. He reached them in a moment. Clutching them with his sinewy hands he glared at me like any tiger till I left the place. But for those bars I think he would have made an end of me.

THE LEATHER BAG.

How much the bag contained I do not know, and question whether Andrew Miller himself did. It had in it the savings of twenty years, and was full upon the closing-day, just three weeks before the date of my story. His wife and daughters were rejoicing at the sight of the bag, but more so it: they knew he had money somewhere, for when it was wanted it was forthcoming, and whether they might conjecture, they certainly didn't know where he kept it, how he kept it, or how much he had. Andrew was not one to encourage them in any allusion to these subjects. He had a mortal, diseased anxiety for the money, and a corresponding diseased anxiety for the secrecy. He worked himself, soul, hands, and body, to the last degree, but he was a miser. Andrew Miller was a miser.

It was an old satchel, a small one, in which, when a boy, he had carried his dinner to school; when he was across country to be apprenticed on a walk of twenty-twenty miles from his father's house—he rather liked the walk—he had carried there for which his mother's anxiety provided for his sustenance by the way. While he was an apprentice he kept his Bible in it, and the first pound-note he ever earned he kept in the bag.

As he advanced in life, it was his "partner" fattened with his savings; all in notes, between its leaves, till it could hold no more of them, and he was an old maide; by which time, through use and wont, and the association of ideas, Andrew had come to believe "bank-notes" were the best and safest form of the currency. He derived more pleasure from seeing the bag swell out with them, and had by now the ring of gold pieces against the walls of the safest iron box could ever have given him. For twenty years he added to it, and put by all the sums in the strongest of the bag. Time was he was to play with, taking the bag between one and by one, "rumpling" them to make them bulk well, and patting them in till the bag would swell as if it would contain another note or two at the outside; and after compulsively contemplating it in this state for awhile, he would put them by, and even folds, and sigh over the mere entropy of an independence to which they contracted. It had been the main object of his life to add to this bag, and many a struggle it had cost him to reconcile his duties to his fellow-men with, his duties to what is kindly fellow, he could not but acknowledge were owing to his family. He took a pride in it; he loved it, and after watching and smoke his pipe, and look at it as if it were a child, as it lay cradled in his arms, until—and more than, in later years, he would stroke its back and wink at it—the old rogue—taking it into his confidence; but when with the bag in a bag a pride in the first sound of a footfall, let it be of wife or daughter, causing towards it. At last the bag was empty, as was realized, and the bag that had been year by year becoming more and more dropsical was ready to burst and he! they found the bag, and opened its great big mouth, and took out such heaps of papers, and they wondered what they were; when suddenly the wind arose, and caught the heap, and whirled away the whole, and the air was as white with hand-notes as ever it was with snow-flakes in a storm. Andrew wakened gasping: he could stand this sort of thing no longer. The gray dawn was coming in at the window, cold and cheerless. He got up quietly, and, with nothing on him but his drawers and shirt, pulled on his cork-shoes, up to the gaiters, to the wall, to the hob; and there—he was gone!

I am not going to analyze Andrew's feelings on missing the bag—the blankness of his despair in the street, the wringing of hand and hanging arms, at the damp old wall in the dull twilight. He returned to bed, after a time, to his spouse's bosom, and quite unconscious of his desertion. For nose his couldn't think rational; but he did think that the first conveyer, by whom his good sense grat fully asserted itself, and the more he reflected the stronger grew his hope that it might be a conveyance for things more desirable than—whose—whatever the bag must have been to him.

Tibby, the leader of the village gossips, was standing at her door as he approached it, and at once proceeded to the attack with the usual "How do ye do?"

"Man, I was sorry," said Tibby, "ye weena be in church yester-morn, more because o' your no being aisle. Aweel, auld folks is auld folks, as we hae a' to see some gae to the kirkyard; but Johnnie has to travel nae far's yoursel', Andrew Mitchell, to reach the end o't."

"Ay, ay!" she continued, pressing home her inquiries without giving time for answer. "Was it the same auld wi' Johnnie, Andrew, as it was wi' Johnnie Swan was bad, too, yester-morn, an' had to bide at hame like yoursel', poor body; it had the symptoms very near."

Andrew gave no answer to her question as to the nature of his malady, but he was determined, in the tone of our passing: "I fancy almost every body was in church save myself and you."

Tibby scanned him the kirk was "crammed;" that it was hotter work for the minister than "a mawk flee in July;" and that "Johnnie Swan's napkin wi' the sweat o' his brow."

Andrew passed on, so far the conversation had lasted to manner of perfect indifference. Casual inquiries made elsewhere in the village in the course of the forenoon with regard to Johnnie Swan, the shoemaker, was the thief; at least, that he was the only one who had been out of his house and was at all likely to have done the dishonest thing. How, now, to get round Johnnie without exposing himself? Andrew pondered over the problem during three pipes, after which he went straight to the house of Johnnie Swan.

Johnnie Swan was a dour, ill-favored, avaricious body of a shoemaker, the leader of the pot-house politicians of the village, and a great stickler for strict and original specialties in morals and philosophy. On the Sunday-evening in question, he had the bag, our philosopher, who was really indifferent, and unable to go to church, was behind the old wall in a position to see—without himself being seen—Andrew's extraordinary proceedings, from the first casting-away of the bag to the end of the matter, with his stealthy slipping into the house again. What Andrew was about he couldn't exactly see, nor did he see the bag; but he drew his own conclusions as to the probable meaning of the phenomena which he had witnessed.

"Folks may duffer, but, in ma opinion, 'tisn't for nothing the mire coons out. When a sober body like Andrew Mitchell, the fuller, sees fit to tak's a hake in an auld dike, like a weasel, there's nair auith' than just what I'm thinkin'. Now, I'll see i' the back o' your head, man, Andrew, ye'd has missed me yon time, wi' your wants o' gumption; he back shirt the hale wad day, an' a' ready for your secret then twenty glowerins over it. Aiweel, there's nae mistakin' what's what, an' I'm nae a pop o' ; nae gird your loins, sas man, an' inspect the bigging. If there's nae eye a sent whaur the pea-cooses wiggy, I'll be the deevil o' a tryin' to find ane." And with these sagacious observations Johnnie got over the wall, and commenced search, which in a short time resulted in the discovery of the bag. Without stopping to inspect its contents, he tottered off with it to his own house, and went quietly home, calming what tugs of conscience were in him by reflections on Andrew's motives to prove the role that honesty is the best policy, and with the following, among other results:

"It's a kind o' treacherous, ye-wicked-cr-cattle," I find it; sas it's a' my ain an' main o' my neighbors, as Colmonell's auld minister used to say. Some folks wadna has trokken it, no' some folks are fules. Na, na, Johnnie Swan; grasp it hard, my man, an' say nothing about it. Wise folks let the nor' wind come in by the chimley, an' open their doors to the west when it's a fine day; an' I'll has sic a windfall as is nae under your extent."

Swan having got home without meeting my one, a brief inspection of his booty satisfied him he had stumbled on a fortune. He had no misgivings as to the way in which he had done so, and, from the circumstance that no one was abroad, and that Andrew hadn't caught him, no fear. He was thwacking a piece of sole-leather on the lapstone on Monday forenoon, when Miller cast his shadow across the door.

"How'd w' you the day?" said Andrew, cheerfully, but eying him that so as to catch every shade of feeling on his face.

Johnnie was really much discomposed at the unexpected apparition, yet had nerve enough to command his features so as to be looked up, and waiting to Andrew to be seated, answered:

"Gaily and brawly, neighbor; hoo's t' wi' yoursel'?"

Though Andrew was disconcerted by this coolness, he proceeded, in a friendly tone, to speak of the ordinary inquiries for "the wife," who was out on an errand to Kilmarnock, who was in a shop in Kilmarnock; and for the girls, who were out at service. After this interchange of commonplaces, Andrew at last came to the subject of the bag.

"Johnnie," said he, "we have been neighbors for some years now, an' never cottoned-ower much; an' I've long kent you for a prudent, sensible person, wi' a guid head, forby heart, an' that's the reason I'm here the day, as I am."

Johnnie began to feel very uncomfortable, and the look steadily at his companion, which he had begun to fasten, when conversation made it proper he should lay by the lapstone.

"Ye has a guid stock o' siller—stewed, I'm sure no muckle wark, an' many years' hainin' to get; many siller-bawbees, I'm sure, mair than ever, but it will be disparin' in muir ways than I can account for; in't's hard to a man no to feel sair at a bit siller in the midst o' his ain ruins. But that's the fact, Johnnie Swan, though I'm ashamed to tell't. Ye ken Andrew Mitchell's makin' a management o't, an' I've come to ask your advice what to do wi't. What say ye to lay it in first for a new flure? Mine's a' worn out, an' bad crops, bad rents, dullness, ye ken. An' eh! if I had Lord Lawyer Meiklerat tellin' me I'd never get more than three per cent for my siller from land. Deed, I'm thinkin' I'll just has to lay it in land."

"After a', frien," said Johnnie, "it's your ain affair, an' none o' my business."

Johnnie could hardly keep from laughing at this stage to hear Andrew debating with himself how much he should restore of the money which was in his power, and, in fact, in the drawer of the stool he was then sitting upon; but one of the leading ideas was all the livelier that he saw that Andrew, so far from suspecting him, was not even aware of his loss.

"What d'ye say, sas, to layin' some o't out on a ship?" said Andrew, proceeding with the investigations.

Johnnie's tenure was loose now, and love-sick he began to perceive that his position was not particularly enviable with all the treasures of the Indies, if Andrew was to be the owner of them. He could not yet might do wiser than lay't out on a ship.

But ships sink, and are exposed to a variety of accidents not to be guarded against; a ship-load blows away a hundred fortunes. Andrew continued not to see the point.

A great many other plans were considered, to the great amusement of Johnnie, who could barely keep his gravity when he thought of the secret upon them with him: he had clearly given him to feel that he thought of restoring the money, and consulted him for the purchase of almost any thing; and now he proceeded to put the interview by a further proof of his confidence.

"Weel, weel, we'll give it up, my friend; the thing for you and me to do is to has nae mair to do wi' the matter by mysel; an' I'll tell ye what I has done wi' the siller in the meantime. To stop that suspicious character Andrew Mitchell has seldier the siller day into ten parts: the sma' ane I has gien to my wife, an' the lave I has put away in what I has been thinkin' o' makin' an investment o'; an' that I'll now hand in my ain hans, an' gie't to your hans, Johnnie, for the rest, which is the snug while we talk' our time to think what to do wi't."

Johnnie forgot himself altogether in applauding this plan: and when Andrew left him, he was quite unable to behold the bag of gold, which to the brilliant fancy which was, as he imagined, dawning upon him, it was already transformed by. Something whistling while he did it, he pitched the lapstone at the cat, missed her, and broke the window of the room next the door full of water, which instantly flooded the floor. He gave a kick to the dog which lay in the way, which howled; and then he rid himself of a good deal of his surplus energy by leaping over and over the fragments. It was long time ere he could settle to his work: a world of mischief on the premises, before he settled down to his usual quiet and steady habits. Andrew, "he were blinder nor me," he reflected, "that didna see Providence in this matter. I'm no for judgin' a man by appearances, but there's nae doubt that Andrew Mitchell has this thing in us left'n' Andrew for nought. The man's guyt. It's what the deevil's in a' the warld, when I has gotten the siller to gi'e what I has to do wi't, to try a good use, no' when he comes to his ain muckle. And as he reckoned on the leather bag to his share, he participated in the night-time, not doubting but the night following he would carry away the whole assets.

Next morning Andrew was up betimes and out into the garden, and to the wall, and to the hob, and there, sure enough, was the leather bag, all safe and sound!

The little grey man gave three cheers as he carried it into the house in triumph. Meeting his wife on the stairs, he surprised her by joyously bouncing at her, and kissing her. He thrust the leather bag into her hands, crying, "There, there, keep it, keep it!" He ran into the kitchen, and kissed Molly and Kate, who were cooking the breakfast. They couldn't understand him; he quite puzzled all three of them. Why go further with the story? He told them all about it—the night he left the bag; and he did so with a black demon of dissension sullenly left his dwelling. His mother was therefore "made an honest man of," and "a good advice; and from that day there was no "Andrew" and "Mrs." in the case, but he and she were "Johnnie" and "Jenny."

Johnnie Swan's confusion, after losing these nights' rest sitting up to pay visits at unearthly hours to the kain in the wall, was extreme; and self that he had been overreached, were still philosophical, if not complimentary to himself, and set worthy of Andrew's success. "I'll has to tell ye, sas, you're a fool, Johnnie Swan—a thin' kind. In the the sense o' gumption, you're a fool, an' I'll has to don't worth tea'd the tenth? Ye nod has been even tenth, my man. Modesty's the best policy for the warld, I may scale on't. I has dune a shrewd thing, wha'd been name the hand but the stock-an'-corn lord? I has been to your understandin'; and to hand your mug up again to the man wha kens ye for baith a rogue and an ass is maik than ye can think."

He kept out of Andrew's way for a long time, and at last came to the point of thinking that he had been serious with him, and had sacredly changed the hiding-place for a new one. He was not long in finding out his mistake, for he was undeceived. Meeting Andrew one day by accident in the fields, he addressed him in the old style, as if nothing had wrong between them, when Andrew, with a queer grin, bursting into a loud laugh as he finished his statement, asked him, "What d'ye say to lay out some o't out on a ship?"

Johnnie retired, and it: he made off precipitately; and, a few days after, the Kilmarnock shopkeeper left the parish a legacy of his old wife, and disappeared no one knew whither.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris, February 17, 1859.

The Ball at the Hôtel de Ville—Appearance of the Guests—Exhibition—Fancy Dresses—Italian Refugees—Return from the Ball—The Orders of Time—The Wedding Ring—Marriage of Miss Bloomer—Another Daughters—American Belles at Rothschild's—Banyer and Thiers—Crops in Fashion again—The Fine Arts—Literature—A rejected Book—Father Lord Napier—His love for the United States—Dickens as a Reader—Opinion about Gerald Griffin—English and American Protestantism, etc., etc.

I LEFT off my last letter with saying "You will hear something of balls," and you will be struck with the same theme, for indeed there is no other just now; and those of this week have been remarkable among the great developments. The first at the Hôtel de Ville, on Monday, was certainly a most magnificent affair, and the most splendid and the best society, of which the Count and Countess Haussonville, who they presided together, are conspicuous members. After that the bulls became like any other intensely crowded ones; and no thought, except to get out, was entertained. Count Frois, I had almost forgotten how superb the fashionable world is here, and was delighted as he was with the gorgeous sort of Arabian Night scene of entertainment spread out in the Hôtel de Ville, where in particular the refreshment, with a fountain playing amidst shrubs and flowers in the centre, and a large table all round covered with, alternately with a choir of German singers, a full band, and a ballet of Swedish dancers, filled the air with sweet sounds with almost as much fragrance. And then upon table and before one, gilded and decorated, and filled with tiers of dazzling delicacies, and the whole thing so splendid, beautiful, and were certainly brilliant with jewels and feathers and flowers.

The ingenuity of the naked imposing, as imperial parties ever must, with uniforms, and diamonds, and ardors, Empress and Emperor included, and there; but the Princess Clotilde was, of course, the heroine of the costume, and the most striking and picturesque, to get a chance of gazing upon her. She was dressed in pink, with a diadem of diamonds and lace on her young and pretty head, one tries to forget how very plain she really is—plain, in spite of a very fair skin and beautiful hair, that does not look gay; and I should not think it was in her nature to be very demonstrative in any way.

So I really enjoyed my ball for about an hour, as I met many acquaintances, principally English and American; but after admiration and curiosity were satisfied, one began to feel how oppressive was the heat, and longing for the cool and quiet of moving in a crowd, and which has certainly become some little habit of late, and especially since the cold, and cooling in the construction of carriages. I felt several times that night that if "stone walls do not a prison make," from being so, and it was sometimes for a moment impossible to extricate one's self—and from the heat, which the crowd folds around one. The getting away from the Hôtel de Ville is always difficult. There is a long and weary exit for one's servant in the first instance, and then for the carriage to be brought up. One pities the delicate ladies shivering around one without cloaks or shawls, and does not wonder to hear that sore throats and bronchitis are fearfully prevalent in Paris. Such are some of the drawbacks which accompany pleasure; and which, scarcely felt in the eagerness of youth, weigh heavily in the scale when that pleasant time is passed away forever.

Not that I am inclined to regret the days that are gone, or to feel that their sun came a time—a day—a time. No; every age has its enjoyments, and ours, there is nothing in what surrounds one to admonish that there must come a time when there will be neither ball-goers nor ball-goers, it is rather satisfactory to have something in one's self from which to learn the whole lesson. This reminds me of a gray hair or two which would have a sober import and a useful warning, though one may escape from even those, if one chooses to send into the next street for the dyeing a person whose profession it is to restore youth, or to Henri-Quatre's to get Cream of Rose, which it is said really will straiten the puckers of Time. But I am not going to do either. I have the views, when it may be heard, which is not always pleasant to the listener, and sour of this great Babel and all its vanity of vanities.

The other ball that I shall take you to was one given by the wife of the great banker Rothschild, in his magnificent hotel of the Rue Laffite, and in honor of a favorite marriage in the family. The salons were very handsome, and rich in pictures and works of art, and the dancing-room was particularly gay and beautiful, with its gilded and painted ceiling. I thought the company assembled more remarkable for beauty than for fashion, and retired by any exclusive clique or circle, it had gathered fair women and men of note from all quarters. Mrs. Mason and her amiable and accomplished young daughter were there, as ever, beautifully dressed. Of the other ladies, some of the most striking were the family, are absent from Paris coyeties, and are at Pau for the benefit of their health.

There were also several of our American beauties; and some who, though with daughters that have been presented, are still in the bloom of youth, and look as to contribute the recital of ones that our country women lose their great charm to those of other lands. Among these was Mrs. H——, a and her pretty daughters, who are always much admired, and are very lovely in the Spanish and Bronda' sort of contrast of dark and fair. The eldest is very lovely, and looks like a Madonna in the disguished girl. Her mother is a superb woman, often too much dressed, which makes me call her "the Queen of Sheba," which I do not mean the case last night, and she therefore looked extremely well. There was Mrs. ——, who was once called the Queen of Beauty, so faultless is the outline of her features—so regular, even in their redundancy, and so beautiful is her form and general figure. I still last the finishing of her dark eyes. This lady, too, is born and bred in Paris, and is the daughter of Mrs. and Miss Cass—a, looking always as those who are shed them will would desire them to, dressed with perfect taste, and with the most distinguished, and possessing a sweetness of manner and grace of conversation of which all others envy them.

Among men of note there was the distinguished Legitimist lawyer and orator, M. Berryer, whom I have had a sight of before, and which (always to wish) to my reminds me more of an Englishman than any Frenchman I have encountered in the course of his mind. He is very superior and attractive in conversation; and, indeed, in all respects, is, one of the first men of his age. Then there was M. Thiers, who is unfortunate in never being able to look dignified, even when he is at the most; for he is short and clumsy in figure, and not of a pleasant countenance. He is a self-made man, and perhaps because there is a feeling that he has proved rather tricky as a statesman, and not always to be relied upon in his lapse as a writer.

Before I finish my account of the balls I must say one word more in my first regard to the fact that charming and becoming material, transparent crape, has resumed its ancient empire in the fashionable world of Paris. The ancient queen lost night were of white crape, over a silk petticoat of the color of the flower worn in the bosom or robes over color for the matrons. Flowers without foliage, and in a wreath around the head, are most worn by the younger married; while the unmarried indulge themselves in cuffings of velvet to imitate the cuffs of gentlemen, and in much head-dress and more unbecoming still with gold cord and tassels, and golden ornaments of all sorts.

The weather has been of the softness and mildness quite like spring, and there has been no cold even among the poor. Of course, the Bois de Boulogne is crowded every day with those who, having danced all the night before, like to be promenaded pretty freely for the evening's coming ball; and really there is already there a feeling as if the winter was over—as if one's year of at home still bound in chains of ice and snow; but then you have the blessed sun to thank for it, and we have been absolutely hidden since three months.

And as you are to lose Lord and Lady Napier from among you, I will tell you a story of him from the former to his father-in-law, Mr. ——, who resides in Paris, and is blessed with five lives in Paris, and is blessed with five lives in Paris, in which Lord Napier says "that the people of the United States are the most hospitable and the most inhospitable in the world." Lord Napier, I do believe, is a sincere regret at leaving those, and that every one will be glad to welcome him home again.

I had a pleasant testimony the other day to the way in which English merit and the praises and brave deeds of Englishmen impress even those in America who are quite removed from those great emporiums of commerce, those Atlantic cities which naturally learn the news of Europe once or twice a week as a matter of course, and who then feel as interest in what is going on here. I have a young cousin upon my hands here now from your Far West, which he never left until a month ago to come to Paris. At a dinner-party the other day I mentioned the name of Windham, apropos of a letter of introduction for some one who was going to India, when I was interrupted by my young cousin's eager question, "Is that the great Windham—the hero of the Redan?" Oh, how I should like to see him!" And when he found I knew him intimately, he asked so many questions about him as quite to have proved to any observer present his own Yankee lineage. I have often thought that such a charming anecdote in Maryatt's "Travels in America," the little New York shop-boy who, when tying up a parcel for him, said, "Will you please, Sir, to tell me what has become of Midshipman Easy?" Byron long ago said he never knew what fame was until he had heard of his poems being read on the banks of the Ohio; and, believe me, this is the true way to look at it, and it is thus united that the English race are great and wonderful.

THE LATE POSTMASTER-GENERAL, HON. A. V. BROWN.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

THE LATE POSTMASTER-GENERAL BROWN.

ON Tuesday, 8th, Postmaster-General Aaron V. Brown died at Washington. His friends will be glad to see the accompanying portrait.

Mr. Brown was a Virginian by birth, and at the time of his death was about sixty-four years of age. His father commenced life as a revolutionary soldier, but ended it as a Methodist clergyman. He was fortunately able to give his son a good collegiate education.

At the age of eighteen, the family having migrated to Nashville, Tennessee, young Aaron commenced the study of law in the office of Judge Trimble of that place, and in 1817 was admitted to the bar. According to the Herald, his maxim was to be "always first at court, and never leave till the order of adjournment is given." With such a rule for his guide, professional success was certain. For twenty-two years—the fact deserves consideration at the hands of young lawyers of the present day—Mr. Brown never suffered politics to rob his clients of an hour of his time. Though his talents naturally attracted the attention of his fellow-citizens, and the political success of his partner (Ex-President James K. Polk) would easily have opened to him the door of political advancement, he steadily refused to leave his home until he had "served his time" as a practicing lawyer, and accumulated an ample fortune. He consented to serve as a Member of the State Legislature of Tennessee, because this did not involve any sacrifice of his clients' interests. But to Congress, however pressed, he did not go till the year 1839.

In Congress Mr. Brown took an active part in the debates and business of the day. He was Chairman of the Committee on Territories, and as such secured a place in history by becoming the father of the bill securing a territorial government to Oregon. In politics he was a strong Southern man, warmly opposed to the doctrines especially known as Northern; but he was equally opposed to the schemes of the Southern disunionists. During General Jackson's life he was a zealous partisan of his projects, among others, the annexation of Texas.

In 1845 he was elected Governor of Tennessee by a large majority over the Whig candidate. In 1847 he ran for the same office, but was defeated. He was a member of the Democratic Convention which nominated Mr. Pierce for the Presidency, and, as Chairman of the Committee, framed the famous Baltimore Platform.

Various public stations were offered him by Mr. Polk and Mr. Pierce. He declined them all; but on the election of Mr. Buchanan he accepted a seat in the Cabinet as head of the Post-office Department. We should be happy to add—if we could do so honestly—that he had rendered that absurd Department efficient or self-supporting; but to do either was perhaps beyond his power or any man's.

In private life Mr. Brown was much liked. His temper was genial, his manners engaging; all who knew him loved him. His family relations were exemplary, and no house in Washington has been more pleasant to visit than the one over which his wife presided.

"EVE REPENTANT."

OUR readers will remember that we have at different times noticed the works of the gifted American sculptor, Edward S. Bartholomew. They will also remember that in the August number of Harper's Magazine the editors of that publication were called upon to record the untimely death of that eminent man. He died last spring at Naples, at the age of thirty-six, just as a desperate struggle for fame was gloriously ending, and the laurels were gathering thick around his head.

BARTHOLOMEW'S "EVE REPENTANT."

The engraving we now present is the first published copy of Mr. Bartholomew's most important finished work. The statue from which it was taken was purchased from the artist in 1857 by Joseph Harrison, Jun., has just arrived from Italy, and is on exhibition, for the exclusive benefit of the deceased artist's widowed mother, at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia.

Bartholomew's other works are in the hands of Mrs. Sigourney of Boston, Colonel Colt of Hartford, Frederick Marquand of New York, Erastus Corning of Albany, Millard Fillmore of Buffalo, C. H. Wolff of Fitzburg, Enoch Pratt of Baltimore, Governor Aiken of South Carolina, and other ladies and gentlemen of taste in America and England.

We shall take pleasure in presenting other works by American sculptors in the pages of this journal.

THE EXCHANGE AT BUENOS AYRES.

THOSE who are familiar with the bustling scene presented by 'Change in our Northern cities—New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, etc.—and in the great marts of Europe, as Paris, London, and Frankfort, will view with interest the accompanying picture of the Exchange at Buenos Ayres, taken from a late photograph. The business in specie and merchandise is quite large; but the brokers move noiselessly about like spectres, and transact business in whispers. They look more like conspirators than mercantile or financial men.

MY TWO PARTNERS.

I.

WHY do men become chimney-sweeps; dust-contractors; sausage-makers; meat-salesmen; and soap-manufacturers? Why do men in large or-christmas play upon kettle-drums, cymbals, trumpets, and serpents, instead of chewing violins, flutes, and clarionets? I can not make it out.

THE EXCHANGE AT BUENOS AYRES.

II.

I AWOKE one morning and found myself a man of property. A man of property! There is a talismanic power in these words. My uncle had died suddenly, without a will, and I was his heir. Heir to what? Then distinct and glowing sentences; a bona-holding factory, a skin-drying establishment, and a patent-medicine for the human race.

"Yes," my mother on her death-bed had exhorted me to be genteel; she had left me a genteel fortune; and I had lived a genteel life. It was all over now. At the early age of twenty-five, with the romantic name of Edwin Gaskell, I was tucked into the vortex of trade. And such a trade!

III.

I WENT over my new possessions. It was a hard, sad task; but I did it manfully. I could not bear myself, which they told me was mine; but I did not venture personally to measure its extent. I saw several rotten-looking barges lying off the wharf, and in them several men, who seemed to be dancing and clowning in the mud. They moved me vigorously from the depths of their unwholesome craft; and I gave them beer. They were happy! I inspired their new master, who was obliged to conceal his conflicting emotions.

"Shall I put your coach up, sir, this barge?" asked my late uncle's chief clerk, who was now my managing man.

"Not at present, Stevens," I replied with a shudder, "not at present. Oh, certainly not at present."

The next place to inspect was the skin-drying settlement; a Robinson Crusoe-like collection of huts that were built of twig and matting, and which were hundreds of thin, flat, spectral forms of animals stretched upon the walls and hanging from strings over my head. A child's frock and a few pairs of socks were hung in the centre of these phantoms, relieving the gaunt, ghastly effect with a little humanity.

"What is all this?" I asked of Stevens.

"These are your skins," returned my managing man.

"And the clothes?"

"They belong to the keeper's children."

We left the place without examining further, although the patent manure depot was at the back of these premises. The aspect was not cheering, and the smell was indescribable.

From the skin-yard we proceeded to the bonehoiling factory; the chief of my new establishment. I had come into my property; and I was compelled, in common decency, to go over it; but there no certain things that a man is not equal to, even with the interest and curiosity prompt him to undertake the task. The factory was the first place I came to near an important main road; and, at the moment I approached it, the last unfortunate port of its manufacturing process was in full operation.

"Stevens," I said, faintly, "where is the chief counting-house?"

"In the centre of the factory-yard," replied my managing man.

"Then, Stevens," I returned, holding my scented handkerchief to my nose, "as I have an appointment now, you shall bring the books and papers to my rooms at six o'clock this evening."

At the time fixed he came, in company with one Mr. Nebel, a friend of my late uncle's, experienced in such habits. We employed ourselves till nearly midnight. The examination, as to the books, I will take out, went to show that the property, if rather repulsive, was decidedly lucrative. It was agreed that, to minimize it for the time, was more than business; and, appealing my friend as general inspector, to look after my interests, I resigned my derivity. From that hour I was a bone-boiler.

IV

I HAD command of wealth, but I was not happy. Although I did not alter my style of living, I felt that I was no longer the same individual. I had bartered my soul for worldly goods, and the cold shadow of the eternal factory was always clouding my heart. I still moved in the same circles as I had moved in before; but I was still the same single man. I was still five feet five inches in height; my appearance still preserved its pleasing, if not commanding, expression; and yet I was not happy. The name of bone-boiler was always hissing in my ears. The fact of my wealth I had not always prevented me from exploring my own premises, seamed to cling to my clothes, and exude from the roots of my hair.

I was now nervous and diffident; for I was moving in society under false pretenses. Carefully at I had maintained the secret of my connection with the repulsive factory, and its very repulsive adjuncts, I could not but think that others knew it, especially discreet, and in every sly glance, every whisper, and every titter, I imagined I read the discovery of my imposition. The blow might fall at any instant, and I lived in dread.

V.

IT was near the close of May when I received my second invitation to Mrs. Buckram's annual musical frill. I was supposed to be the same young, idle bachelor I was experiencing, living in clubroom, as I was some months before; and scores of such invitations came to me in the course of the year. I accepted this one gladly, for I knew that sex was would be there; Emma Sandford, Mrs. Buckram's niece, and the fairest and sweetest of her sex.

The night of the ball came, and with it all that I had anticipated, even in my fondest dreams. She was fairer and, even more amiable than ever, and she voted so much of her time to me in the dance, that most of the visitors thought we were engaged to be. When nearly all the dancers were down in the supper-room we found ourselves upon a balcony, looking into the garden. My lips had long been struggling to disclose my love; and my honor told me that, at the same moment, I ought to state fully and unhesitatingly who I was—what I was. The situation in which we were unexpectedly placed was it quite unexpectedly?) gave eloquence to my tongue:

"Miss Sandford—Emma—" I said, "I dare not speak to you upon a subject that is weighing on my heart, until I have made a full and honorable disclosure. I am not—I am not what I seem!"

"Good gracious!" gasped the blushing and trembling Emma.

"Yes," I continued, "at the same moment in which I tell you that I love you, I tell you that I am—a bone-boiler!"

She sank upon a rustic seat, but quickly recovered herself.

"A bone-boiler!" she muttered, in her sweetest tones, evidently suffering from a feeling that I was not, as she had seemingly expected—a man of crime; "a bone-boiler, Edwin; and what is that?"

Beautiful simplicity! Troublesome question.

"Well, dearest," I replied, getting more confident, now that I had made the revelation, "dearest, lovely know, as I go so seldom to the works; but they call me bone-boiler."

"Works? bones?" she interrupted, evidently full of some sudden idea. "Speak, Edwin, tell me—where is this establishment—this factory? you know what I mean."

"My property, Emma?"

"Yes."

"About three miles out of London, on the Downham Road."

"Near the church?"

"Near the church."

"Then we are lost!"

"Lost?"

"Yes, Edwin," she returned, in sorrowful tones, "it is within a stone's throw of my father's freehold villa, and it is the one nuisance which embitters his life."

What reply I might have made to this I can scarcely tell; for, at that moment, Mrs. Buckram, a stately man of severe aspect, entered the balcony.

"Emma!" I heard her call, sternly to her, as he frowned at me, "I have been searching for you every where. Wish your aunt good-night."

Emma gave me one tender, sorrowful glance, and left the place followed by her father.

VI.

THE next day was a busy one, at least for me. It was to be passed at the works to receive my operations for several days, and he replied that this could not be done. I was told as little as possible, but boil he must. My object was to prevent the nuisance being very obtrusive at the exact moment of my visit to Downham.

I went to the Downham Road, about mid-day, and was met at the works by Sandford's self. There was one large French window which opened upon an extensive ornamental garden; and in the distance, just over the top of the boiling-house, I saw the two black, smoking chimneys of my bone-boiling. I was told that Mr. Sandford considered the apartment, very still and severe in his manner, as he mentioned the fact:

"Sir," he said, "after the conference between you and my daughter, which I interrupted last night, I had hoped that you would leave the object of your visit. Take a chair."

This question was chilling, and calculated to increase my trepidation. I made no reply.

"Sir," he continued, in a severe tone, "the first question which I put to you was calculated to put to a gentleman in your position is. What are his means for supporting a wife and children?" May I put that question to you, Mr. Gaz—, Gaz—"

"Mr. Gazelle," I answered.

"Mr. Gazelle," he repeated.

I was about to reply to this very troublesome, and fully expected, question, when a sudden fear and horror I observed a dense volume of smoke issuing from both my factory chimneys, and I was made painfully conscious that some monstrous fire was flinging coals, not to my reckoning effluvium, which floated toward us upon the wind, and through the open doors. I coughed and moved uneasily in my chair while Mr. Sandford let several puffies on the mouthpiece of a cool cheroot the garden window with a hasty bang.

"Sir," he said, in an excited manner, "sir, no; nothing but a Chancery injunction will stop this. Night or day, it's always the same. My apartments are literally filled with smoke, and my family poisoned with effluvium—"

"Effluvium, Sandford," I said, "int—"

"It's more than annoying, Sir," he interrupted, "it's illegal, Sir. They are bound down never to boil bones with a naked fire. They are allowed only ask you to look at that weathercock over the conservatory, Sir—you can't, Sir; you may be boiled alive in your own essence."

"That, Mr. Sandford," I said, with attempted firmness, "I am afraid can never be."

"Sir?" he calculated, in astonishment.

"The law of England, Sir," I continued, "protects a man from incriminating himself."

"You?" said Mr. Sandford, converting his brow to the attitude of interrogation.

"Yes, Sir, I am the proprietor of those works," I replied, with a sensation of relief that did not last over.

It was now Mr. Sandford's turn to be disconcerted; but he soon recovered himself.

"And you come here, Sir," he said, red with anger, "to ask my consent to my daughter's union with an illegal and a pestilential nuisance?"

"Mr. Sandford," I began to reply, deprecatingly:

"Go, Sir," he interrupted with irritating, though pathetic dignity; "go; you have polluted my house. You have made the ark of my declining years unbearable; but you shall not rob me of my child!"

"You decline my offer?" I enquired with considerable spirit; for I now felt indignant and aroused.

"God-morning, Sir?" he said, with a majestic wave of his hand. "God-morning!"

In the passage I came full in the arms of my beloved and anxious Emma, who had evidently been listening.

"Oh, Edwin," she exclaimed, "is papa indeed inexorable—and are we to part thus?"

I could not trust myself to speak; but fled from the place.

VII.

SCARCELY knowing what I did I rushed to the works. The men were all on duty, with Stevens, the manager, and my friend, the inspector.

"Boil!" I shouted, in my excitement. "Boil like—like—"

My two managers looked at each other, and then looked at me. Their looks made no remark.

"Pile up," I continued, "mountains high, and let no carpet in the place be other than a collation of boiling stench."

"You are aware, Sir," replied Stevens, "that we are already condemned by the inhabitants' with proceedings for creating a nuisance?"

"Am I not equally by me about?" I hastily interrupted Mr. Nickel.

"Gentlemen!" I exclaimed, becoming more excited as I spoke, "the name of that nuisance shall be—You are the managers here; but I am the master. Boil, I say, to the utmost verge of your power!"

The order was obeyed without further remonstrance; and as hour by hour the neighborhood must have been sickening under our repulsive agency, I felt more and more happy. I hardly knew. Perhaps to storm my enemy into compliance? To reach him I was compelled to annoy the innocent; and, while I gloated in imagination over his sufferings, I was painfully conscious that my own Emma must be affected by the same poisonous vapor.

At this thought a momentary weakness impelled me to stop the boiling nuisance; but I checked it at once when I remembered the contempt I had met with. The sensation of hope and highest ecstasy rolled in majestic volumes of effluvium over my enemy's villa. I was amply revenged; and, as the weeks became unbearable, I began to feel dizzy, and turned my steps in the direction of home.

VIII.

THAT excitement had preyed upon my health, and I was sure that we have my residence for several days. At the end of this time I went once more into the works, and ordered the most stringent impulse toward the Downham Road. I approached Mr. Sandford's villa with no definite design. I had not determined to call; but I was anxious to see the place. A mild flavor of the works still hung over the neighborhood; but I felt sure from this that my instructions had not been neglected. When I reached the villa my heart sunk within me, for I found it in a shutters of every window closet except them of the kitchen. A dreadful thought suggested itself. Could they have died a death in the family?

Regardless of every thing I hastily rang the bell; and I was answered by an old char-woman.

"Is she—is any one dead?" I asked, breathlessly.

"Lauk-a-daisy, Sir," she replied, "you give me quite a turn!"

"Is any one dead in this house?" I repeated.

"No, Sir," she replied, in a nervous manner.

"Why are the shutters of the—the—"

"Well, Sir, I don't know who you may be—"

"Why are they closed?"

"Bcose the family couldn't stand them stinkin' works, sir' they've gone out o' town."

"Mistress?" I muttered to myself; "I have driven them into exile."

I asked the old woman where they had gone; but of course she could not tell; for the address, as usual, had been written on a piece of paper which she had never realized.

"It's some town as begins with a P," she said. "There are five hundred such towns!" I replied.

IX.

A PAIR of misery and a night of restlessness was recompensed by an announcement which I read the next morning in the second column of the Times:

"Edwin Gaskell—To the Chalin Pier every morning at nine. The air on the Downs is healthy, and the steamers are not. Bother the smoke of a hundred boiling factories if there were only near."

EMMA S.

I read this and read it, and dazzled eyes, and I could not doubt that this paragraph was meant for me. The poinest mention of the Chalin Pier and the Downs directed me to Brighton; and, rejecting the old woman's statement that the town began with a P, I started at once in search of the first fashionable watering-place. A few minutes before I went for the cab a letter without a direction was left at the garden door, and directed to me, arrived through the post. Its contents were as follows:

"Dearest Edwin,—Sandford, in a rage, has left for a speculative adventure. Far from having any objection to your marriage with his daughter, he is anxious to secure your absence from the matter; but in such a way that no suspicion shall attach to himself in his child's proverbial wedding portion. Pause, and reflect.

"Your affectionate friend, S. WELL-WISHER."

I treated this base minxive with the contempt it deserved. If it had contained any libel upon her whom I was dying to meet, I would have found out the writer at any cost; but as it merely confined itself to remarks upon her parent, I put it in my pocket, and thought no more about it. In a few hours I was at Brighton, gazing upon the sad sea-waves.

X.

THE afternoon and evening passed wearily enough; for she was not to be seen. I sought her on the beach—the promenade—the Downs—and in the assembly-rooms, but without success. I felt that I was rash in betraying my arrival in places where I might be discovered by Mr. Sandford; but I could not control my impatience until the morning. At dusk approached I gave up the search and settled down to a late and solitary dinner in the melancholy coffee-room of my hotel. The outlet was lonely; the sea was hot and still; the waiter painfully obsequious; a clock was ticking with mathematic regularity. The whole establishment, who ought to have been sociable, was glaring as me over and anon from an opposite table. At times the thought came across me that I might have been deceived by the advertisement; and my early conduct was to be visited as a crime against the court-sound and read it all through the meal.

At last the morning came, and at the appointed time I hastened to the pier. The direction was right. I was not deceived. She stood before me, more lovely than ever. I asked, after the first salutations were over, at what hotel or lodging they were staying, and was answered, "At neither."

"Where, then," I inquired, perceiving some hesitation on the part of the lovely Emma, "if not at one of these small places?"

"At no small place, Edwin," she replied, in a sorrowful tone. "Would that it had been otherwise!"

"Tell me more, Emma," I replied; "for there is something which you are concealing from me."

"It is a secret, Edwin."

"A cousin, Emma?"

"Yes. They call him relative because he does nothing but spend his time in billiards, and spend half his time in a yacht; but he is no favorite of mine, and cousin rather than many!"

"Marry him, Emma! Surely your father can have no such design?"

"It is not his wish, Edwin; and any day I may be compelled to bid adieu to you forever."

"Then, dearest," I said, "with me, Emma—fly from this fashionable and detestable abode."

"I can not, Edwin. Where can I go?—alone—"

"Speak! I will take you to the world's end, fly, and fly at once."

"To my late Buckram's, then. She will do any thing I ask her."

In a few hours we had reached the desired haven in London, and the next morning saw us man and wife.

XI.

MY honeymoon was not without its troubles, though my wife was not the cause of them. My friend, Mr. Nickel (whom I suspected of having written the anonymous letter), had informed me next morning from his post as my factory inspector with a considerable degree of alarm that the fires had not counted for. On the next day to the one on which he left the country my father-in-law, Mr. Sandford, made his appearance; calling with me personally as we were seated at breakfast.

"I come here," he said, "in no spirit of enmity. You have acted without my consent; but I freely forgive you. The portion I might have given my daughter Emma I have already had been conducted in the regular way, will now remain a secret between you and me."

After we had thanked him for his kindness, and had wished him a life as long as Methuselah's, he continued:

"I am not surprised that your inspector, Mr. Nickel, knows my late uncle, and has married your property. I know him some years ago, and I never had a favorable opinion of him."

"Is it possible, Sir?" I replied.

"You are young and inexperienced," he continued, "and I am afraid of the world. You did not enjoy yourselves while you can, and, repugnant as the bone-boiling establishment is to me, I will look after your interests as a father."

"Mr. Sandford," I replied, "I can not allow this generous sacrifice. After all I am the married man regarding this repulsive business—"

"I only do as I am prompted. "One more matter of my family has already become your partner for life. I propose to join the firm also. From this hour you will consider me your active partner."

And he became a partner; I scarcely know how. Sometimes I think of the anonymous letter, and suspect his disinterestedness; but one glance at my gentle and amiable wife reconciles me to all.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

WHY DOES OUR SOIL PRODUCE LESS WHEAT PER ACRE THAN THE SOIL OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND?

ONE neighbors on the other side of the Atlantic—in England, Ireland, and Scotland—grow more wheat per acre than we do, yet from the country we explore in order to feed their hungry nations. Should our wheat-growers, by an improved system of husbandry, double the yield, many millions of dollars a year would be added to our national wealth. We could estimate the advantage on this account. Why should we not apply the full rule in the ways of enlightened agriculture? Figures can not answer the question. Facts can. We must look elsewhere to the unfolding of this great subject with all the lights of science and practical demonstration.

In no country can flour wheat be grown than in America, but we seldom till the soil as well as the farmers of Great Britain and Ireland, whose wants stimulate industry. They have to pay high rents. When we want a farm we buy it, and own it. Let our industry be guided by intelligence. Our wants are rapidly increasing. Whole districts, which fifty years ago gave an average of 30 bushels of wheat per acre, do not give ten bushels now. Until we stop eating bread made of wheat flour this subject will not lose its interest. Why should we not grow as large crops of wheat as the farmers of any other nation, and of as fine a quality? Does any one think good wheat can be grown on bad soil? Can a large crop be gathered from a poor soil? Can it give that which it has not? We must look well to the nature of the land. Liebig truly says: "Again, how does it happen that wheat does not flourish on a sandy soil, and that a calcareous soil is also unsuitable for its growth, unless it be mixed with a considerable quantity of mould? It is because these soils do not contain alkalies and certain other ingredients in sufficient quantity, the growth of wheat being arrested for this reason alone, even should all other substances be presented in abundance."

The common opinion, that the soil of the West can not be exhausted, is a great mistake. See how the crop in Ohio has fallen off! The average yield in 1850 was 17 bushels per acre; in '51, 15; and in '52, under 14. Has the average fallen off increased since? Those facts are true of more States than Ohio. From 1840 to 1850 the crop of wheat in New England fell off one million of bushels. Upward of six million bushels more wheat were grown in Georgia, Kentucky, and Tennessee in 1840 than in 1850! Hereafter we will give the changes that have taken place in these States in the quantity grown and average per acre, for the better and for the worse, since the dates named.

In some places land is so much exhausted that wheat crops paying for the labor can not be grown. Again, we find wheat in fair ear very rich, but the balance; others are all that can be desired, but they are the fewest, excepting those we take from the bankings-out of the red mud, which are by no means to us as the Garden of Eden was to our first parents.

If land is too poor to pay for labor, the more of it the wheat-grower tills without remuneration the poorer that land and himself will grow. In order not in balance there may be too much straw-making food, but not enough for the grain. In this case, even the most favorable seasons can not give the best results. The absence of the necessary moisture in the soil will cut off supplies of food to plants. An excess of it may cause available food wanting for the development of the grain to be appropriated by the straw. In wet seasons, especially in the absence of under-drains to carry off water, when there is much straw-making food and a deficiency of phosphates, the latter are taken up by the stalks and leaves, to the loss of the grain; hence some soils may yield less grain in a wet season, but more straw, than they would in a dry or one, other things being equal. The losses of animals coming into the large cities being phosphates in refined sugars from the West Indies. In our first article on wheat we had occasion to say: "Grain is carried to the cities, and the substance that made it can never from their original source. The wheat crop of 1850 robbed the soil of more than thirty millions of pounds of potash, and sixty millions of pounds of phosphoric acid. But a small proportion of these elements are carried off in the salt. Nature's economy nothing is lost; but when man displaces things he should put them back again in their proper places. A soil that nature looks well to its agriculture, the great source of wealth. England dug the fields of Ireland, and human bones to enrich her soil. She sent her ships to foreign nations to bring home fertilizers. In our agricultural system is a wasteful and destructive one. We are tenants of it but for life; others will come after us."

These are a few of the reasons based on the bad principle of EXHAUSTIVE, why we do not grow as much wheat per acre as other people do.

A correspondent in California informs us that the modes of culture practiced in the valleys and along the river bottoms is to give one plowing for two or three crops, and without any manure being added the first crop generally yields from 40 to 60 bushels per acre. The second, known as the volunteer crop, is very large, and similarly good or better quality, weighing heavier, and less liable to smut. The gentleman who, at the State Fair in 1854, got the premium, had a field of wheat which cut 85½ bushels per acre, of sixty pounds to the bushel. But these facts only prove that the system of renovation and fertilization must differ with the wants of special cases.

Corn is taking the place of wheat in the prairie districts, and especially where less protected by snow during winter than other States. But in spite of the severity of the Canadian winter, wheat crops, protected by snow, never suffer as much as those grown in more changeable climates.

When there is little snow, if wheat is to be well grown, land must be fertilized and well cultivated to give the roots a strong hold in the soil. Fertilization will cause a vigorous growth, and the roots of timothy, &c., in well-prepared land, strike deep and hold fast. This helps the plant, and augments the quantity and quality of the grain.

The prairie soils, even in districts whose winters are of the most disagreeable kind, are well adapted to the growing of Indian corn, because in a region in which the growing season is shorter, corn, if not a forced crop, often gets caught by the frost and is injured.

In some localities wheat is grown on the same soil for many years in succession. We often hear farmers in such places say that the plowing in of clover is better than to fallow. It is better for the land. You can not grow wheat and weeds together; for if you want one you must kill the other. We would refer the reader to our first article on wheat for facts relative to the action of clover in the preparation of the soil.

One good farmer, living near Geneva, New York, tells us "that by under-draining his land, and fattening a large number of cattle and sheep, he kept up the fertility of the soil and secures paying crops of wheat." As fast as our minds arrive at good principles and the application of them will successful wheat-growing prosper. And the natural field of every acre growing wheat in the United States was equal to that of the land above referred to, the national wealth of the country would be increased more than $150,000,000 a year.

The anxiety with which British farmers watch their wheat crops shows that they study the habits of the plant and the probable influence of the crop on prices. When it comes into ear quickly, in warm, settled weather, they immediately conclude that there is little danger of blight. Then the wheat-ear is examined carefully, and the anticipation of plump and well-developed grain. There are now but few of the unimproved wild breeds which, in moist, cool seasons, sometimes destroy 20 or 25 per cent. of the crop, and of genuine kinds, commonly known as red-coat, red-rubbin, red-gram, and mildew. All this inspires the husbandman with the hope of an abundant harvest, even when,

"With sleep-seal'd eye,
Wields at his sound the sickle's sweep,
Forming soft with the sun-tanned wheat,
Spiked by the summer's heat."

[TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Irving's Great Work, Complete!

The 5th (and last) Volume of IRVING'S WASHINGTON will be ready early in April. It has plates and a copious Index to the whole. Octavo Edition, $2 00; 12mo Edition, $1 50. Sent per mail, post free. Subscribers should complete their sets at once. IRVING'S WORKS are now Complete in 21 vols. Send for list with prices.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S "NORTHERN TRAVEL," with new part and plate, $1 25. His whole Works, 6 vols. in box, $8 00. Sent post free.

G. P. Putnam, 506 Broadway, N. Y.

FOR THROAT DISEASES and affections of the Lungs, "Brandreth Pills," or Cough Lozenges, are of great value. In Coughs, Irritation of the Throat, Influenza, Colds, and Consumption in the vessel organs, in speaking in public, or singing, they produce the most beneficial results. Sold by all Druggists.

New and Elegant
TOY BOOKS.
1.
THE LITTLE OLD WOMAN WHO LIVED IN A SHOE.
Price, 12½ cents.
"There was an old woman,
She lived in a shoe.
She had so many children
She didn't know what to do."
II.
THE UGLY DUCKLING.
By HANS ANDERSEN.
Price 12½ cents.
Illustrated with Forty Pictures.
☞ Others of the series in active preparation, and will soon appear.
STRAHAN, CLARK & BROWN,
13 Washington St., Boston.

UNIQUE PERFUMES
—IN—
ARTICLES DE TOILETTE
Neat safety by mail. Send for Catalogue.
BENJAMIN DUTY, 489 Broadway, N. Y.

Facts Stranger than Fiction.

MATRIMONIAL BROKERAGE IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY is now made easy to all parties wishing to marry. Send for a circular containing full proof of the remarkable incidents contained in the book, sea the New York Evening Post of the 24 inst. Price One Dollar.
THATCHER & HUTCHINSON,
No. 323 Broadway, Up Stairs, Nichols Block.

BIRDSEY BLAKEMAN, of the late firm of SHELDON, BLAKEMAN & Co., 115 Nassau-street, New York,
WILL CONTINUE
THE PUBLISHING AND BOOKSELLING BUSINESS,
At No. 249 Broadway, New York.
We shall keep constantly on hand a complete stock of MISCELLANEOUS AND SCHOOL BOOKS
In general demand, and offer them to the trade
FOR CASH, ON VERY FAVORABLE TERMS.
Books not found in our list will be promptly supplied. New Books as issued from the Press, and also to Mail Orders. Catalogues and Circulars will be sent to purchasers, and as well as though the parties were present.
THE PUBLICATIONS
OF THE HOUSE OF GOULD & LINCOLN,
PHILLIPS, SAMPSON & Co.,
L. H. BUTLER & CO.,
CHILDS & PETERSON,
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.
And other Boston and Philadelphia Publishers, constantly on hand.
From long experience and familiar acquaintance with the details of the business, we feel confident that we can make it for the interest of all Book-Dealers to give us a share of their patronage.
To all our Friends and Patrons we think nothing more need be said.
To those with whom we have no acquaintance we will simply say, give us a fair trial, either by a personal visit or mail system.

BAILEY & CO.,
619 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia.
(Adjoining L. J. Levy & Co's.)
The largest manufacturers of
BRITISH STANDARD SILVER WARE
in the United States.

Guaranteed to be of the above quality. All Silver Ware sold by them is manufactured on the premises—designed by J. C. Booth, Esq., of the U. S. Mint.
DIAMONDS, FINE WATCHES, JEWELRY, PLATED WARES, BRONZES, &c.

"MASSER'S"
Patent 5 Minute Freezers.
OPERATION SIMPLE. RESULT CERTAIN.
The increasing demand and the unrivaled popularity of "Masser's" Ice Cream Freezers prove them to be the best Ice-Cream Freezer in use.
Purchasers and Dealers are cautioned against imitations. Freezers that are offered in place of the above. Get "H. D. MASSER'S" freezers, that have been thoroughly tested for the last five years.
Sole Agents,
E. KETCHAM & CO.,
Manufacturers of Japanned and Galvanized Tin Ware,
259 Front Street, New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines—it has trebled within four months—indicates the returning prosperity of the country. The prices of our Machines have been greatly reduced.
J. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR
FLOWERS, FEATHERS,
COMFITURES, and BRIDAL GIFTS, at
361 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

WM. ROWE, JR.
CARPETS and OIL-CLOTHS,
CHEAP, FOR CASH.
No. 532 Hudson Street, near Spring,
New York.

The New Books of the Season,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.
ADAM BEDE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
FARKWEI; or, The Sun Jackite in the Seas of India. China, and Japan. By WILLIAM C. HAZELTINE, M.D., U.S.N., late Surgeon of the Fleet to the United States East India Squadron. Author of "Wanderings and Sketches in South America, Polynesia," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
EPISODES OF FRENCH HISTORY during the Consulate and the First Empire. By MRS FARRAR, Author of "The Young Lady's Friend," "Recollections of the Seventeenth Century," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
THE OLD PLANTATION, and What I Gathered There in an Autumn Ramble. By JAMES HAMMOND TYRE, of Maryland. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
SYLVAN HOLT'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By HOLME LEE, Author of "Kathie Brande." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
LA PLATA: The Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay. Being a Narrative of the Exploration of the River La Plata and Adjacent Countries, during the Years 1853, '54, '55, and '56, under the orders of the United States Government. By the Valuable T. J. PAGE, U.S.N., Commander of the Expedition. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.
THE GOLDEN HOUR. A Scottish Story. By the Author of "Mary Powell," &c. 12mo, "The Days of My Life," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF SCOTLAND and English Princesses connected with the Royal Succession of Great Britain. By AGNES STRICKLAND. Seventh Volume just published. To be completed in Eight Volumes. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00 per Volume.
RECENT DISCOVERIES IN NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA. Being a Narrative of an Expedition undertaken under Her Majesty's Royal Commandment, in the Years 1849–1855. By HENRY BARTH, PH.D., D.C.L., &c. 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, and numerous elegant Illustrations. Complete in 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $7 50; Half Calf, $10 50.
THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and the Imagery of the Holy Land. By W. M. THOMSON, D.D., Twenty-five Years a Missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Syria and Palestine. With Two Maps, Plate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and numerous Engravings. Comprising Researches, Discovery, Topography, and the Present Condition of the Land, and the Customs, Manners, and Habits of the People. 2 vols. 12mo, Large Type, Volumes, Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 50.
WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT? By PISISTRATUS CAXTON. A Novel. By Sir EDWARD LYTTON BULWER, Author of "My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.
HISTORY OF FREEDOM THE SECOND, called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE. Author of "History of the French Revolution," "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," &c. Complete in 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 50 each. (Vols. I and II, with Portraits and Maps, SAMPSON & Co.)
SELF-MADE MEN. By CHAS. C. B. SEYMOUR. Many Portraits. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
THE HISTORY OF PROSTITUTION: Its Extent, Cause, and Effects throughout the World. (Being an Official Report to the Board of Alms-House Governors of the City of New York.) By WILLIAM W. SANGER, M.D., Resident Physician. Author of "The Results of New York City: Means of Cure." Second Edition, Revised and Corrected. Illustrated with Plates from the Physicians to the Marine Hospital, Quarantine, New York, &c., &c. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00. (Second Edition just ready.)

"Twin Temples of Fashion."
SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140
Fulton Street,
Between Broadway & William St.
THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RUCK.
NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.
The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

THE MARBLE TRINITY,
SAINTS, FASHION, AND FOLLY.
By Julia Carey Rheinhardt.
WHEN April's earliest dawn brings round
The festival of All Fools' Day—
Don't you run within the reeks be found
Of those who to St. FOLLY pray—
But quit the crowd and make your way
To where St. Fashion's mild divinity
Unfurls on benign bread and gay
O'er SMITHS' PALATIAL MARBLE TRINITY.
ONE FORTE, and ONE TWENTY-TWO,
And NOW ONE THIRTY-EIGHT, in life,
Of FULTON STREET shops to view
The honor of SMITHS' NEW SPRING STYLE!
If man's respect and woman's smile,
You'd gain—be off to that vicinity!
In buying clothes, you'll "save a pile,"
By dealing at the MARBLE TRINITY.

NEW TEAS.
JUST RECEIVED
BY LAST ARRIVALS,
The finest quality of OOLONG TEA, Retail price 75 cents per lb.
The finest quality of YOUNG HYSON TEA, Retail price 75 cents per lb.
A very fine quality of YOUNG HYSON TEA, Retail price 62½ cents per lb.
BEST BREAKFAST SOUCHONG TEA, Retail price 50 cents per lb.
BEST OLD JAVA COFFEE, Retail price 37½ cents per lb.
RETAIL PRICE 10 CENTS PER POUND.
BEST CRUSHED AND REFINED SUGARS, Packed and Labeled in REFINER'S PRICES.
CHOICE OLD WINES AND LIQUORS,
Of every variety.
ALBRO & BROTHERS,
156 BOWERY,
Fourth door above Houston Street, and 254 GRAND STREET, corner of Christie.

The Perfection of Toilet Soaps.
Yardley & Statham's Sunflower Oil Soap.
The Sunflower Oil Soap imparts an agreeable softness and elasticity to the skin, lathers freely, and has a refreshing and bathing influence. It is admitted by all who have used it to be the most agreeable and useful soap extant.
The Right Hon. Lord Hatherton, in a letter to Messrs. Yardley & Statham, says: "I have found your Sunflower Oil Soap, it is incomparably the best soap I know."
We are satisfied that this trial will insure its constant use. Manufactured by
YARDLEY & STATHAM,
Fine Soapmakers and Perfumers, London, and 24 Conduit Street, Regent Street.
J. W. NORCROSS & CO.,
Importers of Druggists' and Perfumers' Fancy Articles,
New York, 51 Milk Street, Boston.

LIGHTE, NEWTON & BRADBURY'S
PIANOS,
283 and 285 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.
HENRY D. NEWTON, Jr., Agent.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURED BRUSHES, at the Brush Warehouse, No. 379 Pearl Street, Harper's Building. Brushes of every description on hand, and for sale at the lowest prices. A liberal discount to the trade. Awarded the Institute, in 1849, for superior Brushes.
JOHN KIDDER & HOPPEL.

Select Family School for Boys
AT
SOUTH WILLIAMSBURGH, BERKSHIRE COUNTY, MASS.
(ESTABLISHED IN 1845.)
Summer term of twenty-one weeks will commence on Wednesday, May 4.
Boys received between the ages of six and twelve.
Number of pupils limited to thirty.
For circulars address the Principal,
BENJ. F. MILLS.
March, 1859.

FRED. S. COZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,
Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest quality at his own importation.
RARE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
72 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

ELIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency Office, main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

The Copartnership heretofore existing between the subscribers, under the name and firm of D. S. Barnes & Co., is this day dissolved by mutual consent.

A. S. BARNES,
H. L. BURR,
S. A. ROLLO.

NEW YORK, Feb 1st, 1859.

S. A. Rollo, having retired from the late firm of A. S. Barnes & Co., will continue to the PUBLISHING, BOOK-SELLING, and STATIONERY BUSINESS, at No. 29 Park Row opposite the Astor House, under the same and style of

S. A. ROLLO & CO.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1st, 1859.

The subscribers, having newly fitted the store No. 29 Park Row, are now prepared to offer the trade and buyers generally, at the lowest market prices, a large and well selected Theological, Medical, Miscellaneous, Common Books and Stationery. Blank Books of every size and quality. Letter and Cap Papers of every style, English and American Staple Stationery, &c. &c.

Every assignment, so far as regards price, styles, qualities and quantities, will be offered to first-class buyers, either for cash or credit.

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,
Publishers, Booksellers and Stationers,
No. 29 Park Row opposite the Astor House),
New York.

DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S
PATENT
TOURNURE CORSET.

This article combines in one garment a CORSET of SURPASSING SHAPE and FITTING, and a SUPERB and PERFECT MODEL, insuring free and healthful action to the lungs, and conformation to elegant in the upper. It has been pronounced by all who have seen it among those most superior and perfect articles of the kind ever made, to be the only Corset without an objection, either in point of comfort, health, or fashion, and is offered to the ladies of the United States with confidence.

EXPANSION SKIRT.

Also the celebrated

MATINEE SKIRT,

which for COMFORT and for HEALTH is unsurpassed, together with over seventy other different styles, all of which are for sale at all the principal stores in the United States and Canadas. All articles of their manufacture

ARE STAMPED WITH THEIR TRADE MARK.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES.

PRICES GREATLY REDUCED.

Office 505 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

NEW YORK PURCHASING AGENCY.
W. M. LAFFERTY, No. 49 Nassau Street.
Persons desirous of making purchases in New York of any article, large or small, of use or luxury, from a Book to a Sewing-Engine, a Shawl to a Carpet, can have their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, at a per cent. commission charge. Refers to G. L. Simpson, Esq., Cashier Long Island Bank, Messrs. Adam Ayer & Son, Hastings, Plimpton & Co., New York; J. D. Dawson & Co., New Orleans.

WANTED!

AGENTS EVERY WHERE, to sell the best Books, Aetna, Wall, Map and Picture Agency, but a small capital can in this very pleasant business within a profit of from fifteen to fifty dollars per day.

Our Publications are adapted to the wants of every family, and of the most interesting and intellectual character. For full particulars address

LILLEY & GUILD, Publishers,
No. 224 North Second Street, Philadelphia.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS

Have just issued their SPECIAL TRADE LIST to Dealers for the Spring Sales, with the additional Discount, Early orders solicited.

WORTHY OF NOTE for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption. — See Dr. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY, sold by druggists generally. Genuine only when signed by Lorenzo Pettengill & Co., Boston. Sold by HEDDEN, SUTTON & CO., Druggists, Nassau street, corner Spruce, New York.

VEGETABLE PULMONARY BALSAM.
Prepared only by REED, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Fulton street, corner Nassau, New York.

BARNES & PARK, Agents.

"HARD TIMES NO MORE."
ANY PERSON (Lady or Gentleman) in the United States, possessing a small capital of from $5 to $10, can enter into an easy and respectable business, by which they can from $3 to $20 per day can be realized. For particulars address (with stamp), W. R. ACTON & CO., 13 Nova Scotia Street, Philadelphia.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for "LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION." Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages and 1100 beautiful illustrations. This work will be published early by Agents, to each of whom a special District will be assigned, with Instructions offered. Applicants should name the County they would prefer. For full particulars address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $850,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive merchandise business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has redeemed the Certificates of the issue of 1858.

THOMAS EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LEGGNEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. OGDEN, Secretary.

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD.

THE LIVING AGE

Having largely increased in circulation the past year, the Publishers are enabled to append the new and attractive feature of the

Portrait of some Literary Celebrity, with Memoir, in each Week's Number, consisting of 64 pages of reading matter, or 3328 pages, double columns, and 52 FINE PORTRAITS per annum.

This large-established and excellent Periodical is a choice Repository of the Best Periodical Literature of the Age, comprising the productions of the most popular Writers and Authors of Europe, together with occasional lighter articles from the British Magazines.

TERMS: $8 per annum, prepaid to any address. Clergymen, Teachers, and Clubs, $7. Specimen numbers, 10 cents. Subscriptions taken for a shorter period. Single Numbers for sale.

DELISSER & PROCTOR, Publishers, 599 Broadway, and to be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen throughout the Union.

Important to Consumptives!

Dr. Churchill's Discovery.

Winchester's Genuine Preparation of Dr. J. F. Churchill's Compound of the

HYPOPHOSPHITES
of LIME, SODA, and POTASH,

As Discovered and Prescribed by him, as a Specific for

CONSUMPTION!

This Remedy is acquiring an unprecedented popularity from the invariable SUCCESS with which it acts in all cases of PULMONARY CONSUMPTION, and the many REMARKABLE CURES it has effected in the most confirmed and apparently hopeless cases. Pamphlets containing these cures will be furnished to all who call for them, or forwarded by mail. Physicians will find a timely use of the GENUINE HYPOPHOSPHITES

The Hypophosphites restore the healthy vitality but a PRESERVATIVE POWER. They are a complete prophylactic or preventive of PULMONARY disease, and act with EVEN MARKED EFFICIENCY in all incipient cases, even of the most acute, consumption will be found IMPOSSIBLE.

☞ CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC! ☜

Various unscrupulous and fraudulent attempts having been made to palm off spurious, impure, worthless, and deleterious preparations, under the LABEL PURPORTED TO BE THE GENUINE, and as the only preparation of Dr. J. F. Churchill's Compound of the Hypophosphites of Lime, Soda, and Potash; will, after this date, be put up in extra large bottles, with the following words blown in the glass:

"DR. J. F. CHURCHILL'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME SODA AND POTASH. A SPECIFIC REMEDY FOR CONSUMPTION. J. WINCHESTER, New York."

Also, the label upon the bottle, and the wrapper has a fac-simile of the signature. NO OTHER IS GENUINE.

From the N. Y. Druggists' Circular for February, 1859:

"The Hypophosphites, taken as a class, seem to possess two powers or virtues—that of a TONIC and preserving the function of nutrition." * * Dr. Churchill, who first brought them into public notice, claims for them a SPECIFIC IN PULMONARY CONSUMPTION, alleging that the progress of that disease is altogether due to a deficiency of phosphorus.

"Whether this be true or not, there can be little doubt of the value of these Remedies, as VESICO and ARTERIAL SEDATIVES. They relieve the irritable stomach, which often taken for some time they tend to produce more assimilative power in the system." * * We have no doubt they have very many valuable properties, combined with the Tonic and Sedative, and will be found USEFUL IN CASES ADAPTED BY CONSTITUTION."

This REMEDY is invaluable in all forms of Nervous or Debilitated Diseases, Nervous Headache, Dyspepsia, or Loss of Vital Energy from whatever cause. Ladies suffering from Nervous Prostration or Debility will find in this remedy an soft charming effect, from its VITALIZING and TONIC properties.

Price $5 per bottle, or three bottles for $5. Single bottles only sent when ordered by express. Sold in cases specially ordered. Allow no one to impose a fraudulent article upon you. Ask for Dr. Churchill's Hypophosphites. Give no other; better have none. Use no other. Beware even how to tell who write enclosing a stamp.

Sold wholesale and retail at the Sole General Depot in the United States by

J. WINCHESTER,
American and Foreign Agency, No. 40 John St., N. Y.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to purchase MACHINES which will not perform the work that purchasers expected them to do, are informed that SINGER'S MANUFACTURING CO. have NOT a work. No one is ever dispossessed in these machines.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
458 Broadway.

MENDELSSOHN'S
SONGS WITHOUT WORDS.
Complete in one volume, Octavo, in cloth, Price $2 00. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

NOVEL—COMPLETE.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?
By Pisistratus Caxton.
A Novel.
By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart.,
Author of
"My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c., &c.

One Super, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.
BY THE
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S
LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A. M., 3.15 and 6.30 P. M. daily.

Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and do not lie over or stop at any point.

The regular rates by the Fast Run is

To Chicago	in 40 hours	To Dayton	in 30 hours
" Cincinnati	" 36 "	" Louisville	" 34 "
" Cleveland	" 24 "	" Louisville	" 34 "
" Columbus	" 30 "	" Indianapolis	" 36 "

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in like good time.

Goods for sale on Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, Kansas, &c., will have time by shipping by our line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

In the whole history of medical discoveries, no remedy has performed so many and such remarkable cures of all affections of the Throat, Lungs and Chest, of Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, Consumption itself, in this fat-famed, long tried, and justly celebrated Balsam.

Consumption slowly, but surely, seizes her victims, the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed label of "SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston," is on the outer wrapper. For sale every where.

JUST PUBLISHED!
THE CULPRIT FAY.
By JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE.

A charming edition of this world-celebrated poem. Dorchester, elegantly printed upon tinted plate paper, and illustrated and illustrated by Darley, Weir, and Rossiter.

"One of the most exquisite and absolute creations of pure imagination that has been produced since Shakespeare."—Edgar A. Poe's Literati. "Full of the most delicious and delightful evidences of poetic power and perception to devour and relish, with intellectual."—N. Y. Mirror. "Unsurpassed in its kind."—Knickerbocker.—N. Y. WILEY.

For by mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

RUDD & CARLETON,
Publishers and Booksellers,
130 Grand Street (near Broadway), New York.

Alice Learmont—38 Cents.
By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX."

A HERO,
BREAD UPON THE WATERS,
ALICE LEARMONT.

Tales by Miss MULOCH.
Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Olive," "The Ogilvies," &c., &c.

Complete in one vol. 12mo, Muslin, price 50 cents; Paper Covers, 38 cents. New Edition. (Originally published in 1853.)

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of FIFTY CENTS.

Tests of Character.

Lord Byron once said "You never know a man's business partner or wife until you happen to be a ship-mate, or a woman's until you have married her." We are able to add that we also know how many use Hostetter's Heir Restorative unless they use it applied, for it restores the hair to its proper color, gloss, and beauty.

Price Fifty Cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.

W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, N. Y.

MOUNT PLEASANT INSTITUTE.—A select Boarding School for Boys, Amherst, Mass. H. G. NASH, A. M., Principal.

Consumptives do not Despair!

CONSUMPTION CURED. AN OLD INDIAN DOCTOR, UNCAS BRANT, Chief of the Seneca Nation of Indians of the Rocky Mountains, has left in the hands of the PLANT, one of his remedies for a certain cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Asthma, Liver Complaint, Nervous Affections, Coughs, Colds, &c. Having now made his fortune and retired from business, he will send the prescription and directions for preparing the medicine, free of charge, to all who apply. Those wishing to avail themselves of this great blessing, will please address the agent, inclosing a cent, to pay the return letter, with a description of their symptoms. The Old Doctor has spent more than a life-time in Consumption alone, and hopes all afflicted people will avail themselves of this opportunity. The Agent further wishes to do all the good he can before he dies. Address all letters to

CONSUMPTION CURED. DANIEL ADEE,
Box 338 New York City,
Who is his sole agent.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

DUPUY'S
NEW PERFUMES.

"The Mount Vernon Bouquet."
"The Perfect Gem."
"The Washington Nosegay."
"The Kiss-me-Quick."
Extracts of Fragrant Flowers, 40 Varieties.
Perfume Sets, Pomades, and Toilet Soaps.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist, 630 Broadway.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—
The Original and Genuine Article. Infinitely superior to all others. Prepared by A. SANDS, Druggist, of purely Vegetable Extracts, and may be taken all Seasons with perfect safety.

Prepared only by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

THE MISSIONARY IN MADAGASCAR.

Now ready, with 34cp and Illustrations from Photographs, and a Map, uniform with Livingstone's Travels. Muslin, Price $2 50.

THREE VISITS TO MADAGASCAR,
During the Years 1853—1856—1858. Including a Journey to the Capital. With Notices of the Natural History, Climate, and Productions of the Country, and of the Character, Customs, and Manners of the People. By Rev. WILLIAM ELLIS, F.R.A.S. Author of "Polynesian Researches," &c.

The questions opened out by this book are of such public interest as to warrant their use as a text-book in preaching for it a common scarcity reigned in the Island of Madagascar, and the missionaries, with their wives and children, botanical, political, or theological, to this excellent book and discussion.

A work abounding in matter of extraordinary interest, and which, as a book of travel in an unknown land, must be considered second only in importance to that of Livingstone. Even in this link-and-link personal style, it displays unities in himself the missionary, the man of science, the keen observer, and the social gentleman.—Athenæum.

The press was closed for the time to everything, with a knowledge of the Gospel, the outline of which was explained.—Colonial Journal.

Interesting throughout.—Literary Gazette.

Deeply affecting narrative of the simple piety and heroic fortitude of many of the Christians when exposed to slavery, torture, and death, in most truly modern times to the verzone itself. We feel assured that there are few who will not rise from the tale with a deeper impression on the spread of Christianity in the world, who will not feel more determined than ever to do their part in the great work.—Christian Observer.

A volume replete with interest, and illustrated by many highly characteristic engravings.—Church of England Magazine. Mr. Ellis has produced decidedly the best and most instructive work on the past publication on the subject of Madagascar and its all but unknown inhabitants.—The Press (London).

For men were better qualified for this visit to Madagascar than Mr. Ellis.—The Spectator (London).

Mr. Ellis is a zealous missionary—an active, intelligent observer, and a well-informed writer. Everything he says is worthy of attention, and is conducted either. In this handsome volume he has given us the result of his observations during three visits to Madagascar. We are disposed to the little known but very remarkable island of Madagascar, and we are glad to see with him a strong desire is illustrated by a number of portraits and views of scenery, which will add greatly to the interest of the work, having been photographed on the spot. Mr. Ellis was accompanied during his journey by a native artist, who every evening the events of the day; and that journal, thumbnailed and sketched in the form of letters, furnishes the materials for the present volume. It is a readable book, and will be found useful by those who wish to be authoritatively informed on the manners, customs, and prospects of Madagascar.—Athenæum.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 50.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

THE NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are attracting universal attention. In all essential good qualities they are much the best machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

EVERY YOUNG MAN SHOULD READ Arthur's Celebrated Sealed Volume, Advice to Young Men and Others. Address Dr. WALLIS & ASHTON, Box 1857, N. Y.

☞ EVERY NUMBER of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 128 pages—and therefore is the best volume reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
FOR MAY.

The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contain a mass of valuable and attractive reading than will be found in any other publication of the day.

At no period since the commencement of the Magazine has the literary material at its command been more ample and varied; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the Periodical for the past six months as evidence of the distinct claims upon the patronage of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

☞ The postage on HARPER'S MAGAZINE must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST KIND OF READING
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

[From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 18, 1859.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY is a first-class paper in all its characteristics and entertaining publication, issued during the past year with a degree of spirit and vigor which we have seldom seen surpassed. Its pictorial illustrations, the variety, the originality, and the value of its contributions, and the handsome style of execution, place it at the head of the press—there are ample dissertations on the leading topics of interest, and a judicious selection of miscellaneous matter, however, but profoundly instructive of the Lounger—a series of short, pithy, and sensible articles, which, in every way, &c—there are the records of jokes, new and old—and altogether, there are those striking evidences of the sensations of contemporary men and things, of fashion and fashions, and of the progress of the world, which are found within a single volume of a newspaper, and which, when bound together, make up the human life of the nineteenth century, in a form which will be valuable to the future. Every class of readers, moreover, may be interested by the variety of the HARPER'S WEEKLY, and every one must of business, the child and the woman.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY:

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
One Copy for Two Years	3 50
One Copy for Three Years	5 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.

THE POSTAGE on HARPER'S WEEKLY Costs a Line.

A Library Cabinet will be made for those wishing to preserve the Three Months' Numbers.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

TRYING, VERY.

DAGUERREIAN ARTIST. "Now, Sir, be so good as to fix your Eyes on that Painting, and assume a pleasing expression of Countenance.

FASCINATING GENT. (to precocious little Girl). "You are a very nice little Girl; you shall be my Wifey when you grow up!"

LITTLE GIRL. "No, thank you; I don't want to have a Husband; but Aunt Bessy does; I heard her say so!" [Sensation on the part of AUNT BESSY.

EARLY SPRING OPENING AT

GENIN'S

Ladies' and Childrens' Outfitting

BAZAAR,

513 Broadway,

AND

Genin's Hat Establishment,

507 Broadway,

Adjoining Genin's Bazaar.

I shall present, on this occasion, the most extensive assortments of Paris made and home-manufactured dress and undress attire, for ladies, misses, boys, and infants, which the facilities of a house, comprehending within its business sphere, every branch of fashionable costume can command. Nothing that can be required, for the complete outfit of a family of both sexes, from the infant in arms to the wife and mother, has been omitted from this attractive stock. The styles and goods in the following departments, exhibited for the first time on the 1st March, are now ready:

MILLINERY AND HEAD DRESSES,
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S CLOTHING,
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S HOSIERY,
LACES AND EMBROIDERIES,
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SHOES,
BOYS' CLOTHING,
GENTLEMEN'S AND BOYS' FURNISHING GOODS,
CHILDRENS' HEAD DRESSES,
BOYS' HATS AND CAPS,
PARASOLS AND UMBRELLAS,
GENTLEMEN'S HATS AND CAPS.

AT

New Hat Establishment,

507 Broadway, adjoining the Bazaar, in also now opened with a superb display of new modes in dress hats, caps, &c., of which the programme can not be compressed into an advertisement.

The hat store is connected internally with the extensive suit of rooms forming the bazaar.

J. N. GENIN.

Brown's Bronchial Troches

OR COUGH LOZENGES,

Cure Cough, Cold, Hoarseness and Influenza.

Any Irritation or Soreness of the Throat.

Brown's Bronchial Troches

Relieve the Hacking Cough in Consumption, Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Catarrh.

Brown's Bronchial Troches

Clear and strengthen the voice of Singers. Indispensable to Public Speakers.

Brown's Bronchial Troches

Soothing and Simple—Children use them. Assisting Expectoration and curing Hoarseness.

"Pre-eminently the first and best."
REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I recommend their use to Public Speakers."
REV. E. H. CHAPIN, NEW YORK.

"I have proved them excellent for Whooping Cough."
REV. H. W. WARREN, BOSTON.

"An old lady friend having tried many remedies for Asthma with no benefit, found great relief from the Troches."
REV. D. LETTS, FRANKFORT, ILL.

"Great benefit in affections of the Bronchial Organs."
DR. J. F. W. LANE, BOSTON.

"A simple and elegant combination for Coughs, &c."
DR. O. P. HOGELOW, BOSTON.

Sold by Druggists everywhere, 25 cents per box.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Vermin Kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is inestimable. In warm weather all insects terms with those annoying fees. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while assists the form of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by them, dried, and found a positive insect destroyer. Very recently this plant has been chemically prepared to resist the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous medical and horticultural colleges and societies.

Letter from the President of the U. S.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 21st Jan. 1853.

"MY LEARNED LYON.—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

"MILLARD FILLMORE, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

"NEW YORK, DECEMBER 1858.

"MR. LYON.—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to animal and domestic economy, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.

"JAMES G. CARTER, M.D., Chemist.
"LAURENCE REID, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital."

Mr. Jonas L. Ewen, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powders, and finds it of immense value."

Every gentleman and housekeeper must have a direct interest in an article of this kind: References can be made to Hon. Millard Fillmore, Ex-President of the United States; Hon. Daniel Webster, Gen. Winfield Scott, Gen. W. Tell, L. H. Frank, of the Five Points Mission, &c., &c. Judge Mason says, "This discovery of Prof. Lyon is of material importance." Mr. Spence's Club have tested it thoroughly. It will destroy bronze, grasshoppers, ants, moths, bugs, and all vermin. Garden plants can be preserved, and houses made pure."

Arrangements are now made through Messrs. BARNES & PARK, of New York, to have it sold throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!

"New York, November 8th, 1858.

"In selling from business, I have sold no other Insect Powders and Pills, Letters-Patent, and the secrets pertaining thereto, than Barnes & Park. This powder is a discovery made by myself, and brought from the interior of Asia, and is unknown to any other person. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name.

"T. LYON."

Rats and mice can not be reached by a powder, and established by a Magnetic Pill. Order them through any bookseller.

To Try Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
Ten Cent's Prize are issued for one Pill Slice.

Sample Pills, 25 cents; regular size, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions. Use freely and thoroughly.

BARNES & PARK

15 and 16 Park Row, New York.

Domestic Chemicals!

SALÆRATUS,

Manufactured at the Jersey City

CHEMICAL WORKS,

Warranted most reliable and the best in the Union.

The following are our brands:
"EXCELSIOR."
"DIDYMIC."
SUPERIOR DOUBLE REFINED,
"EXTRA REFINED FAMILY,"
AND SODA SAL-ÆRATUS.

It is put up in the neatest manner, in papers, boxes, kegs, or barrels, suitable for any trade.

Also the Jersey City Chemical Works

BI CARBONATE SODA,
Sal Soda, and Refined Soda Ash,
Uncolored in their respective

Dealers should buy of us if they want to save at least ten per cent. in price and quality.

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.
135 and 137 Cedar Street, near Wall, N. Y.

YOU SHOULD TAKE

THE METHODIST

Home to your MOTHER, WIFE,

SISTER,
Or FRIEND.

If you are a METHODIST, EPISCOPALIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, BAPTIST, CONGREGATIONALIST, UNITARIAN, or of any other denomination, take it home, for YOU WILL LIKE IT.

A fresh edition now ready, and for sale every where. THE METHODIST. By MIRIAM FLETCHER. With an Introduction by the Rev. W. P. Strickland. 2 vols. 12mo.—Price $2.

PICTURES OF COUNTRY LIFE.

ALICE CARY'S NEW BOOK

ALICE CARY'S NEW BOOK

ALICE CARY'S NEW BOOK

ALICE CARY'S NEW BOOK

ALICE CARY'S NEW BOOK

PICTURES OF COUNTRY LIFE.
By ALICE CARY.
1 Volume, 12mo. Price $1.

Copies of either of the above sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price, by DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

TESTIMONIAL.

BOSTON, July 19, 1857.

☞ MESSRS. J. BURNETT & CO. — I can not refuse to state the salutary effect in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil—Cocoaine.

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain complexe spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that others, similarly effected, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,
SUSAN R. POPE.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded by all who have used it to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.
For sale by dealers generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

U. STATES JUVENILE WAREHOUSE, 503 Broadway, by the St. Nicholas Hotel.
S. CHAMBERS has removed to the above establishment, where Ladies' and Children's Clothing of the Newest Styles and best material and workmanship are always on hand.

HOME
Insurance Company
OF
NEW YORK.
OFFICE 112 AND 114 BROADWAY.

THE Capital of this Company has recently been INCREASED BY A CASH SUBSCRIPTION OF $400,000, making the present Capital

ONE MILLION DOLLARS,

WITH

A Surplus in Addition of over $300,000.

This Company INSURES AGAINST LOSS OR DAMAGE BY FIRE, on terms as favorable as the future of the risk and the real security of the INSURED and of the Company will warrant.

Losses Equitably Adjusted and Promptly Paid.

DIRECTORS:

CHARLES J. MARTIN, President.
A. F. WILLMARTH, Vice President.
WM. G. LAMBERT, late of A. & A. Lawrence & Co.
GEORGE C. COLLINS, firm of Sherman, Collins & Co.
DANFORD N. BARNEY, firm of Wells, Purge & Co.
LUCIUS HUTCHINSON,
President Importers' and Traders' Bank.
THOMAS MESSENGER, firm of T. & H. Messenger.
WILLIAM H. MULLEN, firm of Claflin, Mullen & Co.
CHAS. B. HATCH, firm of Hatch, Hilter & Merryman.
B. WATSON RILL, firm of Haskell, Merrick & Hall.
HOMER MORGAN.
LEVI P. STONE, ... firm of Stone, Starr & Co.
JAMES HUMPHREY,
late firm of Burney, Humphrey & Butler.
GEORGE PEABODY, ... firm of George Peabody & Co.
WARD A. WORK, ... firm of Ward A. Work & Son.
JAMES LOW, firm of James Low & Co., of Louisville.
T. H. FROTHINGHAM,
late firm of T. H. Frothingham & Co.
CHARLES A. BULKLEY, ... firm of Bulkley & Co.
CEPHAS H. NORTON, ... firm of Norton & Jewett.
ROE LOCKWOOD, ... firm of R. Lockwood & Son.
THEODORE MCNAMEE,
late firm of Bowen, McNamee & Co.
RICHARD BIGELOW,
firm of Doane, King & Co., of St. Louis.
CURTIS NOBLE, ... firm of Condit & Noble.
GEORGE D. MORGAN, ... firm of E. D. Morgan & Co.
OLIVER E. WOOD, ... firm of Willard, Wood & Co.
ALFRED S. BARNES, ... firm of A. S. Barnes & Burr.
GEORGE BLISS, ... firm of Phelps, Bliss & Co.
AMOS T. DWIGHT, ... firm of Trowbridge, Dwight & Co.
SEAMAN COOKE, ... firm of Cooke, Dowd, Baker & Co.
LEVI P. MORTON, ... firm of Morton, Grinnell & Co.
J. B. HUTCHINSON,
firm of J. C. Hoyt & Co., of Boston.
CHARLES P. BALDWIN, ... firm of Baldwin, Starr & Co.
JOHN G. NELSON, ... late firm of Nelson & Co.
HENRY A. HURLBUT, ... firm of Swift, Hurlbut & Co.
JESSE HOYT, ... firm of Jesse Hoyt & Co.
WM. STURGIS, Jr., ... firm of Sturgis, Shaw & Co.
JOHN B. FORD, ... firm of Ford Rubber Co.
SIDNEY MASON,
late of the firm of Mason & Thompson.
GEO. T. STEBBINS,
firm of Stebbins, Carlile & Shaw, of Cincinnati.
CYRUS YALE, Jr.,
firm of Cyrus Yale, Jr. & Co., of New Orleans.
WM. H. FORDICK,
firm of Wm. R. and Chas. B. Fordick.
DAVID I. BOYD,
firm of Boyd, Bros. & Co., Albany, N. Y.
F. H. COSSITT,
firm of Cossitt, Hill and Talmadge, Memphis.
LEWIS ROBERTS, ... firm of L. Roberts & Co.
SAMUEL R. CALDWELL, ... firm of Hoyer & Caldwell.

CHARLES J. MARTIN, President.
A. F. WILLMARTH, Vice-Pres't.
J. HILTON SMITH, Secretary.
JOHN McGEE, Ass't. Secretary.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 117.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

In the number after next of this journal we shall commence

A New Serial Story,

ENTITLED

TRUMPS.

BY

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

ILLUSTRATED BY

AUGUSTUS HOPPIN.

A perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the day.

No other publication gives SO MUCH AND SO CHOICE MATTER, or so fully illustrated a history of the times in which we live.

More money is paid to AMERICAN ARTISTS AND ENGRAVERS for illustrating this publication than for illustrating any other paper in the United States.

This is the CHEAPEST AND BEST family illustrated newspaper in the country.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective — because THEY MEET THE EYE OF MORE PEOPLE throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West — than advertisements in any other publication.

We refer families to our printed list of terms on the fifteenth page of each paper. By forming clubs, people in the country can obtain the paper on very advantageous terms.

THE WRECK OF THE "ADONIS."

On 7th inst. the ship Adonis went ashore, shortly before midnight, at Long Branch. A correspondent of the Monmouth Democrat gives the following thrilling description of the manner in which the crew were saved:

"Mr. Green, the station-keeper, was on the spot the following morning with a crew of wreckers. They launched the surf-boat, boarded the ship, and brought the captain ashore. The captain insisted upon returning to the ship, but, the wind bruising up, it was found impossible to do so, so upon the second attempt the surf-boat was filled. All haste was then made to shoot a line over the vessel; the first attempt the line did not reach the ship; the second the line parted; and the third was successful. A large line was then secured to the ship, and then a hawser, which was properly made fast to the mainmast head. The crew soon understood the working of the life-car upon the hawser, and five of them landed the first voyage to the shore. The life-car was again dispatched upon its errand of mercy; this time, better satisfied, six of them got into the car, but, when within about thirty yards of the shore, the line attached to the shore end of the car gave way. Then there was a universal shout of agony, the men on the beach running to and fro. There was quite a number of ladies present, who, as they looked upon the scene, turned from it with a shudder. Thus the car was at one moment upon the top of a large wave, and at another in the trough of the sea. The daring and impulsive boat's crew could not stand tamely by and see a car-load of human beings in this doubtful condition, but rushed in up to their armpits, seized the car, and brought it ashore. The name of Joseph West and his crew should be written in letters of gold upon the record of the Life-Saving Association. Upon examination it was found that the ring-bolt on the end of the life-car, to which the shore end of the line was attached, was imperfect, and that the breakage was easily accounted for. The damage was repaired, and again the car was dispatched, and the remaining seven were soon upon the beach."

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Why our Correspondent could not go to the Washington Ball—Terrible consequence of marrying a Bricklayer—Gayeties in Paris and New York—Acquisitions of the Columbus for the Capitol—American Patrons of Art—the Tourtelot Gallery—Chairs at $50 apiece—A Marriage in Franco-American Life—Cunning Bulls—Sudden Death at Dinner, etc., etc.

PARIS, February 24, 1859.

I AM not able in any way to carry out my intentions in regard to my letter of this week, for I had purposed giving you a detailed account of the Washington Ball at the Hotel du Louvre, day before yesterday, with a catalogue raisonnée of the company, the beauties, and their dresses. Though suffering since Sunday from an attack of (shall I confess it?) terrible gout, I was still confident of being able to supply my own deficiencies by the aid of a kind friend and countrywoman, who is in the midst of all gay doings, and who has a quick imagination and holds a lively pen. Imagine my mortification and the failing away of my hopes under the perusal of the following letter, just received from her:

"MON PAUVRE GODTFEET,—I am sorry for you in all ways; but I can tell you nothing about this ball, for I was not invited to it. I hear it was an exclusive Assemblée for the Americans sort of an affair, and I suppose my right was barred by my being married to 'a bloody Britisher,' and that I had no chance of being there unless I had petitioned to be admitted as 'the Fair Penitent,' in my crinoline only, in order to avow my fault and express my contrition for this said marriage. But, you see, they are punished, for they have lost their chance of having their sayings and doings chronicled by you, through me, and I that of knowing myself in print, which I should have much enjoyed. I do pity you, poor caged weekly correspondent, obliged to make bricks without straw, and pushing in the midst of plenty: for never, I think, was Paris in a state of more determined gayety. The feverish political condition seems to stimulate social desires. The Faubourg St. Germain for long years have not danced as this winter, and the fonctionaries of Government and the lambs flemen seem disposed to imitate them in this respect, while their dinners are, in truth, never-ending. Did you need have no regrets at not being able to make the New Yorkers jealous by a description of the carnival pleasures here; for, from what I hear, they are indulging in plenty of their own. For, not being able to find more than six nights in the week in which to dance, they have taken to morning (bis demands), and those who a year ago were in the lowest depths of moneyed depression are now vying with each other as to who shall spend most on their varied entertainments."

THE WRECK OF THE "ADONIS."

Here ends my fair correspondent's assistance, which I am bound to reward by giving her the pleasure she wished of seeing herself in print.

I see in the newspapers, in a correspondence which seems to be creditable to all the parties concerned, that Mr. Mason has accepted for the Capitol the model of the fine statue which the Marquis de Brignolles has erected to the memory of "the great Genoese." It seems difficult to account for the seeming neglect of all America for that grand old genius, Columbus, unless it is explained by the fact that we have view of his services as was done by an American lady, whom I once heard laughingly exclaim, when something of this kind was said in her presence—"After all, I do not know why we are bound to be so very grateful to Christopher Columbus; for, if it had not been for him, we might all have lived and died in Paris!"

Apropos of art of all sorts, I have been pleased, lately, to hear Americans spoken of as among the most liberal and enlightened patrons of art in the present day; and I believe that the inhabitants of the "Golden Fountains" in this city, which, by the testamentary dispositions of the founder, will be disposed of in another seven years, will look to Americans as likely to acquire many of the finest pecuniary treasures, both in ancient and modern painting.

I went there lately to accompany my friend Frank, as I wish him to form his taste a little, and acquire some familiarity with the names of the various masters, as a preparation for his projected tour in Italy next month. I had not been there for several years before, and had forgotten how rich in this Gallery in beautiful things: and it is remarkable, on showing what taste and refinement may effect, even without any very enormous expenditure.

Among the older pictures there are two very fine large Murillos, and some smaller ones. There is a beautiful "Madonna" of Leonardo da Vinci, some Carlo Dolces: and one of the loveliest heads of Greuze, which has been engraved under the name of "Filial Piety." Then there are several of the productions of the modern French artists, which were purchased for Count de Morny's gallery, with which the print shops in New York have probably made you familiar, as the engravings are said to be copies. There are Delaroche's celebrated pictures of "Richelieu conveying Cinque Mars to Prison," and "The Pendant" of "Richelieu at the Louvre," also his "St. Cecilia," and Horace Vernet's "Trumpeter." Besides the pictures, there is a valuable collection of Greek and Roman antiquities, etc., and a quantity of superb ivory carvings of the sixteenth century. Now, I am sure, there will be here in a few years capital pickings for your subscribers; and I should not at all think they would be inclined to make the acquisition of objects which will not only tend to refine their own taste, but that of those who come after them. It is better than mere gorgeous furniture.

"My chairs, in my house in Broadway, one in another, cost me fifty dollars apiece," I once heard one New Yorker say to another across the table of a hotel at Interlaken, astonishing with this intelligence a party of English who sat near him.

I thought to myself then, "For that sum you might have a copy of some of the master-pieces of the galleries you daily visit here, and, at the same time, cause the new artist's heart to bound for joy, and carry away with you something to look at when seated in your gilded chairs."

Frank, who came to see me just now, has told me of a marriage to be—error a flirtation that is going on in the Parisian-American circles of the young man, good-looking and pleasing, and the only son of a rich mother, and the young lady a distinguished beauty, who has been immensely admired, the last year or two, in the aristocratic circles of London and Paris. Miss Forrest is certainly very lovely, with virile, Oriental-looking eyes, an exquisite skin, and a splendid, luxuriant figure. There was for a time a Spanish Duke among her admirers, whose success would have pleased grandmamma Grandissime, if he was not quite intralled; but as he has paid the same court to all the most beautiful of the girls of the last twenty years, one felt tolerably certain that this one had not more real chance than others of becoming Duchess of ——. Now, the young lady is supposed to be very decided in her preference for her American suitor; and, judging from externals, they seem really well-paired and well-matched.

If the tyrant gout allows, I shall have half a score of astonishing fêtes to relate to you next week. Among them will be a ball at Madame Duchatel's, which is certain to be as perfect as a fête hotel, a company the most chosen, good taste, and great wealth can make it; and the young lady's ball costumé at Madame Walewska's, which are always what one of their kind, given by persons often has the superior pleasure of being elbowed by imperial personages, who, secure in the domino's disguise, amuse themselves enough in evening to make amends for the many dull Court balls they are expected to attend. Then the strange story could be told of the freaks of our great people under the mask.

The making of dominoes reminds me of a very sad event, which has thrown a gloom over Paris society—that is, the sudden death of Count Walewski,—whom I mentioned in one of my letters as one of those, in a morning visit, who seemed to me pressed with the horror of sudden death. Poor man, it soon came his turn! He died at his club, "The Union," at dessert; and he had just said to his neighbor at table, "As there are to be so many bals costumés, I have just had a new domino made;" when the other replied, "Do you expect your new domino to drop from the ceiling, that you look at it so fixedly?" Alas! it was the Ex-odious of death! The poor Prince —— never spoke again!

A registry law, with a law imposing a penalty of $25 on every citizen who failed to vote at elections, would have the effect of taking the political supremacy out of the hands of the fowdies, and placing it in the hands of the majority of the people, who are in all communities friends of law and order. It will probably come to this at last.

THE SICKLES CASE.

By the time this paper is laid before the public, Daniel E. Sickles, member of Congress from New York, will probably be on his trial for the murder of P. Barton Key, late District Attorney of the District of Columbia. There appears to be no doubt as to the result of the trial. If a guilty connection of Mr. Key with Mrs. Sickles be proved, it is difficult to expect that any jury will find Mr. Sickles guilty.

His offense may not be justifiable in the eye of strict morality. The infirmity of our human blood, even in obedience to legal sentence, is by many deemed inexcusable; the means to which these persons of unbending allegiance rises so far above common rules of human law and practice that mere vulgar humanity may how reverently before, but can not undertake to explain it. Practice, however, has established, not only in this country, but in France and Ireland likewise, that the husband and the seducer may be slain with impunity by the best friend of the woman they have misled. But that the latter is to be admitted as palliable, but that the original evil-doer is rightly punished. Nobody wants to shake hands with Jack Ketch; yet hanging is in weakness as a preventive of crime.

The brilliant and graphic correspondent of the New York Times, who is understood to be none other than the clever Irish exile, Mr. O'D. Shea, has given us, in numerous various cases in which adulterers have been killed with impunity by outraged husbands. Had this admirable writer been a woman, and a country or a longer period of time, he would not have needed to go abroad for precedents for acquittal by a husband who killed his wife's seducer. The counsel for Mr. Sickles will, without any extraordinary labor, be enabled to lay before Judge Crawford a score of cases in various states of the Union from Maine to Louisiana, in which juries have refused to render verdicts against husbands who have vindicated their honor by slaying the seducers of their wives.

Nor can there be much doubt of the issue in Mr. Sickles's case. He is a politician, and remained. With that we have nothing to do. The slaying of a fellow-creature may be indefensible under any circumstances. At this point we do not feel bound to express any opinion; it is a question which may be safely left to the religious and moral teachers of the community. It is enough for us that we record the fact that the legal practice in this country will secure impunity to any husband who, on conclusive evidence, takes the life of the destroyer of his domestic peace.

Those who prefer to read the arguments in favor of hanging Mr. Sickles will find them, rather briefly put, in that excellent journal, the Evening Post; those who wish to see his side of the case will discover it in various journals which support his party. To state the facts simply is enough for us.

THE PROSPECT OF WAR IN EUROPE.

THE Pope has notified the Emperors of France and Austria that he is eminently grateful for the aid which they rendered him in the recovery of his territory for the last six or eight years, but that now he feels competent to undertake the charge of his own dominions. He says that the French Emperor testifies his willingness to withdraw from Rome so soon as the Austrians retire from the Legations. The Austrians hesitate.

The reason is very simple. The Papal dominions are filled with active republicans who are only withheld from rebellion by military control. So soon as the French and Austrians depart it is highly possible that the Papal authorities may break out, and take the field, not only against the Pope, but against the despotisms of Italy and dynasties of every hue. With an active revolutionary movement in the Legations, the neighbor-states would be in a hot haste. Just so the Austrians, knowing the slender tenure of their hold on the Milanese, and the eagerness of the people to rebel, can only be expected to take any step which may naturally lead to a revolutionary movement in the country which borders on Austrian Italy.

It is understood, however, that the Governments of Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia concur in pressing on Austria the necessity of putting an end to the anomalous position of affairs in the Papal States. Lord Cowley, it is said, has gone to Vienna with instructions to say to the Emperor of Austria that, in the event of his declining to evacuate the Legations, France will have the moral, if not the active support of all the other great nations in operating against Austrian domination in Italy. If this be so, there can be no doubt of the result. Austria must yield. The tax of an outpost in Lombardo Venetia may be inconsiderable, but no single power can afford to cope single-handed with all the rest of Europe. Therefore, Lord Cowley's mission is correctly represented by the European journals, we may safely expect to hear of the evacuation of the Papal dominions by the Austrians, and of the Episcopal Rome and the Legations, and the peace of the world will henceforth depend upon the temper of the Roman people. A slender dependence at best!

COTTON KING INDEED.

THE cotton crop of the United States this year will probably exceed 3,900,000 bales. This crop will be worth, at 10 cents a bale, a thing of York money a pound. The better qualities are at this moment in demand in New Orleans at 12 and 12 cents. Since this country has grew cotton there never was a year when the field was so large or the profit so enormous. When it is borne in mind that, on the average, cents a pound will remunerate the planter for cotton that will be worth twice as much, some idea may be formed of the wealth which the South will acquire this year.

It will be safe to say that an astounding development of industry and agriculture throughout the South. What the enormous crops of 1853 and 1854 did for the West the enormous crop of 1857 and 1858 will do for the South. Southern railroads and steamboats will soon begin to take place of Western steamers and railroads in store in our markets. Whatever is Southern will be in favor. The effect of the great increase of Southern wealth on the slavery controversy will be worth watching.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE GORILLA QUESTION.

BOSTON, March 7, 1859.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

THE article is, in the main, sensible, though interesting and timely, does not do justice to American authors and specimens.

The gorilla was first introduced to the scientific world in August, 1847, by Dr. Savage, an American resident in Africa, and was described to the external characters and habits of the creature in Vol. V. of the Boston Journal of Natural History, p. 417. In that article it was described as being "man in a scrimed stone skulls, and several bones of the spine and extremities of the body," the description, comparing the gorilla with the chimpanzee and with man. This was before Mr. Owen's papers on the subject.

It is not exact to say that only a skull of this creature exists in museums of the Academy of Natural Science of Philadelphia, and has been partly described in the "Proceedings."

So that not only was the first scientific description made in Boston, but that city and Philadelphia are the only museums that have more than one specimen whose habits and anatomy were understood by the naturalists of America shortly twelve years ago. The "most learned professors of Great Britain" will not do much, if any, more than was done in this country long ago.

I am led to make the communication to show that American naturalists are not behind the times as well as in politics and money-making. Now that we have the first of living zoologists among us, it is to be hoped that the eyes of the people will be turned toward our native naturalists and their achievements, which are unappreciated, or lamentedly stolen abroad, and pursued amidst the neglect and almost the scorn of the worshipers of the "Almighty Dollar."

The proposed establishment of the great Museum of Zoology at Cambridge will do much to educate the people to the value and necessity of those studies connected with the origin and laws of animated life. SAMUEL KNEELAND, JR.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

TROY, NEW YORK, 19th February, 1859.

IN Harper's Weekly of the 26th February, 1859, I find the following article:

"We all read the other day the story of a Troy bank President who brought to this city a Troy bank President who brought to this city a Troy bank twenty thousand dollars of counterfeit bills on his own bank, without suspecting their genuineness."

I write to say that in your sheet "the story" was first presented to me; that the story is not true in any particular, but unqualifiedly false so far as it relates to myself and the State Bank of Troy.

I think, and I sincerely hope, that upon mature reflection you will be disposed, in justice to us, to centralist the story as broadly as you have given it circulation. Respectfully yours, ALFRED WOTKYNS, President.

☞ We are inclined to think that, "upon mature reflection," Mr. Wotkyns will conclude that he has allowed his fire to be drawn rather precipitately. His bank has never been insolvent, and Weekly. Will it not be time enough for him to indicate himself when he is assailed?—Ed. H. W.

WHO INVENTED THE STARS AND STRIPES?

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

QUERO. February, 1859.

I ASK this occasion to send you the following extract from "Sherry's Pictorial" (1 Vol. 1719 on my possession), of the poligees of a branch of the family of Washington. There is a very close coincidence between the arms and the national flag of the United States—singular, because I have never yet, in the various printed notices on the subject, seen one that alluded to this as the origin, if it really was so, of the stars and stripes:

"Mr. Robert Washington, an eminent merchant, lived and died at Andrew Hill, near Leeds, though buried in a distant parish. His son, Joseph Washington, of Gray's Inn, Esq., is to be remembered by these his authors. He was descended from those of his name at Sidwich, on the Street, near Dorchester, where the family yet remains. Their arms WASHINGTON were—Argent, two bars and three mullets, in chief Gules."*

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
J. G. CLAPHAM.

A GROAN FROM A SUFFERING SUBSCRIBER.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

* * * Mamma and I both write to remonstrate with you on the engravings which you are publishing. We don't want to be gone any more pictures of murders or mad-houses. Baby burst into tears at the sight of the maniacs, and I have dreamed three times that Dow the Independent were cutting my throat.

You are fond of showing pictures of lambs and shepherdesses with crooks, and sweet autumn scenes with lovers sitting on hay-cocks, and little tottering birds, and graceful girls with their arms round each other. I mean pleasant pictures that Baby could look at without waking, and that would not scare me and mamma something delightful to dream about! Mamma says that when she was a girl her papa used to subscribe to a paper which was called, she thinks, The Lady's Own Anodyne—in which she says she used to delight to look. You never had her in the least, and over which she enjoyed the sweetest sleep. Pray, dear Mr. Editor, get this old paper, and try to imitate it.

Papa has been for years a subscriber to the Weekly Tribune, which puts him to sleep every night; but when we get your Weekly, he remains awake till midnight, which, you will admit, is very annoying. Even poor dear mamma sometimes sits up in her night-cap to read your stories.

Why can't you follow the example of Mr. Greeley—the dear old creature—and give us long proy stories to set us asleep? I have read what you say about being obliged to give interest, and that is all nonsense. Mr. Greeley doesn't worry us by giving us news. He likes to put us to sleep, and he does it very well; and the sooner you follow his example the better you will please your devoted

ANNA MARIA.

THE LOUNGER.

DISTINCTIONS AND DIFFERENCES.

A special contributor to a journal—like the lounger, for instance—has certain great advantages. The chief one is, perhaps, that he can express his own opinion without affecting the proper position of the paper. The editorial responsibility of course nobody knows that fifty different people prepare a newspaper. Nobody knows that the man who writes the leading article on the financial and theatrical articles, and the agricultural and literary articles, and the paragraphs of fashion and the letters from all parts of the world, is not the same individual. Every body, on the contrary, is perfectly aware that Mr. Nicholas Pike Raymond, who lectured in Iowa last evening, also wrote the leader in this morning's paper. Nobody is not the Times Raymond's paper? and the Tribune Greeley's paper?

Now the special contributor is the lucky person who speaks solely for himself. His views are not those of "the paper." You say yours or disagree with him as much as you please. He is isolated in his individuality, and shivers in his solitude. His "we" carries no magisterial weight. The nearest tyro in newspaper reading is not taken in by it. The intelligent reader does not say to you when he reads, in the special department, "If I think that a European war is going to break out, indeed?" means the intelligent reader; "why, it's only Saunders!"

Yet every special contributor enjoys that very solitude in which he shivers. He is a man sitting at his own window and making his own comments upon the world. If James Buchanan, President of the United States, living officially in the White House, says, "I think I must have Cuba!" Will Street stops shinning a moment, and fails to thinking. But if James Buchanan, a farmer of Pennsylvania, living quietly at Wheatlands, say, "I think I must have Cuba," Wall Street doesn't even hear him. And yet it is the same James Buchanan.

So with the special contributor. When you, most kind and courteous reader, deign to attend your next lecture, in glancing at the particulars you know that you are reading the opinions of Chilion—a mere subordinate of the intelligent Free and Happy! But when you turn your eyes upon the other page at the left, then you know that you are not in Wheatlands but at Washington—that you are perusing not an individual but an official paper.

The Lounger gossips on this page; Harper's Weekly speaks on that.

A SIMPLE QUESTION.

If the honorable Chief Justice of Attorney for this or any other district in the country should be shot by a cashier as he was making off with the proceeds of a check which he had forged—if the cashier should be abound him working at his silver-suits by the light of a dark-lantern, and by a former system which he had just succeeded in landing into a light blaze—and the honorable District Attorney thus stood before us the world as a forger, a burglar, or an incendiary, would his successor probably feel that the gravity of the latter would be increased, or the criminality and decency benefited by his saying to the tor in open court, "By most of us he was known and cherished as a man of principle and honor. On the just keeping of such he has left the most sacred of all human trusts—the honor of his name."

Of his faults let us not, at least now, speak. Who has them not? Now that his son has gone down, let his faults rest at the splendor of his fall than at the shadows which clustered its glory.

I move that the memory of the deceased do court be now adjourn."

Would the presiding judge then probably rebuke in sympathetic terms, a slipcorn the court?

But if a decent public sentiment would feel itself outraged by such office-seekers as the perjury of a burglar, a forger, or an incendiary, suddenly cut off in his career, what would probably be a much more shocking thing had the same history had been paid to the memory of a man whom that public sentiment believed to have by his own hands only destroyed for a greater crime than arson or forgery?

And who answers—What?

A LITTLE TALL.

EVERY busy time writes in a journal must take some interest in Mr. Senator Ely's bill introduced into the Legislature to authorize the county treasurer and office-holders to settle their little differences through the friendly means of chairs, canes, clubs, fists, bolts, or whatever other convenient missiles may be at hand.

The bill originates, represents, in part, the city of New York, at Albany. He is what is termed in rather lordly, and consequently loose, language, a "self-made man." Self-made, indeed! But popularity is weaned of his function—and who can be surprised?—now that the legislature is considering it for the abolition of law.

It is unquestionably the easiest way. It makes short work of human society, which Mr. Senator Ely evidently considers a failure, instead of the glorious success that it is. It makes the office-holders being scoundrels, rascals, and gents at once—reasons Mr. Senator Ely—being, in fact, the bon-constructors, the anacondas, the cobras di capello, the lions, unicorns, and Kilkenny cats of society, it is high time we have them let out together and, under Divine favor, to extermination.

To be sure Mr. Senator Ely does not make his little bill quite fair. He allows the office-holders to attack each other indiscriminately, but the full officers think they have been libeled, but he does not allow the editors the same privilege. Mr. Senator Ely, for instance, declare his conviction that Mr. Wood was an able and incorruptible magistrate. Mr. Wood may, according to Mr. Senator Ely, pommel Mr. Bennett to his heart's content, and Mr. Bennett may not retaliate. Mr. Wood should assert in private circles, or cause to be placarded upon public walls, his opinion that Mr. Bennett is a pure, high-minded, honorable gentleman, according to Mr. Senator Ely, except the fists and cudgel process is still left legal.

But any slight partiality should be gladly pardoned to a bill whose operation would necessarily fill all public offices with Bowery and Dead-rabbit, and also silence the Press. The great practical difficulty in such a measure is that it would not be worth of a little more corruption. Public virtue is all very well, but why should public officers be so very much more virtuous than the rest of us, pray? In this world we must be practical. Let us have fewer assaults and less perjury and more fairs. Why not take men as they come, and put them into office, even if they do smoke one cigar a day? Why also not legislate for cleanliness, or do, upon having seen to administer our affairs who will not be bribed, and who will always promptly attend to the smallest detail of their duty without a fee of a hundred dollars? Sagne is good, but it is too cumbersome. It has been tried and with us there. In this manner we must insist upon disturbing the tranquility of the public virtue.

Mr. Senator Ely, friend of man, proposes to follow the dictates of common sense in this matter, by making it easier for blackguards to bruise their way into office, and to break the heads of all citizens who call public attention to the fact.

A VALEDICTION.

A WEEK or two since the Rev. Dr. Gannett preached the last sermon in the old Federal Street Meeting-house in Boston previous to the destruction of the old building and the removal of the society to another part of the city.

This old, dingy brick church, with its feeble spire, had a peculiar, an unequaled historic interest as the scene of the preaching of the celebrated William Ellery Channing. Dr. Channing died seventeen years ago; but his influence will never die out of American social and intellectual development.

He was in point of time the father of that liberal intellectual movement in this country which is the direct result of the Protestant Reformation, and is peculiarly sympathetic with the American character and civilization. That "Peace on earth, good will to men," which is the substantial aim of the Christian or humanitarian movement in all its forms, was the soul of his preaching as it was the life of him. The contemporary theology of American thought, whatever creed they may profess, or to whatever party they belong, are mainly his disciples. And the tendency of our civilization, in its broad and benignant humanity, is the natural development of the great principles for which his name will be always associated.

A shy valetudinarian—a man of delicate perceptions, of exquisite and almost dainty tastes, and of a lofty and invincible moral heroism—a retiring scholar, a faithful friend, living at once out in our social society, nothing was so dear to him as his own profound meditation of God, and he strove, not with a simple, glowing eloquence which captivated even those whom it did not convince, while it carried the conviction often almost by force to the subtlety of its grasp upon the most hoary intellects.

As time passes and the earlier part of this century becomes more illustrious while it recedes, as great Ideas become more imposing when you trace away from it, the influence of Dr. Channing upon the moral life of the world will be more plainly discerned. Many a thought which stands symmetrical in the lyrical line of our wisest thinker, like a perfect rose in a garden, was a germ dropped from that rich soil by Dr. Channing. Many a human impulse which, with the direct eloquence of an utterance by our most popular orator, shakes the hearts of thousands of men and women, arose originally from the heart of Dr. Channing. How many a man hereafter will seek in vain, and grieve that he can not see, the building consecrated in our history by the presence and voice of such a teacher!

It is a remarkable coincidence, which history will not forget, that on the other side of the street on which the name of Dr. Channing is given, the palace of the Bishop of the Roman Catholics of Boston. One of the new churches of that faith, and the future, touched so nearly upon Puritan soil! And that some history will not forget the general tendency of the fact that the leaders of the old and the new were both full of the love which is the fulfilling of law, and repentance of sin.

The good Cardinal Cheverus was for a long time Catholic Bishop of Boston while Dr. Channing was a prominent Unitarian minister. Dr. Channing up was summoned home to France and a cloud of enthusiasm filled the streets of Bordeaux as he passed with only the trunk which twenty-seven years before he had brought to America. His house, the church, and his familiar converse, he gave to his diocese, and his history to his episcopal successors. It has been said that Dr. Channing's name would solicit a comparison between himself and the declared Cheverus.

Who can help regretting that the necessities of our expanding cities gradually obliterate the places hallowed by great men?

THE LOUNGER'S LITTER-BOX.

—L. M., Austinburg, Ohio, who wishes to know where and when Longfellow and Poe were born, and where Hemans was married, will find the information in Duyckinck's Cyclopedia of American Literature and Chambers's English Literature.

—W. W. M. M., Salem, Indiana, who wishes "if Harpers to put some cuts of their establishment in the Weekly," and according a charming little sentiment, profusely illustrated, in one of Abbott's Story Books.

—A WELL WISHER, New York, should have signed his name to his note, or else have made the initials serve to conceal the initials stamped upon the corner of his paper! If he writes a book which he accordingly sends in the corner of his thinks "good" in a business point of view, he will have no difficulty in making a favorable bargain with the publishers. It is no matter what kind of book it is, so he be morally correct. The Harpers have published a book which the Bishop reveals in the form he describes, the price varying from two to eight shillings. It is not possible to say what the price of your book will make a printed page without knowing the size of the manuscripts and of the page.

—Common humanity insists upon the concealment of the name and residence of the writer of the following letter:

"MR. LOUNGER.—Please, sir, tell me the feminine termination of Julius Cæsarius, for I have found many in whom the name would be very applicable. Even with my extensive acquaintance I have found only Julius Cæsarius and Jemima, I think, very applicable.

"Yours, &c."

—W. V. A., Detroit, Michigan, wishes to know if the Lounger were correct in calling Guy, Earl of Warwick, "the King-Maker." Certainly not; it was a ship. The nursery hero, and slayer of the dun cow took the put of Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, and King-Maker.

—BUTE HAYES, Ravenscroft, Georgia. No, madam, the Lounger never saw the verses before, nor does he think them very fine. Bonland is, undoubtedly, dead.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY EVENING, March 19, 1859.

THE week has been less active than usual in business and monetary circles. The import of Dry Goods is scarcely larger than that of the corresponding week of 1858. Merchandise generally is quiet.

There is increased ease in the money market. Call loans are offered to the brokers at 4 per cent., and first-class short acceptances are done at 5; 4 and 6 months' paper at 6 @ 7. Exchange on London continues firm, at rates which allow the shipment of specie.

The Stock Exchange has been active in speculation, and the bears constitute a majority of the board.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, March 19, 1859.

THE WHOLESALE TRADE in Dry Goods is rather quiet for the principal kinds of breadstuffs during the week. The usual assortment of Spring goods is coming to hand in small lots.

Groceries have been tolerably active, and prices have been very well sustained. Provisions have been in fair request, and firm, bringing rather higher rates.

Ashes, Beeswax, Dry Codfish, Hay, Tobacco, and Wool have been in moderate request, and generally sustained.

Naval Stores have declined slightly, and with more offering, while Sole Leather has been in demand at steady prices. Chocolate stocks of Dry Goods have been offered rather sparingly at very full rates. The demand for Hardware has been brisk. Prices at the close of week's imports of Dry Goods has been $733,792 against $647,417 the same week last year. The total imports for January I have been $17,590,977 against $11,367,709 same time last year. The exports in other articles of domestic have not been productive of any remarkable changes.

The following are the closing rates of Cattle, Sheep, and Swine in the New York market:

Common Steers, per 100 lbs.	$4 75	@ $5 00
Common State Heifers, per head	30 00	35 00
Superfine to Extra Western, per barrel	5 55	@ 6 10
Western Canal, barrel	4 70	@ 5 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	5 80	@ 6 00
Ohio, common to fancy	5 00	@ 5 75
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	6 75	@ 8 75
Rye flour, fine to superfine, per bbl.	4 50	@ 4 75
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 75	@ 4 85
Wheat, Chicago Spring	1 40	@ 1 45
Wheat, Milwaukee Club	1 45	@ 1 50
Mixed Western Corn, per bushel	65	@ 65
Yellow Corn	67	@ 68
Rye, per bushel	88	@ 90
Barley, per bushel	80	@ 85
Western Oats, per bushel	40	@ 43
Canada Oats, per bushel	43	@ 45
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	51	@ 53
Barley, per bushel	80	@ 85
Cotton, middlings, per pound	11	@ 11
Hay, per 100 lbs.	77 1/2	@ 80
Prime Pork, per barrel	13 50	@ 13 50
Mess Pork, per barrel	15 25	@ 15 50
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	14 50	@ 14 50
Lard, per pound	11@	12
Western Bacon, per pound	10	@ 10
Western Butter, per pound	10	@ 17
Ohio, fine, per pound	14	@ 15
Rice, per 100 pounds	$ 3 25	@ 4 50
Tallow, per pound	10	@ 10
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6@	7
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	30	@ 32
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	6@	8
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	30	@ 32
Cuba Coffee, per pound	10	@ 10
Oolong Teas, per pound	30	@ 65
Gunpowder Teas, per pound	40	@ 60
Hops, new, per pound	10	@ 15
Hops, old, per pound	10	@ 15
Hay, per 100 pounds	65	@ 80
Straw, per 100 pounds		@
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	$ 3 75	@ 3 93
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	43	@ 43
Tar, per barrel	$ 2 25	@ 2 50
Rosin, common, per 280 pounds	3 00	@ 3 00
Rosin, fine, per 280 pounds	3 00	@ 3 00
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	9@	18
Seed Leaf, per pound	9@	18
American Fleece Wool, per pound	43@	48
Pulled, per pound	40@	43
Am. Yellow Bronze, per pound	39	@ 40
Am. Refined Bronze, per pound	40	@ 41
Iron Gone Fashion, per pound	40	@ 41
Iron Gone Fashion, per pound	4 @	4 1/2
Large No. 1 Sheeted, per bolt	10 00	@ 15 00
Large No. 1 Unsheeted, per bolt	10 00	@ 15 00
Am. Hemp, unbleached, per ton	160 00	@ 162 50
Am. Hemp, unbleached, per ton	160 00	@ 170 00
Clover Seed, per pound	10	@ 11
Timothy Seed, per bushel	2 75	@ 2 75

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were somewhat depressed by the arrival of Drovers. Much stock on hand is limited demand, and were heavy. Veal Calves were in fair demand. The leading Live Stock Market last Wednesday was as follows:

	Number.	Sold at.
Beeves, per pound	3,400	$ 6 @ $ 7½
Cows and Calves, per head	90	30 @ 50
Veal Calves, per pound	1,200	5 @ 6
Sheep and Lambs	4,800	3 @ 6
Swine, per pound	2,000	5 @ 5½

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock on the leading Live Stock Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

	Market.	Market.
Beeves, per pound	March 16.	March 16.
Milch Cows	6 @ 7½	6 @ 7½
Veal Calves	30 @ 50	30 @ 50
Sheep and Lambs	5 @ 6	5 @ 6
Swine	4,800	3,500
	5 @ 5½	5 @ 5½

The receipts of Live Stock for the week ending March 16 were as follows:

	Cattle.	Sheep.	Swine.
Via Hudson River	1,200	2,500	1,000
Via Harlem	1,000	1,000	1,000
Via Erie	1,000	1,000	1,000
Via Long Island	1,000	1,000	1,000
Via Jersey	1,000	1,000	1,000
Via Central	1,000	1,000

THE TERRIBLE HOMICIDE AT HAWESVILLE, KENTUCKY.

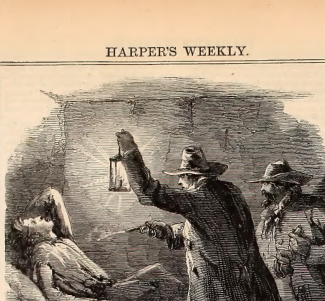
We are requested to give place to the following illustrated account of one of the most shocking scenes that ever took place in this country—being the homicide of Mr. Lowe, of Hawesville, Kentucky—in the hope that the horror of the scene may, in the language of the Grand Jury of Hancock County, "have a salutary effect upon the community, and may inculcate a desire to have the laws hereafter promptly administered."

We may premise by saying that Mr. Lowe was a retired merchant of Hawesville, and Mr. Maxwell a prominent lawyer of the place. They had quarrelled some time previously. The Louisville Journal of 5th thus describes the subsequent events:

"On Tuesday last Lowe sent word to Maxwell that he wished him to remain a part of the day in his room. Maxwell accordingly staid in his room, having employed Judge Yeamen to attend to his duties as prosecuting attorney. Lowe sent him a letter by a friend, inquiring whether he would accept a challenge from him. Maxwell refused to communicate with Lowe by note. Lowe's friend then asked Maxwell whether he could appear upon the street with long or short arms. Maxwell declined to give an explanation of his intentions, adding that Lowe might go upon the street when he pleased and as he pleased.

"Shortly afterward Lowe made his appearance on the street, and calling on Mr. Cicero Maxwell, if within the sound of his voice, to come forth, stated that he had been stigmatized by Maxwell as a political juggler, and then proceeded to denounce Maxwell as a liar, a scoundrel, and the son of a ——, repeating the denunciation several times. Maxwell, accompanied by Messrs. Harris and Morton, of Hartford, Thomas Withrow, of Hawesville, and Judge Mayhall, of Hawesville, left his room—Max cell armed with a double-barreled shot-gun, Mayhall with a rifle, and the two others with pistols. Maxwell, as soon as he got within shooting distance of Lowe, fired at him. The shot struck Lowe in the left breast, but he was protected by a coat of mail, which was subsequently given to him by Judge Stuart, of Bowlenburg. Lowe immediately returned the fire, and then wheeled and fled. He ran into a crowd at the Courthouse, where the Hon. John H. M'Henry, of Owensborough, made a speech invoking the citizens to do no violence, but to let the law take its course.

"Lowe afterward took refuge in a widow's house, but Maxwell's friends pursued him, demanding him of the widow, and threatening, in case of refusal, to demolish her house. She told him he was there, but entreated them not to injure her house, as she had no power to remove him. Three of Maxwell's friends went into the house and assured Lowe that if he would go out with them he should not be hurt. Lowe, asking them to spare his life, left with them; but after his proceeding some distance the crowd commenced firing. One of Maxwell's friends then said to Lowe that he could no longer risk his own life to save his. Lowe ran, and called on Harris to deliver him, pursued by the crowd, who continued firing. Aldridge, a friend of Lowe, ran with him, and fired once or twice at the pursuing crowd. He was instantly killed by a shot through the head. Lowe was shot in the thigh, and had a finger shot off, and his clothes were literally riddled, his life being saved by his coat of mail. He ran down to the bank of the Ohio, where he fell in a state of exhaustion, followed by the crowd. He fell on his face as if killed. Thomas Withrow had fired at him in the pursuit until his shots were exhausted, and after Lowe was down ran up to him, cut at him with a knife, but the coat of mail prevented the penetration of the weapon. This coat of mail, which was of steel, was so closely linked that a pigeon-shot could scarcely penetrate it, and it extended up over the whole of the back part of his head, being concealed by a thick wig. Harris, Maxwell's friend, went to Lowe to protect him. One man presented a pistol, swearing that he would kill Lowe, but Harris knocked the pistol up, and it was discharged in the air. Maxwell then went up to Lowe, and asked him if he would retract what he had said of him. Lowe replied that he retracted every thing he had said, and that he was a coward, and had disgraced himself.



THE MURDER OF LOWE IN HIS CELL IN PRISON.

"Thereupon Maxwell appealed to his friends not to hurt Lowe, stating that the latter had done all he could with him to do. The appeal had its effect, and Lowe was conducted before Judge Stuart at the Court-house.

"Judge Stuart made a speech to the crowd, telling them that they would have to walk over his dead body to do any further injury to Lowe—that Lowe had surrendered himself to him, and should be protected by him. A surgeon was sent for, and Lowe's wounds were dressed at the Court-house. Judge Stuart then took him to the jail, and remained with him till half past ten P.M. Nothing further occurred during the night. The next morning Lowe sent for Harris, and thanked him for his protection. He was still afraid of the mob, and begged Harris's influence in behalf of himself, his wife, and his children.

"In the mean time a rumor became current in the streets that Lowe had threatened to kill the last son of the mob, at the risk of his own life, as soon as released. Thomas Withrow and Dr. Davidson went to Mr. Oldham, the jailer, and demanded the keys of the jail. He refused to comply with the demand; whereupon they pointed their pistols at his breast, and said they would kill him if the keys were not surrendered. He surrendered them, and the two men went to Lowe's cell and unlocked the door. The prisoner in the adjoining cell saw them enter. Lowe, who was lying upon his bed, begged for mercy, beseeching them to spare his life for the sake of his wife and children. The prisoner of the neighboring cell states that the tall man (Withrow) shot first, and the short man (Davidson) next. The two then passed out of the cell, but immediately went back, and each fired two more shots. Any one of the six shots would have been mortal. Two balls were lodged in Lowe's body, and one in his head."

On 7th the Journal adds:

"The Grand Jury report that Lowe was proved to have a coat of mail on the day before the affray, but they say nothing as to his having worn it in the fight. Well-known facts can scarcely leave a doubt that he did wear it upon that occasion. Our informant, who was a spectator of the scene, says that at least between seventy-five and one hundred guns and pistols were fired at Lowe, and that there were thirty-two bullet and buck-shot holes through all portions of his coat, but that not a solitary ball or shot entered his body, or even drew a drop of blood. Heavily-loaded guns were fired at him from a distance of not more than six feet, and he was repeatedly knocked down and whirled around by the leaden missiles, yet no wounds except contusions were inflicted. The ball which struck his thigh made a very severe bruise, but did not enter the skin. Our informant saw a strong man strike him four times with a bowie-knife, but the point of the weapon turned without penetrating."

The Grand Jury have inquired into the case, and present as follows:

"In reference to the killing of Lowe, on the next day, when he was unarmed and confined in the jail, a difference of opinion exists in the Grand Jury. A majority of the Jury, however, believe that the lives of the two persons by whom he was said to have been slain were threatened by him, and would have been sought if he had been permitted to live, and that the same principles of self-preservation which justified the killing of Aldridge were applicable to the killing of Lowe. The Grand Jury unitedly declare that no great provocation to violence existed in this county, and that blood has been shed in the very presence of justice. They hope sincerely that the bloody proceedings referred to may have a salutary effect upon the community; that the result may inculcate a desire to have the laws promptly administered, and impress upon those who disregard the rights of others the certainty that, in the judgment of all good men, the law is magnified when he who without right appeals to the sword is by the sword destroyed. They all regret that the law should have been inadequate to remedy the existing evil. It is plain the law must protect men, or they will protect themselves; and this Jury seriously fear that unless the law is made to act more vigorously, force will assume the place, and the rights of the citizens be determined by the strong arm of violence. They also hope that there will be aroused the virtues of their own and the wrongs of the public will not so act in removing a public terror as to become a substitute for the same in the community, and that a love of law and order may, from this day, distinguish and redeem the citizens of Hancock County. WILLIAM ADAMS, Sen., FOREMAN."

THE PISTOL-SHOT.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

TREAD the dance, the merry measure—
Youth's the time for pleasure, pleasure;
Eyes are never half so bright
As under ball-room lamps at night.

"She loves me not, but mocks my pain!
Hard heart, good-by! the end is plain."
"There's Ernest, now—his looks are wild;
I must be careful of the child."

She smiles like a lady nobly born,
Half in pity, and half in scorn;
And then, her proud heart drunk with pleasure,
Goes whirling on to the merry measure.

"What's that?" "An idle pistol-shot."
"I faint!" "The rooms are somewhat hot;
This way: you need the garden air."
"Not there! there's something lying there!"

But back again to the merry measure—
The nights of youth are made for pleasure;
The day is long enough for sorrow;
Let her laugh to-night—she can weep to-morrow!

FLYING FOXES.

We give herewith a couple of engravings which may be of interest to students of natural history. The one represents a common bat, measuring from ten to fifteen inches from tip to tip of the wings; the other depicts those curious animals known as "flying foxes," and "kalongs," being the largest known variety of bat, which is chiefly found in Java and the neighborhood.

Common bats, which fly round every farm-house throughout the United States, are in fact only an overgrown insect, with a body but little larger than a "bumble-bee," and wings not twice the length of those of a "dove-it-a-needle." It is generally understood that, if confined in a room, these bats will cling to any substance resembling foliage; that, for instance, they will attach themselves to the hair of any individual who may happen to be in the room. It has been said that, in their agony to set themselves free, they will break their wings to pieces in the hair of their victim, and will so entangle themselves as to render it a work of great difficulty to extricate their remains. These stories are probably nursery tales. Bats are said by naturalists to be able to steer their course through the thickest foliage without the aid of nose, eyes, or touch; hence it has been supposed that nature has invented a sixth sense for their especial use. If this be so, how unlikely it is that they willfully run themselves aground in men's heads!

THE CHASE OF LOWE BY THE MOB AT HAWESVILLE.

The flying foxes are a peculiar kind of bats, which flourish in Java, Australia, and parts of Central America. Their peculiarity consists, first, in their size: they will measure five feet from tip to tip of the wing, and the body will be as large as that of a fair-sized cat; and, secondly, in their singular habits. They live mostly on fruit. During the day they hang suspended, head downward, from the branches of trees. In this singular attitude they sleep soundly—so soundly, that if they are shot dead they do not stir, but hang on still as before. Thus travelers often mistake them for singular fruit, and only discover their mistake when they endeavor to pluck them. In Java five hundred or more of them frequently "roost"—of the word can be thus used—on a single tree.

When night comes they awake. Then comes the hour of danger for fruits. In Java they will clear an orchard in a single night. In the orchards attached to palaces every fruit, as soon as it is shaped, is inclosed in a sort of cage, to protect it from the kalongs. But for this precaution none would ever reach maturity.

In Central America and other parts of the world this variety of the Chiroptera is said to feed on human blood. Throughout Central America it is understood that if a bat of the large species once discovers a traveler nothing but incessant vigilance will save his life. If unwatched, the bat will attack him in the midst of his first deep slumber, and will suck his blood—generally from the foot—so painlessly and so noiselessly that he will never discover what has happened till, on awaking next morning, he sees the heavy clot of blood on the puncture. That day the traveler will feel weak and languid. The next night, when he goes to sleep, the bat—or vampire, as it is called—is watching him. No sooner has sleep overpowered him than the blood-sucker is at work, fanning his victim to secure his deeper sleep, and abstracting a still larger quantity of blood than on the previous night. The story of Central American travelers is that this operation will be continued nightly, unless reliable watch be kept, so long as the victim remains on the isthmus.

FLYING FOXES ASLEEP.

THE COMMON BAT.

Similar tales are told by travelers in other regions.

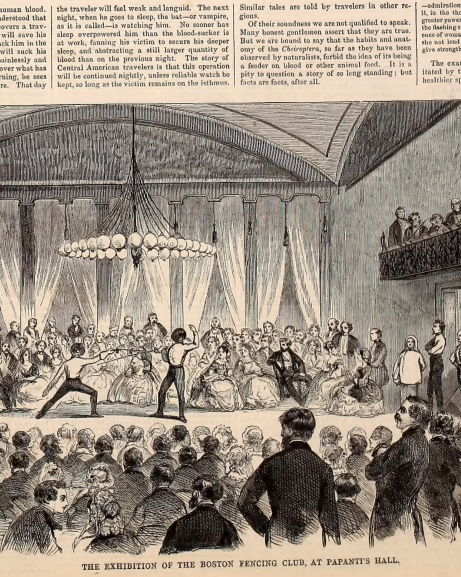
Of their soundness we are not qualified to speak. Many honest gentlemen assert that they are true. But we are bound to say that the habits and anatomy of the Chiroptera, so far as they have been observed by naturalists, forbid the idea of its being a feeder on blood or other animal food. It is a pity to question a story of so long standing; but facts are facts, after all.

FENCING AT BOSTON.

We publish herewith, by request, a picture of the great fencing exhibition given at Papanti's Hall, Boston, a few evenings since. The gentlemen of the Boston Fencing Club invited their friends—la crème de la crème in that cremnicst of American cities — to witness the sport, and never was fairer audience gathered to see a more pleasing spectacle. We copy from the Boston Courier the following account, which rumor ascribes to the Hon. George Hillard:

"Mr. Papanti's Hall — that place so awe-inspiring to the unsophisticated, so fondly regarded by those within the imaginary line bounding 'society' — was filled with a closely-seated throng of ladies, save only a square space reserved for the combatants, and that occupied by standing men. How can the general character of the audience be more delicately made known than by saying that it was composed mostly of 'people whom one knows?' The exhibition consisted, during the first hour and a half, at least, of fencing, the broadsword exercise, and the single-stick play. It is useless to attempt any description of what is indescribable to one who has not seen a similar display, absurdly unnecessary to one who has. Nor is it desirable to mention the names of the actors. Indeed, their dearest friends could hardly have recognized those who entered the ring—which we just said was a square—accoutred for the play of single-stick; imagine a cross between a suit of marine diving apparatus and an armor of the Middle Ages, the whole made of stuffed buckskin, and a tolerable notion will be gained of the general effect of the defensive preparations necessary; and even with these safeguards so palpably before their eyes, some of the spectators would occasionally wish 'they wouldn't strike quite so hard.' Great muscular power, dexterity, grace were displayed, and plaudits, even from fair hands, certainly from admiring eyes, rewarded the eager combatants. Here was an excellent opportunity to observe the natural effect of sports like these. For the first time in their lives most of these fair spectators looked upon a scene like this; they came, not knowing what they were to see: now look about, and note the expression of the different countenances of those unhitted witnesses — excited, pleased delight is depicted on nearly all: here and there a nervous anxiety of look shows an unduly timid sensitive but the general survey shows that pleasure and admiration and pride are in the hearts of the rest; pleasure in the sight of the skill displayed—pride, shall we say it, in the thought that in their own small land lay a greater power than swelled in the muscles which controlled the flashing steel. And why should not the refining influence of woman be shed upon manly sports? Why should she not lend her inspiring presence to exercises which give strength to the graceful, and grace to the strong?"

The example of Boston may be profitably imitated by the rest of the country. There is no healthier sport than fencing.



THE EXHIBITION OF THE BOSTON FENCING CLUB, AT PAPANTI'S HALL.

CHESS CHRONICLE

BY C. H. STANLEY

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. F. C. We have come to the conclusion to decline publishing Problems wherein castling is the main feature. In nine cases out of ten the inference, judging from the position, would be that either King or Rook has already been moved.——P. L. is informed that, having no other means of communication than a letter, we have to guess, and that he can send chess matters to us only through the medium of the columns of Papers. His solutions to Problems No. 207 and XVIII. are due in the matter of Enigma VI., wherein Black Pawn should be on Rook's third square and not to the eight with Black home, as would appear in the text. (This also to D. J. W. and some others.) We think, by-the-way, that it is necessary with Problem Solvers accepting an Diagram, as comparatively few people take the trouble to transfer the position to the board.——Additional solutions have been received to Enigma V. from "Pawnbroker," "Pawn and Move," T. R., E. W. Hall, and some others, and to Enigma VI. from "Pawnbroker."——Kt takes Q. will not effect the mate as anticipated.——W. A. J. (Yale College). Try again. (See No. XVI.) We shall be glad to receive the particulars of your match as it progresses (Yale College vs. Brown University).——Dr. K. and "Pawnbroker" will find many blanks. Your communications are always welcome.——We have on file another matter for examination, inclusive of communications from "Jacques," "Patterson," "Unity," etc. Au revoir, gentlemen.——Newton: "Problem Solvers and Publishers defy such as those consulted. Both parties are right, and both wrong. Mr. Staunton is right, and Black P. 2 to Q B 4th (not 3rd) is a fair move, and a good one, but it is hard to say that he is held at positive disadvantage——Staunton. A piece pinned in the manner stated to put not deprived of its checking power.——Dr. J. R. and T. C. In the matter of solving Problems, when we wait to hear the opinions of our Chess friends generally, as well the more particularly of our brethren of the goose quill.——J. C. G. We are not aware that, in actual play, Mr. Harrwitz ever moves his Queen's Rook in fifteen moves" but if he did make such an unnecessary move, he is by no means the only player so rash. It was your own invention. We thank you as well for the Problem as for the Enigma (shared), as all merits are allow ed. (See Diagram.)

WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in two moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM XVII.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B takes Q B P	Q takes B
2. Q to Q Kt	K moves
3. Q takes Q (ch)	Kt takes Q
4. Kt to Q B mate

(*) Q takes Q would involve mate on the third move.

SOLUTION TO ENIGMA VI.

White plays Queen to K Kt 7 Queen takes Queen Bishop takes Pawn, mating. If P takes Kt, Kt to Kt 6 dbl. check and mate.

GAMES.

The following hardly-contested played game is one of several contested between Messrs. Anderson and Morphy subsequently to the termination of public matches:

(Bishop's Gambit replayed.)

WHITE (Mr. A.)	BLACK (Mr. M.)
1. P to K 4	P to K 4
2. P to K B 4	P takes P
3. B to Q B 4 (a)	Kt to B 3
4. P to Q 4	P to Q 4
5. B to Q Kt 5	Kt to K 5
6. Kt to B 3 (b)	B to Q Kt 5 (ch)
7. Castles	Kt to Q B 3
8. P to K 5 (c)	Kt to K Kt 5
9. P takes Kt (ch)	P takes B
10. P to Q 5	P to Q R 4
11. P to Q 6	P to Q R 3
12. P to Q Kt 4	P takes Kt P
13. P takes P	Castles
14. Q to Q Kt 3	R to Q Kt
15. Q to Q R 3	P to Q B 4
16. Kt to Q B 3	Kt takes Kt
17. P takes Kt	P takes Kt
18. P takes P	K R takes P
19. P to Q B 4	P to Q B 4
20. P to Q 7	P to K R 3
21. P to K B 3	R to Q Kt 3
22. P to K 6	R to Q Kt 5
23. R to Q B 3	R to Q R 5
24. R to Q 3	P to K R 4
25. P to K 6	R takes P
26. P takes P (ch)	K to R 2
27. K takes B	Q to Q 3
28. P to K 7	Q to Q B 3
29. P takes P	K R to K 1
30. P to K 8 (d)	R takes R
31. K to B 3	R to R 6 (ch)
32. K to K 4	R to K 6 (ch)
33. K to K 5	R takes B (ch)
34. K to B 6	R takes R (ch)
And White resigns.

NOTES.

(a) With the best intention of favoring his game, Morphy with a Bishop's Gambit opening, plays his Bishop to Q B 4th (a) and by the 30th move, unlikely as it may be, he will have lost a piece.

(b) Kt to K 2nd would have been better, as the Knight would have been in a position to support the Pawn at K 4th, and he could not be taken without loss of Queen.

(c) Had he taken the Knight with Pawn instead of Queen, he would have obtained a strong hold. The remaining portion of the game presents a result each move.

LITERARY.

It is remarkable and noteworthy that the most valuable manual of American literature should appear in London and be published by an English house. THEBNER'S BIBLIOGRAPHICAL GUIDE TO AMERICAN LITERATURE is a work of extraordinary skill and perseverance, giving an index to all the publications of the American press for the last forty years. The introduction, consisting of BIBLIOGRAPHICAL PROLEGOMENA, and CONTRIBUTIONS TOWARD A HISTORY OF AMERICAN LITERATURE, is just and admirable. The last-named portion especially presents the most careful, elaborate, and judicious views of the literary world on this side of the water that have ever appeared in England, not to say in America. Hereafter no Englishman who wishes to write about us, or to ask questions, "Who reads an American book?" The COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY will find American authorship in all departments of science and literature. No one can fail to be interested in the statistics of the book trade here gathered. All the great publishing houses are described, and estimates are given of the profits of success in the issue of popular works, and of the general success of authorship in this country. On the whole, possessing as we do few natural aids, we have attained a more fair and satisfactory sketch of the progress of the past and present in American letters than ever, and the thanks of all Americans are due to Mr. Morgan, of the American Legation, to whom we think we owe the idea of embodying these various contributions.

We have received the sixth number of the MATHEMATICAL MONTHLY, published in Cambridge by John Bartlett. Its success is not only gratifying to the mathematical and scientific young students, but is due to the learning and ability of the contributors, who are among the first minds in the country. It is hardly to be expected that general readers will be interested in such an article as that by Prof. CHAUVENET, U. S. N., on MONNET OF INERTIA, but the student of the "science of science" will thank him for the attention to it as remarkably skilful and apt, and answering admirably its design in aiding those who are pursuing studies which require it. We also are also an excellent article for young students from Professor Mahan, of West Point, and many prize problems.

Coin collectors and all others are interested in American numismatics will welcome the appearance of Dr. DICKESON'S AMERICAN NUMISMATIC MANUAL, from the press of Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. This is one of the most elegant works which the American press has hitherto issued. The typography is sumptuous, and the volume is enriched with a large number of fine plates, giving facsimile representations of all the American coins, from the earliest and rarest down to the latest, the gold and silver coins being respectively gilded and whitened, and the copper burnished. The work has long been needed, not only by collectors, but by every library in the country; and while we say that this, in style and execution, rivals HUMPHREY'S great work on the coins and coinage of England, those who know that superb book will understand the elegance of Dr. Dickeson's.

The author has given his attention to a full history of money in America. He illustrates the remains found in aboriginal mounds and the Museum of the Indians, then passes on to the Massachusetts mint, the Pine-tree and the N. E. coinage, and follows up all the colonial issues, and the struck in England and France for America, and finally to the regular United States issues from 1793 to the present time. The patience, perseverance, and accuracy of Dr. Dickeson are worthy of great praise. He has the entire confidence of us all on experienced collector, and it is a matter of astonishment he has made so few errors as he has, or so tedious and minute. The reader may judge of this when we remark that he describes no less than 72 gold pieces of the first Congress, and subdivides them into more than a hundred other varieties. Extraordinary care, in short, has also afforded him a field of interesting research, and the collector of American coppers will find his work indispensable. We have not the slightest criticisms of our author. We do not agree with Dr. Dickeson as to his conclusions, but we are not occasionally a slip of the pen, which he will correct in future editions. We are glad to express a hearty approval of the work and a cordial commendation of it.

Mr. James Challen is not only one of our most respectable publishers, but is an able author, and has published several interesting works on religious subjects. We have just received a copy of one from his pen, CHRISTIAN MORALS, published by James Challen & Sons, which is a thoughtful treatise on the morals and manners which too many Christians, it is to be feared, seem to think they live. Quite though they seem to be, they make the man in his relations to the world around him and it is the author's aim, well and ably to exercise the duty of clear attention to them in men calling themselves disciples of Christ.

Rev. William H. Lewis, D.D., the learned and beloved pastor of the Church of the Holy Trinity, in Brooklyn, well, some time since, several articles on the subject of CHURCH UNITY, which appeared in the New York Observer, and which he has written and amplified, and now published in an excellent treatise worthy the attention of all Christians, and especially of the Episcopalians. Dr. Lewis has the union of all Christians in one Church close at his heart, and believes that the Episcopal Church is broad enough in its platform and creed to receive all orthodox believers, while it has the organization which will keep them in other denominations. So far as his plan may be carried out practically of all other denominations, the Episcopal form of Church constitution as to receive all evangelical bodies into its embrace without sacrificing anything that may be considered as essential part of the Church. He proposes to yield, and asks others to yield as much, and meet on middle ground. This, if any, must be the plan. Not a new Church, never heard of before, but an old Church opening its arms. But is it necessary, is it desirable, will it result in good? Frankly; we do not believe in evangelical alliances. We do not believe that the churches of Antioch, and Ephesus, and Corinth, and Rome, would have a nearer alike than Methodists, and Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, and Baptists now; and we do believe that the variety of Church organizations now existing is a means of keeping up the learning and activity of the clergy, is the grand enemy of bigotry, and is the salvation of the world from that age of stagnation, gloom, intolerance, and persecution into which men would plunge rapidly if there were one controlling Church organization among all Protestants. But this is only apropos of Dr. Lewis's book, which is, like himself, learned, gentlemanly, and winning, and which is especially interesting from the speculation of its author, and a mine of arguments in defense of their Church against the assaults to which it is most subjected in this age and country.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

WILL THERE BE AN EXTRA SESSION?

The Times correspondent telegraphs to Friday 18th: "Senator Collamer still insists that there will be an extra session, but their resistance is all in vain. The President's mind was made up on Saturday last, as stated in Monday's Times, and his proclamation may issue to-morrow. Senator Douglas and Lane are still here, and so is Senator Seward. Governor Chase leaves for his Pacific coast home to-day."

EMIGRATION TO ARIZONA.

We find the following in a late number of the Galveston News:

"We had the pleasure of a call, on Tuesday, from Colonel Lockridge, who has returned from a visit to the Pimos from New Orleans, and left by the same train which conveyed him. Colonel Lockridge says that the means of transportation for the emigrants who are going to Arizona are ample, and that there will be from 1,000 to 1,500 persons who will leave Texas for those mines by the 1st of July; and Colonel Lockridge informs us that he will return to Arizona himself, and take the charge of the expedition. These visiting to join the party may have a good opportunity, either by coming through our city en route for their destination."

We read in the Arizona Journal that General Heintzelman will leave Washington in a day or two for New Orleans, and will be accompanied as far as Texas by "started who are to establish low-cost-order in Arizona." The Journal says that Governor Lane, of Oregon, will leave on his return to Arizona, and that two Abbott will be claiming admission to balonia Mountain Territory. We have only to add to Arizona that we do not write back the most favorable accounts of it as a mineral house for the precious metals, and as a field for emigration.

THE CAMANCHES AND THE OVERLAND MAIL.

The Overland Mail Company, as previously noticed, is suffering from the depredations of the Camanches. Some eighty head of mules have been run off in a district of Texas between Fort Chadbourne and the Pecos. Bullock's Station, on the Pecos, in that part of Texas every the company had purchased in Chadbourne and Texas. Mr. Bullock's establishment was the only one attacked. A company of Rangers had started in pursuit of the savages, and had traced them as far as the Clear Fork. At last accounts they were still on the trail, with strong hopes of soon overtaking them.

DIPLOMATIC MOVEMENTS AT WASHINGTON.

Mr. Bodisco, late Minister from Russia to Sweden and France, to Washington, are advertised to be "for sale at the Court-house door of Montgomery Co., Md., on the 1st of April, on the heights of Georgetown. Lord Napier expects to leave for England in a few days, and expects to be on the 1st of April, accompanied by Mr. Erskine, the present Secretary of Legation. Mr. Yrisarri, from Spain, is also living, from Vienna, Mr. Wurts, son of the member for Jersey, will be left in charge of the Legation. Mr. Calderon, who was in Washington two years since, is appointed Minister from Peru to the United States, succeeding Mr. Pezet, of Captain Hoyo. Of Court Battles it is said, it is not probable that Mr. Bodisco will return to Washington. It is now ten months since he applied for leave of absence, and the Emperor has not responded to the application with any decision. He will probably be appointed either to a Germanic mission or to Lisbon. He entered the diplomatic service in 1837, and shortly afterward Baden was removed to Ida Jassitz, where he remained some years. Mr. Bodisco was then appointed Minister to Constantinople and then to Athens, then appointed Minister to Sweden, and from Sweden finally promoted to Legation in America. Vicomte de Serre, his probable successor, is a Paris literary gentleman and a banker. He was for some time Chargé de Cabinet in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

DEATH OF MIKE WALSH.

The body of Mike Walsh was found five o'clock on Thursday morning by a policeman at the foot of the stairs leading to the basement of his dwelling in Avenue A, a pool of blood marked where his head lay, his gold watch, pocket-book, and money untouched. The first presumption at first was that he had been murdered. A post-mortem examination, however, has shown that his immediate cause of death was congestion of the brain, and that he had fallen down the stairs in a fit. He was in his usual health on Wednesday evening, when he left his office to sleep while intestated, and this came to his death. He was born in the County Cork, Ireland, and was about to place on Sunday from his late residence in Twenty-first street. He was a member of Tammany Hall General Committee.

HOOPS THE MEANS OF SAVING LIFE.

We were informed, says the Asheville Spectator, by a citizen of Buncombe county, that a most remarkable escape from drowning of Mr. Robert Anderson, wife, by the following circumstance: Mr. Anderson, with his wife, to us, are as follows:

Mr. Anderson believes, a citizen of our District, his wife, two children, and sister, left home on Saturday last for Greenville, South Carolina. Mr. Anderson, Mrs. Anderson, George Anderson, of Spartanburg District, and while crossing the Saluda river, at the ford, the water being somewhat out of the banks, Mrs. Anderson's horse became frightened attacked with 'blind staggers,' and fell overboard, nearly drowning all in carriage. Mr. Anderson, with great presence in the general scuffle to extricate the animal, lost his hold on the carriage, and was carried down the stream by the concurrent driving rapidly—the river being considerably swollen. Mr. Anderson, seeing that there was no alternative but to go over the dam, gathered his hoop-skirt around him and went over. He succeeded in his wife and sister in do the same, which they did. Mr. A. says that he was under the water for a considerable time, but was not drowned, as he retained his presence of mind in a manner drowned, when she was rescued by a negro, who, seeing the accident, came to their assistance in a boat to save life. She was unconscious when first taken from the water, but after some time recovered, and is doing well. The young lady, the sister of Mr. A., fortunately, at last in the boat, and was rescued without injury. Mr. Anderson's other sister-in-law, by having on a hoop-skirt, which we understand, so completely supported her that she suffered very little from the accident, more than a slight wetting. Mr. Anderson's horse, after about five minutes time, was seen from the bank by the ferryman, in the middle of the stream, still it passed over the dam, and in it performed with perfect safety, dragging the dead horse, which was drowned by falling overboard, with it.

The above incident is remarkable enough, and should be a warning to those who neglect to detach their horses from the carriage after such an accident. The strongest arguments we have seen in favor of the hoop, which, in this instance, served as an excellent substitute for a life preserver."

TERRIBLE MURDER AT HARTFORD.

The Hartford Courant, March 14, says: "Yesterday afternoon there occurred, at No. 34 South Willard Street, the most horribly cool-blooded and atrocious murder that it was ever our painful duty to chronicle. It appears that Christopher C. Colton, whose wife some few years since procured a bill of divorce from him, on the ground of habitual drunkenness and cruelty, has, since that time followed her with continued persecution, and finally has patiently threatened to take her life and to kill her on her sight. Yesterday afternoon, at about 3 P. M., at the house of his brother, James H. Colton, baker, No. 34 South Willard Street, he met her in the entry of the house, and, drawing a pistol, shot her through the left breast. Christopher was sitting in one of the lower rooms, and, hearing the report, rushed out, and found his wife, who has, since the divorce, taken her maiden name of Sarah Ann Bunce, lying on the entry floor. He was advanced to his wife and endeavored to take her hand, but she pushed him away, saying that the ball in her hand was nor sore, and that she did not wish to have him touch her. Mr. Colton then went into a lower the room, when he followed her, caught her by the hair of the head, and, drawing a knife, cut her throat to the point just below the ear, making a deep incision and severing the carotid artery. Death was instantaneous. Mr. Colton then left the house, and, after the perpetrating of any kind, but remarking that he 'hoped she was satisfied, three hid thereby escaped, and, having a sharp-edged knife—under the table, and proceeded leisurely to the residence of Mr. Colton's brother-in-law, some four that were stored there. The intimates of the house were, at the time of the murder, in the basement kitchen, the excitement by the terrible event that had just transpired, and consequently no one saw the murderer escape. He was so much hold in dread by those present, who fearing that he would be shot down by the police, that no effort was made to arrest him. He was seen by a number on the house unmolested. From the hotel he walked to the county house of correction, and delivered himself up to the Deputy Sheriff Tucker, where he was arrested."

A VILLAGE OVERFLOWED.

The village of Bellows Falls, Vermont, was partially submerged a few days since by the breaking of the dam at the head of the falls, on the Connecticut River, at Lake. The dam across the Upper Lake first gave way, and the water rushed down the river in a flood. The dam at the head of the falls, which was built of solid stone, filled poured in a torrent through the village, carrying away the lower part of the building, and doing a large amount of property. The disaster occurred at about five o'clock in the morning, and in the darkness of the midnight. They were aroused by the noise of the water rushing through the houses. The Bellows Falls Hotel, Fulmer's Hotel were the first to suffer. Every the inhabitants were obliged to leave their houses in a hurry. Mr. Ging and family had to wade to the second story, and only escaped with their lives. Many were driven to the roofs, and passed the night shivering. Mrs. Mrs. Palmer's store and dwelling, and the large brick store of Mr. Weedhall's cotton-mill was carried away. The loss of property is estimated at from $30,000 to $40,000. Many houses, barns, bridges and aqueducts were destroyed, and a large village was rendered desolate. The damage done to the dam is not a mile. The loss of property is estimated at $30,000. Many houses, barns, bridges and aqueducts were destroyed. Some fifty years ago the same village was flooded by a like occurrence.

STRANGE STORY OF A MURDERER.

We read in the Boston Journal: "Under the care of Isabel, the supposed murderer of his wife and child, Mr. Rockwell, of Bridgewater, has recovered his mind, and child mysteriously disappeared fifteen years ago, and from the first resistance now to the statement of the dead, their remains were never discovered. Isabel is now lived in Illinois. He has a fine property, and is insane feeling, and Rockwell was placed on trial for the alleged murder of his wife and child. He was found guilty of murder in the second degree, and was sentenced to the term of years. At the expiration of his term he was released from prison, and returned to his home in the vicinity of Ithaca and child. After an exciting trial, in which he defended himself with great ingenuity, he was found guilty of the murders of great legal research, he was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and was sentenced to be executed in the Tompkins County jail, and after a long absence was released from prison. He returned to his home, and he frozen both feet, from the effects of which he is still lame. He has since lived with his family in the village. Terminier his case was carried to the Court of Appeals, where it was decided that the testimony of the wife and bodies of the alleged victims before the murder could be admitted, and a new trial was granted, resulting in his acquittal."

THE PROPOSED RESCUE.

The Times says: "Mrs. Ellison and Tompkins County, Long Island would not be surprised to hear that Mrs. Ellison had been rescued from her captors. She has her own hands and administer summary punishment upon them. She has been known to have knocked down with a bible headed with the words, 'Shall the murderer escape punishment?' Mrs. Ellison's friends in the county of Ithaca and Tompkins County to meet the head in them on the subject of the murder of Mrs. Ellison's child, and the method of disposing of the wife and child murderer. It is understood that the plan of rescue is that the wife would have been attached, the doors driven in, and Mrs. Ellison carried off by force. Mrs. Ellison is now in a building fitted in and about Ithaca. The Sheriff of Tompkins County has been notified of the proposed rescue, and has taken measures to prevent it. Mrs. Ellison is retired again in a coat of emergency, quietly removed from the jail to the residence of the Sheriff, and is now confined to the steamboat landing; placed Rudolf on board, and started for Albany. Mrs. Ellison is said to be endeavored to get him in at the prison, but, of course, was not allowed to do so. Rudolf was placed in Sheriff Hoskins, who opened his door, and Rudolf was immediately placed within the walls of the prison."

FINAL DECISION OF THE PEOPLE.

The Iowa Legislature has passed a bill to be presented at Ithaca with reference to the case of Rudolf, accused of the murder of Ellison's wife and child, and that he has been granted a new trial, after having been convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hung on Wednesday evening, at which it was resolved that Rudolf shall be hung between the hours of 10 and 2 o'clock. A draft was raised for the prosecution of a further search for the remains of the murdered child, and the murderer's wife.

PERSONAL.

Richard Colden was Deputy Postmaster Bridge, at his way to Illinois. The Buffalo Commercial says: "It is a remarkable fact that there is not a single native of Buffalo. He was here many years ago, and his leading characteristic was his love of fun and practical jokes. He rode a bedroom wherein about thirty-five men raised to the Legislature, and he was the only man here who which the best assigned to Mr. Colden, who explained to the House the nature of the joke perpetrated upon them being in favor of having a separate bedroom. The Hon. Mr. Colden's reply was that he was in favor of it, and would consent to it, if practically what it was." said Mr. Colden, "but, said Dennis, 'I am in favor of it, and would consent to it, if practically what it was.' and sometimes during." That is just such a room as I like. I like to be where I can hear the noise and disorder in the big ball-room."

The Boston Journal says: "Dr. Bailey, of the National Era, calls for Groups about the 1st of May, for a six months' book. He will be accompanied by Mr. Wood, editor of 'Peter Schlemihl in America,' etc. Should there be an extra Session, Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, will go for one of the party. The statement that Dr. Bailey has been appointed Minister to Turkey is premature. He will summer with him, in autumn. He was invited but declined. Dr. Bailey's health is better than it was in midwinter."

A correspondent of Bridge's Journal of Music, writing from Cincinnati, March 5th, says: "I have recently returned from a letter he had just received from Mr. Sonnet:

"'Since I left you I had a voyage, which left me but days a wreck, and made me for a while despair; but have followed with the greatest fidelity the prescribed course of treatment, and have led a life of perfect tranquillity. The morning begins with dry cupping for half an hour, then pleasant, but also fare quite tolerable; then more dry cupping, more exercise, avoiding fatigue; repeated dry coffs or bed illness hurt not the twenty-four hours' day of lukewarm and opposite of Turnbenstein. I may from these details be—— wrote me that you had expressed an interest in knowing them. The calmest physicians in Paris and those here who have made them-selves acquainted with my case, are of opinion that the cure of Mr. Parker's illness is complete. I am myself of the same opinion, and turn to my own medicine, which is now beginning, as it were, to be superseded by nature's own healing.

Dr. Shew thinks that "As the session of Congress will soon be over, there will be no public duties to claim my attention for some time, and I shall be ready to start on the 'three sheets!' "Meanwhile, having given them a good outing to my immediate friends, I have work to do. Nine, where I shall be a week; perhaps three to Rome."

Hon. Ballard Preston, Secretary of the Navy under President Pierce, died at his home in Louisville, Ky. He was eminently a Southern gentleman, and was born in Montgomery county, South Carolina, have been originally of Scotch-Irish descent. The general health of Wilmington, when old visitors to Washington in the early days of the United States Senate will remember one of the most distinguished orators in the country. He is, however, suffering from the combined ills of old age and of paralysis.

The Rev. Theodore Parker, of Boston, has bequeathed his "scrot"—not spiritual but military—to the State of Massachusetts. They consist of a number of rifles and cannon, with which his grandfather, Captain John Parker, defended Lexington Green against the British troops, on the 19th of April, 1775. The scrot, it is said, is worth a thousand dollars, and will be given to the Historical Society after his decease.

The Rev. Dr. Quarterly, of Philadelphia, preached last Sunday the last sermon that will ever be heard in the old Lutheran Street Church, so long looked upon as the home of Dr. Channing. The text was from Haggai, ii. c: "Who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory?"

Captain Daniel Brown, believed to be the last survivor of the Wyoming massacre, died in Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, on the 15th inst., at the age of eighty-eight years.

Mrs. Pendleton, a sister of the late Mr. Key, has taken his four children to her home in Ohio.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE TELEGRAPH IN PARLIAMENT.

In the House of Lords, on the 14th, Lord Wodehouse inquired if any guarantee had been granted to the Atlantic Telegraph Company. Lord Malmesbury replied that a conditional guarantee had been granted, but a condition of guarantee was, unsuccessful attempt to lay the cable, one of interest, amounting to £14,000, would be advanced by the capital, but contingent upon the success of the second effort to lay the telegraphic communication was continued without interruption.

THE NEW REFORM BILL.

Mr. Disraeli, in the House of Commons, upon the 28th ultimo, rose to explain and ask leave to introduce the promised Parliamentary Reform Bill. He would be satisfied in every part. A large number of Peers occupied the gallery, and also many members of the House. Mr. Disraeli, in a speech of three hours, reviewed the various efforts made during the history of the reform question since the ordinal century; and showed that it constituted the importance of population and property, by one a variety of reasons why the representation on those two grounds would not answer, and contended that the principle of representation based upon population was unstable, fallacious, and entirely erroneous, and had no strong ground about it. The principles of the proposed Ministerial measure he stated to be as follows: "In regard to boundaries, it is intended to make no change in the county, by conferring it upon those who derive £10 a year from freehold property, and £20 a year from leasehold property. In the boroughs, the right to vote is proposed to be vested, ordinary, and civil services to the amount of £6 a year, and dwellings of equal value are proposed to be equal to 6s. per week. The bill also proposes an educational franchise, by conferring the right to vote upon the inmates of all the universities, ministers of all religious denominations subject to certain reasons, all members of the legal profession, registered medical men, and a certain class of schoolmasters. In regard to plurality of votes, the bill proposes to establish identity of suffrage between the counties and the boroughs, and to confer the right of voting wherever the right of voting for the borough in which he has a property qualification, and also where he has his home freehold. It is also proposed that the right of voting for savings, and civil services to the amount of £20

THE PURCHASE OF CUBA PICTORIALLY CONSIDERED.

AFTER THE PASSAGE OF THE ACT APPROPRIATING THIRTY MILLIONS FOR THE PURPOSE, A.D. EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND????

1. Brother Jonathan proceeds to annex the lovely Miss Cuba, in obedience to the laws of manifest destiny.

2. The first consequence of the measure is an enormous increase in the size and number of the cigars smoked by Young America.

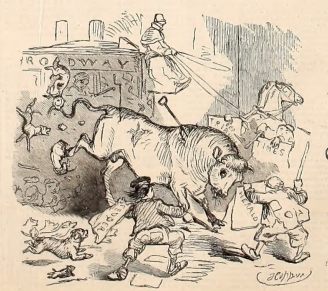
3. The market for young niggers is so tremendously affected that a couple of those interesting objects are sold for a cent, with guarantee.

4. Sugar and Molasses becoming dirt cheap, free lunches to small boys are given by enterprising and liberal grocers.

5. The United States Treasury, depleted by the transmission of $80,000,000 to Madrid, incontinently stops payment.

6. The Cuban Senators move that cigars be used in the Senate; which motion being carried, clouds of smoke obscure the deliberations of that venerable body.

7. The Juvenile American consoles himself by feasting gratuitously on bananas, oranges, and other tropical fruits.



8. And New York appreciates the change when bull-fights on Broadway become an established feature of the institutions of the city.

9. The only parties who complain are foreign nations, who vent their disgust in severe but harmless demonstrations.

THE EXECUTION OF THE MURDERERS AT DJEDDAH.

EXECUTION OF THE DJEDDAH MURDERERS.

We gave in a recent number an illustration of the brutal and fanatic assault upon the Christians of Jidda or Djeddah by the Mussulmans of that place. Since then, it is known that the Christian Powers have insisted on the punishment of the murderers. The Emperor of the French, whom certain English and American publications delight to abuse, has been especially energetic in vindicating the Christian cause; mainly through his vigor the chief criminals were detected and punished.

It was on the 15th of June that the massacre of the Christians took place. On the 12th of January last the murderers were punished. The persons chosen to expiate the crime of the infidel populace were the chief of police of Djeddah, and one of the leading merchants of the place named Amondi, who had been particularly active in instigating the attack on the Christians. Both, in company with others, had been imprisoned some time before. The energy displayed by the British and French Consuls—a remarkable contrast, by-the-way, to the inefficient behavior of our representatives in Central and South America—had succeeded in forcing the judicial authorities at Djeddah to institute a thorough inquiry, and to pronounce a righteous sentence. Even after the sentence was determined, the authorities were so timid that it was kept a secret, and to the hour of their death the culprits did not know their fate.

It was just after daybreak, on the 12th of January, that the sentence of the law was carried into effect. French and English vessels lay anchored in the Bay, prepared to bombard the place in case of trickery on the part of the officials. Before daylight the two unfortunate men were led forth.

The first was the chief of police. He was led into the square. His sentence was read to him, and he was handed over to an Algerian, who was reported to be familiar with the use of the heavy sword used on such occasions. Whether his nerves were shaken, or he had falsely represented his ability, he did not sever the head of his victim from his trunk before the third stroke—thus inflicting, it is supposed, much needless suffering on the wretched man. The merchant was more fortunate. It is generally supposed that he had foreseen his doom, and that he had used a part of his large wealth to secure an executioner of undoubted skill. The investment was judicious. At one blow his head was severed from his trunk.

When the execution was over, the families of the culprits were notified that the bodies were at their disposal. Thus the injury of June has been avenged, and a lesson taught the fanatics of the East which will probably be of great service to Christian travelers hereafter.

THE FOREIGN SQUADRONS BEFORE VERA CRUZ.

As the condition of Mexico is attracting no ordinary attention at the present time, we give a picture of the Port of Vera Cruz with the British and French fleets riding at anchor in the harbor. The admirals, as is known, made certain demands upon the place, in default of compliance with which they threatened to bombard it. Offers were made by the Government which were deemed satisfactory.

Meanwhile, it is curious that the policy of the admirals at one time induced the English and French residents of Vera Cruz to desert their own allegiance and place themselves under the protection of the American flag. Such was the case. The greatest indignation at the conduct of the French and English representatives in Mexico appears to prevail among the mercantile men of Vera Cruz, and strong representations have been sent to Europe on the subject.

At latest dates from Vera Cruz the city was in a terrible state of confusion and alarm. Miramon's arrival being expected hourly. A thousand women and children left on 24th ult. for Alvarado. The British and French residents made application to the commanders of the allied squadrons to protect their lives and properties in the event of an attack upon the town, and ten men are said to have been told off for the protection of each house. The

THE FOREIGN FLEETS BEFORE VERA CRUZ.

American residents made similar application to the commander of the Sarmian; the only United States vessel in the bay, and were, it is said, equally successful. The next steamer will bring startling news from Vera Cruz.

OUR COUSIN ALICE.

I HAD certainly not recovered from the effects of the terrible nervous excitement in the battles fought between Cawnpore and Lucknow, when I met again, after four years of separation, my cousin Alice. My brain must have been less steady than usual; and it was perhaps a little turned by my being regarded as the hero of the little world, formed by the county families and early friends, who met to congratulate me on my return to England from the seat of war in the East. I ought to have had a mother to nurse me, but I had none. I was an orphan. Tell it was to the house which, in my father's lifetime, had been my home that I came back.

There was the great down, wooded nearly to the summit, which I remembered so well, where the coursing meetings used to be held. I could scarcely believe, as I entered the drawing-room before dinner, that the same party which had so often assembled for the great gatherings on Morley Down, were not drawn to the place now for the same purpose. But other customs prevailed. My young cousin, Sir Reginald Moore, was no sportsman. The times previous had all the appearance, I missed them sorely. The old squire—my grandfather—had been more than a sportsman—a hero. His youngest and favorite son—my own parent—had gone before him to the grave. Our present host, the representative of the family, was a fine, passive-looking youth of five-and-twenty, fond of poetry, accomplished, handsome, and perfectly nerve enough to fire off a gun.

Our fair cousin, Alice Verschoyle, had always been a privileged favorite between us. We had been jealous of her smiles in boyhood; as men, we were still more jealous of her favor. She visited all the Crimean battles, and 'made the burning Indian sun, in the perilous march with Havelock and Outram, feel unnerved by illness after that fierce time of conflict was past, I had worn her picture next my heart. The cast had formed away a bolt that would else have pierced it.

There had been no avowed betrothal between us when we parted, but her fair form was pressed unresistingly in my arms, and she wept her long farewell on my shoulder. It was I who laid the cold Bermuda settles in the letters she wrote to me, but I never acknowledged the unfavorable, painting her poverty stood between us then; and now I had risen in my profession. If I feared her still in the same manner, and willing to avoid the vicissitudes of a soldier's lot, I meant to make her my bride. As I left her for service in India, neither of us were not rested near each other—and saw a deep blush mount to her face beneath my ardent gaze, I believed that we would soon be united by matrimony.

Perhaps she thought me vain, for every one was calling upon me to tell the tale of our Indian battles. She did not look at me; her eyes were quite averted: but other women were weeping as I spoke of the noble patience of those heroic ladies, whose names will be a history for ages to the valiance of suffering at Lucknow. I had seen those pale victims, some widowed, some orphans, all-most deeply tried by the privation and anxiety of those long months of waiting, before the heavy boom of the guns told them that the gallant English soldiery were advancing to their rescue.

Can I ever forget that midnight exclamation? The dread silence, the long lines of tents, the wood fall intervals, where all our care could not prevent danger, though when hole-hollowed trenches—and their brave but exhausted defenders had to pass. Thank Heaven! all went well—that no accident, no mistake marred the glorious end of our gallant chief. Our triumph would have been scant if one of that brave band had perished on their way to freedom!

Reginald had written some verses on the subject, which Alice had set to music, and I was soon a tear in her bright eyes previously, but they received such ample down their cheeks as the song my young cousin's words. I do not remember what they were, but I thought them scarcely worthy of the air which had certainly something of the precious drops they called forth.

A window was open near me, and I was not upon the terrace before the song was ended. I was alone; and a couple of persons who were seated on one of the benches sat against the wall, and talking earnestly; and did not perceive me. I heard a lady's voice:

"When her mourning for her grandfather is laid aside, Miss Verschoyle will marry her cousin. Sir Reginald has none of the fascination of the country. It will be an excellent match for her and had been long contemplated by all parties."

It was, nevertheless, the first time such a thought had entered my mind, and I was one of Alice's nearest relations—no near, some persons might consider, for us to think of marrying; but, if it were so, the same supposed to Reginald. It was the most cruel first cousin to each other.

At that moment there was a stir in the drawing-room: a lady had fainted. I saw her borne out, and the fair head with its long sweeping curls of golden brown, laid once more upon my shoulder by on my shoulder, was now supported by another arm. It was Alice and Reginald. I did not stop to look at them; one word from his lips reached me. I saw the look of intense agony on his fair face, as like her own, as he knit over the insensible girl. In one moment I knew that he loved her. I could not wait to see no more. I had stood five many times, but I had not courage to face the conviction that first glance of reviving consciousness might bring to me, that he loved. I read in the dreaming boy's eyes and voice was returned.

I believe I was half mad when I rushed away. I had traveled night and day to meet her; as I have said, I had not recovered from the effects of the injury I had sustained during the street-fighting at Lucknow; when, in addition to severe wounds, the beam of a falling house had descended on my head, completely stunning me; and but for the gallantry of my comrades I should have been left for dead, at the mercy of our savage foes—and now I had seen her in the arms of another. I had traveled for lips repeat his musical words; nay, I had seen her very senses forsake her under the spell of emotions raised by what appeared to me to be paltry commonplace lines. As I stood in the large hall where we had all three met in childhood, and which, as a man, I had so often pictured my return, the bitterest mortification took possession of my soul. For the first time I realized the change in my position in social position to that of my cousin. I, a mere soldier of fortune, who would receive in a barrack, climate, and a country on which, henceforward, women will look with dread and aversion; while all around me, in the moonlight, from the high windows of that noble hall, hung with trophies of the chase—with the banners of my ancestors, I saw the wide domain which belonged to the young baronet. Those were his deer trooping under the trees. The magnificent stag-hounds in the middle of the dewy lawn, the spreading elms and beeches, in the majesty of centuries, were his hereditary boy. What were a few years of manhood, a few years of service, a few wounds, a few months during death which had won for me no better reward than a few medals and crosses at which sin had scarcely glanced—compared to his advantages?

As I went up the stairs, each step awoke painful recollections. We had come down them together in the morning when I first went to rejoin my regiment, then just ordered on active service. How, in the gallery, I had stopped to look upon her own her picture, and, after some hesitation, the chain of golden hair that still supported it. I had been proven for me. Alice would not confess, but she did not deny the fact. I always believed that it was so.

As I stood looking down into the lighted hall, the persons came about it together: the women were weeping, and I needed to the support of Reginald's arm on which she was leaning. I heard him say:

"It is a shock, Alice, but she will recover. Will you never repeat, and with to draw back from the words you have spoken to me?"

He took her hand and looked in her fair face with mournful tenderness. I did not wait to hear her answer. I could not control myself sufficiently to move away quietly. As I looked down upon them for the last time, I saw Reginald kneeling before them for compassion, and was gazing upward; I even fancied that she called me, but I did not return or answer to it. I felt that I would have been if I had heeded that sweet warning voice.

I rushed to my room at once, and for hours I walked up and down, passion swelling within me like the surging sea. I felt that I knew my mood changed, my sanguine seemed unbearable. I was wounded at seeing one again to whom I had broke words of delight she had uttered when I came upon her by surprise in the park; our long interviews, unrestrained by the fear of interruption and present confidences. If no plighted vows had been exchanged, it was because I felt that I had none that we were pledged to each other. The words I had heard on the terrace now seemed to me like gossip, mere words, which any woman would bring her again before me, bright, beautiful, and truthful as ever. Jealousy—the most terrible of all jealousy steel rebuked; but again and again he returned, maddening my already fevered brain and overwhelming me with a sense of wrong mingled with excitement.

The same images haunted me when, at last, I lay down, exhausted by fatigue, but deeming it impossible to sleep, just as a dull gray haze spread over the landscape, and the sun rose in splendor which was soon to give place to the dawn. The last thing I had remembered was the sound of the birds and the old trees opposite to my open window rocked to the blast.

I thought I woke it was bread daylight. The sun was shining in, tempered by silken hangings, that waved in the breeze. Some one had been in and the shutters was closed, and the room, considering that the morning was so brilliantly fine out of doors, was unusually shaded and cool. I felt very faint; I recollected the train of ideas which had so distracted me on the night before, and remembering such as might visit a sufferer from long sickness or a prisoner, assailed me. I tried to start up from my couch, but a strange feeling of weakness in the limbs I had experienced when I was first wounded, came over me, and I fell back exhausted.

As I moved, a woman-servant stepped forward quickly, and in gentle, measured tones, spoke to me. I understood a word or two, and was aware in a mist came before my eyes, her voice rang indistinctly in my ears, and I was overwhelmed with a nervous—images of horror seemed to fill the room, and I fainted. When I revived, my mind was clear, but I could form no idea of where I was, except my vision became distinct, and I recognized them as those of my own room, which I knew I was too weak, and as I, the once strong man, lay prostrate, incapable of moving. I thanked my God for the blessing which it might be to me, and I fell into such guilt as in the visions of the night had been denied me.

I do no know whether, at that moment, any one was watching by me. The person or persons in the room, if it were so, must have been very quiet, for not a sound disturbed me as I recalled the images which had been present with me in that fevered dream. The room I was in was one that I knew well, and which I had occupied as a nursery lodge of ornamental stone-work, which was among the entire front of that old house. It was barely furnished, and I knew that I was alone, and that I had walked the whole length of it in my fever. In my dream I came to my Cousin Reginald's room. He was now the master of the house, and slept in what had once been my grandfather's apartment. When I was a boy, the kind old man had had an illness, during which my mother nursed him; and the servant reprimand I ever received from her was when one of the servants told her that Master Hubert had got upon the stone ledge outside his window, and tried to walk round to one that opened into the chamber where she was sitting up with the invalid. My father said then that it was a thing impossible to be done, but in my dream I fancied that I had achieved it.

My cousin was a painter as well as a poet, and the room in which I imagined him lying was full of indications of his talent, which were gentle and refined. A half-finished picture stood on an easel, at which he must have been working before he fell asleep. It was Alice resting a letter, with a bright flush of happiness and warm love in her face, and a most beautiful attitude, modified by some old classic ideal of loveliness, but with her features, and in a habit she at times wore. He was stretched on a couch, still dressed as I had seen him, calm, but with the melancholy expression which had startled me. His delicate, artistic-erratic features and pale complexion, which looked as if white in the moonlight, were distinctly seen in their regular beauty. I do not know what disturbed his slumbers, for all passed dreamlike in silence. I saw him, and, rising from my couch, he came forward to close the window at which I was standing. The ledge was narrow; but it seemed to me a touch would throw me off my balance, and precipitate me many fathoms to the paved court below. I was aware of a strange struggle with which I had steadied my footsteps on the giddy ledge, as I approached the open casement once more, the fierce rising of blood-thirsty passion. Though no words were exchanged, we seemed to know that it was death or life on the tottering ledge was passing between us.

How I escaped I do not recall. At this point my sleep must have been interrupted, for I remember—if no more of my dream, which chilled me with horror—that I had not continued to lay my human being during my slow recovery, and few words were spoken in my presence. I was, however, anxiously ill for many weeks, which had passed in the delirium caused by brain fever. My wounds had been reopened, and the ground which I was necessary above all things, the mention of any agitating topic had been carefully avoided.

I began to think that my jealous surmises were unfounded, when I woke up night after night and found Alice sitting by my bed. She appeared slumbered in her chair unchidden, while my visitors watched over me. I remembered that my cousin Reginald had left our house, and that she had overtaxed her strength, but Alice would come back to my bedside when I woke at night.

The horrid dream which had followed my access of jealous fury returned to me frequently. I rejoiced that Alice's sweet face was beside my pillow when I woke from it. Nothing evil could remain with me during her presence, and I must be took possession of my senses in her absence, bring my prayer before me that accompanied it.

I thought that the house seemed singularly quiet, and that my nurses were all grave, even sad, in their demeanor; but this was probably occasioned by the precariousness of my situation. Alice, in their opinion, fearing to excite me, avoided that; but I trusted that, with returning health, I should see her under happier auspices, and, if she loved me, I felt sure that, spoiled and petted as per less lovely than when she smiled upon me every hours.

No rival came between us now. My sick-chamber was visited only by the physicians, and by the kind neighbors who had been to see my son. Not a breath of what was passing without reached me. I had been ill for many weeks, during, for whom I was once more beginning to entertain affection, never came to see me; but pride restrained me from asking why they did not come.

Once, when I casually mentioned his name, Alice looked confused, and I fancied that she would grieve; her bright eyes filled with tears.

"Do not let us speak of any one but ourselves," she said, in a low voice. "They are worth. It may be selfishness, but I can not interest myself in any thing that does not concern you and me. Nothing doors till you are well enough to leave this chamber of sickness, and share the pains and pleasure of the world once more with me."

I could not quarrel with her answer, though I strove to chase away the tears that followed it, and lent her thoughts to brighter prospects. When I was sufficiently recovered to leave my chamber, I felt so weak, and as I, the once strong man, lay prostrate, incapable of moving. I thanked my God for the blessing which it might be to me, and I fell into such guilt as in the visions of the night had been denied me.

I do no know whether, at that moment, any one was watching by me. The person or persons in the room, if it were so, must have been very quiet, for not a sound disturbed me as I recalled the images which had been present with me in that fevered dream. The room I was in was one that I knew well, and which I had occupied as a nursery lodge of ornamental stone-work, which was among the entire front of that old house. It was barely furnished, and I knew that I was alone, and that I had walked the whole length of it in my fever. In my dream I came to my Cousin Reginald's room. He was now the master of the house, and slept in what had once been my grandfather's apartment. When I was a boy, the kind old man had had an illness, during which my mother nursed him; and the severest reprimand I ever received from her was when one of the servants told her that Master Hubert had got upon the stone ledge outside his window, and tried to walk round to one that opened into the chamber where she was sitting up with the invalid. My father said then that it was a thing impossible to be done, but in my dream I fancied that I had achieved it.

My cousin was a painter as well as a poet, and the room in which I imagined him lying was full of indications of his talent, which were gentle and refined. A half-finished picture stood on an easel, at which he must have been working before he fell asleep. It was Alice resting a letter, with a bright flush of happiness and warm love in her face, and a most beautiful attitude, modified by some old classic ideal of loveliness, but with her features, and in a habit she at times wore. He was stretched on a couch, still dressed as I had seen him, calm, but with the melancholy expression which had startled me. His delicate, artistic-erratic features and pale complexion, which looked as if white in the moonlight, were distinctly seen in their regular beauty. I do not know what disturbed his slumbers, for all passed dreamlike in silence. I saw him, and, rising from my couch, I came forward to close the window at which I was standing. The ledge was narrow; but it seemed to me a touch would throw me off my balance, and precipitate me many fathoms to the paved court below. I was aware of a strange struggle with which I had steadied my footsteps on the giddy ledge, as I approached the open casement once more, the fierce rising of blood-thirsty passion. Though no words were exchanged, we seemed to know that it was death or life on the tottering ledge was passing between us.

How I escaped I do not recall. At this point my sleep must have been interrupted, for I remember—if no more of my dream, which chilled me with horror—that I had not continued to lay my human being during my slow recovery, and few words were spoken in my presence. I was, however, anxiously ill for many weeks, which had passed in the delirium caused by brain fever. My wounds had been reopened, and the ground which I was necessary above all things, the mention of any agitating topic had been carefully avoided.

I began to think that my jealous surmises were unfounded, when I woke up night after night and found Alice sitting by my bed. She appeared slumbered in her chair unchidden, while my visitors watched over me. I remembered that my cousin Reginald had left our house, and that she had overtaxed her strength, but Alice would come back to my bedside when I woke at night.

The horrid dream which had followed my access of jealous fury returned to me frequently. I rejoiced that Alice's sweet face was beside my pillow when I woke from it. Nothing evil could remain with me during her presence, and I must be took possession of my senses in her absence, bring my prayer before me that accompanied it.

I thought that the house seemed singularly quiet, and that my nurses were all grave, even sad, in their demeanor; but this was probably occasioned by the precariousness of my situation. Alice, in their opinion, fearing to excite me, avoided that; but I trusted that, with returning health, I should see her under happier auspices, and, if she loved me, I felt sure that, spoiled and petted as per less lovely than when she smiled upon me every hours.

No rival came between us now. My sick-chamber was visited only by the physicians, and by the kind neighbors who had been to see my son. Not a breath of what was passing without reached me. I had been ill for many weeks, during, for whom I was once more beginning to entertain affection, never came to see me; but pride restrained me from asking why they did not come.

Once, when I casually mentioned his name, Alice looked confused, and I fancied that she would grieve; her bright eyes filled with tears.

"Do not let us speak of any one but ourselves," she said, in a low voice. "They are worth. It may be selfishness, but I can not interest myself in any thing that does not concern you and me. Nothing doors till you are well enough to leave this chamber of sickness, and share the pains and pleasure of the world once more with me."

I could not quarrel with her answer, though I strove to chase away the tears that followed it, and lent her thoughts to brighter prospects. When I was sufficiently recovered to leave my chamber, I felt so weak, and as I, the once strong man, lay prostrate, incapable of moving. I thanked my God for the blessing which it might be to me, and I fell into such guilt as in the visions of the night had been denied me.

I do no know whether, at that moment, any one was watching by me. The person or persons in the room, if it were so, must have been very quiet, for not a sound disturbed me as I recalled the images which had been present with me in that fevered dream. The room I was in was one that I knew well, and which I had occupied as a nursery lodge of ornamental stone-work, which was among the entire front of that old house. It was barely furnished, and I knew that I was alone, and that I had walked the whole length of it in my fever. In my dream I came to my Cousin Reginald's room. He picked up the sword-stick which had done me good service in the dark streets of Constantinople among the drunken Bashi-Bazouks and thieving Greeks. The sight of the weapon recalled the dream which I had had when I was first taken ill—I had forgotten it lately. Reginald's dimly-lighted room, the pale, graceful youth reclining among works of art with the pale gleam of the night-lamp shining on his handsome face. I shuddered, and was about to put aside the sword-stick, when some involuntary impulse made me try to unsheath it. The blade was rusted to the handle, and refused to come forth. My hands trembled; I was forced to use against the task; when at last, with a more vigorous effort, I succeeded, and saw a dull red stain upon the blue sheen of the polished steel.

At that moment my self-control gave way. I threw the weapon back into the closet from which I had taken it, and hurried from the room, and out into the door; Alice was shedding her parting tears on her mother's shoulder. The pestilence were re-gaining with difficulty their temporary ascend. Every one was crowding round us with congratulations and good wishes. I passed on unheeded on the threshold. Should I reveal the dark thoughts passing through my mind? After all, what was there? Mere vague surmises, based upon the airy fabric of a dream; while before me was life—real, palpable happiness. I drove these away from her parents, impatiently, but with tenderness, lifted her into the carriage; and the next moment the carriage was whirling down the broad roofs of the old hall, were fast fading from our view.

A month passed quickly with us. I think, I believe, that Alice was happy. For myself, I can not tell. I seemed to live in a dream, more real than the accursed vision which, day and night, was present to my eye, and ear, and brain. I found myself imagining myself walking along that giddy ledge, standing myself by the aid of a weapon down which blood was slowly dripping. What was it against that the nervous shrets and tremors which often shook my frame were the natural result of my illness. All that was soothing and gentle lay in her voice and manner; yet their very sweetness tortured me within the secret chamber of my soul. I had done a deed for which my life might be the forfeit. Had it been so?

Never was this sensation stronger than when we drove up the long avenue leading to our home. There were her parents, whom I regarded as my own now; the old servants, who had known us from infancy. Must I shrink before them, and in terror—a murderer? Would any one believe that I had done this most vile deed in my sleep—unconsciously—I, who had so much to live for—my cousin's death? and yet could the tortures of the prisoner in his confession have been greater? I almost endure if I loved among them bearing the weight of such a burden on my heart! Could I hide it from Alice—from whom we had all of us some talks with me, and were so near me in blood?

As I crossed the threshold, even while Alice was blushingly receiving her parents' kisses and congratulations, my resolve was taken. I would be selfish, put in practice. Nothing could exceed the surprise of my relations when I announced, upon opening the letters that awaited my return, I said that in one of them my immediate presence in London was required. That was but just before the time the train at the next station. I took nothing with me but a change of clothes, and my revolver-case, which had lain unnoticed in the dark corner to which I had consigned it; and, declining Alice's offer to accompany me, I left the house in haste, and was soon traveling through the soft darkness of the summer night, alone—and free from the oppressing the letters that awaited my return, I said that in one of them my immediate presence in London was required. That was but just before the time the train at the next station. I took nothing with me but a change of clothes, and my revolver-case, which had lain unnoticed in the dark corner to which I had consigned it; and, declining Alice's offer to accompany me, I left the house in haste, and was soon traveling through the soft darkness of the summer night, alone—and free from the oppressing consciousness of my self-imposed task.

I now heard for the first time the exact particulars of the state in which Sir Reginald Moore was found when his servant entered the room the morning after his death. Every one could be convinced that it had been brought about by violent means, but whether his own hand or that of a murderer had put an end to his life, had never been ascertained. Every circumstance corresponded with the images in the dream, as I had seen them reflected in my self, which had shown us his last moments. The absence of his weapon was the only point which was fatally corroborated the idea I had lately entertained.

There had been marks, my old friend was forced to confess, of some person or persons having entered the room by the window, which was standing open, but this was contradicted by the absence of any footprints on the border beneath; and the impression was that Sir Reginald had himself thrown away the weapon with which he had committed the deed. Search had been made for it, however, he said.

Though my version of the story was almost incredible—in spite of the many circumstances which told against me—my companions believed it. Not having voluntarily surrendered to take my trial, at the moment when I should have been the object of suspicion of my life, was regarded as a strong proof that my guilt was not premeditated. No walking man, it was decided, could have passed to and fro in safety along that dizzy ledge. I certainly could not have done it myself. Then the horrible shuddering which my brain was affected; beginning that very night, was ascribed to brain fever, resolved in my country's battles, made that illness very regard it as impossible that the officer before them, with the Victoria Cross and Crimean clasps and medals on his breast, could be a cold-blooded murderer. Those twelve honest men judged not by the dictates of their own noble hearts, and, after a short consultation, unanimously acquitted me.

But I had been arraigned before a severer tribunal, which was still unsatisfied. The revengeful, passionate impulses which murdered me in my sleep—which strewed my brain, and made me pass in sleep that fearful fluidcon which divides guilt from innocence—were still remembered, and lifted me with remorse; for me, the gifts of wealth and happy connections were as dust. I could not enjoy life under the shadow of the words that once were fire, or rewrite the scene of dreadful murder—he perished by my hand, or by that which I had deprived of life? Better, as it seemed to me, that I should have died, and my memory, as the men of my old regiment were perishing day by day—sunk into sun-stroke and disease, on the burning soil of India—have profit by the untimely death of Reginald Moore!

My preparations were made silently. I did not mention even to my wife the resolution I had formed to her, after the trial was over, she pressed me to return to our home. My command of my regiment had been kept open for me till the last moment. I took up my quarters in the London, resolving to avail myself of the opportunity which the wiping off of the stigma which, in spite of all reason, had attached to my name, still weighed me down. It was only after I had received notice that the vessel which would take me to Calcutta, that I should be about to leave her.

"No, Hubert," she said, gently; "I am a letter dissembler than yourself. I have guessed your intention; a word spoken in sleep revealed it to me. I took my resolve as promptly as you did weeks, only you have not had time to recite it. I am going to accompany you to India."

Alice was not less firm than myself, and her cause was a better one. Her parents, too, much to a grieved friend, were on her side, and urged her arguments. How it might have been if I had been separated from her, I feel that I am not responsible for an action committed when my senses were not under the control of reason. The stirring scenes in which I was soon to be engaged in part have restoring my nerves and invigorated my constitution. I was not the first who had been unscathed: in the burning jungles and against swamps, I have watched and slept unharmed. This year's, it was said, will be a comparatively quiet one for warfare; and, when peace is proclaimed, I shall be laid down my sword, and, retiring on my hard-earned pension, settle down in England, satisfied that manly, arduous exertion, and the remembrance of that providential escape when passing through fire and battle, will enable me to struggle with the pleasure which at one time threatened to haunt our pleasant home.

As I look across the thereafter fields, black and torn as if a country of border war, and the sky reddened—as the smoke mounts to the lurid sky of burning villages, and upon fire by a cruel design; in the wake of the army, despite the stern edicts of our gallant commander-in-chief, and the vigilance of the provost-marshal—Englishmen, and Sepoys, and peaceful homes, rises before me. I see the old manor house that I was born in, and which I return to me; and I hear, instead of the shrill rèveille and the dropping shots, the cheerful cawing of the rooks as in the days when I used to come before the squire's barriers, as the pack bursts from the kennel.

Transcriber's note: Text duplicated in original.

WILLIE'S TROUBLES.

WILLIE did have troubles; he thought he did, any way; and I suppose "three-year-old" troubles are just as hard to bear as thirty-year-old trials. He is sure about it. Why, Willie's life is a big parable of the grape-vine, this one summer morning, and he says so himself. "Ah! Willie was the happiest days now!" as she watched him coming up the long path from the poultry-yard. But Aunt Abby didn't think so. Willie's life knew well enough that he had been grievously ill-treated, and he had been left to cry by mother, who could be tried to wipe away with his little fat hand. He had wandered off to see some wee, white, soft, fluffy chickens, "cunnin' little things," he called that Margaret—or "Marget," as he called her—and Aunt Abby had warned "Marget" against them as they followed the old hen about, the tall Shanghai, known as the "big rooster," walked up deliberately and pecked the wee chickens fiercely, then putting his long legs one before the other, and they looked like an "action, off," which the Silbouter, leaving Willie looking at his empty hand in astonishment. This was what he was looking for, half-grown chickens, that he might succeed as he trotted toward home. Great additions to his troubles were the sudden rain, and the appearance of a gravel stone in his shoe. So he was thoroughly miserable until good Aunt Abby had bathed his feet and changed his clothes, and "Marget" had brought a bowl of bread and milk to comfort him. Then mamma appeared, and Willie was put to bed, where he went to sleep, and dreamed a red rooster, with a limp arm bonnet on its head, was eating bread and milk out of his bowl.

Little those of children of a larger growth, many of Willie's troubles were the result of his going out of the right path. Thus it happened that he was "so frightened to see mamma" when she came to take care of him. It was a bright, beautiful morning, and the hay-makers had gone down the hill, through the lane, and over to the "back meadows," their shining scythes glittering in the distance. Willie's father had gone, too, he saw, in the straw hat you could yet see far away. The cows had been milked, and they too had gone "down the lane." So to Willie it seemed that all the world was going that way, and he might as well try the same road. So he did; stood: stopping a little while to look through the rail-fence at the cow, which was not quite as tall as himself now: then he sauntered slowly along, until he found himself absent by the bridge over the little stream, looking off to where the daisies by the way he was walking to himself. He was getting pretty tired now, and the back meadows seemed to stretch out farther and farther away. The brook, too, which he began to look backward and upward, but the long hill hid the house from sight. So he sat down there that now began to small him, he saw "Tearsus" coming down the hill.

Tearsus" was Margit's corruption of "Taurus," as Willie's father was wont to call a mischievous young bull, a year or two old, who roamed at will from the barn-yard to the fields. When he saw Willie he stopped to look at him in a quizzical way, as much as to say, "What are you doing here?" I don't suppose he would have hurt him any way, but Willie didn't know: so he scrambled out "Marget!" over so many times, and every time Tearsus would come a little nearer.

Marget was wishing the churn-dash, and had just hung the clean white milk-dasher up in the basin of the cherry-tree to dry, when she heard one of the strange sounds. Giving her old head an expressive sniff every year, and saying to herself "Sakes alive, if I don't believe that Taur-us is after our baby!" off she started, catching up a broom as she went. But she was already too late. Willie was up and after her in a moment, wide awake, and ready for any excitement. Marget screamed, but it did not take her long to catch sight of the animal, who was now putting his head down in a very threatening way. It was now time for action, and could see Willie, who was cowering in an angle of the fence. A stout, hickory-handled hoe lay upon the buckle on his hat, and then she knew how matters stood. In three minutes more she had him to her own; while "Taur-us" was trying to punish the boy who jumped around him too nimbly to be caught.

All Willie's troubles were not experienced in a day: for the afternoon proved no more fortunate than the morning had been. After dinner was over, and he was comfortably rested from his fright, having a well about four inches deep, of very unreasonable circumference, he felt that he must go and do it like a mouse. But when, with much vexation of spirit, he carried a cupful of water to fill it, and found the liquid would drain it up, and then with a third cupful—brought the weary length of the double-walk—and found that it was all in vain, he was in despair, sat down under the old apple-tree, and cried. His hands and clothes being somewhat untidy in consequence of his "grubbing" in the soil, and hands being lifted to wipe away the tears from his cheeks, he was presently in a sad condition indeed.

Aunt Abby didn't think so when she came to the door to look for him. Both her dainty hands rest up in a homely way on her hips, and she called to mamma to see the condition that Willie was in; "chip-dirt" in his hair, "chip-dirt" upon his clothes, "chip-dirt" in solution on his cheeks, and "chip-dirt" in its natural state every where. He was voted under the floor all day every night, and he met with no more mishaps that day.

These are some of his troubles, and I will soon the lees real to him than are ours.

. . . . Time has traveled on. Seven years have come over our little land, and now he is eleven years old; taller, somewhat wiser than when we last saw him; still mischievous, though not to that "trouble" belongs to no age or circumstance. But now a shadow is on him that seems to make him any older. He has come before. "The farm" is to be sold. Father has become tired of the vexatious care of a farmer's life, and is about to remove to the city. As Willie takes up the village paper he reads:

On the 8th of March "the Willetts Farm" to be sold, etc.

His eyes are full of tears as he catches the sentence, "Also a span of horses;" for he thinks of the noble, gentle creatures he has loved so much, and can remember; and laying down the paper, the boy walks slowly out to the stable to spit their grain in behind and under their familiar mangers once more. They greet him as they always do; but feeling just as he does, they do not whinny as they generally do on the manger beside "Jeannie," and laying his arm on her neck he cries, with boyish earnest: and his eyes cry no more.

As he raises his head at last and looks out of the stable-door, he can not be sure that he sees a dimness, around whose foot "mother" has been so many spring times to gather the anemones and spring beauties that have been earlier than the violets; since: and remembering how mother has known and loved every one of them, Willie's thoughts cross him for the first time that perhaps she is suffering too in the prospect of leaving home, and with true unselfishness he runs to the house to look back, and thinks how he will be brave for mother's sake, and how he will not let her know how sorry he is.

Ah, sor Willie was a whole little fellow; and though the boy came to be a man who helped her household thoughts and look at all that was bright in future. "Jeannie" was sold, and the "span," "farming utensils," "household furniture," etc., all as set forth. One after another the familiar objects, that seemed to him part of himself, were carried off by stranger hands, and there only remained the animals not yet driven away by their new owners. His courage was oozing out at his eyes now, and he ran up to the south room to look from its sunny window as the neck cows were one by one driven away, and the horses were guided out of the barn-yard, and down the familiar road that had held rein over them for years.

But Willie was not alone. His little mother, as he called her, was there before him; and mother and son mingled their tears. Then they were cheered, and agreed that they must not let father know how sad they felt, because he was doing all for the best, and would grieve so much to know that they were unhappy. Then in that future that seems so patent to the boy—"When I get to be a man"—Willie saw himself rich enough to buy it back again.

We pass over our hero's college days, with their special griefs and woes. Jim Wetherell was the prize which he had only missed by want of constancy to a trifling rule; his friend and class-mate turned traitor to him when he should have been most true; and other trials of the same nature came to him as they do to us all. But the old, old story comes like new to every heart that treads the path.

Twenty-two, a profession fairly attained, a position fairly won. Now already have the baby touches had begun to fade remembrance of the sorrows of the past; and now he, too, looks at a little girl, regard within passing by and says, "Happy day! he is seeing his happiest days." But a sorrow is coming to him even now.

When he had left his home he had said "Good-by, mother," as he went to call her, beneath the spreading elms of the village, but right, as he saw the expression of triumph that curled her lip when he asked "if Southern ranks would bloom if shelled by a Northern band?" nor did he look at night the hurried adieu with which she left him. Today he will come, for there comes a time now, performed and visited, simply "regretting his mistake," he knew Southern rose was destined for a plaster's home long time ere since," said Willie to "Marget," and such like mockery, the bells of the South flung back as much as they sent out a heart as true.

How well he bore that blow his mother knew; now he suffers. One alone. . . . It was the one of his life, and its memory lived always.

The bright future in which he had reveled was dead, ambition was dead now, and he became wonderfully bitterly—from all but one—his mother. The boy's devotion to her was the man's idolatry, and the heart that must love some one soul turned warmly to the guiding star of his infancy. But the trial of the serpent is the fate of the eagle who lurks in the breast "that pillowed his baby head." With the same energy that disappointed love often has flung himself into business, until, at thirty, he found himself rich enough to realize the dream of his boyhood.

It was a bright, beautiful May morning when carriages were seen coming in the direction of the Willetts domain; and though "Old Morris" looked up at it, they passed him without recognizing in the gray head and face the "master" the master" he had served on the "shaver" he had carried. They knew him, and the old, white-haired lap-man was made to understand it all the tears rolled down his black face faster than he could wipe them away with the back of his hand. As he removed his hat they saw that Time had touched the woolly head, but that the sunshine of many years had fled since those happy days when they were an unbroken circle. "The face of the "Widow Willetts" grew pale as she saw the carriages approach her coming years ago a bride, or her going forth again. She had walked leaning on her husband at the gate, and her son, with the enthusiasm of his boyhood once more upon him, led her about to see the well-loved old place, improved since her time; and the vines had clustered higher, the shadows from the trees were more dense, and the flowers in the brook almost hid its silver light. In all his life he had never felt the thrill of happiness that he did now as he hung over his mother's chair as the old porch they loved and remembered so well, touching her hair, and saying, with a smile, how the gray hairs were peeping among them, but talking, as he did so, in a high-earth had some spot where sorrow could not enter, and this were one.

"Now, mother, I know you'll get well here; Dr. Grayson has got you. I feel sure he look better already."

She looked up with a grateful smile, simply saying,

"I hope so. . . . And her dark eyes were a little dim as she rested them on the fair face near that before the apple blossoms were turned to fruit she began to forget.

A something in the tones of her voice startled him, and as he took up the transparent hand that hung listlessly by her side he saw the hollowness the unwelcome tokens of disease.

"It is a little trembling—poor heart lear up bravely; it is coming. The light trials of the past vanish into nothing now as the dark cloud of foreboding settled over him.

Not the breath of those flowers that are blooming gave to him the sweet, yet melancholy, heartsnow-tree; nor the aroma of that lilac planted by her hand; nor the warm south wind that comes to us so refreshingly, telling of the summer that has passed; and, sudden still, not the tones of love that surround her can keep her here.

Still she sits in her old arm-chair to watch the setting sun go down behind the hills that rise from the vista of the evening glow from the twilight, and she knows that, when her sun of life has set, brighter than light of earth will rise over her eternal home from the mists of death. As she sits thus she invokes many a blessing, laying her hand on the head of her only son, bowed as it is with sorrow, and she feels that "He doeth all things well." A prescience comes upon her that when the last veil of earthly joy, is taken, he will yield the heart yet unbroken!

And it was even so; for before the Katydid had hummed her song his mother was in heaven, and though he bowed beneath the tempest of sorrow that swept over him, it pleased God to raise him up a cousin, homeless and, and the peace that passeth understanding came into his heart. When he told adieu to his old home he was accompanied to the station by a train, acknowledging humbly that God knows best, and that his trouble have worked out for him an exceeding great reward, even life eternal.

LIFE-SCENES IN THE SOUTH—ILLUSTRATIVE OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE.

A TRUE SNAKE STORY.

YEARS ago I was called in consultation to see a lad of fourteen or fifteen, a year or two after I commenced the practice of physic. He was very ill then, but God blessed the prescription and he recovered health, and has very recently moved westward. His father, an estimable old gentleman, whose friendship I shall ever value, related to me the following narrative, at the time when we were watching with anxious suspense the crisis of his beloved boy's fate. Said the old man, with a trembling lip and a moist eye: "Sir, if that boy is spared now, it will be the second time that God in his goodness has saved him from almost inevitable death. I have heard, Sir, some dreadful tales of the cobra da capello, the most mighty of all reptiles in the East; but there is none on record to match the horror, the dreadful agony which I endured when this boy was but four years old: the recollection of which still makes my heart stand still and my knees smite together again, almost as hard as they did ten years ago. Oh, Sir! others may have had the cobra wreaund around their own limbs, or coiled under their heads as a pillow, or creeping with slow pace over their recumbent forms as they reclined upon their Eastern couch, but never felt the torturing anguish of a father's heart who sees his beloved boy about to place his little foot into the wide, extended jaws of a huge rattlesnake, and yet with no power to arrest his approaching footsteps."

The good old man paused, drew forth his handkerchief to wipe the gathering sweat upon his brow, then bowed his head upon his hand and resumed in a lower tone:

"Oh, Sir! excuse a father's weakness!"

I immediately said, "Nay dear Sir, I honor your manhood! Pray proceed. I feel deeply interested in your story;" and involuntarily I drew my chair closer to the aged man upon which he was seated. Thus urged, the old gentleman continued his narrative in the following strain:

"It was a sultry afternoon in the month of August, and the sun had nearly sunk in the western horizon. At the request of my little George, then scarcely four years old, I sallied forth to one of my fields to hunt bobwes—a specimen of lowbush muscadines, very common in the Southern States, at the same time not forgetting to take along with me my double-barrelled gun; hoping to come across some squirrel who had been fattening upon wild grapes during the summer. I was walking at a slow pace along a serpentine fence, with my eyes turned occasionally upon the branches of the trees and then upon the low bushes which grew thick in the corners of the rail-fence which skirted the field. I was so intently looking for game and for fruit at the same time, that I scarcely ever turned my eyes upon the ground, nor ever dreamed that danger was lurking there. I had walked probably a mile, thus absorbed in my double pursuit, when I accidentally, or rather providentially, cast my eyes upon the ground, when, to my great and sudden surprise, I beheld a large rattlesnake coiled up before me. He had been perhaps asleep, or was partially blind from the film which covers their sight at this season of the year before they have shed their old skin; and then it is said that their virus is most deadly. You know also, that when in this state, during the months of August and September, when, like the chrysalis, they are about to quit their old shell—"to cast their old slough"—they are too inert to flee away, as they usually do at other times, at the sound of approaching footsteps. At this fatal period, as if courting attack, they are either found already coiled up as if prepared for contest, or they immediately do so at the slightest intimation of approach on the part of man or beast. Then, too, the virus of the rattlesnake is said to be most deadly, often destroying its victim in a few moments; whether because being so long pent up in the little pendulous sacs attached to each fang it has lost a portion of its watery elements by absorption, or by the process of evaporation, or rather transpiration from the intense heat of the summer months, the poison has become converted from a sub-acid to an acid of a highly concentrated and most virulent character, I know not, nor have I had the opportunity to determine. But pardon this digression. It is enough to say, and those who have seen this venomous reptile when fully aroused, will feel something like the ebb awe creeping over them when I tell them that he was a huge monster, with no less than thirteen rattles, which were now ringing wildly, and with an electric effect, which ran strangely through my nervous system. His head was erect, and turned toward the direction I was coming, while his eye turned with an intensely brilliant and almost dazzling light; and had I not been in imminent danger, I would have delighted to gaze in calm contemplation upon this most beautiful, but most deadly, of God's creatures—to look upon his eye flashing with anger, and his spotted folds quivering with wrath, while his dreaded rattles rung their fierce alarm upon the evening air, waking with confused and bewildering echoes the stillness of the neighboring forest. Indeed, Sir, none but those who have once heard the fierce alarm of this deadly serpent, when thoroughly aroused to anger, can imagine the strangely bewildering effect which it produces upon the hearer. The prolonged sounds echoing and re-echoing around you seem to proceed from no particular direction. Like the startling Indian drum, it rolls its war-notes upon the ground so that the very earth seems to vibrate and tremble beneath your feet and partake of your terror. Unlike the watchman's night-rattle, which summons the distant sentry to the sense of danger or of contest, you may listen in vain to ascertain whence issue the sounds which startle the ear or where lies the hidden foe. You seem to be surrounded by ten thousand attacking foes armed with deadly vengeance. They give you warning of their approach, it is true, but you can not perceive the coverts whence they are approaching. And of what avail is their warning? The whole atmosphere seems to be filled with confused echoes, blended and yet distinct; so that you are surrounded, enveloped by the terrifying notes of the deathdealing monster. At one moment they appear to be before and then behind you; on your right and again upon your left; and then again the poor bewildered victim starts with horror, as though he had heard the rolling of the Indian's war-drum under his very feet, or the stunning blast of Death's trumpet in his ear. It is vain to flee before you have ascertained where lurks the concealed danger. For until you have seen the basilisk eyes of the monster, and beheld his spotted folds quivering with vengeful ire, your safest expedient is to stand still; for you know not if, in moving from your tracks, you may not enter the serpent's den or tread upon him when coiled for his spring.

"If such, Sir, was the effect produced upon my auditory nerves when I could both see as well as hear this deadly serpent, what must be the confusion created in the mind of one who, surrounded by the tall grass or thick bushes, is startled for the first time by the dreaded ringing of the rattlesnake, warning him to approach no nearer, for death is in the brake and beneath the breast? To stand still is perhaps certain destruction, but to flee away is to rush into the vortex of almost inevitable death.

"But, Sir, I had no time then to pause for reflection. Indeed my observations were all made in a single moment—in the twinkling of an eye; for at the next step I would have trod upon his body. In fact, I had raised my right foot, and was about to make another onward step, when, looking down, and hearing his startling rattle at the same time, I beheld the terrible monster lying just in my pathway, but a single step before me. He could easily have struck me, for he was prepared for battle, and his keen, hooked fangs were even then filled to overflowing with the gore and death-dealing virus. But God held him still, and restrained his spring in the same way that He shut the mouths of the lions that they hurt not his child, Daniel. Gathering up my strength, I made a leap—a sudden and a single leap, in the air. You know, Sir, that, for a man of my age, I am considered an exceedingly active man; indeed I may say, without boasting, that there are few young men who can leap higher or jump farther than I can, when, in some perilous ball mood, I feel disposed to exhibit my agility. I was therefore, must have been a long and an almost supernatural leap, for it was done in a sudden terror; the consciousness that sudden death, in its most threatening, most forbidding aspect, now stared me in the face.

"But I was safe myself. That single leap saved me; and I felt certain that there was no longer any cause for personal alarm. In a moment I turned and looked back, with the intention to step my son George where he then was. Oh, Sir! what horrors! who can imagine my anguish then! My little boy, instead of standing as I left him, was what he witnessed my sudden alarm, and utterly unconscious of the lurking danger, child-like, pressed forward to his father, with forward his countenance, his little feet bending down lightly the luxuriant grass, and bringing him swiftly to the very jaws of the terrible monster, a victim to his blind rage, now doubly aroused because it had been foiled in his attack by my happy and providential escape.

"Now, Sir, picture to yourself the dreadful scene: My little boy is approaching the fatal reptile with fearful rapidity; indeed he is now but a single step from him—but a step between life and death. My hand is upon the trigger, it is true; but it is now too late to fire, for I know not if, in shooting the snake, I may not kill my child. Can you imagine a feud father's anguish then? With the weapon in my hand I dared not use it, but stood petrified with horror. My heart stood still, as if its walls had been pressed together in the strong hand of some giant. My respiration was suspended, my eyes were ready to start from their sockets, while great drops of sweat, cold as death itself, started from every pore. I stood transfixed as by the look of a basilisk; petrified with horror, as those who have been turned into stone by the gaze of a Medusa; and I gave up my boy as lost—hopelessly lost.

"But, Sir, a good God was at hand; a kind Providence was nigh; and, oh, how I do thank Him for his kind and merciful direction and interference in the hour of danger! And here the good old man bowed his head again, and a few silent tears of gratitude trickled down his cheeks. But in a moment he resumed his narrative in a more mournful—in less mournful tone.

"Well, Sir, I will conclude my story in a few words: As I stood looking in the utmost consternation, and expecting to witness at the next instant the fatal spring, my little George made the next step forward, and trod upon the serpent's head! His weight was sufficient to press it down to the earth. A few more steps and he was in safety by his father's side. The enraged serpent, relieved from the downward pressure of the little boy's foot, raised his head again, and rung his rattle loud and shrill as the death-cry of Satan's vengeance. But, blind with fury, he leaped in the wrong direction—the very direction in which he had last seen his appalling victim. But, thank God! his intended victim was safe now; and I had sufficiently recovered my consciousness to perceive, and then well pay, such deliberate aim, and fired. With almost savage exultation at my success, and then well my gun, full praise in my heart toward a good and beneficent Deity, I beheld the now headless monster writhing in the agonies of death, and I blessed God.

"I GAVE UP MY BOY AS LOST—HOPELESSLY LOST."

"TRAITOR, YOUR DOOM IS SEALED!"—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

When the old gentleman ended his interesting narrative I thanked him for his story, rose from my seat, and extended to him my hand. He placed my hand upon the wrist of the patient; his pulse was now soft, and from 140 had fallen down to 90, while his skin was moist with a gentle perspiration. The touch of my finger woke him from a gentle slumber. His eyes wandered upon me unconsciously, but was surprised to see me there. I directed another potion to be administered; remembered him to sleep a long and refreshing sleep; closed the door, and went out with a smile upon my lips, for all the cats in my house!

"And how is my boy, Doctor?" asked the anxious parent as soon as I entered the parlor.

"Your son, my dear Sir," I replied, "has again escaped the grim monster, Death; and if my prognosis is correct, he is, under God, as much indebted to his infant's foot pressed the serpent's head upon the earth, and closed his wide-extended jaws that he could no more inflict injury upon the human race, than could the hungry lions harm God's prophet in the lion's den."

STRUGGLE FOR LIFE WITH A MANIAC.

NEARLY twenty years ago I entered the office of my old friend and relative, Dr. F——, as a student of medicine. I was but nineteen then, and ardent after truth; and having a strong desire to look into the mysteries of a most fascinating science, I doubtless often worried him with innumerable questions the moment he put his foot into the office to obtain some article of medicine or mix up a prescription for his unmanageable patients. But it was all in vain that I questioned him, for it was rarely the case that I or any one else could obtain a response to our inquiries. The old gent was of a reserved and droll continually in the land of dreams—ever muttering to himself, as if in close communion with some spirit—perhaps holding converse, as did Socrates, with his guardian angel. Be this as it may, he was a good and a skilful man; kind to the poor, amiable to the poor, and so benevolent and sympathetic that his own health seemed to be at times poised by the sufferings of others as the objects of his pity. But he has ceased his muttering now, and doubtless they have joined the choir of the just prize; for he fell a victim to the yellow scourge of 1854, or at least from a disease contracted in one of that insidious malaria which consigned so many noble spirits to the tomb. He fell not, however, until the terrible plague had nearly exhausted its rages, and the grim "conqueror who sat upon the pale horse" had nearly ceased the victory, and then was wearied with wielding his blood-red sword. He was one of the "noble thirteen" who fell voluntarily at their posts in the hour of their country's need, though possessing ample means both to retire from the scene of danger and to remain comfortably where at the same time, be scorned to turn his back upon the common foe, or prove traitor to suffering humanity. Placing his life in the hands of his Creator, all his perilous position; and if, like Bonaparte at the siege and tocking of Acre, he was hurled from the scaling-ladder, like him, too, he fell gloriously, sword in hand, and with victory shouted in his ears! If Death's hook flag had for a time been waved in triumph from the city walls, and if crape had covered many a portal, and mourning had filled many a sad face, he had the gratification to hear the music of the trumpet-notes of victory, and knew that Death's banner now trailed in the dust!

"His friends, who gathered round him, sad
Watch'd him, when none but God could help,
And the red field was won:
Then saw, in death, his spirit close
Calmly and in sweet repose,
Like flowers at set of sun!"

But if the good old Doctor was a silent and a thoughtful man, and if he usually held converse with his own spirit, and found entertainment by whispering to himself in the midnight hour, there were times when he was not only communicative to others, but even jocose; for he loved the world around to pervade his heart and fill his soul with pleasure. He was then no longer the same being; and happy the man who could find such a mood, and need, for he was sure to receive amusement or instruction. It was in such a mood that I found him, in answer to one of my inquiries, he related to me the following narrative, which, if it does not thrill my readers as it did me, will certainly entertain them with another remarkable illustration of God's wonderful providence regarding the weak and the frail.

"It was in the year 1815," the old Doctor began, "that I was seated, late one summer evening, in the front room of my office, at the dilapidated village of Parsybury, in a state of profound war of my practice, and I was then an active young man, for my arm was not then withered, and my soul was now, from a recent fracture, and my head was not then either bald or grey from age and anxious care and hard-fought battles, and sleepless, night and day, in all kinds of weather. I was then, my boy, as you, and almost as young, as you are; for I had not yet taken to myself an additional wife, and my soul nature have ordered all the sons of Adam to do.

"I had been thus seated for some considerable time, engaged in reading Dr. Rush's Treatise upon the blind, and pondering upon its singular conclusions in insanity, when Reason has been hurled from her pedestal, whether by the ruthless or suicidal hand of man or the vengeful wrath or beneficent kindness of God; for in some cases I contend that it is through pure kindness that God afflicts men with insanity, 'for whom He loveth He chasteneth.' Thus musing, my ear caught the quick and hurried footsteps of some one approaching, and in a moment a gentleman, whom I had known for some time as a peaceable and quiet citizen, entered the office and instantly seated himself in a chair before me.

"'Doctor,' said he, in a quick, stern, and dictatorial manner, 'I wish you to bleed me, and that right away.'

"I felt hurt at first at his abrupt way of speaking and setting; but on feeling his pulse, and looking into his bloodshot eyes, I discovered that he was laboring under the excitement of a high fever; and, excusing him for his apparent rudeness, I replied to him, mildly, 'Yes, Sir, I will bleed you, Sir, for, indeed, you need it badly enough, and right speedily!'

"He smiled almost savagely at my response, but made no reply, and I at once proceeded to bandage: and taking from my silver case a sharp lancet, I made a full, free incision in the left median vein. The blood flowed freely; and after abstracting twelve or fourteen ounces, I closed the orifice, and carefully applied a cool wet lint to the wound, I applied the figure of 8 bandage to his wounded arm, removed his cravat, and, after some persuasion, succeeded in getting him to lie down upon my own bed. I could not persuade him to pull off his clothes, and I therefore complied to his request 'to let him alone, as he wished to rest only a little while, and then he would get up from the bed, and put up there for the night.' But he soon fell into a profound slumber; and as it became dark, I lighted my night-lamp and placed it on a small table. It was not my custom before I had left the family to which I was then a boarder for patients during the day, there was no necessity that I should be with them at night; and I therefore, about nine o'clock, and three quarters past, upon a lounge in the same apartment, expecting to enjoy sweet rest, and, if possible, dream of my day's ride, 'a foul fall asleep. I awoke about midnight, and finding my patient still slept soundly, and even snored loudly, I turned over upon the other side, with my face to the wall, and concluded to sleep until morning, and then to return home.

"I had just done so when the deep and heavy breathing ceased, and I was at once aroused from my listening I rose up and looked toward the bed. There was no longer any person lying upon it. My patient had suddenly disappeared. Startled at his sudden and noiseless disappearance, I heard a light, and feeble voice say, 'Doctor!' and I recognized way I cried out, 'What are you doing there?'

"There was no response to my inquiry at the time, but in a moment he re-entered my sleeping apartment, with a large carving knife in his hand, which he had procured from my amputating-case, lying upon a shelf in the ante-room. It was a sharp-pointed, keen-edged knife, known to me as a razor—a most deadly weapon in the hands of a frenzied man. I felt that I was in for it, first time, that I had to deal with a maniac!—a man, too, of large frame and powerful muscles! I could not escape from the room, for besides, and he was, besides, armed with a most deadly weapon. I was not terrified; and becoming aware of those miserable assassins, the 'beware as sang,' I felt that I was equal to the occasion. Thank God, 1794. A chill of horror crept over me, as I saw there was no earthly chance to escape; for he had carefully locked the door, and had the key in his pocket—I presume, to prevent any assistance from me, should I need it. But I was prepared for the result, and resolved to sell my human arm, and that resistance would not only be useless but worse than nonsense—madness. I knew that I was to die alone, butwhere like a dog by the hands of a noble-hearted man. Such was my reflection, as, in a brain reeled, I closed my eyes and staggered back a few paces; for his imagination I felt the dark drawn across my throat driven through my pulsating heart. But recovering myself in a few moments, I felt as composed and collected as I could well assume, 'What do you intend to do with that knife?'

"His reply was, 'To kill you, Sir!' And the madman hissed between his clenched teeth, 'To kill, kill, kill!'

"'Why?' I asked. 'What evil have I ever done you?'

"'Done me!' he replied, with a sneer; 'done me! Have you not plotted my destruction? Do not I know that you are a vile conspirator? Did not God as his eye caught sight, for the first time, of his bloodshirted face, 'I am not a cowardly assassin!' Look at my blood, which, like a vampire, you have been sending from my veins! Look at the diabolical security upon your bed! Traitor, your doom is sealed!'

"I assured him that I had done him no evil, and attempted to explain the circumstances of his case. But in vain did I endeavor to reason with him, upon the occurrences of the day before; and when I solemnly assured him that I was his friend, while he slept, and that some secret enemy of his must have shed that blood during my slumber—he but angrily regretted his forbearance, as I would have defended his life at the sacrifice of my own.

"'Liar!' he shrieked. 'Will you add falsehood to your crimes? Will you stain your soul with perjury when it is about to be ushered into the presence of its Maker?' Down upon your knees, and ask God for mercy and forgiveness, last it be speedily sent to the bar of a just retribution unshrived and unannealed!' And he brandished his weapon wildly as he approached me, declaring that he could easily have plunged it into my heart. I stood still and closed my eyes; my heart seemed frozen or turned into stone for a few moments; then it slowly again, and even regularly, resumed its beatings: they were not the throbbings of hope or of faith in God—they were rather the low wailing, the sullen surgings of despair—and I felt all the horrors of death rolling over my soul! As 'the lamb led to the slaughter is dumb and openeth not its mouth,' so also I felt resigned to my fate, and was even anxious that Death's dark curtain should fall at once, and thus end in blood his grim tragedy.

"My passive and resigned condition, or supposed obstinacy, seemed to provoke rather than increase the rage of the maniac; and, with an expression of fearful solicitude in his countenance, he seized me by the shirt-collar, exclaiming, 'Doctor, I can not kill you until you have prayed!' Down upon your knees, instantly! For woe is me if you die this sacrifice,' I attempted to reply, but my voice was acquired; for I felt condemned in my own sinful soul that at that time I had never sincerely prayed, and I knew not pardon through the blood of Christ. I said to him, therefore, and my own voice startled me when I uttered the words, 'I know not how to pray!'

"'But, Doctor!' said the maniac, 'you must and shall pray!' and by main strength he forced me upon my knees. Yes! those terrible words had been locked as by bars of steel that they could not burst in upon the merciful God, were sent by the strong hand of the maniac—and my heart touched the floor the lever of pride snapped at its side, and my whole soul was at once melted within. Then it was that a cry, wild and full of agony, rushed from my heart, as the gates rent in twain self, and with painful sobs I uttered the heart-felt prayer, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!'

"The madman uttered grateful approval, and a look of sympathy stole over his countenance. 'Doctor,' said he, 'I am sorry that I have to slay for you. I would have killed you before in anger, but now it pains me deeply that I am compelled to do so in a spirit of duty.' And he placed the heart of Abraham to slay his own son, so also do I feel that compelled for you; I am sure you are now God rather than man, and unless the Almighty shall prepare a escape-goat, "a ram caught in the bushes," you must perish. Will you submit in submission to your destiny?'

"He ceased speaking and looked down upon me with a sorrowful expression, and then added, with a smile, 'But, Doctor, before I do you my hurt, will you be so kind as to favor. Bleed me, by bleeding freely, and I will you to readjust the bandages. Will you comply with my request? Can you not? Come then, quick! for I feel like fainting!' and the maniac staggered backward and fell upon the lounge in a swoon. I sprang to his feet in a moment, secured the knife, and readjusted the bandage. I then bathed his pale face, and applied bartshorn to his nostrils, and poured a little down his throat; but it was a long, long time before he recovered from that deathly swoon. At one time I thought he would never wake again. But at length his eyelids quivered, and a deep sigh seemed amazed that he was there; he evidently remembered nothing of the past scene in which he had been so fearful an actor. 'What is it, my pended, Doctor?' he asked, in alarm.

"'Nothing serious, my friend. Pray be composed. You have been very sick lately. And, by-the-by, Sir, you had left your lancet within your pocket. Excuse me the liberty of taking it out, and thus save you all unnecessary exertion.'

"'Certainly, my dear Doctor,' he replied. 'I feel very grateful to you for your kindness toward me in my illness, and I hope to prove so in time.'

"I took the key, and, passing on to the door, unlocked it; then blowing my little silver whistle for my office boy, I sent him to a friend with a note a note to Mr. ——, begging his immediate attendance as a friend. The boy was absent, and the note was placed in his hands. In ten minutes Mr. —— appeared, accompanied by another gentleman. In a few words I explained to them all the horrible circumstances which had transpired, and requested them to remain in a room two, I left them in the room with the helpless maniac. I went out into the garden, and failing not to pray for my new love in the hour of danger, of God and not by the strong hand of the madman, poured out my heart in thankfulness to Him whose providence had been so signally manifested to me that dreadful night, and then and there I pledged myself to his service, and, God helping me, I hope to prove faithful to my vows even unto death.'

"And did the poor maniac recover his reason?" I asked.

"Alas! no. The poor fellow died a few years afterward in the Asylum at Columbia. Requiescat in pace."

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

WHY DOES OUR GOLD PRODUCE LESS WHEAT PER ACRE THAN THE SOIL OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND?

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST NUMBER.]

AS TRUE FARMERS let us return thanks for your favor of Harper's Weekly of the 5th instant. Such a journal must enjoy an extensive popularity in the agricultural world. To the article on which is particularly interesting. The writer understands his subject, and his remark that 'In the moist climate of Ireland wheat will contain more water than that grown in the clear and drier atmosphere of America,' contains a truth fully borne out by the effect but too frequently produced by those sudden and violent meteorological changes to which our climate is subject in the blossoming season, from the latter end of June to the latter end of July. With us the preparation of the ground for one of one year is the great basis for the wheat crop of the next. But here we are dealing with soils which, with few exceptions of rest, have been many centuries under cultivation, and our usual mode of treatment most necessarily differ from that which may answer very well for newer soils, such as many of those in America. When visiting the United States, where I had the pleasure of making your acquaintance, I was forcibly struck with the sensitiness of some crops, and the great carelessness of farmers in the preparation of soils, especially for cereals. One farmer in the western part of your Union informed me that he had for years under cultivation; but his horses, cows, and calves, could eat, as I thought, be much more profitably used on 30 acres. Extending the area of cultivation, with little attention to the improvement of its character, appeared to me to be leading consideration on your side of the Atlantic. You must not suppose that I mention this for the purpose of drawing any unfavorable contrasts, but merely as an impression which may be erroneous or otherwise. In October, 1858, I plowed a reliable field of six acres with the view to its preparation for a green crop (potatoes), to be succeeded, according to my usual practice, by wheat. The following spring was very rough, so as to expose as much of the soil as possible to the action of winter. In March I gave a sharp cross-plowing, a thorough pulverization by repeated harrowing, and a careful removal of the roots of weeds, couch grass, &c., by which I caused to be burned and the ashes spread over the surface. This was followed by a good drilla 24 inches from centre to centre, and of a depth sufficient to bring a good body of moisture. The latter was of a very powerful kind, composed of the ashes from the usual accumulation of the farm-yard, a slight mixture of limestone gravel, and a heavy proportion, say 70 per cent., of peat mull, previously warmed with fermenting dung. To this preparation I applied about 130 cubic yards, or about 600 ordinary cart-loads, to the acre. I need not now give you the reasons for my mode of considering this treatment in its connection with the crop to succeed the present one. The object was all dug with the spade, a process by which the soil receives such a tilth, cleansing, and pulverization as is the opinion of our most skilful "revolutionizing" farmers more than compensates for the extra cost of manual labor, when we have not the year so-called 'labor-saving machines.' Early in November, therefore, I dressed the surface from stalks (weeds there were none), and covered with with white Kent (white hull and red grain) in drills eight inches and a half feet wide, and 3 in the centre, and sloping sharply to the furrow, thus insuring a certain escape for superfluous water, and a means of exit for the throwings of winter, both so detrimental to the well-being of the crop in early stages of its growth. The result, not weight, on the day of sale, was 61 bushels of wheat, and 7 pounds, each stone being 14 lbs., and each barrel 20 stones. Another mode of preparation for the ensuing crop, but one which should be only resorted to when the one just described can be properly carried into effect, is by trenching. This is a good branch of the subject I shall be happy to forward you my views by a friend just preparing to go to New York for the season of 1859.

We have not space to comment in detail; but for an observation in general terms as to the mode of preparation for wheat as our neighbors? Precisely the same modes of cultivation will not do in both countries, but a good deep preparation is applicable all over the world. When we hear from our correspondent in the south of Ireland we will give our readers the benefit. A soil being thoroughly fitted for the reception of food in it by the combined influences of sun, air, and moisture. When a crop is grown and turned under, the substances which it has made it, taken from the air, are in an advanced condition for the future use of other crops. Rational cultivation requires such follows, by causing great division and exposure. A rotation of crops is based on the principle of some taking from the soil one class of constituents of seeds, and the adaptability of a crop to take the food of a preceding one.

In Ireland, in 1849, there were 667,666 acres of wheat, yielding 2,148,893 quarters; in 1857, there were only 316,000 acres, yielding 1,264,000 quarters.

A calculation of the above figures, giving the average yield per acre, will show that the wheat crop of Ireland is nearly twice as large on the same area at the end of the year 1857. This may be considered too figure-ative a statement; but there has been an undoubted increase with Irish cultivation that we can not forbear giving the above, even in the detriment of Byron's compliment, when he said,

"The oar becomes more Irish, and less nice."

The Commissioner of the Census of Ireland established certain grades of wheat, as follows:

No. 1.——White.	No. 1.——Spring.
No. 2.——Red.	No. 2.——Mixed.

If a system of grades in fairly and thoroughly carried out by competent inspectors, it will do much to raise the average value of wheat in Ireland. Inasmuch as the brands would become a guarantee of quality, and the reputation for Chicago wheat in European and other markets could not fail to enhance its average value. Wheat and flour must depend for full on their own merits; brands will not be detrimental to farmers who have wheat of inferior quality for sale, for it could not long hold a favorable reputation sold under a false representation. It will not do hereafter to mix wheat of Ireland mixed with rye, barley, oats, winter wheat, chess, seeds of weeds, and other refuse, which too often been done. This will cause farmers to grow wheat with greater care.

Great Britain imported of wheat and its equivalent in flour—

	Bushels of Wheat.
1853.....	44,000,000
1854.....	48,000,000
1855.....	53,000,000

We have thus the means of approximating to the value as a market to us for the staff of life.

Brazil and the West Indies are good customers to us for our flour.

The wheat crop, in all badly farmed districts, is the cause of much loss from the attacks of insects, diseases, and other casualties.

Again it will be asked, why do we not grow as much wheat per acre as other people? Most of the facts in relation to this subject have been considered in the first article on wheat and the one which is now offered to the public. Brief references to the headings may be acceptable. We do not pay proper attention to the preparation of the soil, including manures and manipulation, the choice of the best varieties, influence of climate, selection and preparation of seed, changing of seed, quantity of seed per acre, mode of sowing on the best soils.—Whatever a man weeth, that shall he also reap"—dull and spring culture, habits of insects, time of cutting, seasoning, etc.

But, even after all these things, before our granaries are overflowing with the fruits of a golden harvest we must abide our time. In the words of the lord of Avalon, "He that will have a cake out of the wheat must carry the grinding."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Throat Affections.

I have been in the habit of using "BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" or Lozenges, when I have been compelled to speak, though suffering from a cold, and am very heedless in clearing the throat, as for as I am see, have no injurious effect. I, at any kind. I can confidently recommend them to public speakers generally.

S. P. T. ANDERSON,
Pastor of the Central Church.

St. Louis, Feb. 21, 1859.

I heartily unite in the above commendation.

M. SCHUYLER,
Rector of Christ Church, St. Louis.

For sale by all Druggists.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy SEWING MACHINES which will not perform the work that purchasers expected them to do, are informed that SINGER'S MANUFACTURES never fail to do any kind of work. No one is ever disappointed in these machines.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

A Quarter for a Quarter.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED is a FIRST-CLASS FAMILY NEWSPAPER, designed to encourage a spirit of HONEST, MANLY, SELF-RELIANCE, and ACTIVITY among the People; to illustrate Life in all its phases, and ought to be read by every Family.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, at TWO DOLLARS a year, or sent 3 months on trial for 25 cents, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $850,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive marchandize business, and has returned to its shares, out of the profits of the last year, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has reduced the Certificates of the issue of 1855.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LECONEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. HOMMOND, Secretary.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.
BY THE
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S
LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 8.45 and 11.15 A.M., 3.15, 4.30, and 8.30 P.M.

Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and for no more cartage at any depot.

The regular time by the Fast Run is

To Chicago	40 hours	To Dayton	In 30 hours
" Cincinnati	" 36 "	" St. Louis	" 54 days
" Cleveland	" 34 "	" Louisville	" 36 "
" Columbus	" 32 "	" Indianapolis	48 hours

And other Western towns in like good time.

Goods for points on Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, Kansas, &c., will save time by shipping by our line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

Unity Fire Insurance Company of London.

(INCORPORATED UNDER THE ACT OF PARLIAMENT, 7 AND 8 VICTORIA, CAP. CX.)

United States Branch, 56 Wall Street, New York.

Authorized Capital, Two Millions Sterling, or $10,000,000 00.

Available Assets, $4,520,951 16.

Statement of New York Branch,
For Thirteen Months, ending 31st December, 1858.

Gross amount of Premiums	$100,625 10
Losses, Taxes, Expenses, Commissions and Re-insurances paid	$50,837 77
Surplus in hand	43,787 33
Loss subject to Litigation	1,004 25
Deposit Fund in the hands of Trustees	150,000 00

GEORGE ADLARD,
Manager and General Agent for the United States.

"HARD TIMES NO MORE."

ANY PERSON (Lady or Gentleman) in the United States, possessing a small capital of from $2 to $5, can enter into an easy and respectable business, by which they may realize from $3 to $10 per day, or more. For particulars address (with stamp), W. F. ACTON & CO., 41 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

IMPORTANT TO BOOK AGENTS!
NEW WORK BY REV. J. H. INGRAHAM.
ON MONDAY, APRIL 11th, 1859, WE SHALL PUBLISH
The PILLAR of FIRE;
Or, Israel in Bondage.
By the Author of "The Prince of the House of David."
BEING AN ACCOUNT OF THE WONDERFUL SCENES
In the Life of the Son of Pharaoh's Daughter, Hiero.
From his youth to the ascent of Sinai: comprising, as told by an eye-witness,
HIS MIRACLES BEFORE PHARAOH,
PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA, AND RECEPTION OF THE LAW ON MT. SINAI.
Containing an elaborate and richly colored Description of the Architecture of the Egyptians, their Mechanical Genius in Peace and War, in the Temple, the Family, the Mart, and the Tomb; and the Habits of the Israelites, while in the Land of Bondage; together with
PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF THE
Hebrews under their Taskmasters,
Of Scenes, Processions, and Spectacles; and beside the Nile, and Legends of the Obelisks, Sphinxes, and Pyramids, and of their Founders before the Flood.
DELINEATIONS OF BEAUTIFUL WOMEN,
Of Mitten, Amenae, Lilith, and Chloe,
AND OF WONDERFUL MEN,
Aaron, the Prince of Ur (Job) and Ramases (Moses)
Narrated in a Series of Letters from a Prince to his Friend living in Egypt, to his Royal Mother, Queen of Tyre.

The volume abounds in characteristic passages of highly wrought beauty, in Dramatic Incidents, and in curious descriptions of Female Loveliness.

One Vol., large 12mo, 500 pp., Illustrated. Price $1.25.

Sent to any address by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

50 EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED, in all parts of the country, to obtain subscribers for the above work. Circulars will be given to good Agents, and rare inducements offered. For further particulars apply to the subscribers.

AGENTS who have sold The Prince of the House of David will find it specially invited to give their attention to the above and kindred volumes, by the same author. Circulars are ready supply, orders should be sent in at once, as they will be filled strictly according to their priority.

COUNTRY NEWSPAPERS giving this Card two insertions, before the day of publication, shall be sent a copy of the work, by mail, prepaid, upon sending a copy of the paper.

PUDNEY & RUSSELL, Publishers, 79 John Street, N. Y.

New York, March, 1859.

NEW HAND-BOOKS.—HOW TO WRITE IN.—HOW TO TALK—HOW TO BEHAVE—AND HOW TO DO BUSINESS—Bound in one large handsome volume, may be had, prepaid, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

The Perfection of Toilet Soaps.
YARDLEY & STATHAM'S
Shaddow Oil Soaps.

Sole Agents for the United States,
J. W. NORCROSS & CO.,
Importers of Druggist's Fancy Goods,
51 Fulton Street, New York. 31 Milk Street, Boston.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,
822 Chestnut Street,
Opposite Girard House,
Philadelphia.

Fine Watches,
Rich Jewelry,
Silver Ware, Sterling,
Cloeks and Bronzes,
Chiefly of our own importation and manufacture.

Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

Select Family School for Boys
AT
SOUTH WILLIAMSTOWN, BERKSHIRE COUNTY, MASS.
(ESTABLISHED IN 1845.)

Summer term of twenty-one weeks will commence Wednesday, May 4th.

The location is healthful and pleasant.

Number of pupils limited to fifteen.

For Circulars address the Principal,

BENJ. F. MILLS.

March, 1859.

Inventors, Look to your Interests!!

HOW TO GET A PATENT, or The INVENTOR'S INSTRUCTOR. New Edition. Sent by FIRST POST, for 6 cents, or 7 three-cent stamps. By FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

"THAT STANDARD MEDICINAL ARTICLE, the Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam, prepared by the well known druggists, Messrs. Seth, Cutler & Co., of this city, is, we have good authority for stating, one of the specialties for Coughs, Colds, and all Pulmonary Complaints, ever offered to the public. It has stood the test of all tests, time, and has sustained its reputation for more than THIRTY YEARS.

Physicians of the highest respectability prescribe it, and thousands of families keep it on hand as a standard family medicine.—Boston Journal.

Inquire for the article by its WHOLE NAME,

"WORMLEY'S VEGETABLE PULMONARY BALSAM."

Prepared only by SETH, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Boston. Sold by all druggists. Small, 50 cents.

AGENTS & PARK, Agents, New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines—it has trebled within four months—indicates the reviving prosperity of the country. The prices of our Machines have been greatly reduced.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR COIFFURES, FEATHERS, COIFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, at 561 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

LIGHTE, NEWTON & BRADBURY'S
PIANO FORTES,
281 and 283 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.
HENRY H. HOOPER, Jr., Agent.

After some little delay, owing to imperfect ways, The Clipper Ship S. A. Rollo, is launched and properly fitted, being copper fastened, for a prosperous voyage. She is now at the port of New York, and up for Trade and a Market. Having a part of her safe and well-assorted Cargo on board, consisting mostly of BOOKS AND STATIONERY, a favorable opportunity and unusual inducements are held out to buyers and shippers to ship by this vessel, as she is well insured at a low premium, has ample accomodations for first-class passengers, being well provisioned, having well ventilated and commodious State Rooms, and no steerage passengers are to be taken on this voyage. She is well officered and manned by experienced, sober and intelligent men, who are ever at their posts, and understand the Ropes, and the Captain's on Deck.

Everything to make a prosperous voyage is provided. The Pilot is familiar with the port of destination, knows the Coast and the Shoals; and the Ship is provided with the last Chart of Piracy. The Compass and Barometer have been tested, proved and found reliable.

It is proposed to sail the first favorable day, with an old Pilot at the Wheel, under easy Canvas, for the comfort and safety of the passengers and shippers. A good Library is provided, together with files of the latest Magazines and news of the day, to add to the pleasure of the voyage.

The opportunity is a favorable one for shippers of BOOKS, STATIONERY, &c., to fill their Rolls of Trading, at the lowest rates, as all the disagreements are made to save the extra commissions, and to deliver the Cargo in good order and with despatch.

OFFICE, No. 29 PARK ROW,
OPPOSITE THE ASTOR HOUSE.

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,
Publishers, Wholesale dealers in School, Classical, Theological, Standard and Miscellaneous Books, Blank Books, Foreign and domestic Stationery, &c., &c.

WILL SOON BE PUBLISHED:

FROM WALL STREET TO CASHMERE.

A JOURNAL OF FIVE YEARS IN ASIA, AFRICA, AND EUROPE.

COMPRISING

Visits during 1851, '2, '3, '4, '5, and '6, to the Danemora Iron Mines, Plains of Troy, the "Seven Churches," Palmyra, Jerusalem, Petra, Mt. Sinai, Bombay, Seringapatam, and Surat.

With all the Scenes of the recent Matinies.

CASHMERE,

Peshawur, and the Khyber Pass to Afghanistan, Java, China, and the Mauritius.

Nearly 100 full page Illustrations.

BY JOHN B. IRELAND, ESQ.

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,
Publishers, Wholesale Dealers in School, Classical, Theological, Standard and Miscellaneous Books, Blank Books, Foreign and Domestic Stationery, &c., &c.

THE KISS-ME-EVER TOP-COAT.

SAID Nell, with a pretty trick
Of modesty:
"I call this head a kiss-me quick
If e'er I do see."

Said Tom, "The name, I grant, is clever,
But, my divinity,
I call this coat the kiss-me ever
From SMITH'S GREAT TRINITY.

So kiss-me-quicks—
"I will," Tom cried;
And kiss me ever—
"Leave this, never!"
"Leave mine, never,"
The blushing girl replied.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

A NEW WORK ON THE HEART.
Just Published, By DR. SAMUEL S. FITCH,
Of No. 8 Bond street, New York,
Author of "Six Lectures on the Causes and Cure of Consumption," "Health, its Abuse and Restoration," &c.)
A POPULAR TREATISE ON
DISEASES OF THE HEART, APOPLEXY, DYSPEPSIA,
and other Chronic Diseases, with proofs of their cure.
ALSO—RULES FOR PREVENTING DISEASE AND PRESERVING
HEALTH,
(especially after fifty), to one hundred years.
This is a work of the greatest interest to all who are suffering with any of the disorders on which it treats, or who wish to avoid them. The author proves clearly and conclusively that Heart Disease, Apoplexy, Dyspepsia, &c., may be both prevented and cured, and shows how. It is written in a plain, popular style, and adapted for the general reader.
It contains about 112 octavo pages, handsomely bound in muslin, with six fine illustrations. Price 63 to 67 Sc. 25 cents; when sent by mail, 36 cents. It will be sent by mail, postpaid, to any one applying for it, and when the price (25 cents) may be remitted in postage stamps or otherwise,after it is received, and approved. If not received soon after it is ordered, write again. A liberal discount made to dealers. Agents, giving address in full, to S. S. FITCH & Co., No. 714 Broadway, New York.

Prof. Peck's Elements of Mechanics.

ELEMENTS OF MECHANICS. By W. G. PECK, Author of Practical and Theoretical Mechanics. Optical Text-Book is designed for Colleges, Academies, and High Schools. Price $1 50.
Just published by
A. S. BARNES & BURR,
51 and 53 John Street, New York.
Publishers of Davies' System of Mathematics and Bartlett's System of Natural Philosophy — Do Text-Books of West Point, Free Academy, &c., &c.

TREES AND PLANTS.

PARSONS & CO. are now sending out from their NURSERY at FLUSHING, L. I.,

Fruit and Ornamental Trees,

Evergreens,

Flowering Shrubs, Roses, and Greenhouse Plants,

of the choicest varieties, and of thirdly, vigorous growth.
Catalogues furnished on application. No. 179 Broadway, and goods delivered at Fulton Market Wharf free of charge.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

$120 a year pays Board and Tuition in Common English. Experienced Gentlemen Instructors at the head of each of the Nine Departments. Extra Arrangements for French, Painting, and Piano Music. Excellence and Economy the Motto. Term opens April 18. Write for a Catalogue. Rev. A. FLACK, Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

Nothing Else of Services.

MECHANICSVILLE, N. Y., March 17, 1858.
MR. W. E. HAGAN: I have used Hobensack's Electrozyne for three years and have found it to be a most excellent article. It not only restores the color of my hair, giving it new life and strength, but it cured myself and wife of a most obstinate eruption upon the scalp, which neither else seemed to benefit. I fully believe it to be the best article in use.
Yours Respectfully, KNOWLTON HOWLAND.
I remember that this result was produced by Hobensack's Tonsaline, the original and only reliable Hair Restorative.
Price Fifty Cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

DIANO PORTES, MELODEONS, AND HARMONIUMS of first-class makers at the lowest terms.
J. M. CHICKERING,
541 and 543 Broadway, N. Y.

SPRING FANCY GOODS.

L. J. LEVY & CO.,

Nos. 609 and 611 Chestnut Street,
Adjoining Bailey & Co.'s,
PHILADELPHIA.

Are now opening a large and very choice assortment of

NEW GOODS FOR SPRING,

Selected for the most part in PARIS and LYONS for their RETAIL SALES from the choicest productions of the looms of FRANCE.
They invite the inspection of Wholesale as well as Retail customers to one of the most beautiful assortments for its extent ever offered.

LADIES' SPRING DRESSES

which can be found in this country.
In all the richer articles of DRY GOODS, such as
ITALIAN CASHMERE SHAWLS,
CHOICE SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS,
PARIS PRINTED FOULARDS,
SUPERB BAREGE AND BAREGE ROBES,
NEW SPRING and SUMMER SHAWLS,
their assortments are constantly being increased by the arrivals of the Steamers from Europe.
PHILADELPHIA, February, 1859.

68 AND 70 B. T. BABBITT'S SAPONIFIER, OR, CONCENTRATED LYE, 68 AND 70 manufactured in New York. Warranted to make Soap without Lime, and with little or no 68 AND 70 SOMETHING NEW.—B. T. BABBITT'S BEST 68 AND 70 MEDICINAL SALERATUS 68 AND 70 Is manufactured from cream Tartar. 68 AND 70 Pure Concentrated Potash, 68 AND 70 In SIX POUND CANS. 68 AND 70 Six pounds of this Potash equal to 68 AND 70 twelve pounds of common Potash. This is the best and cheapest article, strength considered, for retailing in the smallest quantities. 68 AND 70 Every can is warranted full weight. 68 AND 70 Put up in Tin Canisters. Cans of 1 lbs., 68 AND 70 2 lbs., and 6 lbs. For sale by 68 AND 70 B. T. BABBITT, 68 AND 70 Nos. 68 and 70 Washington Street, New 68 AND 70 York, and No. 18 Dutch Street, Boston.

68 AND 70 POTASH, 68 AND 70 FIRST SORT, 68 AND 70 In stone Jars, repacked in casks, suitable 68 AND 70 for shipping, by 68 AND 70 B. T. BABBITT, 68 AND 70 Nos. 68 and 70 Washington Street, New 68 AND 70 York.

NEW YORK PURCHASING AGENCY.
W. M. LAPSLEY, No. 48 Nassau Street.
Persons in the country can procure in New York any of any articles, large or small, of use or luxury, from a book to a Steam Engine, a Shawl to a Carpet, who have their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, on 1 per cent. commission charge. Refer to Hon. Benjamin Ewe, Long Island Bank, Messrs. John Jacob Astor & Co., Messrs. Harper & Co., New York; J. D. Dawson & Co., New Orleans.

WANTED!

A GENTS EVERY WHERE, ready to sell the best of Books. Active, industrious young men having had a month's practice in the business, can secure lucrative results a profit of from Three to Five Dollars a day.
Full particulars will be given by the issue of every family, and are of the highest moral and intellectual character. For particulars address
CLARK & GUTTS, Publishers,
No. 78 North Second Street, Philadelphia.

A GRAND CONCERT OF SACRED MUSIC will be given in St. Paul's M.E. Church, corner of Fourth avenue and Twenty-second Street, on Tuesday evening, April 6th.
THE MENDELSSOHN SOCIETY will sing the 95th Psalm, and Selections from HANDEL'S GRAND MASS IN A MAJOR.
Mr. Bergner will play on the organ.
Miss Annie Kemp,
Dr. Guilmette,
Mr. Castle,
and a number of the best solo singers, will assist.
Mr. Morgan will preside at the grand piano.
Further notice next week.

THE NEW BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

By the Rev. Wm. Ellis, F.H.S.

THREE VISITS TO MADAGASCAR, during the Years 1853 —1854—1856. Including a Journey to the Capital, with Notices of the Natural History of the Country, and of the present Civilization of the People. Illustrated by a Map, Wood-cuts from Photographs, &c. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

By Dr. W. M. Wood, U.S.N.,

Surgeon of the Fleet in the U. S. East India Squadron.

FAREWELL TO THE FAR INDIES, in the Seas of India, China, and Japan. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

By Lieutenant Page, U.S.N.,

Commander of the Expedition.

LA PLATA, THE ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION, and Paraguay. Being a Narrative of the Exploration of the River La Plata and its Affluents, during the Years 1853, '54, '55, and '56, under the orders of the United States Government. With Map and numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $3 50.

By Dr. Barth.

TRAVELS AND DISCOVERIES IN NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA. Being a Journal of an Expedition undertaken under the Auspices of H.B.M.'s Government, in the Years 1849–1855. With a Map and numerous elegant Illustrations. Complete in 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $7 50; Half Calf, $10 50.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of the price. Any of the Works (above 300 miles), on receipt of the price.

LOOK BOYS!
Here's the Book for You!
WILD SPORTS
AND
Adventures in the Far West.
By Frederick Gerstaecker.
OVER EIGHT LARGE ENGRAVINGS.
Most Splendidly Executed in Oil Colors.
16mo, Price $1.
This Book has no Equal
In Splendor and Beauty of Illustration.
IT SURPASSES ANYTHING OF THE KIND YET PUBLISHED!
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

The Age of Chivalry.
PART I.
King Arthur and his Knights.
PART II.
The Mobinogeon; or, Welsh Popular Tales.
By Thomas Bulfinch,
Author of "Age of Fable." Illustrated with Engravings in gold and colors. 12mo, Price $1 25.
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

Every AMERICAN BOY and GIRL
SHOULD READ
THE LIFE OF WASHINGTON,
WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR THE YOUNG.
By E. CECIL.
Illustrated with Engravings designed by Billings.
16mo, Price 60 cents plain; 75 cents colored.
JUST PUBLISHED BY
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

PHELAN'S IMPROVED BILLIARD TABLES AND
COMBINATION CUSHIONS,
PATENTED FEB. 19, 1856; OCT. 28, 1856; DEC. 8 1857; JAN. 19, 1858.
NOVEMBER 14, 1858.
For sale only by the manufacturers,
O'CONNER & COLLENDER, 81 and 83 Ann Street, And the patentee,
MICHAEL PHELAN,
756 and 758 Broadway, New York.

PICTURES FOR GRECIAN AND ANTIQUE PAINTING,
ARE ONLY PUBLISHED BY
E. G. TILTON & CO.,
161 Washington Street, Boston.
They forward them, post paid on full and special directions how to paint, to any address. Send for a list and other information gratis.
Dealers and Teachers supplied.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
THE NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are unquestionably the best machines for family use, the qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES,
PRICES GREATLY REDUCED.
Office 505 Broadway, New York.
SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

CHESS PLAYER'S INSTRUCTOR;
OR,
GUIDE TO BEGINNERS.
WITH DIAGRAMS.
BY CHARLES HENRY STANLEY.
Price 38 Cents.
ROBT. M. DE WITT, Publisher,
No. 160 and 161 Nassau Street.
Copies mailed, prepay paid, on receipt of price.

BOOKSELLERS ARE CAUTIONED
AGAINST PURCHASING OR SELLING
A SPURIOUS AND COPYED BOOK,
Which hails from Philadelphia, entitled
THE MODERN HOUSEKEEPER IN THE COOKERY AND CONFECTIONARY, as we HOLD the COPYRIGHT of the GENUINE BOOK of that TITLE, and RIGIDLY PROSECUTE ALL INFRINGEMENTS THEREOF.
Those who sell for the genuine, authorized, and only perfect Work, will consequently recommend that it be bound only in cloth, and in shape published by HEATHER & RUTCHINSON, 823 Broadway, N. Y.

SELPHO'S PATENT ELASTIC ANGLESEY LEG AND HAND—Combines new and valuable improvements. Send for Pamphlet. Address
WM. SELPHO, 840 Broadway, N. Y.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID IT! PUFF! Take an Agency for our Publications. The terms are such there can be no possibility of loss. Every Family and Individual is glad to obtain one of them. For particulars address, FOWLER & WELLS,
No. 308 Broadway, New York.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURED BRUSHES, at the Brush Warehouse, No. 289 Pearl Street, Harper's Buildings. Brushes of every description on hand, and for sale at the lowest prices. A Silver Medal was received from the American Institute, in 1849, for superior Brushes.
JOHN K. HOPPEL.

$60 A MONTH to Active Men to travel on an Agency for popular SOLAR TELESCOPES and other Globes in the United States. A rare chance for Pedlars, Book Canvassers, and others. Address
T. B. PARKER, Clinton, Oneida Co., N. Y.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

The Home Garden.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square),
Publish this Day:
THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN:
BEING PRACTICAL AND NEW RULES FOR THE CULTURE OF VEGETABLES, FRUITS, FLOWERS, AND SHRUBBERY,
TO WHICH ARE ADDED BRIEF NOTES ON FARM CROPS, WITH A TABLE OF THEIR ANALYSIS AND PRODUCTS AND CHEMICAL CONSTITUENTS.
By ALEXANDER W. WATSON.
With several Hundred Illustrations.
12mo, Muslin, $1 50.
The author here presents, in a digested and plain form, such directions and information as will, if applied, enable every one who has a garden to supply the home table with its greatest and healthful products at the least possible outlay of labor and expense, and add choice fruits and flowers to the family stock of rational, cheap, every-day enjoyment.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 20 to 30 Wood-cuts—and these cuts are half—more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
FOR APRIL
CONTENTS:
WRECKING ON THE FLORIDA KEYS.
HUMORS OF TRAMPING.
THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS OF MADAGASCAR. Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.
THE RED RIVER TRAIL. (Fred Ingoe.)
THE FIRST OF APRIL. (Poem.)
THE COSTLY KISS: A NEW YORK DETECTIVE EXPERIENCE.
PORCHYROGENITUS. By Bayard Taylor.
HEAD AND HEART.
LITTLE CHILDREN.
EAST AND FOUNDS.
THE SONG OF THE TRINITY BELLS.
LADY LEVEN AND HER ROSES.
A COSMOPOLITE BILL OF FARE.
THE FAUTHER'S HOME.
BORED TO DEATH.
NEW BOOKS OF THE MONTH.
EARS.
HALF AN HOUR WITH MR. HUME THE SPIRITUALIST.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. Thackeray. Illustrations.—Hetty's Misgivings.—A Run for the Train.—Family Hand-Power.
CHAPTER LXIV. In which Harry lives to fight another day.
CHAPTER LXV. Soldier's Return.
CHAPTER LXVI. Which is a Sequel to nothing.
CHAPTER LXVII. In which a Tragedy is acted, and two more are begun.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN MIRROR.
FASHION DRAWER.
HEADS OF THE PEOPLE.
Illustrated by Fifteen Original Portraits.
FASHIONS FOR APRIL.
Illustrated by Eight Figures.—Dual Costume.—Morning Dress and Child's Costume.—Hints.
The Publishers announce that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a large amount of valuable and highly attractive reading, not to be found in any other periodical of the day.
As an evidence of the high appreciation of the Magazine have its literary and artistic merits been made upon the part of the Public, the Publishers refer to the contents of the Periodical for the past as the best guarantee for its future claims upon the favor of the American public.

TERMS:
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three Copies for One Year (and) . . 7 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5 00.
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. Postage only Thirty-one Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.
(From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 15, 1859.)
HARPER'S WEEKLY is the best illustrated and literary family paper containing publication, issued during the last year. It has improved greatly in its literary matter, and now that we can them together, we are surprised at the amount of good reading which it contains. Its illustrations are There is a complete history of nearly all the public events of the year, and a large part of the contemporary history of the world. Its literary matter is also worthy of its illustrations. Besides the graceful trifles not always trivial, which are published in the ordinarily numerous of Weeklies, there are the tales and stories of Bulwer, Dickens, Thackeray, and others, which are known to the whole reading world, and above all, there are those striking wonderful reprints of articles from the English periodicals, which, for vigor, fulness, and variety of information, are unequalled in any single volume, and to be had for a song. It is a paper to keep, and to make a permanent file of the intelligence, by all its phases, and in nearly all matters. In short, we are pleased, and may be interested by it—for the old and thoughtful, the young and gay; the man of business and the man of leisure.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Six Months 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 16 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 32 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 60 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twenty or Twenty-five Subscribers.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.
A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.
"." Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription amount, to the Office of Publication.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Gifts! Gifts!! Gifts!!!

EVANS & CO.

OFFER GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO BOOK BUYERS THAN ANY OTHER HOUSE IN THE COUNTRY.

E OUR NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, OF SIXTY PAGES, CONTAINS

A larger and better selection of books than ever before offered, and includes every work of literary value or interest published in the United States. All books furnished at publishers' prices, with at the time of sale.

A GIFT ACCOMPANYING THE BOOK

The most liberal inducements to clubs, surpassing those of any other house, in particulars of which, see page 3. Now is the time; also great commissions allowed to agents who are willing to devote their time to our business. Particulars sent on application by mail.

Send for a Catalogue, which will be mailed free to any address to all parts of the world.

Books and Gifts without money.

An extra dollar book and gift presented to any one sending an order for ten books.

The following is a Schedule of Property which will be given to the Purchasers of Books at the time of Sale.

Worth Prices.

Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever and Lepine	$20 00 to $100 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jeweled, Hunting Cases, open face and cylinder escapement	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, fine glazed and two glasses with spring—large and small size, with snap	9 00 to 12 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Florentine, Painted Lava, Goldstone, Garnet, and Coral Sets of Pins and Drops	5 00 to 25 00
Gentlemen's Gold Vest Chains—Neck Chains, Chatelaines	8 00 to 18 00
Gent's Fob and Vest Chains	10 00 to 50 00
Sets Cameo, Goldstone, Painted, Mosaic, Garnet, Onyx, Engraved and Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons and Studs	2 00 to 16 00
Gold Pencils with Pens, large, medium, and small size	3 50 to 7 00
Silver Pencils, with Gold Pens, large, medium, and small size, double and single action	2 00 to 5 00
Gent's Heavy Signet Rings, Ladies' Gold, Chased, and Plain Rings	1 00 to 7 00
Gent's Gold Breast Pins, Cluster, with Opal, Pearl Pins, Onyx, Garnet, etc.	1 50 to 5 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns	10 00 to 50 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Coral, Garnet, Chased and Plain Oval Brooches	5 00 to 30 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles	50 to 6 00
Gent's Silver and Pocket-knives	25 to 3 00
Pearl and Morocco Purses, Portmonnaies	50 to 3 50
Gold Lever Watches, Open Guard Slides	1 50 to 7 50
Gold Cameo, Scroll, and Band Rings	2 00 to 7 50

Besides other Gifts, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold. An equal proportion of the whole will be given with each $1,000 worth of books.

Address all orders, letters of inquiry, etc., to EVANS & CO., Publishers, 471 Broadway, New York City.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S ROSEMARY,

is the best dressing for the hair known.

The Rosemary will restore hair and can not be surpassed.

The Rosemary will remove dandruff.

The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.

The Rosemary has been and can not be surpassed, according to all a clean, healthy dressing and beautiful hair.

The Proprietor can furnish great numbers of the most extraordinary testimonials, but deems it unnecessary. Those will only submit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.

Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 21 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.

Sold by Dealers generally.

WM. ROWE, JR.

CARPETS AND OIL-CLOTHS,

CHEAP, FOR CASH.

No. 357 Hudson Street, near Spring, New York.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Vermin kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is incalculable. In warm weather all nature teems with these annoying foes. Lyon's Magnetic Powders are the discovered desideratum.

Upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Patents, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, which sealed the firm of Ads, observed that all insects fighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their sight cannes from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to retain the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous medical and horticultural colleges and societies.

Letter from the President of the U.S.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Department of State, March 1, 1858.

Professor Silliman, Jr., "Dear Sir:" I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

"WILLIAM L. MARCY, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1858.

"Mr. E. Lyon,—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain death when thrown into the fire, or mixed with JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., and Chemists.

JOHN A. DREW, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital."

James R. Chilton, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powders, and finds it of immense value."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in an article of this kind. Reference can be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Mason, President of the American Institute; James Gordon Bennett, Esq., Warren Leslie, Editor New York Ledger, A. M. Pease, of the Five Points Mission, and to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Plymouth Church, in the interior of Ads, and is unknown to any other person. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name.

"E. LYON."

Ants and mice can not be reached by a powder, and are killed by a Magnetic Pill. Order them through any merchant.

The Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
And Lyon's Pills on mice do most precious well.

Sample Flasks, 25 cents; regular sizes, 50 cents and $1 00. Pills, 25 cents per box. Sent by mail, postage free.

BARNES & PARK,

Sole Proprietors, 181 Broadway, New York.

P. P. P.

PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated impurities and soreness from the system; they impart vitality to the nerves; they diminish inflammation, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous; all impure secretions pass off, and they are not heavy or tender, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster. They are cheaper than all other plasters, because they are better, and do not require to be worn a single day after pain is removed. Sold by all druggists and country merchants. Price 25 cents per sheet, or, sent post-paid, for 30 cents. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp and our Signature.

BARNES & PARK, 13 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Feder's Method for the Guitar.

A New and Progressive Method of Rapidly Acquiring a Thorough Mastery of the Instrument, with a pleasing variety of Songs and National Melodies. Price, $1 00, post-paid.

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Brown's Bronchial Troches
OR COUGH LOZENGES,
Cure Cough, Cold, Hoarseness and Influenza.
Any Irritation or Soreness of the Throat.

Brown's Bronchial Troches
Relieve the Hacking Cough in Consumption,
Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Catarrh.

Brown's Bronchial Troches
Clear and strengthen the voice of Singers.
Indispensable to Public Speakers.

Brown's Bronchial Troches
Soothing and Simple—Children use them.
Assisting Expectoration and curing Hoarseness.

"Preeminently the first and best."
REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"I recommend their use to Public Speakers."
REV. E. H. CHAPIN, NEW YORK.

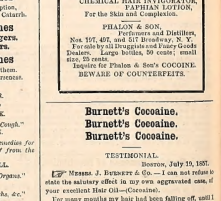
"I have passed them excellent for Whooping Cough."
REV. H. W. WARREN, BOSTON.

"An old lady friend having tried many remedies for Asthma with no benefit, found great relief from the Troches."
REV. D. LETTS, FRANKFORT, ILL.

"Great benefit in affections of the Bronchial Organs."
DR. J. F. W. LANE, BOSTON.

"A simple and elegant combination for Coughs, &c."
DR. G. F. BIGELOW, BOSTON.

Sold by Druggists everywhere, 25 cents per box.



BALLOU'S FRENCH YOKE SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway,
Premium Shirt Manufacturers.

Shirts made to order from Scientific Measures, of the best materials, cut by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the usual prices.

BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

FRED. S. COZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of his own importation.

RARE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.

73 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

MOUNT PLEASANT INSTITUTE.—A select Boarding School for Boys, Ashland, Mass. R. C. NASH, A.M., Principal.

Pity the Sorrows of a poor lone Bachelor!

THE BEST AND Cheapest Article FOR THE HAIR, PHALON & SON'S

COCOINE.

Prepared from Highly Purified COCOA-NUT OIL.

This preparation possesses extraordinary properties for preserving and beautifying the hair, and also restoring its natural lustre and glossy appearance.

One application, however harsh the hair may be, renders it soft and glossy.

MAGIC HAIR DYE.
CHEMICAL HAIR INVIGORATOR.
FAIRHAIR LOTION.
For the Skin and Complexion.

PHALON & SON,
Perfumers and Distillers,
Nos. 197, 497, and 517 Broadway, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Large bottles, 50 cents; small size, 25 cents.

Inquire for Phalon & Son's COCOINE. BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

TESTIMONIAL.

Boston, July 19, 1857.

☞ Messrs. J. Burnett & Co.—I can not refuse to state the salutary effect in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil—(Cocoaine).

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised barwashes, which I have since been told contain camphor spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you kindly shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that others, similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,
SUSAN R. POPE.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded by all who have used it to be the best and only Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

For sale by dealers generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

THE NEW NOVEL.

TWO WAYS TO WEDLOCK.

A New Novel of Great Merit.

(Reprinted from the Home Journal.)

12mo, Muslin. Price $1 00.

"Never, since the days of Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield' have we read any thing more beautiful than the story called 'Two Ways to Wedlock.'"—New York Daily News.

The extraordinary popularity of this remarkable novel, which reached so much beyond as it ran through the columns of the Home Journal, has induced the author for publication in complete book form, and a large sale is anticipated.

Sold every where, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price ($1 00), by

RUDD & CARLETON,
130 Grand Street, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 118.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

In the next number of this journal we shall commence

A New Serial Story,

ENTITLED

TRUMPS.

BY

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

ILLUSTRATED BY

AUGUSTUS HOPPIN.

A perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country thoroughly posted on the news of the day.

No other publication gives so much and so choice matter, or so fully illustrated a history of the times in which we live.

More money is paid to American Artists and Engravers for illustrating this publication than for illustrating any other paper in the United States.

This is the cheapest and best family illustrated newspaper in the country.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because they meet the eye of more people throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West—than advertisements in any other publication.

We refer families to our printed list of terms on the fifteenth page of each paper. By forming clubs, people in the country can obtain the paper on very advantageous terms.

THE TERRIBLE RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN CANADA.

An obliging correspondent has sent us a sketch, which we engrave below, of the late fearful accident on the Great Western Railway, near Hamilton, Canada West. The accident occurred at about 3 A.M. on March 19, between Flamboro' and Dundas. The Superintendent of the road thus describes the event:

"The fearful storm of the 18th had washed away a portion of a heavy bank between Flamboro' and Dundas, and into this chasm the engine ran, taking with it the first portion of the train. At that hour of the night all the passengers in the car which he was in, the second (in first-class passage), were fast asleep, their bats hung up, their boots off, and generally disposed for as much comfort as possible. Mr. Cornell was reclining upon his seat, which he occupied by himself, when he heard the splash created by the engine, and, to what manner he can not tell, he found his car turned completely over, and himself standing erect upon its side. It seems the chasm made by the washing away of the line was at least as long as three passenger-cars, and from twelve to twenty feet deep. Into this the locomotive rushed headlong, burying itself completely in the soil, and becoming, of course, an absolute wreck. The baggage-car fell above and on the locomotive; the first passenger-car ran astant upon this; the second passenger-car slid under the upturned end of the first, and the third, the sleeping-car, running into this, had its corner carried away.

"Mr. Cornell found himself upon his feet on the side of the car, one end of which being higher than the other was comparatively clear, while the other was one confused heap of human beings and broken seats. The door was wrenched off, the windows all broken, and part of the floor and ceiling ripped up. All of his companions who were not injured escaped out of my available aperture; but the shrieks and groans which he heard about him induced him to remain to succor the helpless. He commenced by tearing up the pieces of seats which held a great many passengers firmly and dangerously fixed, throwing the boards, etc., out of the nearest window. He first helped out two young men, who hurried away uninjured as quickly as possible; a third had a broken leg, but crawled out of the car. Three young ladies, who were tightly wedged in, he next extricated, two without injury: the third had both her feet injured. While working away unaided in this brave manner, Mr. Cornell was supplicated by one of the ladies to be careful and not hurt her; and it was with the greatest trouble, and only by cutting away her clothing that he finally got her free. With her sister he put her out at the door, and they jumped out in safety. In the pile of human beings under these ladies, were two others whom he next attempted to rescue—one, a young man, he finally drew forth, and passed him out of the car; his leg was broken and he was very much injured; the next object was a dead body, some poor creature killed at once; finally he came to two others—a man and his wife. The woman was firmly held by her feet by pieces of seats and planks, and beneath her was her husband, wedged tightly in the ruins, his head only being visible. To extricate the woman required the greatest care, for her husband was in peril of suffocation by dislodging pieces of wood. He finally got her out, and lifted her to a window to some one above; both of her legs were broken. The husband he also set free; he was not much injured, though very much bruised. Mr. Cornell says he was the last live man in the car. He extricated all he could, and then left it himself.

"The scene presented outside was of the most frightful description. The furious equinoctial storm was raging in all its violence—it was blowing a hurricane, the snow was falling, the water was yet washing over the ridge of the mountain, on whose side the track is built, and the difficulty of succoring the wounded or extricating the dead and the living so much increased. The cars lay in absolute wreck, passengers were looking for friends, the wounded were groaning, and the utmost confusion prevailed. To add to all this, another engine was seen rapidly approaching, evidently unconscious of the casualty. Every body shouted and screamed to induce it to stop, lest it should destroy itself and destroy all the wounded who still remained in the ruins.

"Fortunately the engineer stopped, and subsequently the train took back the living, the dead, and the wounded to Copetown.

"It seems the shock to the passengers in all but the last car was very severe; in the last, or sleeping-car, it and hardly felt, owing, probably, to its peculiar construction. Here it was, however, that the late Superintendent of the Mercantile department of the railway, Mr. Read, happened to be. He was not in the berth, but sitting in the corner near the stove, chatting with another gentleman. Bolts and timbers from the passenger-car flashed entered the sleeping-car, only wounding the other, but killing Mr. Read instantly.

THE TERRIBLE RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN CANADA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. S. G. POPE.]

Mr. Cornett informs us that the number killed must exceed the published statements. He mentions an effort made to account for the disparity of the participants. He thinks the gossiping engineers only could have rendered such an estimate possible. It is said that the train passed safely over the spot only an hour before, and that train, in his opinion, weakened the embankment sufficiently for the subsidence of the one that followed it. He describes the soil in this spot as a "quick-sand which almost disappears by the action of water."

Another passenger says:

"The embankment was about 60 feet high, and the bank in the west end sank. One lady, named Jones, had with her four children, the youngest being a baby of only two weeks old. The baby's mother and father killed or badly hurt. There were two ladies in the sleeping-car, for whom are not sure. One was Mrs. Read, wife of the late Mr. Read, who had with her, a nine mile.

"A terrible storm of wind, accompanied with rain and snow, was prevailing, and rendered the situation of the passengers more uncomfortable than it would otherwise have been. All the ladies and children that could be found were got up the embankment and placed in the sleeping-car for shelter, but as the house was filled short of giving way beneath it, they were afterward removed to the track, and made as comfortable as circumstances would permit, with mattresses and cushions taken from the cars. Several of the ladies were without shoes, stockings, and bonnets. Among these were Mrs. Geare. This lady also lost her purse and money, being thus left destitute."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1859.

THE POST-OFFICE FAILURE.

IT is at length announced authoritatively that there will be no extra session, and that the Post-office must manage the best way it can without an appropriation. It is also announced, apparently on good authority, that no certificates of indebtedness will be issued to contractors, and that the department will be made as small as possible after expenditure. This is as much as to say that over one half of the present postal accommodation afforded by the Government to the people will be withdrawn. The bulk of the unprodcutive mail routes will be abandoned; letters will cease to be delivered at new post-offices, and in the more thickly settled parts of the country, the postal service will be continued on a restricted scale.

This is all good news. The only news that would have been better still would have been the announcement of the total abolition of the Government Post-Office. Still, let us be thankful for what we have got. The post-office at all be the best possible, but a post-office there must be much better than a whole one.

We hope and trust that Postmaster Holt will proceed forthwith to cut down the postal arrangements; that he will altogether deprive Mississippi, Arkansas, and Minnesota of the benefits of the service; that wherever two mails a day are dispatched to or from the great commercial centres, he will reduce them to single departures to one; that he will do all in his power, in a word, to hamper, and obstruct, and reduce the accommodation afforded by the mails to the people by the Government Post-office.

For though the people of the United States are the most active and long-suffering people under the sun—though, as a rule, they cheerfully submit to be annoyed, and cheated, and overtaxed, and defied, and trampled by their Governments without so much as a word of remonstrance—yet, even with them, there is a point at which their power of patient endurance ceases, and a measure of misgovernment to which even they can not submit. We have no hope that Postmaster Holt, in pursuance of the system which is understood to have been adopted at Washington with regard to the whole Post-Office Department, may reach that point and fill that measure.

We repeat what we have said before: the National Post-office of the United States is an anomaly which must, so long as it is suffered to last, be a curse to the people and a needless burden to the Government. Every attempt to make so absurd and impossible an institution fit into the requirements of the age is a folly. Postmaster Brown, in the agony of attempting to solve the problem, stultified a long and respectable career by proposing to raise the rate of postage to five cents. Postmaster Holt confesses his administration by proposing to cut off unproductive routes.

We hope he will work out his theory vigorously. When the people of Nevada and Massachusetts are deprived of one-half their usual postal facilities—when the people of California, of Arkansas, of Mississippi, and of Minnesota discover that they enjoy no postal system at all, they may, perhaps, begin seriously to ventilate the query whether the National Post-office might not safely and beneficially be abolished altogether. The moment they begin earnestly to agitate on the subject the result is certain. Never was more indefensible an edifice than the United States Post-office.

Here is a ch[illegible]ood plank in new party platforms. If Mr. Holt does what is intended, a few months hence the whole country will be crossed against the National Post-office. Any party which comes forward with a practical scheme for the remedy of the postal evils will obtain the support of the honest people throughout the country. Where is the politician who shall seize the opportunity and make his capital out of it?

THE PACIFICATION OF INDIA.

THE latest mails from India bring a brief order of the day from the British camp announcing that the rebellion in Oude is quelled. The British army has been victorious in the city of Nina Sahib and other rebel leaders, who are chafing their purseers in the jungles and fastnesses of their native land; but this matter, it is obvious, must soon come to an end. The rebels have not the means to carry on the war; famine, treachery, and perfidy have pursued us only to cause their capture before long. In a few months the work of insurrection, which has commenced under such terrible auspices in May, 1857, will be definitely ended.

Some changes have taken place since that rebellion broke out. The government of India has been transferred from the East India Company to the British Crown. The Native residents of India have been warned of the precarious tenure of their lives and property. The Hindoo and Mussulman residents of Hindostan have been taught the power of England.

The two last effects of the rebellion will prove wholesome. European residents in Hindostan had grown so contemptuous of the "inferior race," and so proud of their own blood, that they were not to favor of the natives. It is well that they should be reminded that even Pandy has a heart and hands. Nor is it less useful that Englishmen, in India, should learn, and severe lessons, that white women and children can not be slaughtered with impunity. But the greatest benefit will be the check to infinite obstacles of every kind, are as nothing to protect the murderers of helpless men, and women, and children. The Hindoo and the Mussulman—like the Turks of Djeddah—will be all the better men for the punishment they have endured.

But as to the third effect of the rebellion—the transfer of the government of India from the Company to the British Crown—it is very doubtful whether this to any real gain. We have benefited in this instance less than for many, many years the Company has been a myth, so far as the government of India was concerned. Shareholders met, and voted, and the East India Directors held their meetings, drew up formal minutes of proceedings, and used remonstrances freely; but the real government of India, since the Company's charter was last renewed, has always resided in the British Ministry for the time being. The Board of Control, resolved itself into a "board of control." Practically, therefore, the formal transfer of the colony to the Crown is no change at all. It was here before, to all real intents and purposes.

As to the probable working of the new system nothing can yet be predicted, except that it will not succeed. It is impossible to legislate, or a congress of nations, comprising onesixth the population of the earth, can be ruled by an assemblyized before his eyes, must confidently be impeded and hampered in his official action.

It would, perhaps, have been unjustifiable to expect any thing truly liberal or generous from the narrow-minded Tories who are now in power at Great Britain. But they ought to have known better than to have attempted a system which the experience of the past century has thoroughly exploded.

THE FUTURE OF ART IN THE UNITED STATES.

A RECENT auction sale of American paintings has resulted somewhat disappointingly to artists. The times were bad; very few persons have money to invest in pictures; but the prices commanded by fine works were not. Even more much higher than was expected. The event is of good augury for the future of American art.

Several writers have expatiated on the "American School of Art." We do not pretend to understand their meaning. The American school —so far as it is represented by Gignoux, Church, Cropsey, Durand, Stillman, etc., etc.—is a faithful representation of nature, and nothing more. If other schools differ from it, they are palpably based on an erroneous idea, and must presently fail.

The only point in connection with American art which to us appears worthy of especial notice is the prospect that American artists will presently command a market that is unequaled in the world. Even at the present time our leading artists receive higher prices for their works than painters in any other country in the world. And when it is remembered that the market for American works of art has only grown up within a few years, it is safe to infer that, ten or fifteen years hence, the reward of artistic merit will be still more liberal. This is easily explained. This is a country in which a few men grow suddenly rich, and possess the money with a freedom corresponding to the facility with which it has been acquired. In Europe wealth is slowly accumulated. Most of the large fortunes are hereditary. Many are transmitted from generation to generation and held by force of mortgages and all kinds of possessor little means for casual expenditure. The rich Americans are the great art-purchasers.

And in almost all the countries of Europe the Government undertakes the especial patronage of art, which naturally and properly assumes a separate expenditure for the purchase of works of art.

In the United States there are no picture-galleries. Private expenditure is more liberal than in any European country; money easily earned is quickly spent; there is no Government patronage for art. Every man who can afford to buy a good painting feels that it is his duty to do so; for the artistic sense naturally art devolves exclusively on him and on his fellows.

We infer, therefore, judging from the profuse expenditure of Americans on their households, and from the peculiar advantages which art enjoys in this country, that the reward of merit of successful artists in the United States will be larger than that which falls to the lot of their brethren abroad. We expect that, in a few years hence, instead of sending our Cropseys, and Powers, and Brownells, and Crawfords abroad, we shall be offering a home to the Turcots, and the Landseers, and the Diaz, and the Mulready of the day.

Nor will our rich men expend their means unprofitably. Such paintings as Gignoux's Islands would adorn any European palace, and be an honor to this country to produce such works. As Agassiz said, when some European museum opened him to examine specimens of creatures discovered in this country, such things should not on any account be parted with. They are the true, indigenous riches of the country—much more lasting than Californian gold, more precious than bonds, and stocks, and real estate.

It was once the fashion to believe that neither art nor letters could prosper without princely or aristocratic patronage. Letters have long since emancipated themselves from the thraldom; the consequence is that one hundred volumes are sold where one hundred years ago one would. It will be so with art. We who read these lines will probably live to see the day when great painters, in this country, will obtain from the nouveaux riches of the United States unheard-of prices for their works, and foreign artists—like foreign singers—will make their visits great market.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SICKLES CASE.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

In your Weekly of the 12th of March there is an article entitled, "The Homicide Law Reform," in which the reasoning, though very ingenious, is yet fallacious. Knowing your impartiality, I think you will not refuse to hear and publish the other side of the question. I am no apologist for the law, neither do I intend to deny the correctness of the inference you draw, viz., that Sickles was excusable for killing Key; for the true doctrine, from the religious aspect of the case, is, that the seducer of a wife, daughter, or sister, forfeits, ipso facto, his life; nay, he is slain by the outraged husband, father, or brother, as the case may be.

The injury done to society by this crime is so great, that it would seem to be nothing but sublime in slaying the author of it. Neither can he be alleged as a legal plea, by the defendant, on the trial for the homicide, in law and not morally in itself justifiable. But to your article. You say, "In the Laws, and subsequently under the civilized nations of the ancient world, the seducer might be lawfully put to death if caught in the act." In those days evidence was doubtful, and trials even more uncertain than in our own times. It is also assumed that where a guilty intrigue existed and came to the knowledge of the injured husband, he would take pains to detect the parties in flagrante delicto. Now the law assumed no such thing; nor is it did such things occur frequently in human nature. Strictly speaking, every homicide is a wanton violation of the divine law, unless it be in self-defense, or the execution of justice, exclusive, or mitigates the act. After the killing is proved, the law presumes malice until the contrary is shown, and it rests with the defendant to show the contrary. The general rule is, "Thou shalt not kill;" and the onus is upon the defendant to show the exception.

It was because the detection in flagrante delicto was calculated so to rouse the passions of the husband as to dethrone his reason, and therefore to render him an irresponsible being, that the slaying of him was allowed to be given in excuse for the homicide. It was not a justification, it was an excuse, a mere indulgence to an infirmity of human nature. The punishment for adultery was, by the Jewish law, death; but that did not give the injured party a right to kill the adulterer. He must be tried according to law, and, if convicted, stoned to death. By the Roman civil law the homicide was excusable only when the adulterer was killed in flagrante delicto in the husband's house. But from this law presuming that the injured party would take pains to detect the adulterer in flagrante delicto for the purpose of killing him, it would presume that the husband was a murderer if he killed the adulterer under circumstances, for example, which make the matter a question of fact, and assumes the husband to be the murderer, by law, and not executioner; that detection in flagrante delicto was a requisite legal evidence upon which to pass sentence, and therefore that the husband's testimony in his own case not be supported by any authority. The law provided specific evidence upon which the jury decided, as it had compassion on the infirmity of his nature, but it did not divest the deed to be done. It did not say that the detection was sufficient evidence, but it did say it was sufficient provocation, as it is worthy of the consideration of the jury. But the true reason of the law was, that the seducer must not only be caught, but also must be killed in the act. The husband has a right to kill him, and then wait until a more convenient season to kill him. He may bind him in order to do it, he would be slound if there was, by law, a right in the husband to kill the seducer upon proof of the connection, and if the law made the detection in flagrante delicto as a mere precautionary rule of evidence, to prevent the killing of him, the concealment was more difficult than it is now. Cases were small, communities were limited, geography universal, as in the case of a leading citizen of Jerusalem, Athens, or Rome, was known to the entire population of the city. Everyone knew if he or she went wrong, the whole city was aware of it. Her offense could not be hidden. There was no room so dark, no bed so well curtained, but the comings and outgoings were certain to be watched. . . . . Hence, we infer, in such circumstances the restriction of the right of vengeance to the husband who took the simple trouble to make sure of it. But, in New York, in the great desert which another concealment was more difficult than then now; whether one knew of it or not, it was not well known now to all the other members of that circle as was ever possible. . . . They scandal, with the knowledge of it, certainly has not been the less yet of her assistry or malignity in our time. And, in the great desert which with consistency in saying, in one place, that "evidence was doubtful" in those times, and then saying it was abundant and certain, we can not see the force of reasoning, and certainly was the reason why the highest justice was required by the Jewish law, and stoning as a natural consequence, restricted to the husband who took the simple trouble to make sure of the fact. It was a wise precaution and the conclusion that the right of vengeance should be restricted to the husband who took the trouble of Jerusalem, Athens, or Rome, who "took the simple trouble" to make sure in this manner of the fact. Where there was no law, there was no restrict the obscurer citizen, as there was not the same probability attending the fact. But the case of a secure Jew had just as much right to kill an adulterer as had the most powerful member of the synagogue. The law was the same to the obscure as to the whole community—might be perfect strangers, just as Sickles—but the husband had the same right as the greatest "leading citizen." The husband, the wife, and the adulterer might be the only persons cognizant of the crime, but the fact of guilt was committed within an hour after their arrival; and yet this obscure, unknown Jew had a right to kill the adulterer with impunity. So we see that the publicity attending the act, and the facility of obtaining this most important fact of it, was not the ground of the reason of the law. But say that that reason is because of the tendency of the act to rouse to fury the passions and dethrone the reason of the husband, and we have a law the reason of which is applicable to the most obscure as well as conspicuous.

The theory that the law admitted the right of the injured husband to kill the adulterer upon proof of the fact, but at the same time admitted only detection in flagrante delicto as sufficient, destroys the defense of the man who kills the adulterer not by detection in the act. This principle was long teen done upon evidence not allowed by law, but without the rule of the law, and therefore monster. It is not true, in point of law, if the prudent rule of the old law has been relaxed," no other evidence of provocation; for by the English common law, which is the basis of the criminal law of every State in the Union, the homicide of the adulterer taken in flagrante delicto was, and is, held to be sufficient provocation to reduce the crime homicide. The foundation being destroyed, the whole tottering upon it must fall. It is not necessary to make this a question of evidence in order to excuse a man who kills the seducer, not in the act, but otherwise proved, for the circumstances and proportions the length of "cooling-time" to the injury inflicted. What length of time is necessary to enable a man thus outraged to regain his reason? The time must be long, indeed, before the death of the injured husband, the widow and few days of reason may have entered his mind, and shown him injustice of the act of slaying the seducer, that he will not be an accountable being. Detection in the act is but certain knowledge, though of the most revolting kind. This says the law, of provocation. Are there not other means of certain knowledge? Is not knowledge of the fact gained by these means calculated to rouse the passions to an uncontrollable degree (though, perhaps, not to the degree that an actual detection as flagrante delicto would), and therefore render the man as unaccountable as the other? Ought the law to be rather in it not, therefore, a legal provocation? It is not safe to base the defense of such a deed upon such foundations as your article points out. It is better and safer to put it on the true ground, viz., that it is such a provocation as poor frail human nature can not resist.

Very respectfully,
OLD SARUM.

THE LOUNGER.

AN APOLOGUE.

DR. NOAH WEBSTER (the English nobility are requested to take notice that this is another and not Sir Benjamin), in his celebrated dictionary, defines apologue as "a story or relation of fictitious events, intended to convey useful truth."

As thus:

Once upon a time there was a country in which the people resolved that every body should enjoy his own opinion about arithmetic. Twice two should make a million if any body wanted it to, and however much he might be laughed at by those who knew that it only makes four, yet he should not be harmed for his opinion.

Then all those people agreed that they would each pay a good round sum to support schools in which their children should be taught botany—not swimming, nor playing on the trombone, but botany.

But one day, in one of the schools, a teacher of botany insisted that the class should recite a lesson in arithmetic according to Euclid. And the scholars said that his parents sent him to teach botany, and not arithmetic. Thereupon the teacher said: "Thou naughty boy, because thou wilt not learn how Euclid does what thou knowest not, and spoke he was.

Then the parents and friends of that scholar said to the other people who smiled upon the spanking: "We believe in the science of numbers as well as you, but we believe differently from you; and we do not acknowledge Euclid as a safe guide, having one of our own." So they sent the scholar home with you, to have our children taught botany; and we ourselves, elsewhere and otherwise, provide for your arithmetical shortcomings. But we also profess to allow us to enjoy our own views and our own methods of instruction, without molesting you for spanking our children because they do not yield to yours?"

The only reply that those foolish people could make was that every body ought to be taught arithmetic—which nobody denied.

And Clio, the great spectator of human affairs, laughed at them dreadfully, and recorded the story for the benefit of school committees.

RUN OUT.

THERE is a slang expression about running things into the ground. It may have chanced to the reader to hear it. It may even have endeared to him to use it, under certain circumstances. An invitation given to a politician to a public dinner, a presentation of plate to a man of science, a gift which has made a voyager without being wrecked, the certificates of celebrated people to their virtues of corn-plasters—these are the things which may be said to have been run into the ground. They all sail travel very far from their starting point by any opinion with them.

There is one more advertising effort of the same kind which seems to have breathed its last during the last week, and is to sow fully into the ground. That is the habit of getting some man or other, or somebody to deliver some kind of public discourses signed by well-known people.

It is a dreary business to tell the tale, but it seems that a gentleman was lately invited to the post, in this city, a lecturer who has been delivered elsewhere. Among the published names of the gentlemen who invite the repetition, and who have not by any intimation the fact that there is such a lecture and such a lecturer, but implicitly vouch for its long-worth, based on its delivery to fifty or fifty or twenty-five cents to hear, the reader of the daily papers finds Mayor Tiemann, Messrs. Peter Cooper, Cyrus W. Field, Moses Taylor, Simeon B. Jerome, Rev. Dr. Prime, Dr. Kennedy, and others. All the notice considered worthy of being that "the Committee," who, so far as the reader knows, are the gentlemen whose names appear, "would add that no lecture has been prepared with more care, the most unique, original, and eloquent discourses of the day."

The result is that the gentleman reads his lecture in the Academy of Music to an audience of about a hundred and a quarter persons.

Of course the smallness of the audience is no body's fault. But from the fact that Harper's Weekly is not clear that the gentlemen who invited its attention, and in whose names it was extolled, re ally knew or cared very little about it?

Doubtless it was only a piece of good-nature on their parts. But why should they lend their names for good-nature? Do reputable people not owe it to each other to have their names mean something? When the reader sees that Mayor Tiemann's or Mr. Cooper's name attached to an invitation, he will probably put his finger upon his nose and exclaim, "Yes, I think I have seen that name before. It means nothing at all. That business is about run into the ground. In fact, no thank you, I've been there!"

IMPORTANT CORRESPONDENCE.

VAN DEN BROECK has addressed a letter to the Lounger in reply to the correspondence of Mynheer Van Tromp in No. 116 of Harper's Weekly. The Lounger hastened to transmit the letter to Mr. Van Tromp, and has received his reply.

Mr. Van der Broeck writes substantially as follows:

* * * * Instead of taking the Columbia College advertisement as a criterion, let him visit the Academy of Music, or any other respectable place of entertainment, and he will see that the audience, although composed of the same people he met at the College Exhibition, will via favorably with any audience in Boston or any other city.

"It fanns well, take the trouble to inquire, as will find that a College Commencement is an institution by which that it is a fashionable resort where the young folks go to meet their friends and pass a pleasant morning, or they do as a concessation on the Avenue. All Commencements are the same, whether at Columbia, Rutgers, Yale, or any other College, and a person who attends them, with the expectation of being able to hear what is said by the speakers will be very much disappointed, unless he is fortunate enough to get a seat in the stage among the Alumni.

"In conclusion, let me remark that your friend answered strong language toward the audience on the occasion of Mayor Tiemann's speech, and I think he comprehended the highest respectability: and he should remember that his ticket was only a 50 by the distribution. He also invited their other friends, and that it is considered in polite society proper for a host to pay the expenses for an invited guest to abuse the persons in whose company he may find himself placed.

"Tell Hans that I am a Knickerbocker as well as he, and proud of it too.

"I remain, dear Lounger, self-appointed champion for bl-hing New Yorkers in general,

"VAN DEN BROECK."

To this the Lounger receives the following:

"Mr. Hans Van Tromp presents his compliments to Mr. Van den Broeck, and begs to say that the conduct of the audience at the Academy is certainly very different from that at the College Commencement. But he has only to remark that, if it is composed of the same people, it was unworthy of them. It is the duty of the highest respectability, nobody would have suspected the fact from the audience.

"Secondly, Mr. Van Tromp has attended many Commencements at many Colleges, and, to his grief, has not found them always crowded and gay—but never so intolerably dull as to be compelled to insist not only on silence, but to request the students to separate themselves from those who were disposed to talk.

"Thirdly, Mr. Van Tromp is aware that he used strong language when he told the Knickerbockers he believed all a gentleman ought to believe. But the President used stronger language when, as above mentioned, he invited them.

"Fourthly, if Mr. Van Tromp received his card from the students, and not from the Committee, and if the committee 'a breach of etiquette' toward his hosts by not attending to the duty of festival alluring, if the guests were those guests guilty of no breach of etiquette toward their hosts, Mr. Van Tromp is at a loss to imagine. In making such a row that the speaking was inaudible in every body in the audience, and not only a breach of piety, which is the offender against etiquette, the one who chatters and laughs during the prayer, or the one who cries hist! and tries to listen?

"Mr. Hans Van Tromp wishes Mr. Van der Broeck good-morning."

The Lounger has thus allowed both sides to be heard, and must insist upon closing the discussion upon the controversial point. If his opinion be asked, he will say that he can not but think Mr. Van Tromp right, while Mr. Van der Broeck considers Mr. Van der Broeck's defense generous and natural.

TO LYCEUM COMMITTEES.

MR. MUNGE, a lecturer of eminence, has favored the Lounger with the following fact.

Toward the close of a course of lectures in a village not remarkably prosperous, it was announced that at the last lecture the audience would gratify the committee if each person present would pay for the lectures he or she must desired to hear during the next season. There was a general response to the request, so that the gentlemen who have the annual course in charge know what speakers are preferred.

This is a sensible, democratic method. It presents any dictation by a committee, and relieves the invitation of the lecturer disreputable for his extreme conservatism, or for any other cause; and the committee are enabled to offer to invited lecturers the people want to hear him. It also serves to show the general sympathy of the community with the views and the sentiments represented by various men.

The Lounger cordially thanks his friend Munnu, whom he would especially recommend to the consideration of lecture committees, together with the excellent plan which he has mentioned.

"MAID MULLER."

C. W. E., writing from Boston, asks the Lounger's opinion "as to the fate of Whittier's fine poem of 'Maud Muller.' A critic in Putnam's Monthly (vol. viii., page 29, says in speaking of it (as no doubt the Lounger will remember) that 'the Old England literature is given to it by the fewest, but most characteristic touches, and it no more occurs to the mind that there is any thing in it but Saxon than that Chaucer's landscapes are in it.'

C. W. E. then, as above, asks that Muller is not a New England name; that there are few Mauds among New England girls; that these girls do not ride hay-carts very rarely, and then rather unwilling in sport; that 'in this critic very justly observes, 'a New England girl would hardly expect to be hired at less than a dollar a day;' and that

"Him who set by the chimney-log, Carved with his knife many a figure and mug,"

"is a sufficiently defined picture of a German peasant."

Then again reading the beautiful poem carefully, the Lounger is inclined to differ with C. W. E., and to agree with Putnam's Monthly that Maud and Muller are very common New England names. But Maud is decidedly not German, and the beauty of the poem must justify the use of that of it in Vanksland. The Yankee girls, however, as C. W. E. observes, are not accustomed to ride hay on the Lounger knows, sometimes with bare feet —which is enough for the poet's purpose. The "toasting of the wine" is not New England, certainly; but the chimney-log, and pipe, and mug are enough so. They are quite well known there, C. W. E. may be sure.

But now let us turn to the poem. The conception of the maiden with "vague unrest" and "a nameless longing" suits the New England farmer's more than any other in the world: for she reads more and thinks more of possible social change than any other girl of her condition in the world. A German peasant girl does not dream of marrying out of her sphere. Caste is a final fact in her world.

"But, when she glanced to the far-off town,
White from its hill-slope looking down."

Now there is not a white town in Germany, and white is the characteristic color of a New England village.

"The judge rode slowly down the lane,
Smoothing his horse's chestnut mane.

"He drew his bridle in the shade
Of the apple-trees, to greet the maid,

"And ask a draught from the spring that flowed
Through the meadow across the road."

In this not all pure New England—the judge on his horse—the apple-trees, chief trees along the New England road.

"But the lawyers smiled that afternoon,
When he hummed in court an old love-tune."

Does C. W. E. know the colonial ceremony that lodges a German court of law, like every thing else official in Germany?

It is by such few touches" that the scene of the poem is conveyed, while the spirit commends itself—that is, to the every body familiar with the minor tone of New England life. Such a judge and such a girl would be as little characteristic of Germany as the white town and the apple-trees of the German landscape.

"Maud Muller, D. D.," &c.

Let C. W. E. refer to Dublin's illustration of the poem in the Harper edition of the Poets of the Nineteenth Century, and see if the Judge is a Gentleman in the imagination of the artist.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—SONS friend in New Orleans, who will accept the Lounger's thanks, has sent the card of invitation and programme of the annual festival of the Academy of Dance, which occurs on the evening of Mardi-gras. The typography and designing in blue and gold are very handsome—and the programme for the festival allures. The Mardi Krave gave a series of tableaux in the Varieties Theatre, representing the Courts of the world from Adam to Napoleon, with Madi Marian as the central figure, and Hobby Horse, Jack in the Green, Bluff—Jack, Fool, &c., in attendance. Midsummer Eve, with Titania, and fairies, Puck, St. George etc. Chivalry, with Sir Father Christmas, and plum pudding, boar's head, wassail, etc.; and Twelfth Night Court, with the Lord of Misrule, and the Abbot of Unreason, with the Queen of Comfits. The description of the festivity in the Crescent entitles to its complete success.

—CARONE'S skating song shows that he had pleasant day.

—F. Skenectales, will find that Garrick was baptized on the 28th February, 1716, and died on the 20th January, 1779. He left the stage in 1776. There is a charming letter of great length on the portrait of Garrick, written by the Hon. Galon C. Verplanck, in the Talisman for 1829, the form of Garrick's life, however, are in all the Biographical Dictionaries.

—A CONSTANT READER, New Orleans, is so fortunate as to discovering the M.S. he sends at the Lounger, who can make nothing of it.

—J. H. G., Louisville, Kentucky, will find Longfellow's "Warden of the Cinque Ports" in the first volume of Putnam's Monthly, January, 1853. It is also republished in the last volume of his works—"Miles Standish, and other Poems."

—J. H. B., New York, asks whether a married lady should be addressed by her own christened name, when more than one is used—whether we should say Mrs. John Jones or Mrs. John Jones? Both are justified by good usage. But it would probably be more exact to say Mrs. John Jones; and it is to say Mrs. of Mr. John Jones; the female John Jones, so to say.

—J. S., Allegheny County, Maryland, asks rather to comprehensive a question. The Prince Napoleon is not married the Princess Clotilde exists, is not as old as the Lounger thought him. He is not the only person in Napoleon's family to wish Charles Paul, and he is the second son of the old Jerome Coarber of the great Emperor), by his marriage with the Princess Catharine, daughter of the King of Wurtemberg. Mr. Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte married, in 1829, the old Jerome by Elizabeth Patterson, of Baltimore, his first wife, whom he married in 1803. The separate was made in Camberwell, near London, on the 7th July, 1805. The great Emperor was angry with the marriage, and refused to forward the Madame Patterson-Bonaparte to enter France. He compelled his brother to marry the Princess Frederica Catharine Augusta, 1807, and on the 15th erected Westphalia into a kingdom, making Jerome King. But Joseph Pope Dux VII. was the only reading Pope has denied the validity of the origination of marriages with Miss Patterson. By the civil law, the present Prince Napoleon is a bastard. But laws, whether divine or human, are recognized by temporal courts only to serve their own purposes. The great Napoleon said to old Pope Pius, "My brother is not married to the Baltimore girl." The old Pope said, and his successor says, "He is!" Twas a pretty quarrel, but the Emperor had several hundred thousand soldiers to emphasize his wit. A few years since the Lounger had the pleasure of seeing Madame Patterson-Bonaparte. She was sixty-seven years of age, and had the remains of great beauty. Even than she was educated, and gayly, for she was symmetry of her arm, of which she was very proud.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY, Evening, Saturday, March 26, 1859.

THE great event of the week in commercial and financial circles has been the revival of speculation and advances in price of cotton, caused by the advices from the other side. The business at the close of the week was larger than was ever known before during the same period of time; cotton closes from ¼ @ ⅛ higher than it was last week.

In money there is no change. Call loans are effected early at 6 per cent.; good short acceptances are done at 8, and first-class endorsed bills at six months may at 10 @ 12, according to quality. The exchange market is very dull, and rates are nominal. Sterling is quoted at 9 @ 9 per cent. premium, and paying for the specie for specie export.

Stocks are generally better, with the exception of the Western Railway Stocks, which are vigorously hammered by the Bears at the board, and have receded in consequence.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, March 26, 1859.

THE Wholesale Dry Goods Markets have been very active for Flour, Wheat, and Corn during the past week. Prices have materially advanced. Barley has been more freely offered and purchased at, however, cotter prices. Rye has been in full demand at full rates. Oats have been very quiet. . . Cotton has been in lively request at advanced rates. Hay, Hops, Provisions, and Seeds, very briskly sought after. The sales on that day reached the large number of 10,000 bales. Rice has been also largely executed; my previous single day's transactions were 1,000 tierces. Tobacco has been in fair request. Sugars and Molasses, Groceries, Green and Dried Fruits, Tobacco have been fair. The principal kinds of Fish, Hides and Leather have been in good demand. . . Hay, Hops, and Seeds have been moderately inquired for. Oils and Naval Stores, &c., . . . With relief inquiry of really desirable Dry Goods available, holders, generally speaking, are generally quite firm. The demand, however, is restricted. An increased inquiry is looked for from the Southern and Northwestern, as well as from the near-by trade, which the resumption of inland navigation will soon bring forward. Prices remain without material change. . . No alteration of import, as all the lots offered, which suit purchasers, are quickly taken at, or near, the quotations. The sales of the week in this week's imports of Dry Goods has been $3,580,228 against $3,000,000 the previous week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $31,660,365 against $17,555,000 during the same period. . . . Commission and consignment business has been productive of any remarkable feature. . . . The following is a general list of the leading quotations for the leading articles:

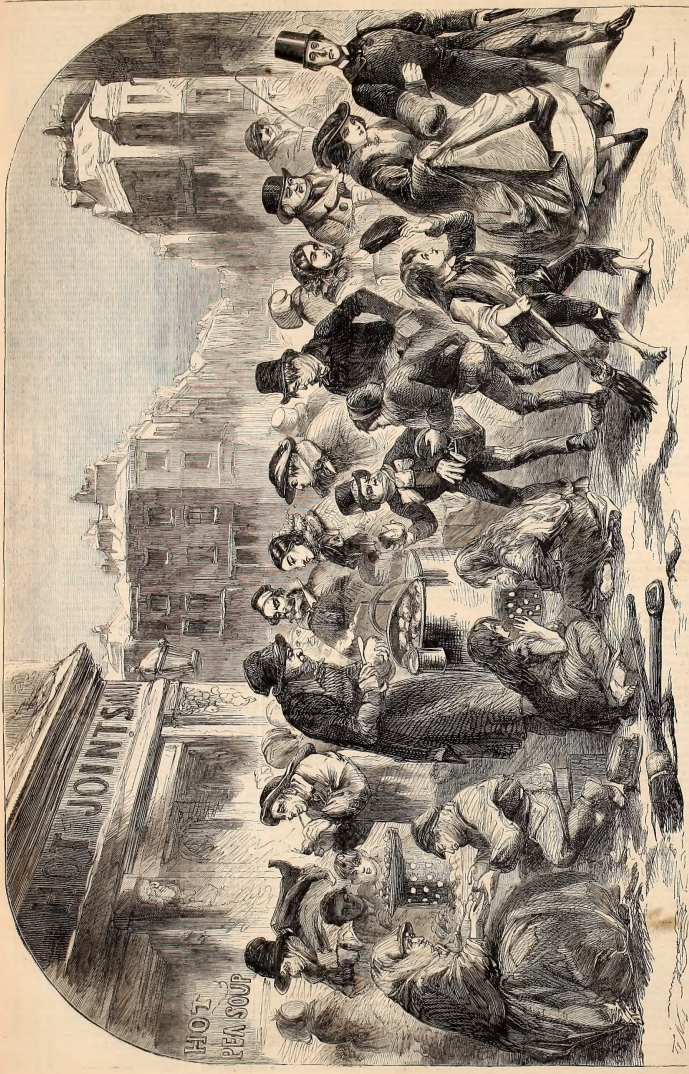
Alcohol, per gallon	$4 18 @ $5 75
Superfine to extra State, per barrel	5 45 @ 6 75
Superfine to extra Western, per barrel	5 45 @ 6 75
Extra Western, per barrel	6 65 @ 8 75
Extra Genesee, per barrel	7 00 @ 8 75
Extra Ohio, per barrel	7 00 @ 8 75
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	6 75 @ 9 00
Superfine to extra Rye Flour, per bbl.	5 45 @ 6 75
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 90 @ 4 40
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 42 @ 1 50
Red Wheat, per bushel	98 @ 1 05
White Wheat, per bushel	1 40 @ 1 50
New Corn, per bushel	87 @ 90
Old Corn, per bushel	90 @ 92
Barley, per bushel	60 @ 80
Western Oats, per bushel	40 @ 42
State Oats, per bushel	42 @ 45
Canada Oats, per bushel	45 @ 50
Southern Oats, per bushel	40 @ 45
Cotton, middlings, per pound	11¾ @ 12
Cotton, fair, per pound	12 @ 12½
Pitch Pine, per barrel	$1 87 @ 2 00
Common Rosin, per 310 pounds	1 90 @ 2 00
Cut Meats, per pound	6½ @ 7
Tallow, per pound	9 @ 9½
State Butter, per pound	17 @ 20
Ohio Butter, per pound	14 @ 16
Cheese, per pound	9 @ 12½
Lard, in barrels, per pound	5 @ 6
Rio Coffee, per pound	10 @ 11
Java Coffee, per pound	24 @ 24
Sugar, Cuba, per pound	6 @ 6
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	23 @ 25½
Rice, per pound	4 @ 5
Hops, per pound, 1857	5 @ 6
Hops, per pound, 1858	6 @ 8
Tallow, per pound	9 @ 9½
Clear Mess Pork, per barrel	$ 00 @ 16 00
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	14 00 @ 14 50
Prime Pork, per barrel	12 00 @ 12 50
Prime Beef, per barrel	9 00 @ 10 00
Cut Meats, per pound	6½ @ 7
Lard, per pound	10½ @ 11
State Butter, per pound	17 @ 20
Western Butter, per pound	14 @ 16
Cheese, per pound	9 @ 12½
Rio Coffee, per pound	10 @ 11
Java Coffee, per pound	24 @ 24
Sugar, Cuba, per pound	6 @ 6
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	23 @ 25½
Rice, per pound	4 @ 5
Hops, per pound, 1857	5 @ 6
Hops, per pound, 1858	6 @ 8
Tallow, per pound	9 @ 9½
Clear Mess Pork, per barrel	$ 00 @ 16 00
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	14 00 @ 14 50
Prime Pork, per barrel	12 00 @ 12 50
Prime Beef, per barrel	9 00 @ 10 00
Cut Meats, per pound	6½ @ 7
Lard, per pound	10½ @ 11
Linseed Oil, per gallon	60 @ 62
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6 @ 12
Seed Leaf Tobacco	6 @ 15
Havana Tobacco, per pound	40 @ 65
Pulled Wool	24 @ 25
Am. Y'llow Pine Timber, per pound	1 00 @ 1 25
Refined Ingot Copper, per pound	23½ @ 24
Refined Sheet Copper, per pound	28 @ 29
Dry Codfish, per barrel, 196 pounds	4 00 @ 4 50
Pickled Codfish, per barrel, 196 pounds	4 00 @ 4 50
Pickled Salmon, per barrel	14 00 @ 15 00
Smoked Herring, per box	16 @ 18
Pickled Herring, per barrel	5 00 @ 10 50
Am. Hemp, dressed, per ton	225 00 @ 250 00
Clover Seed, per pound	6½ @ 7
Timothy Seed, per bushel	2 25 @ 2 75

The following are the prices according to the advices of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday and Monday:

Beeves	$ 0 00 @ $ 0 00
Four to Premium Beeves, per pound	9 @ 9½
Premium to Extra Beeves, per pound	8½ @ 9
Veal Calves, per pound	6 @ 10
Sheep and Lambs, per pound	6 @ 7½
Lambs, per pound	6 @ 7
Live Swine, per pound	6 @ 6½
Dressed Hogs, per pound	8 @ 8½
Country Pigs, each	1 00 @ 2 00

The Country Produce Markets have been only moderately supplied. The Country Produce Exchange, the Wholesale Prices current or Provisions at Washington Market, are as follows:

Apples, per barrel	$ 2 00 @ 3 00
Dried Apples, per pound	8 @ 9
Peaches, per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Dried Plums, per pound	12 @ 15
Dried Cherries, per pound	20 @ 25
Potatoes, sweet, per barrel	3 00 @ 4 00
Potatoes, per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Turnips, per bushel	60 @ 75
Onions, per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Carrots, per bushel	50 @ 75
Cabbages, per 100	4 00 @ 6 00
Chestnuts, per bushel	2 50 @ 3 00
Cranberries, per bushel	1 50 @ 2 00
Cranberries, per quart	12½ @ 15
Chestnuts, per bushel	75 @ 1 00
Chestnuts, per dozen bunches	75 @ 1 00
Celery, per bundle	4 00 @ 5 00
Celery, per bunches	4 00 @ 5 00
Celery, per dozen bunches	75 @ 1 00
Green Peas, per bushel	2 00 @ 2 50
Green Corn, per dozen	12½ @ 15
Chickens, per pound	10 @ 12
Chickens, per pair	50 @ 75
Fowls, per pair	75 @ 1 00
Geese, per pound	10 @ 12
Turkeys, per pound	12 @ 15
Ducks, per pair	75 @ 1 00
Quail, black, per pair	50 @ 62½
" snipper, per pair	50 @ 62½
" canvas back, per pair	1 00 @ 1 50
" gray, per pair	50 @ 62½
Partridges, per pair	1 00 @ 1 50
Pigeons, per dozen	1 75 @ 2 50
Partridge, per pair	1 00 @ 1 50
English Snipe, per pair	62 @ 75



STREET SCENE IN LONDON—WINTER EVENING.

STREET SCENE IN LONDON—THE JAM AT LONDON BRIDGE.

LONDON STREET SCENES.

We have thought that our readers would be glad to see the foregoing spirited pictures of London street life. Broadway—at Stewart's, at Canal Street, and above Union Square—is often unpleasantly crowded; the cry for a wider street is often heard; but what is the densest crowd in Broadway compared to the jam on London Bridge depicted on the preceding page? The sight seems to also characterize and all who have been in London will at once recognize its fidelity. Strange to say, though seats are to much higher here than in London, street life is comparatively rare here. In London, as Mr. Mayhew tells us, the streets are the scene of almost as much trade as the house.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. P. (Lockport).—Position sound and good, but scarcely sufficient depth to warrant a Diagram. "Chess one of the Fine Arts." Your solution of the Enigma and Problem is correct. Answer to his query shortly.—Sir Jas. Stirling.—In answer to his query whether or no the King's Gambit is so strong as opening as R Kt to B 3 or second move, we refer him to Staunton.—Dr. R. (Philadelphia). In your friend P.'s Problem last sent will not 1. P to Q 4 or Q to R thereby produce mate on the third move?——Q. S. W. (Hertford).—Yes, you can be matched. We don't know how you can score games which have not been played.——J. D. In the matter of the Murphy testimonial you are yet in good time. Forward your subscription to the Rev. Mr. Wainwright, Trinity Church, New York. The article of proposition consist of a set of Chessmen in solid gold and silver, a board inlaid with ivory and ebony squares, and a gold watch.—value of the testimonial $2500.——"Harper's Chess Club" (Baltimore). A Problem in fairy shape and a solution of a section in a forthcoming number of moves than stipulated for in the stated terms.

PROBLEM XXI.

BY "CUBNEY," OF DETROIT.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in four moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM XX.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q to K 2	1. P to K 4
2. K to B 6 checkmate.
1. P to Q 4	1. P to Q 4
2. Q takes P	2. Kt to B 3 (ch)
3. K to Q B 5	3. P to K 3
4. Q to K Kt 5	4. P to B 4
5. P takes Kt	5. P takes P
6. Q to K B 5	6. P to K 4
7. B to K 3	7. P to K 5
8. Q Kt to B 3	8. P to Q 5
9. Castles (Ch side)	9. Kt to K 2
10. Kt to K	10. P to K 3
11. Kt to Q 3	11. P to K 4
12. K Kt to B 4	12. P to Q 3
13. P to Q B 4	13. P to Q B 4
14. K P takes B	14. P takes P
15. Q to K 3	15. Q to K 2
16. Q to K 4	16. Q to K 3
17. Q to K 3	17. Q to K 2
18. Q to K 4	18. Q to K 3
19. K Kt takes P (ch)	19. K takes P
20. K takes P (ch)	20. K to Q 3
21. Q to K 3	21. K to K 2
22. Q to K Kt 4	22. Kt to K B 4
23. Kt takes Kt, etc.

White wins.

NOTES.

(a) This move contributes the defence of Philidor. Although it appears to lead to the winning of a winning piece, it is one of the most subtle moves in the game.

(b) Black could have more accurately adopt this move 4. B to Q 3.

(c) He had apparently better have played Queen's pawn on the last move.

(d) The Eastern friend has had, for the last few moves, but little chance for the game, and the way he sacrifices his pieces shows up his wish in quite characteristic of his old dashing style.

LITERARY.

We have known Mr. Alexander Watson for many years as one of the most successful gardeners and agriculturists in America. We therefore welcome a book from his hands.—The American Home Garden (published by Harper & Brothers) —as the result of long experience, careful observation, and diligent study in the best gardens, nurseries and customs of our garden inhabitants. We are sure that here is no theoretic gardening, but that all is practical and practicable.——Mr. Watson starts with a simple garden plan, and suggests its arrangement; then gives us the necessary tools, their uses and ways of usefulness; instructs us on manures, and on the accidents and the insects which are foes to the gardener; and then gives a history and sketch of every useful article in the American kitchen and flower-garden. We venture to say that no one who owns a garden the square of soil can fail, with the aid of this book, to make his little lot pay well in beauty and in food; while we commend it to all agriculturists as being a clear, intelligible, and, as we have said, most eminently practical work. It should be in every house placed in the hands of all the boys in the country who love gardening.

The Bible Annals, published by Carter & Brothers, is a narrative of the charitable labors of Hannah and Martha More in their neighborhood. So says the title-page. These labors involved the establishment of day and Sunday schools in villages, workshops for the poor, and the practice of reuniting good that no man can estimate. The book is like "English Hearts and English Hands" in a simple and a noble story, in which we find names that we have honored heretofore crowned with simple and yet exalting humility.

R. M. Devitt publishes a capital little manual, The Cotton Grower's Assistant, prepared by a planter, by Mr. Charles H. Stanley, who is well known to our readers. It is precisely the book required, and ought to have a large sale among the Kings of cotton, which Morphy has recently made so illustrious. It is simple, intelligible, cheap, and handy.

Adam Bede, by George Eliot (Harper & Brothers), is a powerful novel. The characters are real characters are there, and how they stand out on the page, every one in his own individuality! We have known such people, and we recognize them. What they talk of we have talked of, and their emotions and passions, and loves and aversions are all ours. It is true they go plain people mostly; but sometimes the plain man, as in the case of this, rises a compressed instance of certain traits of humanity found all the world over. It is astonishing how much human nature there is in all men.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE POST-OFFICE IMBROGLIO.

Postmaster Holt has published a letter from which we make the following extracts:

"Upon a careful examination and investigation, it has been ascertained that the deficiency will amount to about the sum of $900,000, as stated in my letter of 7th inst. It is proved that, after the 30th of June next, the sum of $700,000, appropriated to the Department by the acts of July 3, 1848, and March 3, 1851, for the transportation and delivery of the mails on the Pacific Coast and for the relative Department, may be applied in part to the extinguishment of this deficiency. This will reduce the balance to be provided for to $65,000. Of the foreign sum of $4,380,291 95, the deficiency which existed in the quarter ending on the 31st December, 1858, was

.....$749,841 69

That for the quarter ending 31st March 1859, was

.....1,071,288 01

Total.....$1,821,129 70

"The $749,841 69—being the unpaid balance of the quarter's account ending 31st December, 1858—ended on 30th February—one and will be paid by the Department from the appropriation of the current year. The only principal part of it will be made within thirty days. The effect of this will be to reduce the deficiency to $4,385,291 95 between the quarter ending 31st March and 30th June, and payable that time. It appears, also, that the suspension of payment on on part of this indebtedness was caused by the failure of the last session of Congress to make any appropriation for it. Congress, in nearly one half of its the suspension of payment in England. The captain, sea-child of whose freight had been reduced as a guarantee for the performance of his contract, remonstrated with their demand to have his brook let to passengers, but was told that he must do as they suggested or acquiesce in his decision, or at least whatever demand no further that evening; but the next morning it was again renewed, and in a more decided and threatening manner. A young Italian, named Raffaelli Settembrini, had shipped with the captain in Leghorn, and signed articles as a seaman. Up to that morning he had done his work with the rest of the crew. But when the assemblage waited upon the captain he made his appearance in the costume of a fine lady of the Galerie line of existence,—a handsome blue frock, with gilt buttons, a white vest, and a fine Leghorn hat with gold band. It was in vain that he was told to go forward and work, who, hearing of his father's condemned, and of his destination, he refused to do any thing but to the seas we have mentioned to join him. The captain of the ship declared that he dispatched by the Italian Ministry of London to aid the prisoners in the course they subsequently took.

HOW THEY TOOK THE COMMAND OF THE SHIP.

The ringleader of the band had a navigator in their midst, and at once they held a council, and chose by the hands of the majority of their number to be able to sail her without their assistance. They represented to the captain that they had been ten months at sea, tired of them being old, and all with constitutions more or less enfeebled by an injurious climate, that a short run to long voyage would be fortune to them all, and death perhaps to some. They somewhat like the Yankees, and the American flag, they were free, and that they had no right to be taken any where but where they chose. Their arguments, backed up by the preponderance of physical force, the original right of the ship to sail where she was best accustom, and the manifest determination of the majority to do so, left the captain no option but submission, compelled him to give the course to the navigator's head northward. They were temperate and polite in command; but short indiscriminations were made with no mistake. They set a good, effective crew in turn, to keep watch and ward by night and by day, that the ship's head was kept in the direction of the haven they looked for. Not to weather was hardship, and they were never idlers. The captain intended making for Cork, but caused the harbor to be fixed, and all to be put in for Lisbon, but having fallen in with a Cork pilot, but back again, and that brought a voyage of 3,000 miles instead of the only anchored in the mess-of-war roads. As fast as they neared the land, the spirits of the prisoners appeared to increase, and, indeed, they had every reason to manifest joy at being at last assured of freedom. The continued seems to have been a plain sailing one, and when used the soil upon which they first planted foot as free-men. Some of them are already doing well, have given him the length of time they have been in prison, and seem to have no desire rather greater opportunity as far as we were able to judge, there was not in their appearance any thing to indicate that they endured peculiar hardship.

HOW POERIO AND HIS FRIENDS LOOK.

"During the voyage, Poerio, whose health has been greatly undermined, was free of fever, and had only been for a couple of hours daily. On his arrival at Gaeta-town, he was found likewise to be recovered in a great degree. In appearance he is short, thick-set, and rather good-looking. His age is about 40. He has a mild and delicate that he is somewhat older. He now speaks but a few words of English, which he says he has quite lost since the language well. The want of exercise in speaking or reading it for many years has, he says, rendered his accent has almost entirely obliterated it from his memory. The young soldier, to whom he was so much attached, is of very prepossessing appearance. We have not learned his name, although we think it is Carlo Poerio. He is very probably the present of the late Minister, who is in Italy, seeking refuge in the Sardinian kingdom. Under any circumstances, this youth will, we believe, go to Sardinia."

THE GREAT PEERS OF ENGLAND.

A London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian thus speaks of some of the great men of the British House of Lords:

"A very interesting Parliamentary performance the Duke of Newcastle has given us during the week of his Academy. Lord Lyndhurst's speech was a most pathetical fungosity. Now, I believe, in his eighty-eighth year, he is as bold in intellect and as vigorous in mind as playful at once and as powerful in illustration as he ever was. Does the old and venerable man ever remember that the eagle-faced old man spoke of the days when I attended Sir Joshua Reynolds's evening parties years ago. As the son of Copley, the historical painter, Lord Lyndhurst's youth was passed chiefly in the society of artists. He still cherishes the memory of those days, and is proud of his father's and Reynolds's fame. On the other day I heard of his sending for one of our distinguished painters, and asking him to paint his portrait, leaving a picture of his father's in the room. It is consistent to some public institution in his father's native State —I believe at Boston. Lord Lyndhurst's life has been a wonder than Lord Lyndhurst, though several years younger. His energy is still terrific. An old and venerable sledge-hammer where Lyndhurst handles a small sword—but the less death-like it remains the better able to wield it. Far unimpaired clearness of intellect, Lord Lansdowne, now 82 years of age, and whose years are not unfrequently with either of these rigid precision. But doubtless it is physical energy that is necessary to his amusements. His genial, social, and intellectual character is, I believe, the result of the training up of that great senator by his grand-mother. Lord Lansdowne's son as whether with Lord Brougham in the business team of which Lansdowne was the leader. The intellect is of a less massive order than Brougham's, of a less feeble physical energy than Lansdowne's, than Lord Lyndhurst's; but it is an eminently practical mind, and in capital working condition. It is a pity that it is kept in full play as it is, yet not overtasked, by the duties of the Lord Justiceship of Ireland. Lord Derby, I further, and I suppose we might challenge any assemblage of any country of any time to produce three orators, as examples of large acquirement, and long-established and universally-acknowledged power."

AN HONEST LAWYER.

In the course of a lecture delivered in the hall of the Law Society, in Chancery lane, London, "On the moral, social, and professional duties of the attorney and solicitor," Mr. Warren, M.P., narrated the following incident: "A barrister once got drunk on the circuit. He was, in fact, worth his £50,000, was indignant with his only child, a daughter, for marrying a poor curate. He disinherited her, and left the whole property, £50,000, to a nephew. The barrister died, and his son, all of whose associations were with the profession of fortune was a retired solicitor in the town of Manchester, and the daughter and curate were in the most pinching distress in Yorkshire, with mind unbroken. On the receipt of the intelligence of the unexpected legacy, spirit, and deservedly held in respect as an honest lawyer and a kind friend. The curate's daughter has a most magnificent estate, and the late Lawyer of his daughter's choice wears a coat of apple, and has marriage of a notable number of children."

A SEPOY IN A TRUCK.

The Court Journal says: "An officer who has just left the Indian campaign arrived at a west-end hotel with his luggage, among which was a box of unusual proportions, about which he expressed great anxiety, and his repeated counsellings with regard to the safe keeping of the box, and there was something mysterious attached to it. One of the girls, during the absence of the owner of the box and his luggage, took the box, and not so many minutes after the owner brought grew way to the evil genius of curiosity, and as the key was in the trunk, opened it, and found a Sepoy. Thought and done; but the fair partner of the first blow found herself could not have been more horrer-struck than the fair slayer of the hotel. The lid dropped, and she fled in consternation to the mistress and the master, for nothing short of a horrid murder could have been committed according to her notions. At the instant when the excitement was at its height the proprietor of the establishment, and a word or two put him on full with matters, and a malicious laugh showed that the trap Miss Curiosity had fallen into was a set one, perhaps, was laid. At any rate, the sepoy was not dissolved. The nonchalant company was then invited to an inspection. The box was opened; it contained, certainly, that which might have irked the nerves of the most unsophisticated, but the sepoy was dead, and looking uncommonly fresh and lively. The reported departed was then taken out, and, after a little time, was soon figured through his hairy beard and literate appendages. He was a native servant, and was used to the truck. The suspension, either for a museum present or a pea dinner, is more than I can say."

THE NEW DISEASE—DIPHTHERIA.

The London Medical Review has a publication," by the sanitary committee of that journal, which treats the new disease, which has for a period been so prevalent in Hippocrates, and vastly contemporary with Homer, it was known to the Greeks as the Egyptian ulcer. It appeared in Spain in 1613, in Italy in 1618, in England, 1357; in Spain, 1690; in Naples, 1735; in Ireland, 1826; in Russia, 1828; in Paris, 1855. In the United States, it would appear, ravaged New York in 1771 and 1815. The deaths of Washington and Benjamin Franklin are attributed to it. From the careful study of the French physicians, Bretonneau, in 1854, diphtheria would appear to have traversed nearly all the departments of France, and to have been especially severe toward the centre. The epidemic which appear most severely in Paris during a period long enough to test its ravages, are those of Paris and Boulogne, in 1856. The disease is not confined to any season of the year, but appears to have been most destructive of living under ten years of age, and that the female sex is more liable to it than the male. Diphtheria, it would seem, has shown itself regardless of meteorological, climatological, and geological influences. It has appeared in the heat, cold, dryness, and moisture. Its course has been from the Mediterranean coast to the centre of the country, and thence toward the north. Its violence appears to be independent of the state of the public health, races, certain predisposing individual conditions, and the like. Its contagious character would seem to be not to be eminently contagious; and that the first generation taken ill is the most dangerous to the surrounding people. "It is found to attack the tonsils, which have been greatly overlooked, and hence, partly, the frequency with which it has been mistaken for the sore throat of a family or another until all have fallen.

TRACHEAL AND LATHS.

Mr. Edmund Yates has published a delightful giving the history of his quarrel with Mr. Thackeray and the Garrick Club. In the Times of Feb. 26, Mr. Charles Dickens offered his mediation:

"Gad's Hill Place, Higham by Rochester, December 24, 1858.

"MY DEAR THACKERAY,—Without a word of pretext I wish this letter to find you in the best of health. I call it six weeks to you at the Athenæum when I last saw you.

"Coming down here on Monday last, I find in the Sir John James's opinion taken on the painful question of the Garrick Committee and Mr. Yates, and I write to you on the impulse of the moment.

"It is quite impossible that you and I, should tell you that Mr. Yates has been a friend of mine, and that your letter to me. He had recently done me a most kind service, and I had written to him to express my promise generality within your knowledge; he naturally thought of me when he found himself in trouble, and that his action was not to be defended; but I confident that you will feel with me that it is a very unfortunate for him to set right what was amiss, on the receipt of a letter emotion of which I am sure you are not capable of. When you appealed to the Garrick Committee, and they refused to entertain the appeal, I said at that meeting that I had been on good terms for many years, and that I had no reason to suppose that you were not on good terms with me, and that I should be glad to write to you, and that to the strength of my conviction I should write to you.

"If this mediation that I have suggested can take place I shall be glad to hear of it. If it can not, I do not know I hold no sensible spirit toward any one, least of all, my dear Thackeray, toward you. I say it in the least, no worse than it now is; and you will bear this letter as I bear it, in remembrance.

"Yours faithfully, CHARLES DICKENS.

"W. M. THACKERAY, Esq."

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S POLICY.

The Monitor of Brussels gives the following highly important article:

"Journals in foreign countries does not clearly understand the present regime of the press in France. The belief prevails that the articles which appear in journals are subjected to a previous censorship, and that the Government is responsible for their publication. This information is entirely erroneous, and the most protective action as regards the press. The public journals, therefore, are not the organs of the Government, founded on the language of the journals. Whosoever a newly-questioning of the Government, whether it be accomplished, the Government addresses itself directly to the author of the article, and not to the paper in which it has always imposed on itself, and which it will accomplish to the end, whatever the consequences may be, since, as public opinion is now more than ever taken into consideration.

"In the state of things in Italy, although of old date, has been the object of the most serious study on the part of the Emperor, and it is the result of the profound reflection of the Emperor; for the chief of a great Power like France can not act on the spur of the moment, or without a fixed and decided opinion. Animated by a spirit of prudence which has always guided his actions, the Emperor has come to form his intention in the most loyal manner to the resolutions which he announced in his speech at the close of the last session.

"In presence of the disquietudes—we are glad to believe unfounded—which have been raised by opinion in Piedmont, the Emperor has promised the King of Sardinia that he would not abandon him, and would be the part of Austria. He has proceeded nothing more; and it is well known that he will keep his word.

FRANCE IS NOT PREPARING FOR WAR.

"The Emperor has not ordered extraordinary warlike preparations. This is a completely gratuitous information. The regular force of the army, the recruiting, adopted two years ago by the Emperor, has not been exceeded. This artillery is purchasing 6000 horses to obtain the regimentary limit. The infantry regiments are 3000 strong, and the regiments of cavalry 900.

"It is affirmed, also, that the French arsenals are displaying extraordinary activity. But it is forgotten that we have to change all our artillery and to transform our rifles. Besides, it is not extraordinary that the arsenals are in order to provide for the wants of the army, conformed by the annual votes of the legislative body; and, moreover, the transformation of our rifles for two years will still be necessary to complete the operation.

"Lastly, confusion is felt at the preparations in our navy. All these preparations, however, consist in fitting out the fleet for the conveyance of troops from France to Algeria, and from Algeria to France; and four screw transports destined to provide for different eventualities, especially for the service of Civita Vecchia, and for the recluiting, by way of Alexandria, of our expedition to Cochin China.

"Such are the facts, and they should fully reassure those who, such as the peoples ascribed to the Emperor, and look to the future, and who preserve the anticipations of those who are interested in casting doubt on the most unobjectionable measures, and closing the door to evil intentions."

RESIGNATION OF PRINCE NAPOLEON.

The Paris correspondent writes: "I have now to confirm what I mentioned in my last letter, that Prince Napoleon's position as Minister for the affairs of Algeria was at first refused by the Emperor; that it was, however, subsequently pressed; and that it was at last forced the third or fourth time that the Emperor ceased to refuse it. His Majesty also accepted the person the Prince recommended as his successor, namely, M. Chasseloup-Laubat, Minister for the affairs of the colonies. The nomination will appear on an early day in the Moniteur. The Prince has left Paris to proceed to his correct statement of the views of Prince Napoleon, and the reasons of the person who quitted the Cabinet, in connection with those, and whose sincerity I have no reason to doubt.

"A fact of importance is that the Emperor plays in the French Cabinet, of which he is important the political and diplomatic affairs are significantly left to his decision, namely, the resignation of his imperial Highness Prince Napoleon, and the fact that His Majesty has accepted the first of all, he declares that the retirement of the Prince will not be followed by any change in the political direction which unite him to his Majesty the Emperor, and that he will not be replaced by any person who will not support constant labor under a serious error. That the Prince has not been replaced by any one who will not support constant labor under a serious error. That the retirement of the Prince refers only to the Ministry of Algeria and the colonies, and that there will be a change of persons.

"Such is the entry into the Cabinet His Imperial Highness has been in frequent opposition, on questions of internal and external policy, with the majority of the Ministers, and especially with MM. Walewski and Fould. Their opposition within which was not to the great questions of the day, assumed a character of gravity during the last session, and especially at the moment of the publication of the Moniteur, or that it became impossible that it could be kept up. Hence the resolution announced some days ago by the Constitutionnel.

"The policy which Prince Napoleon intended to adopt in the Ministry of Algeria and the colonies will be a prudent liberty at home, under the ten-fold guarantee of the Constitution and authority, and a firm and promising attitude abroad."

THE RESIGNATION—FOREIGN TOWARD ENGLAND.

The following appears in the English newspapers and is from the Times:

"PALACE OF THE TUILERIES, March 1.

"MY DEAR SIR FRANCIS,—I have received your letter, together, in order to send them direct to me, the different addresses you have inserted in the English Journals, for you thus give me an opportunity of expressing, with the greatest frankness, the sentiments of which you have not feared the spontaneous manifestation in my favor. I am glad to see that the great majority of the people of England and of the friends in England have not forgotten me, and that they continue to do me justice, even where for their interests I have been obliged to act in a way which I felt during my exile in the midst of them. Even in writing these lines I address myself to friends, and happy time, the epoch when, prescribed, I saw you in Italy, in the midst of the fêtes which were given on our changes one's joys and sorrows. Formerly the affliction of the people touched me to me; but now I am the sincere of power, and one of the greatest of them around me is, without doubt, the sad and misunderstood and maligned by those who can values the most and who have the greatest interest in my friendship.

"I have always entertained the opinion that parties when it has been my duty to oppose them, have never been in the wish to do me harm, but that they were misled; but that the English, of whom I have always been the most devoted and sincere friend, and whose interests, of necessity in the journals in the most unworthy and in the most unjust manner, that is to say, anonymously; for, in truth, I can not discover any interest they can have in striking the second against the Emperor. As for my own country, I choose to act in this manner, it would be impossible for me to govern it, and therefore I think I should have let long.

"I have always entertained a great admiration for the virtues of the English people; but I have never had the liberty, like all great things, should also have its errors. Why is it then, that, instead of seeking to find out every effort to obscure it? Why is it that, encouraging with foreigners and calumniators, instead of seeking to trust and hatred?

"I am happy, then, among all these BRIGHTNESS of falsehood, to have found a defender who, guided by the love of truth, has not been deterred professionally s expose to them his loyal and disinterested voice.

"Receive, my dear Sir Francis,

"In my sentiments of friendship,

"NAPOLEON."

"SIR FRANCIS HEAD, Bart., &c., &c., &c."

THE ROTHSCHILD DANQUET.

A letter from Paris states that at the banquet given by Baron James de Rothschild to the Emperor, Napoleon all description, and it would appear that sixteen courses were served up, and that the Imperial Guests were invited upon an entertainment to which nobody could find any objection. Besides the Emperor and Empress, the Princess Clotilde, and Prince Napoleon, there were guests were made in silver and silver gilt; plates, dishes, knives, forks, spoons, and every thing on the tables; only at dessert was perceived the pretties service of china, belonging to the house of Rothschild, and whereat each plate represents somewhere about a family's crests, or monogram. The flowers were brought from every country and every clime; there were swallows' nests from China, and truffles from Périgueux and from Russia, or the sea of salmon, and of fat, orange-colored fish, which are found in the Caspian Sea, and which North America, and which are found in Newfoundland, cases of pinnacles' beaks, dishes of buffalo humps, and of the tail of the kangaroo, and other delicacies of Australian parents. Every suit or fresh water had yielded up its gay, every mountain its game, every field its early hot-bed, healed by fire or the sun, to fruit; and every grape that ripens on the sunny slopes, or on the flowers with which the table and the dining-room were ornamented. The cost of the dinner to the Baron exceeds 20,000 francs (about £1000 English). All the windows were closed, and the guests were lighted by a profusion of the choicest rose-pink grapes of the tropics, shedding their light through the crystal of the chandeliers on the tables. Dessert was served at 11 o'clock, and cost between 10,000 and 12,000 francs' worth of jewels, and the Baron de Rothschild presented to the Empress a bracelet of it set in table from half past six to midnight.

BAL COSTUME AT MADAME FOULD'S.

On the 25th ultimo, M. Fould, the Minister, received, at his apartments at the Tuileries, the nobility and world of Paris at a splendid Bal Costume. There were about 1900 guests. Among the dominoes were the Emperor and Empress, who did not otherwise appear. Prince Napoleon and the Princess Mathilde were also there, but no mention is made of the Princess Clotilde.

SOLTYKOFF AND DUMAS.

The Express correspondent writes: "Soultykoff sent an envoy to France, charged with a private mission, and armed with full powers. Shortly after the said minister's arrival, he caused himself to be presented to Alexandre Dumas, and, after some pops, one of which, I believe, or ought to know, was a magnificent general, of a noble family, and who had been a friend of Dumas's for a long time, being of a similar kind, and Dumas junior, as a friend of Dumas senior, pretends to be almost as much so as the dark.

"The Hayties envoy, after diplomatically beating about the bush for a considerable time, finally came to business, and wound up by informing the astonished novelist that the object of his mission to France was for the purpose of demanding the hand in marriage of Dumas junior for her Imperial Highness the Princess Olive, daughter of the Emperor of all the Hayties.

"The head of Alexander!' cried father Dumas, throwing his cigar. 'Goodness gracious! Gracious goodness! The entered pronto must be insane! I say you must be!'

"He paused. The fact is, the author of Monte Cristo has a horrible reputation of never having deliberately said a dangerous thing in his life. He is, in fact, the most harmless man in creation. 'It's impossible, Sir! Utterly impossible!'

"'Why?' inquired the envoy.

"'Why? Because—hum!—because my son's origin is—hum!—rather mixed, and—and—and—and so forth.'

"Dumas thought this a triumphant piece of cunning.

"'Is that all?' inquired the envoy. 'Then, Sir, permit me to say, and emphasizing modestly, 'what are we? Only a—hum!—a—hum!—a—hum!—a—hum!—a—hum!—a—hum! Imagine it, I beg, but it's a fact. Besides, Sir, if we are not, we ought to be, and we will be, for we are the Emperor of Hayties, and can do and say any. A Majesty Prince—that's the title—will be the husband of your son, and—and—and—

MARCH WINDS.

MARCH WINDS AND APRIL SHOWERS.

THE accompanying engravings need no letter-press. They will be recognized and admired by all who have spent a spring in the temperate zone.

A WARNING.

PLACE your hands in mine, dear,
With their rose-leaf touch:
If you heed my warning,
It will spare you much.

Ah! with just such smiling,
Unbelieving eyes,
Years ago I heard it:
You shall be more wise.

You have one great treasure,
Joy for all your life;
Do not let it perish
In one reckless strife.

Do not venture all, child,
In one frail, weak heart;
So, through any shipwreck,
You may save a part.

Where your soul is tempted
Most to trust your fate,
There, with double caution
Linger, fear, and wait.

Measure all you give—still Counting what you take;
Love for love: so placing
Each an equal stake.

Treasure love; though ready
Still to live without.
In your fondest trust, keep
Just one thread of doubt.

Trust no prayer nor promise;
Words are grains of sand:
Keep your heart unbroken,
Safely in your hand.

That your love may finish
Calm as it began,
Learn this lesson better,
Dear, than I have done.

Years hence, perhaps, this warning
You shall give again,
In just the self-same words, dear,
And—just as much in vain.

APRIL SHOWERS.

CAPTAIN PAGE, OF THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

GENERAL JUSTO JOSÉ DE URQUIZA, PRESIDENT OF THE ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.

PROGRESS OF THE SQUADRON.

THE latest intelligence from the United States Paraguay Expedition points to a probable peaceable settlement of the pending difficulties. The Fulton, having on board Commodore Shubrick and Mr. Commissioner Bowlin, the Dolphin, Harriet Lane, Bainbridge, Water Witch, and Perry, entered one of the mouths of the Parana (on which river lies the contumacious state of Paraguay) on Saturday, January 1. On the 4th the fleet anchored opposite Rosario, 300 miles above Buenos Ayres, and the capital and chief town of the state of Santa Fé, one of the Argentine Confederation. Rosario is a good coaling station, and it was the intention to fill the bunkers of the steamers here, and then proceed up river to Corrientes, which city is but twenty miles from the junction of the rivers Paraguay and Parana, three miles from which occurred the attack on the United States steamer Water Witch, on February 1, 1855.

Meantime, on the 5th January, Señor Justo J. Urquiza, President of the Argentine Confederation, an intelligent and liberal-minded man, arrived at Rosario, accompanied by several distinguished officers of the Government. The President was visited by Mr. Bowlin and Commodore Shubrick, whom he received with great cordiality. From the conversation which took place it appears that the Argentine Republic and Uruguay will make efforts, by means of Plenipotentiaries already sent to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, to bring about a pleasable settlement. General Gaido has for this purpose been appointed Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary on the part of the Argentine Confederation to Paraguay, while Dr. Juan Gualberto Mendez, a young physician recently returned to Montevideo from France, has left on board of an American steamer, having been appointed Minister ad hoc to represent the Government of the republic of Uruguay in the Diplomatic Conferences.

At the interview at Rosario Commodore Shubrick presented to President Urquiza a piece of the Atlantic telegraph cable, bound with a shield of gold, on which was inscribed, "To the President of the Argentine Confederation, General Justo José de Urquiza."

General Urquiza, whose portrait is given herewith, is the author of the decree which first opened the immense and fertile region of the Parana to the commerce of the world. He is spoken of in very high terms by all the North Americans who have come in personal or official relations with him. Mr. Pendleton, formerly United States Minister at Buenos Ayres, spoke of him with admiration as a "man of the times." Captain Page found him frank and courteous; and his enlightened liberality is shown by the unhesitating and immediate consent he gave to Captain Page for the prosecution of his scientific and surveying operations on the rivers which bound or water the Argentine States.

Very different from Lopez, of Paraguay, who proved cunning, deceitful, and ignorant.

Corrientes, which will be the next place of rendezvous for the fleet, lies on the Parana, about 200 miles from the ocean. It has above 12,000 inhabitants, an extended water-front, capable of accommodating a considerable commerce, is well laid out, with streets running at right angles, and houses of brick, mostly of one story.

The real designs of Lopez are not yet apparent. With a man of his character, next to the immediate and energetic measures of retaliation which Captain Page was prevented from carrying out at the time the Water Witch was fired into, the best course undoubtedly is to negotiate for redress with a formidable threat in perspective.

As for the opinions entertained at Rosario, a correspondent at that place thus states them:

"As far as I can learn, the sentiment prevails here that every thing will be amicably arranged, and that we will soon wend our way for home. The Argentine people have not objected, as we thought probable, to our passage through their dominions; and although they have outrageously at the Norte Americanos, I do not believe they are much interested in the result of our dispute. If Lopez does not precipitate matters by suddenly in discussion, we succeed in poisoning the food of some of our dignitaries, as it is believed was done with the son of the English Minister, we will soon quit a country which is unexampled as well for the beauty of its surface as for the loveliness of its females and the worthlessness of its men."

Those who wish to inform themselves thoroughly on the merits of the "Paraguay Question," and on the varied beauties and immense but undeveloped commercial resources of the fine countries drained by the Paraguay and Parana rivers, are referred to the interesting work of Captain Thomas J. Page (whose portrait we give herewith): "La Plata, the Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay," just published by Harper & Brothers.

MONTEVIDEO, FROM THE FORT ON THE MOUNT.

CORRIENTES, UPPER END.

CORRIENTES, LOWER END.

FIRST LOVE AND SECOND WIFE.

I NEVER that summer at Nahant. I am obliged to confess myself rather blue. An old bachelor of thirty-three, I have run the course of dissipation, and feel it necessary that quiet should come; not that my constitution will not stand it, but I am really like Sir Charles Coldstream, and have cried out "there's nothing in it." I get through my time philosophically. Winter in London, Paris, or New York; summer at Baden, Aix-la-Chapelle, or some of our own watering spots, only excepting Saratoga. I ignore gentility, abominate mediocrity, and am positively delighted with a sensation. This, however, is so seldom found without contributing one's whole self, that I am only half engaged as a great luxury.

That summer I spent at Nahant; and one evening, sitting on the broad piazza, divining my attentions between my cigar, the crowds who promenaded below, and the glitter of the sea in the mild full August moon, I was pleasantly aroused from a dreamy, apathetic state by the sound of my name. Had it been my name pronounced in a formal manner, I should perhaps hardly have turned at my head: in this case it came to me in a voice calling back all old associations, and coupled with that familiar shortening of the Christian patronymic so pleasant to ears drained by the lofty-sounding titles of the world. I rose and met my visitor.

"Charley Curtis, my dear old friend, how glad I am to see you!"

I said nothing but what was literally true. I was glad to see him—intensely glad; and as certainly shocked when I looked upon his countenance, and saw how changed from the day when I last took his hand and bade him farewell, on that levee at New Orleans, just eight years to a month before.

Charley Curtis and I had been school-mates, college-mates, and traveling-mates; we were brothers in every thing but birth until his marriage, some months previous to the time of our meeting, eight years before. We had been constantly together for two years. It was the shortest time by far then that I should spend a few years in a rambling tour through Europe. Charley could not go. The death of his father called him home to the management of a large sugar estate lying on the Mississippi, above New Orleans. It was, however, arranged that I should go home with him and spend a year previous to my departure, that I might be initiated into the mysteries of sugar and cotton planting.

Charley's mother, a tall, dark, stern woman, who, without appearing to herself to have a atom of affection, ruled her children with the decision of a Napoleon, and with quite the same sort of unbending manner of policy, carried this manner over the death of his father, by holding a life-interest in the entire property. Charley and I were to go home with her, Josephine, entirely in the hands of their mother with reference to all worldly matters.

A single year I spent in the South. The home of Charley Curtis was any thing but a home of enjoyment: the stern discipline, the formality, the system, through every walk of the house and plantation, rather tended to harden me to a young man's way than to soften it. I was then, as I am now, a man of impulse, and though I am free in every thing, I am free in every thing with a certain degree of method, and I could not know that way Miss Joye stood ready to teach, and the fraternization of the system was perfect. Ah, those glorious summer days! what have been the wanderings and fates since!

It was one of these trips to New Orleans that Charley first met Marie Dugrayne. A more beautiful little black-eyed creature I have never beheld. I have seen those since whom I think as well, perhaps that Charley loved her as he did, madly, as he should always have done so were she to be his—No matter. Marie was of French extraction. She was left to her own right and by expected inheritance; and, when I first saw her, was as perfect a specimen of seventeen-year-old beauty and childish innocence as ever eye was beheld. I do not blame Charley Curtis for loving her; it was impossible to look upon her and not do so; but, poor fellow! how well he loved, and how well he all knew, that she was to him only as a myth. Charley was the property of his mother, and that mother had years ago promised Charley in marriage to Josephine, her niece, her daughter Sophia, who would be sole heir to the Winston property, and three hundred negroes; which plantation, adjoining the Curtis property, would be the means of uniting the ambition of Mrs. Curtis, and complete her worldly happiness. There was no mistake in Charley's mind of opposing the desires of his mother; this was so perfectly a chimera that he did not for a moment entertain it. Marie was to all actual idea I never knew. That he loved Marie, and did not believe she loved him, I could not fail to know. That Marie loved Charley was also palpably certain. It was in my efforts as minister plenipotentiary I became thoroughly conversant with all these facts, and as entirely devoted to bringing about the right state of affairs at whatever cost. I could see my way clearly in every case but that of Mrs. Curtis. I feared that woman; and, in spite of her being the mother of Charley, I could not like her a bit.

But as a diplomatist I went. I shall never forget the day of my interview with that tall, dark, stately woman. Nothing upheld me through it but my friendship for Charley. How successful should I be if I could but plead for myself as I plead then for my friend! It was all of no avail. My answer was very decided. The lady could not see, firstly, why I should interfere in matters that only concerned the welfare of the family. If Charles had any thing to say, why did he not say it personally? He could certainly have no objection to Miss Winston—either to her beauty, her wealth, or position. Why should he avoid a marriage that would enhance his own importance before the world? In fact, it was her desire and her will that her son Charles should marry Miss Winston; and he did.

I stood with him at the altar when he wedded his bloodless bride, and I could see in the cold admiration which I knew she could not but accord to her friend for his person. He was handsome. And was a belle, always much sought, and runner Sophia Winston was content that her lands and negroes had bought the finest-looking man in the whole country round.

But I know all—she knew nothing. She knew not of Marie Dugrayne. I knew it, and the agony was over, that Charley Curtis came to me, and taking my hand, drew it to his breast, and with a burst of passionate grief, told me that he was to be the sacrifice he had made; and I knew with what burning words he bade me go to Marie, and tell her, not from him, but from myself, what he would wish her to know, but what he dared not tell. And I went to Marie—how in all the future from all such missions! Oh! that dear little dark-eyed lassy! Never shall I forget the bright but pitying tones of all the coming time on that one dream of struyed!

Time went over; Charley and I parted. I had watched his new life for months. I had seen the cold, unimpassioned, intellectual attention of the wife; I had watched with a shivering admiration the beautiful courtesy with which Mrs. Charley Curtis received the world. It was a perfect well-bred—a study for a hand-book on etiquette. Charley went on account to New Orleans. I, a year older down into a model of quietude; and I, after perfecting myself in the culture of sugar, carried him the first, the first time since my departure, an on the levee, one spring morning, I waved him the last adieu, and turned my face once more to the sea upon the hotest soil of Nahant.

And this is my story of Charley Curtis before I left him. I am glad to see him, and if my shake of the hand and squeeze of the old fellow to my heart was any proof, he had it.

"Who was with him? and how came he there and when had he been?" and where was he going? and was any one body?"

"Every body was well who was living. His mother was with him, and Josephine, quite reconciled with herself and all the world, and charging Charley with the last breath always to keep his place, unless together. He was in Paris, had just returned by the Cunard steamer to Boston, and came down to see me for a few days. He was going home, and I must and shall go with him, and any absence of the weather or season I should like while we were there, and would put in the request; and also his sister Josephine."

"Josephine! Is Miss Josephine!"

"Not very little now. My dear fellow, remember how eight years have passed since last we met, and little Josephine is now nineteen or one."

True. How apt we are to think that time alters none but ourselves! I might have fully understood that Miss Josephine Winston of nineteen had put an unmistakable wrinkle from his cap down. It had married him with a haggard look, an old-bachelorish expression about the mouth. Care-a-premise borne by a man who has a perpetual master, or who has installed power over him.

I was soon in the presence of Mrs. Charles Curtis, who received me with great engagement, not to say warmth, which, when I came to look at her, I felt an attitude that I always concluded it must be assumed when she had a friend to see, as I never met such a person, she succeeded in the idea.

And then in a few minutes came Josephine—little Josephine, as I knew her, in a full, rich room of eight years agone I had before me?—a beautiful, dark, stately, queenly, Juno-like woman: all her mother's air, without the sternness. I was preparing, before she came, to meet Miss Josephine with a little and coldness, for the sake of old times. But, oh no!—well, I did have the kindness to do something of the kind, but it would do no less. I had kissed Charley on our meeting: why not his sister? But—it was very unusual with me to use a certain unceremoniousness—old friendliness about it that was at once flattering to the person and shall I say? to myself generally.

The same exact and studied attentions from Charley to his wife, and the same condescending mode of taking them, Miss Josephine received; like a couple who had been just introduced, and were playing the part of husband and wife, inquisitively demands.

And then Charley told me all the long sight years over. Only one subject on which he did not touch, or when he did, so slightly did his speak that I felt it was merely skimming the top with his wife. Of all things else he talked. Of Marie he only knew by report. He had not seen her; he rather avoided the opportunity. He never went, to New Orleans now but for business. But he had heard of Marie; and in that long three hours we talked over the past Marie came in for nineteenths of the time; and had I been the lady's telegrapher I should have wasted no better chronicle of all her ways and movements, her thoughts, her expressions, but for my silent heart; and as I was sure, when he told me, that it was the truth he had not seen her since his marriage, nor had he spoken her name, or of her, since last we parted eight years before. And there is no mystery in this. Divide two hearts as you will, still there is a magnetic intelligence through life which, if they were ever truly attached, vibrates to the heart and eye of each.

Marie had trembled under the blow; for months she had not been seen in society. Why, the world did not know; but when again she came forth, it was as the mourner, the pitied, the sad. Charley knew, but to its more womanly look was added an intellectuality that well repaid the girlish beauty that had grown tall—ah, how tall!—there always a shade of sadness over her face; in her changed look I could not possibly see. She was always a belle, always much sought, and runner love her many excellent offers; and the very busy tongue said at last that Marie Dugrayne was cold, decided manner, losing her lovers, but keeping her friends. Charley knew them as part of his mother's work, and the fever-stricken city knew her steps, and made fresh hope from her presence. And so Charley and I sat and talked of Marie Dugrayne, and by becoming a Sister of Mercy and giving all her property to the order. It was a little effective to the world of charity save in the possession of her person, for the good Marie gave now the great pleasure of her income to this end. And as Marie had been going on for eight years. Whether she had altered much in appearance Charley Curtis during all that time Charley did not say, and I did not ask; but what Charley did say in his own reserve for individuality. And what he took from the recesses of an inside pocket somewhere—a pocket-book, I think—a pocket-book pocket-book I remembered to have seen years before, and showed me then and there the few letters that Marie Dugrayne had written him, and given him the glove that I well recollected he carried away with him. Charley read aloud, and some of them, in the trifles of the same sort, I was not at all astonished. And though I believe the world will think me a fool, I entered into Charley Curtis' feelings, and indorsed the keeping of those little links, which could only bind him as a memory to Marie Dugrayne, as a thing worthy his loving spirit, or injuring the peace of the calm and elegant Mrs. Charles Curtis.

And Charley cried, and I believed him in this also. I believe in men crying. I believe in men doing any thing that is natural, and I believe none good heart and good soul beneath it.

We were a long time together, and I will venture to say that Mrs. Charles Curtis never had so dangerous a rival near her as myself. She was deserted by both of us, for as the most unimaginative politician would allow him to desert her. In the worst of his neglect he was still more than civil, declining her every wish, and following her wave wherever they wandered. It was only on certain occasions, when the subject of Marie or the parties that were continually projected and carried out; excused because he might be of service to me in the past; and I fancied he brightened under the talk, and the wrinkle seemed to come away from his cap. Well, the ending parties, and taking parties, and sailing parties, and we did our best to be did on the day I first saw him one week before.

Well, the last sailing party as a certainty I was not long in calling upon Ma-ge. Ah, what a change had the eight years made in her! I was prepared, from what Charley had said, for an alteration, but not of the nature I now beheld. When I last saw Marie she was but little more than a child emerging to the woman, half a romp, with her great black eyes sparkling and snapping at every little excitement. Now I had before me a graceful, lady, spiritual woman. A strong shade of habitual sadness was on her face, and a quiet, subdued manner had succeeded to the mood an instant looking at her before I advanced. She held my card in her hand, but it was plain to me immediately that she did not recall the name. I said,

"You do not remember me?"

"I do not," she answered.

I said something of New Orleans, and eight years ago, and the blank upon her suddenly. A flush spread over her face, and she came quickly forward and took my hand.

"You are the friend of Mr. Charles Curtis?"

I was startled; I did not expect the mention of his name.

"I am proud to be his friend, mademoiselle; he is a noble fellow. I have only just left him."

"Only just left him!" she said, in an astonished tone. "I thought he was in Europe?"

"He was, but is now at Orleans, where I left him three days since. My friend has just suffered a great loss in the death of his wife, and I thought of her then for the effect, but it did not answer my expectations. There was a slight trembling and compression of the lips, a closing of the eyes for an instant, and then she said, in a steady voice, as though repeating my words:

"In the death of his wife! Yes, it is a great loss—to him a great loss."

What must I do or say? Must I go off on indifferent subjects, resign my diplomacy, and wend my way back with my card? Most unsympathetic, I should I dash out at once upon broader ground, and bear down every opposition? Either all Charley's information was false, or all my suspicions were true.

"Mr. Curtis," I resumed, "feels the shock severely. I left him prostrated on the day I came away, as I believe dying." I gave way to this diplomatic falsehood as the most unsuspicious that the physician given the greater shock to overcome the lesser.

"Dying!" she said, with vehemence.

Or worse," I answered, calmly.

"What do you mean, Sir," by worse. You are speaking to me in mystery. Can there be any thing worse than death?"

"Yes, mademoiselle; insanity. My poor friend received, but a few hours previous to the death of his wife, the intelligence of his own approaching end. The first shock unsettled my friend, the second prostrated him, and I left him, under the combination, that I might come to you, mademoiselle, and tell you all this. Does not your own heart know why?"

She had risen from her seat and walked across the room, and addressed me, leaning her head upon the edge of the mantle.

"My marriage could make no difference to Mr. Charles Curtis. By his own letter we have been dead to each other for years."

"Not by his own act," I answered.

"I repeat, by his own act," she said, turning to me as she spoke. "Can you attempt to persuade me, Sir, that one can be married without their own free-will and consent?"

"Your own case," I answered. Her eyes flashed for a moment with scorn of the old fire of eight years agone, and walking back again to her seat she said, as she took it,

"It is my own act, by my own will and consent."

And then I drew my chair close to her, and forgetting the eight years that had passed away, and only remembering poor Charley as I had left him, I began on that day when the great trouble fell upon him. I spoke to her as I had never spoken to the little Marie of old times. I told all Charley's struggles and his love, how he had bent to the wish of his mother, and sacrificed himself for her, to live up with Marie; how he had lived on those eight years cherishing the memory of her through all, and never breathing it to any. And then I told of our meeting and our talks, and of the letters, and of the glove, and of the ring, and of their power and its effect. And she listened, while her cheeks grew pale and her eyes fell. And she only said,

"Too late, too late!"

Not too late. His life, more than his life, hung on this. Not too late!

"Too late!"

I had exhausted my power, and she stood before me claiming that her marriage was her own act, and that all intervention was too late. What could I do? I must bring her the head of Johnny, or must bring Charley.

I returned to Natalie, and found him improving and conscious; he greeted me, and they said had been inquiring for me at intervals for two days.

I told him he must wait, that I had important business for him in New York, in which he could serve me largely, and that the change of scene was necessary for him. He looked at me steadily, but it was certain that he gathered nothing from my face. I have lived too long in society to have my countenance so weak a tell-tale. I saw in an instant Charley was a babe in my hands. I had only to persuade him, but he must obey. And that darling little Josephine too, what an aid to all my plans! She was my prime minister. She assured I had taken her to my confidence immediately on my return. She was clear-headed and reliant; she believed in the never-dying passion of her sex. She augured the ultimate success of all. But she had not seen that Natalie woman as I had, when she "Too late!" had pronounced. I would go on: I should be a good attorney if I abandoned my client now. I would I go, even though I thought it hopeless.

And so, on the following day, we were speeding toward New York as fast as steam could carry us. We were there; but what next? I had no plan of action, and my brain suggested none. It was requisite we should have rest for Charley. Instead, therefore, of taking him to a hotel, we established ourselves at a quiet house in the upper part of the city, kept by a lady-like, accommodating woman, who had once been very pretty, and who was known as a widow and Mrs. Fields. Mrs. Fields had two fine blue-eyed children, whom she kept supperingly cosily clean, and between whom and myself a fraternization commenced at once. Charley, I can not so perfectly bless as to affect not to like children. The true way to the mother's heart is through the child, and I was in the right track with Mrs. Field. There was nothing she would not have done for me that I should have thought of in the house. She even gave me her confidence so far as to tell me she was not a widow, and would perhaps have told me more had I encouraged the confidence. But as I could not see exactly how the confidences was to serve me, I gave her none. With the children I had confidences of all sorts, from geometrical instructions in the building a top to the best mode of cracking hard walnuts.

And all this time the hours and days that were of valuable to me were flying unemployed, as I will be talking of his ability to push his way on home, while Josephine in every look said, "What are you doing? What are you doing?" I could do nothing. Again I had called on Marie. Again I had offered her my confidence, and all the information that Charley was in New York, and again I had been repulsed; but oh! what a change was there in her manner! Instead of struggling against her own heart, and against her life, within the single interview of a few minutes she had had come back to her face that same expression of vacuity and dread that I had seen on the day when she had gratified Charley's request to hear all I knew of the news of Charley's marriage. How much I would have given to have had the power to recall it not, and she but have allowed me to break the first ground. I did not go so far even. By her pointless silence and unresponsiveness I was driven to my room with a new box of toys which I had the day before added to my other equally useless stock. Johnny, the eldest, cast furtive glances occasionally at myself. It was plain to his perception that something unusual had occurred in my manner, in his little mind, a perfect willingness to alleviate it even to the sacrifice of his toys. He came softly to my knee and, looking up in my face, said,

"Don't you want to play?"

I said I did not want to play, and Master Johnny was still more dissatisfied. He followed it up with,

"You have been good to me, haven't you?"

And then he seemed buried in thought, which was well for me, for, indeed, I was thinking, yet, like many simple things, hard to solve. Again he turned his face to me.

"I'll tell you something, but you mustn't tell ma; will you?"

I thought Master Johnny was about to make me the confidant of some of his youthful peccadilloes, and I promised, therefore, that I would not tell ma.

"My name isn't Fields," whispered Master Johnny, mysteriously.

"No," said I, before I thought; "what is it, then?"

"John Thompson Hemphill," said Master John, still more mysteriously.

Had Master Johnny pulled a six-pounder from his pocket and sent a ball at all this confusion through me, I hardly think I could have jumped more decidedly than I did at the mention of that name.

I repeated it after him, and he nodded affirmatively, and added,

"Don't tell ma, and I'll show you my pa's likeness."

I told Master Johnny that I should feel interested in looking at it, and I think I told the truth. In a few minutes he put in my hand an ambrotype, which I opened. It was the very same; but what was the use mentioning it? I had it in my pocket, and did not have one wife and be seeking another; and yet, by Master Johnny's declaration, he was his father. And that point was settled. Charley was not to be told, or informed me she was not a widow, but, at the same time, she was not the wife of John Thompson.

The prohibition Master Johnny had laid upon my secrecy must be withdrawn, and I must go to the young gentleman's ma. This matter was managed by the bribe of half a dollar, and a pledge to hold him forever in remembrance in my prayers of commands, and in a few minutes I found myself closeted with Mrs. Fields, from whom, after a picture of failure and success, I received the following narration:

Eight years before, when a young and friendless girl, she had met Hemphill, who, under a promise of marriage, had carried her to New Orleans, where she had lived with him unmarried. A child was born, then returned to New York, where Hemphill had gradually terminated connection, ceased even completing to provide for her and his children. Within a few months he had proposed to her, for what reason she did not know, the condition of her dropping from herself and the children his name, to settle upon her the house in which she now resided, with one thousand dollars per annum for herself and half that sum for each of the children. Which proposition she had accepted, determined to live quietly and another her trouble before the world. A few years after she opened her house. And now, though she did not fear Hemphill's revenge as far as regarded the result of the marriage, by his being unchangeably settled, yet she did fear his personal enmity when he came to know, if he did know, that she had made this revelation.

I pledged myself to Mrs. Fields that no harm of whatever nature should befall her. And then I considered how all this discovery could aid our cause. I must call in Josephine to my counsel. They were to be united in church at three o'clock; it was now twelve. Whatever was to be done must be done quickly. And still I floundered in the dark. This woman and her children had no legal claim on John Thompson Hemphill, and he undoubtedly knew that well. He was, perhaps, of Marie would make her break the marriages could annul it, but, such a step as this he knew it could not reach her. And then came a supposition that I had not seen, I dare say, often, and, going to the church, gave information to the police.

And so we did; though I think Mrs. Fields looked suspiciously on Josephine and myself when we prepared for our departure, and I am sure with us. It was too soon after our late conversation to be a mere casual thing in her mind. I did not believe that Mrs. Fields's suspicions if we could but compass our end.

We were in church in good time. The wedding cortège had not yet arrived, and we secured an eligible position. It came sweeping up the aisle in a few minutes, the little groom looking still smaller by the side of his pale and beautiful bride. We had brought with us the children, Miss Nelly, whom I have not yet introduced, a little woman of five, burnt out, as the cortège approached the altar, with the middle "Ps" in "Pshaw." She was checked immediately, but added, in a demonstrative way: "Pshaw! The new wife is not half so pretty as the first!" And then she was put on her mettle, and I believe she was, in the slight trial which followed. Johnny was not to be quiet, and that this was no place to explain it. I put the little one down and bade her go to her father and kiss him. I think had it not been for the people in that church Hemphill would have kicked the child, or some other equally savage act, but he was, as he related me mechanically as she came to his side and kissed her.

It is useless to prolong this description. The children were a death-blow to the proceeding of the ceremony. I will not attempt to describe Hemphill, in which Marie took no part, and the party returned to their carriages.

How it occurred at this moment I can not tell, but upon the sidewalk Marie stepping in front of me, I took her hand and in a moment was with her our carriage. I think it must have been by her consent—in fact, I am sure it was. I spoke quick in the confusion to the driver:

"Drive fast home."

And we have my wife us the bride, all in her bridal array. And at Mrs. Fields's house it was all told. And there Marie met Charley the first time in all those eight years. Josephine? I can not tell all that was said and all that was done; but I know that I bore the trunk of Marie to my father, and I thought, though she was pale, that she looked handsomer than I had yet seen her. And then it all came about I do not exactly remember, but that day week we married Hemphill to Ma. Fields, as I will call her. Josephine was my bridesmaid, I was groomsman, and Charley gave away the bride. Good people, do not hold up your hands in horror at all this, for Hemphill is not to come.

We all returned to New Orleans together. And that twelvemonth there was a double wedding: Marie and Charley, and Josephine and myself.

And why not?

A RUSSIAN WOLF-HUNT.

A DISTINGUISHED French writer, who has recently visited Russia, gives the following graphic description of a wolf-hunt—a sport common in that country to keep down an animal dangerous, from its numbers, to human life:

At an advanced period of winter, when the wolves become ferocious for want of food, three or four hunters, each possessed of eight double-barreled guns, take their places in what is called a trois-as—a species of dresky—drawn by three horses, the two which, are driven from the sides with a rein. The horse in the middle is trained to run with the head of the wolf over its back, and does not shy at the gallop. The former trots with his head low, and is called the Snow-eater; the other has a prance with his head loose, and is called the Furies. The whole equipment, thus directed in its course, presents a resemblance of a fan, with the driver who can be well relied on conducts the troika.

To the back of the carriage a young boy is attached by a cord, or, for more security, by a chain between three and four feet in length. It is quickly taken in hand to the remote extremity of a cut where the chase is to proceed; there it is put on the ground, and the driver lashes the horses, which start off at a trot and gallop respectively, as we have mentioned; while the boy, little used to such an amusement, raises a cry which soon degenerates into what may be called a lamentation. At this noise the nearest wolf above its nose, and sets itself to pursue the boy, soon followed by two, then by three, and ultimately, it may be, by fifty of the brethren. They all make a chain for the poor boy, and fight among themselves to get at it; some of them snatching only at the skin, or at the claws, and others endeavoring to bite it. The lamentations of the poor animal pass into cries of despair, which arouse the wolves in the deepest recesses of the forest; they presently congregate from three leagues round, and form a chain pursued by a whole troop of them.

Then it is that the urgent need of a good driver is apparent. The horses, which have an instinctive horror for the wolves, become intractable; the tcotier in the middle tries to gallop, and the gallopers to get the bit between their teeth. During all this time the hunters fire at random, there being no time to take aim. The boy, the horses, the horses, the wolves howl, and the guns fire, producing a hideous concert among them. The equipage, the hunters, the boy, the troop of wolves, are involved in a whirlwind which scatters the snow all around, and which is looked on with a stern daring thunder and lightning.

The boy, the driver, and the horses, wild as they may be, all goes well; but should he lose command of them, or should the harness slip, or the troika be overset, it is all over. Next day, two days, or eight days after, the débris of the vehicle is discovered, with the boy, the carcasses of the horses, and the large bones of the hunters and of the driver.

Last winter Prince R—— undertook one of these hunts, and it had nearly proved his last. He was, along with two friends at one of his estates, which borders on a wilderness, and they resolved to have a chase of the wolves, or rather, it may be said, to be chased by them. A large sledge was got ready, in which three persons could move at ease; three young horses were harnessed to it, and it was intrusted to a driver of great experience—a native of the district. Under him were placed a pair of double-barrel guns and five hundred ball-cartridges, and their places were so taken that the prince looked to the back, and the two friends each to a side of the sledge.

At night they arrived at the ground—an immense desert covered with snow. They heard the shouts of the wolves, and, at the same time, saw their eyes, which appeared to glare with unusual brightness, and its rays, refracted by the white surface, spread a light like that of day. The hog were attacked, and the train of wolves, finding itself drawn on in spite of its efforts, it raised a cry; whereupon more wolves appeared, and more yet first, timid also, and keeping at a great distance. Gradually their numbers increased, and they approached the sledge, the prince contenting himself by giving their troika an ordinary motion, notwithstanding the trembling impatience of the horses. For twenty wolves came up, when the party found themselves near enough to begin the massacre. They went a short distance, and the whole band appeared to get alarmed, and diminished in number by about a half. In fact, contrary to the general belief that wolves do not feed on one another, seven or eight starving dogs had stopped behind to devour their companions, and the hunting-party was soon supplied. On all sides bowling replied to bowling, and in all round were seen eyes and eyes sparkling like carbuncles. The animals were within gunshot, and the hunters made a running fire; but this though every effect, effect, the band, as far from being diminished, rather got larger. It went on increasing, and, in order to escape the troop, the close ranks of which pressed on the hunters. Their course was so rapid that they seemed to fly on the wings of the wind. Night came on, to make the smallest noise. Like a flowing tide they approached unceasingly, and did not recede before the fire of the three hunters, well kept up as it was. They formed an immense crescent at the back of the troika, but the prince was not disposed to get in advance of the horses, and the number increased so rapidly, that the hunters were soon all engaged out of the ground. There was something fantastic in their appearance, and it became quite impossible to count the number now shortening their range in a desert where it was in general difficult to see more than two or three in a day. The day had ceased to cry, and had been taken again into the sledge, where its cries recommencing, redoubled the hideous noise. Each time the firing did not cease, and half the ammunition was now expended. There remained to each hunter only a hundred balls. The two horns of the crescent got higher and higher, and threatened the formation of a circle, including the sledge, horses, and hunters.

Should any one of the horses fall, all would be lost, and, already terrified, they seemed to breathe fire, and pranced most furiously and wildly.

"What think you of this, Ivan?" said the prince to his driver.

"Why, I don't much like it, prince."

"Are you afraid of the wolves?"

"The wolves have tasted blood, and the longer you keep firing the more will their number increase."

"What do you advise?"

"If you will allow it, prince, I shall slacken the bridle of my horses."

"Are you sure of them?"

"I shall answer for them."

"And will you answer for us too?"

And in such an reply, it was evident that he did not wish to commit himself. He slackened the bridle, directing at the same time the head of the horses' team to the prince's chateau; and the noble animals, feeling themselves as if loosened from the bridle, pranced with new fury, redoubled speed. The space seemed literally to become annihilated in the concert of wolves. Fire was kept them still farther by a sharp whistle, while they at the same time described a curve which cut off one of the corners of the band. Happily, the horses opened to let the horses pass, and the hunters were preparing for further operations when they exclaimed, "For your lives, don't fire!" They obeyed. The wolves, perplexed by this unexpected manœuvre, remained for a moment undecided; and during this instant the troika gained a considerable distance. When the wolves resumed the pursuit it was too late, they could not overtake the vehicle. A quarter of an hour afterward they were in sight of their chateau.

Next morning the prince visited the scene of his exploit, and counted the carcasses of more than two hundred wolves.

THE GREAT EAST INDIAN DOCTOR.

EVERY body has heard of the famous quack whose sands of life were fast running out, and who hastened to communicate to suffering humanity, for something like a shilling, an infallible panacea which he had accidentally discovered during his travels in the East Indies. The accompanying portrait is not that of the gentleman in question. It is, however, a likeness of a very famous physician, whose name is Yrien, whose native country is Java, and whose extraordinary cures have already won for him a world-wide fame.

Dr. Yrien is probably, the son of a rich native of Java. In early youth he was sent to Holland to study medicine. He was distinguished at the colleges in that country as a student of remarkable promise, and advantageous offers were made him to remain in Europe. He, however, persisted in returning home, where he remained several years.

His story is, that during that period he devoted himself to a study of the remedial qualities of those East Indian herbs and plants which are not included in the materia medica; and that, after many experiments, he made some remarkable discoveries.

At all events, after an absence of some years, he reappeared in Paris, and announced himself as prepared to cure various diseases which the faculty at present confess to be beyond their skill. Among these was encephaloid cancer. It so happened that the famous mountebank and musical instrument-maker, Adolf Sax, was suffering from cancer of the lip, which the Paris doctors could not cure. By some means or other the Black Doctor obtained access to him, and cured him. This success, as was natural, made no small stir among the physicians of Paris; one of these, not the least eminent—M. Velpeau—refused to join in the cry of quack, and actually opened the wards of his hospital—La Charité—to the stranger. We do not think he has effected some extraordinary cures there, and that his private practice is already enormous.

The following anecdote concerning him is amusing. We find it in the correspondence of the Express:

It appears that the Javanese is quite an original character, and holds in contempt—which he does not attempt to conceal—the professional resources of his Parisian contemporaries. He is said lately to have given utterance to a challenge, in broken French, which significantly embodies his views of our greatest doctors.

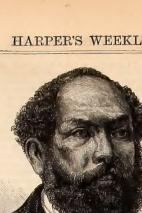
"I will go some day," says the East Indian, "to find Nélaton, Velpeau, Ricord; I will take them in a carriage with me to the Garden of Plants"—the Zoological Garden of Paris.

"Bring here boa, bring cobra capella, bring rattlesnake—ha!

"Whon three terrible serpents come, I say to three great doctors, 'Take off cost and show arm.' I say to him, 'Dis Ricord!' I say to rattlesnake, 'Bite Velpeau!' Once bite, they all swell up and die. Me give rum to three serpents, and say, 'Bite!' But I not swell—I not die; for I pour en arra little vial—antidote—I cured!"

It is doubtful whether the three princes of science to whom the Black Doctor (as he is called) offers this challenge will be tempted to accept it, only to establish his triumph. Nor will they be likely to consent, even if the latter should modify his proposition so far as to admit his own arm to the serpents first; but certain it is, the amusing story, one fact fills the attention of all who witness the proceedings of this strange personage: he has indubitably cured Sax of a malady which has never been known to forgive. Those who know the circumstances exclaim, "A miracle!"

If the Black Doctor can really cure cancer, he will deserve and will obtain a reputation and a fortune superior to those of any of his compeers in any part of the world.



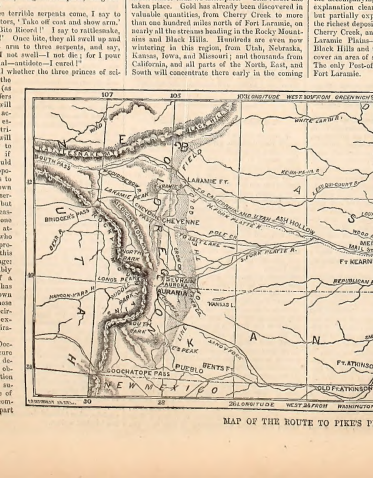
THE GREAT JAVANESE DOCTOR.

HOW TO GET TO PIKE'S PEAK GOLD MINES.

IS Lieutenant G. K. Warren's recent report of the topographical survey of the Territory of Nebraska, speaking of the southwestern portion in connection with the Pacific Railroad, he says: "These regions will yet be inhabited by civilized men, and the communications with the East will require roads, independent of the wants of an interior everland route to the Pacific;" "and should gold be discovered there in valuable quantities, as there have been found indications, this result may be much nearer than we anticipate." This result has taken place. Gold has already been discovered in valuable quantities, from Cherry Creek to more than one hundred miles north of Fort Laramie, on nearly all the streams heading in the Rocky Mountains and Black Hills. Hundreds are even now wintering in this region, from Utah, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, and Missouri; and thousands from California, and all parts of the North, East, and South will concentrate there early in the coming season. Measures are already in progress to organize immediately a new Territory west of Nebraska and Kansas. A Representative has been chosen by the miners, now in Washington for this purpose.

The respectability and amount of testimony as to the wealth and extent of the gold region admits of no doubt; and the shortest and quickest approach to the mines, from different points, becomes a question of immediate importance.

From California and Utah the route will, of course, be through the Cheyenne, or South Pass. To parties residing east of Nebraska and Kansas the accompanying map will render the following explanation clear. The mining region has been but partially explored; but so far as prospected the richest deposits are on the forks of the Platte, Cherry Creek, and Medicine Bow rivers, and all Laramie Plains—which Plains lie between the Black Hills and the Rocky Mountains, and alone cover an area of more five hundred square miles. The only Post-office point at present for this is Fort Laramie.



Fort Kearney is a little south of east of Fort Laramie, and distant from it three hundred and seven miles. Any approach to the mines lying north of Cherry Creek from the East, between Leavenworth and Sioux City, should make first for Fort Kearney, and thence by the north side of the Platte, because, as stated by Lieutenant Warren, "any route that takes the south side of the Platte has the south fork to cross at a point where bridging is or establishing a ferry is at this time impracticable. The road then, along the north fork, has bad places at Ash Hollow and Scott's Bluff. The route by the north side of the Platte is, therefore, of particular value, especially for early travel in the spring, when the streams are generally high."

Starting from Kansas City, the shortest overland route to the nearest mines is seven hundred and forty miles, part of which may be traveled by stage semi-monthly; but miners choosing this route had better start with their own teams. Proceeding by the Missouri River to Leavenworth, the distance from that point to Fort Kearney is three hundred and nineteen miles. There is no stage on this route. Proceeding to St. Joseph, either by the river or the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, the distance from that point to Fort Kearney is three hundred and thirty-seven miles. There is a weekly stage running from St. Joseph to Fort Kearney—fare, fifty dollars; time, seven to eight days.

Starting from Nebraska City, which may be reached either by stage across Iowa or by daily boats up the Missouri River, the distance to Fort Kearney is two hundred and eighty-three miles. A mail-stage runs from this last-named point to Fort Kearney tri-weekly—fare, twenty-five dollars; time, three to four days. This line and the line from St. Joseph unite at Fort Kearney, and from that point run weekly to Fort Laramie, which is within the gold regions.

The usual overland emigrant route for Utah and California, from the East, now mostly crosses Iowa, and strikes the Missouri River at Council Bluffs, where there is the best ferry on the Missouri River north of its mouth; and thus reaching Omaha, start at once on the Mormon trail and the central route for the Pacific Railroad, which all recognize as the most feasible from the Missouri River to the Mountains, and of which Lieutenant Warren, in the report of his topographical survey, thus speaks: "Of all the valleys of streams emptying into the Missouri, that of the Platte furnishes the best route for any kind of a road leading to the interior, and the best point for starting is Omaha City. An appropriation of fifty thousand dollars has been expended on bridges, etc., in the construction of it, and the only important improvement remaining to make it far superior to any route on the south side of the Platte is the establishment of a good crossing of Loup Fork, either by bridge or ferry."

The stage routes already established, or to be made daily the coming season; they certainly will from Omaha to Fort Kearney, and probably to Fort Laramie. The Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad will be finished early in the spring. A line of first-class packets will ply daily between St. Louis and St. Joseph, and Council Bluffs and Omaha. An outfit for the mines, with tools, and provisions for six months, will cost from fifty to sixty dollars. Miners going in company can economize by joining and purchasing a team of either oxen or mules, which, with all other necessary outfit, will be had at fair rates at any of the points estimated above as points of starting. The region about the mines is well adapted to agriculture, but for the coming season provisions must be provided in advance.

From present appearances, the route to Pike's Peak will be tremendous.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

The Cost in Paris—A Grand Dinner at Madame ——'s—Ill-breeding of French Military Men—Contrast with Americans and English Officers—The late General Pelissier—How French Officers treat pekins—An Insolent Colonel—How Ladies are Dressing in Paris—The New Belle, Mrs. St. ——Fancy Balls at Madame Tordid's—Madame Murray's Louis Quinze Ball—Countess Walewski's Ball Costume—Measure of the Dress Ordonnée, etc., etc.

PARIS, March 2, 1859.

I AM glad enough to be well again in this jolly carnival time! Paris is a miserable place in which to be sick or sorry at any time, but during the Lent most might wait for Lent. I know nothing more trying than to be compelled to listen, alone and suffering, to the infernal roar of the carriages which are conveying others to scenes of pleasure and amusement, which, though we may know them to be only the same thing repeated over and over again, yet when we are deprived of them—in the usual rule of contrary to human nature—our imagination directly invents them with ideal delights and superior attractions. No; please remember after awhile than Paris when not prepared to rush in with others in the eager pursuit of trifles; and here certainly is the case with Lent:

"To vice or good
For human nature daily feels."

There were my reflections when, after a week of chicken-broth and gruel, I found myself compulsorily seated at the usual dinner-hour at seven—at a seven o'clock dinner, with an evening visit and two balls upon my conscience later. There were twelve after myself—numerous enough in themselves, and others furnishing matter for pleasant comment. Many of them were old acquaintance there was present at this dinner a Colonel in the French army. It seldom happens but one meets behind the scenes in Paris that they in most instances rise from the ranks; and as they marry in their immediate circle, if they themselves are presentable their wives are not.

This seems strange at first to American and English ideas, in as much that intermarriages there are among the most highly educated and influential members of society, and the best families thus sought and welcomed. What country can show gentlemen superior in all that adorns and dignifies our common humanity to the officers of the French Academy at West Point has produced? If I may not be permitted to name it, I can express my most exact, affectionate remembrance may be allowed to swell for an instant on the departed—the accomplished soldier's and Christian's life of being always true and deplored. There was poor Swift, who died so bravely during the Mexican war, and many a brown, whose attainments and virtues were acknowledged and valued by strangers as well as his own countrymen; and, to speak of one more, the General Thomas, who died in this city last spring. I remember an Englishman who had a most unfavorable opinion of meeting the latter once at my house, and telling me afterward:

"Now that is my conceived idea of an American gentleman; if all were like that, simple and life-expecting in manner, I should enjoy their society."

Alas, poor Thomas! how I liked and trusted him!

But I must return to my subject. French military men give me the idea of being always overbearing; brave enough, as we all know, but so contented in ideas, and yet with such an overweening self-conceit. Their manners are quite unpleasant to those of other nations, is otherwise enough, being that of a travelling-steamer with passengers in want of ferocity, which will not admit of any thing like argument or discussion in conversation; but with women they are even more unpleasant, neglecting the prettiest present (which is perhaps a soldier's privilege), and then giving her such glances, as much as to say,

"You are charming, my dear, and I know you speak I am; and you see I am not in the slightest agonent to tell me so!"

I have been led into these remarks by thinking how the French Colonel spoiled our dinner-party, contradicting and almost quarreling with a courteous Englishman upon, what I am sure must be, a pretty little wife almost as much as the indecent sighing of her white-haired old father at the mail man of war continued to do after his ill-bred impatience had been suppressed by the silence around him. I did not allow this unnecessary ill-breeding to spoil my appetite, though it evidently did that of the young Englishman, who sends me hurry off to fulfill my other engagements more willingly than I might otherwise have done.

More bulk—more plate! more glitter of gold and flowers, sailing boasters and women who look pretty, more up with all that but; rest to be next day in the Bois de Boulogne and you can with difficulty believe that the yellow, grim, or insignificant face which sank into the corner of the carriage is that of the nymph whose raven locks and flashing eyes seemed as if they might be given as much to do with captivating your thoughts as her bonbon-box of white crape, and the wreath of roses red which seemed to bloom from her head. But French women, in these days, ever condescend to what our common sense would call art of the toilet. They never use rouge, they leave that to actresses; nor do they color their hair. They think, wisely, that nature understands all that best; that to be old dressed they consider an equivalent for beauty, as is shown by the universal expression of "How beautiful you are!" when "What a pretty gown you have!" is all that is meant. But in the morning they certainly do not look well, however gorgeous and brave the English race have the advantage. All which makes me think that I am getting very capricious to see the wonderful beauty, Mrs. I——o—y. F——s, of whom all that have seen her quite rave. All my English correspondents from Rome last winter, and from Pau this, speak of her as "the most superb young woman," "the most perfect beauty" ever beheld, and an Irishman whom I met the other day, in the enthusiasm about her has quite raised mine in an unreasonable degree.

As I told you in my last, the Carnival is being finished off with fancy balls. Of these, two have already come off. One on the 20th inst, at the Minister of State's, Monsieur Fould's, where superb apartments are in the Palace of the Tuileries: and a second at the Count de Morny's last night. At the first I mention no dress was worn but the usual as those worn on a similar occasion last year, and which does not fulfill the intention of the ball to promote this species of entertainment, purposely to inspire the young imagination of trade, as it was hoped every evening's ball would do on this occasion. Not a bit of it; and I say nothing new or worth recording. Louis Napoleon is wonderful once there were; but I must say their wearers often remind me of the old woman who has been more agreeably employed in exhibiting them to amuse her a cooster than in thus wearing them as equals among equal company.

At the ball at Count Morny's the costumes were limited to one month—the reign of Louis Quinze, which, though long enough to afford a splendid set of many changes in the fashion at the rate of its present existence, would be apt to become monotony in the same style. But the effect is very superior when this plan of representing an epoch is adopted, and the illusion was complete. Of course, only the Countess de Morny is a Russian, and, to my taste, the Princess Mathilde, the Princess de Metternich, she has lovely dark eyes, with fair hair and a fair skin, which seems to me a contrast rather piquante than folie.

Not to weary you with repeated descriptions, I shall therefore only mention a few of the dresses as you the bell of the Countess Walewski, which is to be on Saturday, a week hence, will be a pêt tat contrast at the Tuileries on Tuesday, to be the Carnival; but to this I do not expect an invitation, as the list for these is very limited. I was once thus honored, but the favor has not been repeated.

I read, in my retirement, a charming book, which, I think, will be found interesting by your readers: "The Travels, etc., of Ida Pfeiffer at Ocean." It is impossible to have been more highly gifted, more lively, and more deplored than this lady Christian lady. I was told Mr. Secretary Liberty of France together at St. Leonard's, last year, and in the drawing-room of the Tuileries very limited. I was once thus honored, but the favor has not been repeated.

"I read, in my retirement, a charming book, which, I think, will be found interesting by your readers: "The Travels, etc., of Ida Pfeiffer at Ocean." It is impossible to have been more highly gifted, more lively, and more deplored than this lady Christian lady. I was told Mr. Secretary Liberty of France together at St. Leonard's, last year, and in the drawing-room of the Tuileries very limited. I had seen them in their prosperity, but how could they ever have been in trouble, so charming all honor and respect as when there is shown all those domestic virtues of attention to their aged parent, Queen Amelia, and to their own children? Such devotion for which they have always been noted.

TERRIBLE ADVENTURE OF AN AERONAUT.

THE Courier de l'Europe has still the following, which took place some short time since, on the occasion of the last ascent of that celebrated and lucky aeronaut, M. Godard:

Monsieur Godard took with him on that day, as his companion on the voyage, a wealthy private gentleman, who paid 1000 francs for the privilege of sharing in the perils of the expedition. The weather was favorable, and the aeronaut reached with his balloon shot up rapidly to a considerable altitude.

"What effect does the balloon upon you?" asked M. Godard of his companion.

"Nothing!" said the latter, quietly.

"Is my conversation to you," said M. Godard, "You are the first whom I have ever seen arrive at such an altitude without betraying some emotion."

"Keep on mounting," said the traveler, with a grave and solemn air.

M. Godard threw over some ballast, and the balloon ascended some 500 feet higher.

"And now," added M. Godard, "does your heart beat?"

"Not yet!" replied his companion, with an air which approached closely to impatience.

"To the devil!" cried M. Godard; "you have really, my dear Sir, the most perfect qualification to be an aeronaut."

The balloon still ascended; when 1000 feet higher, M. Godard interrogated a third time his companion.

"And now?"

"Nothing, nothing! not the shadow of a fear whatever!" answered the traveler, with a tone positively discontented, and like a man who had experienced a profound disappointment.

"Goodness me! so much the worse then," said the aeronaut, smiling; "but I must remove all danger of mishap, and the balloon is high enough. We are going to descend."

"To descend!"

"Certainly; there would be danger in mounting higher."

"I am not more the slightest difference to me; I do not choose to descend."

"You will!" said M. Godard.

"I say I wish to ascend higher; keep on mounting. I have given 1000 francs to experience some emotion; I want to feel it, and I am descending here I have felt some emotion."

M. Godard commenced to laugh; he believed at once that it was all a joke.

"Will you ascend, once more?" demanded the traveler, taking out from the throat and shaking him with violence: "when shall I feel some emotion?"

M. Godard relates that at this moment he felt almost livid. A sudden and dreadful revelation broke upon him in regarding the strangely dilated eyes of his compagnon de voyage; he had to do with a madman!

If even the unfortunate aeronaut had had any defensive weapon he would, after all, have been capable of defending himself; but it is not usual for people to furnish themselves with pistols for a voyage in a balloon, and certainly one would not dream of meeting with a warlike encounter in the air. The ascent was 5000 feet beneath—most horrible depth!—and the least movement of the now furious madman might cause the car to capsize.

"Ah! ah! you are mocking me, my fine fellow," continued the madman, without loosening his grip. "Ah! you think to rob me of 1000 francs, as well as my emotion. Very well, be quiet. It's my turn to laugh. It's you now who are going to be cast up."

The madman was possessed of prodigious muscular force.

M. Godard did not even attempt to defend himself. "What do you wish from me?" asked he, with a calm which was submissive even.

"Simply to amuse myself in seeing you turn a somersault," answered the madman, with a ferocious smile.

But first some cushion appeared to think (to himself) I have my idea. I will see if I can't find some emotion up there."

And he commenced to search.

The madman indicated with his finger the upper part of the balloon. Just in speaking he compressed to distend the cords which held the car attached to the balloon.

M. Godard, who had not before trembled for himself, was forced to do so now for the madman.

"But, monsieur mon, you are going to kill yourself," he cried, with mingled fear and anger.

"No remarks," hissed the madman, seizing him again by the arm; "you are going to earn your pain into the abyss."

"At least," observed M. Godard, "allow me to put the cord round your body, so that you may remain attached to the balloon."

"Be it so," said the madman, who appeared to comprehend the utility of the precaution.

This done, fearful with his record of safety, the madman commenced to climb among the ropes with the agility of a squirrel. He reached the balloon, and placed himself astride upon the circle which is said. Once there, he rent the air with a shout of triumph, and drew his knife from his pocket.

"What are you going to do?" asked M. Godard, who feared that he might have the idea of ripping open the balloon.

"To make myself comfortable forthwith."

Uttering these words, the madman cut slowly the cord of one of the ropes which held attached to his body. With a single puff of wind to shake the balloon, the unfortunate aeronaut would be cast into the abyss!

"Ah now," yelled forth the madman, brandishing his knife, "we are going to laugh. Ah, rob her, you thought to make me descend! Very well. It is you who are going to tumble down, and in a moment, and quicker than that!"

M. Godard had not time to make a movement or put in a single word. Before he was able to divine the infernal intention of the madman, the latter, with inertia of an automaton, had cut—not one—four of the cordages which suspended the car to the balloon. The car inclines horribly—it only holds by two.

"A word, a single word!" cried M. Godard.

"No, no good!" answered the madman.

"I do not ask for pardon, on the contrary—"

"What is it you ask then?" said the madman, astonished.

"At this moment, now," continued the aeronaut, hurriedly, "we are at a height of 5000 feet."

"Stop," said the madman, "that will be charming, to tumble down from such a height."

"It is still too low," added M. Godard.

"How so?" asked the madman, stupefied.

"Yes," said M. Godard; "my experience as an aeronaut has taught me that death is not certain in more than one case. To ensure it, it is desirable to be tumble. I must prefer to fall from such a height as to be killed outright, rather than to risk being only injured by the chance of falling more from a height of 9000 feet only."

"Ah! that's it!" said the madman, whom the mention of a mere horrible fall charmed amazingly.

M. Godard follows heroically his purpose, and throws out a considerable quantity of ballast. The balloon makes a powerful bound, and mounts 500 feet in a few seconds. Upon which the madman sees that he has thrown away his operation with a menacing air—the aeronaut thinks to accomplish another in making only himself be cleared.

The quick eye of M. Godard had remarked that among the cords spared by the madman there was one leading to the valve. His plan is taken. He throws this cord, it opens the valve fixed in the upper part of the balloon, which gives issue to the necessary excess of the hydrogen gas to escape, and the aerial mass is heaped for was not long in making itself apparent.

Little by little the madman becomes drowsy, asphyxiated by the escape of the hydrogen gas which surround him. The madman being sufficiently asphyxiated for his purpose, M. Godard allows the balloon to descend slowly to the earth. The drama is finished.

Arrived at Evreux, M. Godard, not bearing any hatred to the author of his perilous voyage, consented to restore him to his senses, and had him conveyed, hands and feet bound, to the neighboring station.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

THE following questions have been submitted to us for our consideration. As soon as possible the inquiries of other correspondents will receive due attention.

LAND DRAINAGE.

L. W., Adrian, Michigan, writes: "How can an exact grade be found for the bottom of a drain in which tiles are intended to be laid? The soil is very soft and wet. What is the best-shaped tile? How should tiles be laid? How should they be covered? How does the water get into them?"

1. It is sometimes difficult to get an exact grade in very soft ground. In this case the laying of boards in the bottom of the drain will be found of great advantage. But even these, sometimes, because of the action of the water, are displaced. A few flat stones placed beneath them will assist in preventing the difficulty named.

2. We consider the sole-shaped tile the best, because the smallest quantity of water in a well-graded drain is active in washing away earth.

3. Before laying tiles in any drain the bottom should be even and compact to prevent their future displacement. In a soft place tiles are apt to dip, exposing their ends to the washing in of soil, and thus stopping the discharge of water from the drain. The importance, therefore, of having a compact bed for tiles can easily be understood. Boards for one inch thick and not more than two inches wide and one inch thick; and for larger tiles, they should be wider in proportion. Distribute tiles along the bank so as to have them convenient for the man laying them; then commence at the head of the main drain; lay a tile and place a stone at the upper end of it, so as to prevent the entrance of soil. Continue to lay the tiles one after the other, with as closely fitting joints as practicable, and if bottom-tiles are used, put saddles on the joints. Sometimes grass bands are used, but saddles are better. Saddles, being made of the same clay as the tiles, will heat as the tile, whereas grass bands will soon decay, and in such cases, the joints tumble in. There is a possibility, in sandy soils, of silt being washed into the drain. The "laterals" should be so graded that they will empty at the highest point of the main drains; so that water running in the main will not interfere with water discharging from a lateral.

4. When covering drains it is well to place inverted sods over the tiles, so that minute particles of soil from finding their way into them. Soil may now be put in to the depth of about a foot over the bulk, and a pounder used to compact it. Use the pounder on every foot of soil put in afterward. This will prevent, in such soils as Monsieur, the water from washing as much silt into the drains as it otherwise would do.

5. Drain-tiles take in water at the joints, and, by absorption, all over their surfaces.

TURNIPS.

W. S. writes: "I am about to trench a few acres of land for a flower and kitchen garden. Will you state some facts in relation to it?

Our choicest fruits, flowers, and kitchen garden plants do best on trenched soils. The best results are obtained by trenching subsoil. That is, useless to unbeat dew or trench land full of stagnant water. Before trenching, the ground must be underdrained with tiles or stones. Stones will answer with special reference to the wants of crops. All the stones underground to be removed must be well distributed through the soil; the mass will be thus rendered incapable of retaining stagnant moisture. Bear in mind the subsoiled action of long manures on heavy soils, the winter management of which will benefit the soil of the land. Farmer come time ago, and on the principle referred to by Mr. Clarke when he said: "The first of God's plow, which He drives through every inch of ground." When trenching, men should have plenty of room, otherwise they will not do it to the best advantage.

The ground to be wide, so that the soil turned over may be sloping at its side. This will make the water have a more free and immediate exodus; for if the side of the trenched soil be unsloping, a greater part of the moisture thrown on it will fall to the bottom. Where the plow is not used, trenching is underminded and taken down in folds. The pick-mattock is in our estimation best for stiff, wet, and rocky ground. Short manure may be spread as thickly as desired on the undisturbed soil, and as the work advances it may be buried in the trenches as required by with pick-mattocks by the men in the trench. The long and short manuring will cause the manure to be of even quality throughout. Long manures, on the contrary, should be shaken evenly through the soil as it is thrown over. Where the soil is trenched with the view of inverting it; in this case it must not be shaken, but will, of course, be put in the proper depth. This will cause the soil to be completely turned upside down; but if the object be to mix the soil with the manure, thoroughly, but, take it down in folds, pulverize it, and take out stones. The roots of most weeds will not strike to a depth of several feet in well prepared soils, and there are myriads of the smaller ones growing in as many destroyed annually by the naked eye, but easily seen by the aid of a microscope. Every blade of grass has its root attached of a leaf, gives its own supply for the nourishment of the plant. These results are best brought about by the most thorough system of culture.

SUBSOIL PLOWING.

"A SUBSCRIBER, Rockford County, Illinois," writes to inquire whether land in all other respects would be benefited by subsoil plowing, will it do to use but climate to parch the soil by such exposure?"

The action of the subsoil plow is very different from that of the ordinary plow. It does not bring the soil up to the sun and air, but the former slightly elevates and loosens it. It moistens condensed from the air will soon be seen to trickle down the outside. Now let us apply this principle; and it is a very important one in agriculture, insasmuch as plants can not use food in the soil in the absence of moisture, and that in seasons of drought, when they most need it, there is plenty in the air. Into the subsoil plow between row crops, corn included, to full depth, the air will come in, and be caused by condensation to give its moisture to the cool soil, and thus be ready to dissolve food for the growing crops.

In addition to the advantages set forth in the Weekly Farmer of February 19 on subsoil plowing, we may add: Subsoil plowed lands are less subject to the ravages of insects than those more shallow plowed. Manures, instead of being washed off the immediate surface by flowing rains are carried into, and disseminated through, the surface of the soil sufficiently deepened to receive them. Trees are not so shortlived; fruits are finer and less liable to drop, as the roots of trees are deep enough in the soil to escape the injury to the upper portions of the year; blossoms are perfected, instead of being removed by slight winds; leaves are less likely to be parched; diseases of the bark, such as "hide-bound" with the cherry and plum, less seldom occur; and, if the soil is subsoiled deeply, sorels and sour grasses disappear. The ordinary pests of the field can not find a hiding-place at a slight depth below the surface as when shallow plowing alone is practiced.

Two farmers, side by side, with soils and fertilizing materials alike in quality and quantity, one using freely the subsoil plow, and deepening the surface plowing, and the other pursuing the shallow system, will develope at the end of ten years two different conditions—the one with the farm doubled in value, and money to loan; the other with a deteriorated soil, covered by a mortgage. The farmer who told his son that he buried a treasure deep in the earth, and that he must find it, referred wealth to his son—the discrimination of the soil to discover the treasure produced its equivalent in value.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"DEATH TO ALL VERMIN."

"Costar's" Rat, Roach, &c., Exterminator.

"Costar's" Bed-bug Exterminator,

"Costar's" Electric Powder for Insects, &c.

THE

(Only infallible remedies known.)

Supplied honest by mail to any address in the UNITED STATES as follows:

On receipt of $1 00, a Box of the RAT, ROACH, &c., EXT. On receipt of $1 00, a Box of the BED-BUG EXT. Insect, &c., EXT. and ELECTRIC POWDER (each post-paid,) sufficient to destroy all the insects in a family.

Sold by DRUGGISTS and DEALERS every where.

WHOLESALE AGENTS in all the large cities.

"COSTAR'S" PRINCIPAL DEPOT, 482 BROADWAY, N. Y.

F. S.—Circulars, terms, &c., sent by mail on application.

Coughs.

The administration of medicinal preparations in the form of a lozenge, is of all modes the most eligible and convenient, more especially as regards a Cough Lozenge: for the Throat is the principal seat of Cough Lozenges acting Irritation, which induces coughing, gives instant relief in Bronchitis, Hoarseness, Influenza, Sore Throats, Colds and Asthmatic Complaints.

MOUNT PLEASANT INSTITUTE.—A select Boarding School for Boys, Amherst, Mass. H. C. NASH, A.M., Principal.

Grover & Baker's

Celebrated

FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.

New Styles, Prices from $50 to $125.

Hemmers, $5 extra.

Offices of Exhibition and sale:—

495 Broadway, New York.

19 Summer Street, Boston.

730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore.

80 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati.

Agencies in all the principal Cities and Towns in the United States.

☞ Send for a Circular. ☜

Brodie's Opening,

ON

Tuesday, March 29.

The greatest display of

SPRING & SUMMER GARMENTS ever made in the

UNITED STATES.

To enumerate styles or quality would be superfluous.

LADIES, COME AND SEE.

309 AND 310 CANAL ST. and 306 BROADWAY.

STATEN ISLAND.

Fancy Dyeing Establishment.

Barrett Nephews & Co,

Office, 5 and 7 John Street,

(3 doors from Broadway),

New York.

THE BANNER OF LIGHT CONTAINS Weekly Verbatim Reports of Sunday Morning Discourses of Henry Ward Beecher and E. H. Chapin. Subscription price $2, or in clubs of 4 and upwards $1 50 per year. Send to S. T. MUNSON, 5 Great Jones Street, New York.

TREES AND PLANTS.

PARSONS & CO. are now sending out from their NURSERY at FLUSHING, L. I.,

Fruit and Ornamental Trees,

Evergreens,

Flowering Shrubs, Roses, and Greenhouse Plants,

of the choicest varieties, and of thrifty, vigorous growth. Catalogues furnished on application at No. 128 Broadway, and goods delivered at Fulton Market Wharf free of charge.

FRED. S. COZZENS,

WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of the following brands:

RARE OLD BRANDIES,

SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,

from N. Longworth, Cincinnati Vineyards,

72 WARREN STREET,

(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

AMERICAN GUANO.—To Farmers and Dealers in Guano.—This Guano, from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, containing 50 per cent. of Phosphates and Sulphates of Lime, and the most valuable fertilizer known, is offered for sale, in large or small quantities, at about two thirds the price of Peruvian.

For full information and pamphlet, address

C. S. MARSHALL,

President of the American Guano Company,

66 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK.

The most beautifully illustrated Scientific Works ever published in America.

Cassin's Mammalogy and Ornithology of the United States Exploring Expedition.

Under Commanders Wilkes. One Volume. 4to. With 3 Folio Atlases of OVER FIFTY SPLENDID COLORED ENGRAVINGS. Prepared under the superintendence of SPENCER F. BAIRD, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. Price, $36.

Gird's Herpetology of the United States Exploring Expedition.

One Volume. 4to. With a Folio Atlas of OVER THIRTY EXQUISITELY ENGRAVED PLATES, COLORED FROM NATURE, executed under the supervision of Dr. CHARLES GIRARD, of the Smithsonian Institution. Price, $26.

The above Fifty-Six Copies of the above works will be published for both the American and foreign market.

American Numismatical Manual

Of the Currencies, Coins, Bullion, Medals, and Coin Cabinets of the United States and Colonies. With Historical and Descriptive Notices of the Coins or Series. By M. W. DICKESON, M.D., Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, &c., &c. One Volume. 8vo. Illustrated with 19 plates of over 200 Fac-similes. Price, $3.

The Mammalia of North America,

Including DESCRIPTIONS OF ALL THE KNOWN SPECIES, collected under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution. With SIXTY PLATES, illustrating the Genera and Species, with details of Cranial, external form and osteology. By Prof. SPENCER F. BAIRD, of the Smithsonian Institution, New York, and will be ready in a few days.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,

Philadelphia.

STEINFELD'S BITTERS.

JOY TO THE WORLD!

Let all the earth rejoice, our grief had long reigned. Let the inhabitants of the land sing praises to the Almighty. There is a balm, if not in Gilead, at least in New York, and the name thereof is "COGNAC BITTERS." We shall not be troubled with the cholera, for it is a sure antidote and will effect if go to No. 70 Nassau Street, where plentiful supply now with the cure for all sorts of spring diseases.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.

MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.

Assets $650,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive mercantile business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of its year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has reclaimed the Certificates of issue of 1856.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.

WILLIAM LECONEY, Vice President.

BENJAMIN A. GOODHUE, Secretary.

All Freight Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.

BY THE

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO'S LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A.M.; 3.15, 4.30, and 5.10 P.M.

Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and do not lie over or stop at any point.

The regular rates by the Fast Line is

To Chicago	in 48 hours	To Dayton	in 50 hours
" Cincinnati	" 48 "	" St. Louis	" 72 "
" Cleveland	" 34 "	" Louisville	" 54 "
" Columbus	" 42 "	" Indianapolis	" 54 "

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in the good time.

Goods for shipment to Europe by the American Express Co., will save time by shipping by our line.

Rates always as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,

64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

"HARD TIMES NO MORE."

ANY PERSON (Lady or Gentleman) in the United States, procuring a clear copies of Part 1st, for $1, can enter into an easy and agreeable business, by which from $10 to $10 per day can be realized. For particulars address (with stamp), W. R. ACTON & CO., 107 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

New York Purchasing Agency.

W. M. LAPSLEY, No. 25 Nassau Street.

Persons desirous of making purchases in New York city or vicinity, large or small, at the lowest rates, from a Book to a Steam-Engine, a Shawl to a Carpet, can have the same executed by the above Agency, at a charge of 5 per cent. Reference, Messrs. Sellers & Co., Lexington, Sq., Cashier Long Island Bank, Messrs. John Jewett & Sons, Hungs, Fitzgeist & Co., New York; J. D. Dunscom & Co., New Orleans.

68	B. T. BABBITT'S		68
AND	SAPONIFIER,		AND
70	Or, CONCENTRATED LYE,		70

Manufactured at 86 and 88 Washington Street, New York. Warranted to make Soap without Lime, and with little or no trouble.

68	SOMETHING NEW.—B. T. BABBITT'S		68
AND	MEDICINAL SALERATUS		AND
70	Is manufactured from cocoanut oil, and		70
68	Pure Concentrated Potash,		68
AND	In SIX POUND CANS.		AND
70	Six pounds of this Potash are equal to		70
	twelve pounds of common Potash.
	This Potash is the best article known for softening water, for making Soft Soap, &c.
	The attention of Druggists especially is called to this article. Packed in 1, 2, 3, 5 dos., 10 dos., and 6 dos. For sale by
68	B. T. BABBITT,		68
AND	Nos. 86 and 88 Washington Street, New		AND
70	York, and 104 Lydia Street, Boston.		70

68	POTASH,		68
AND	FIRST SORT,		AND
	In stone Jars, repacked in casks, suitable
70	for shipping. Sold by		70
	B. T. BABBITT,
	Nos. 86 and 88 Washington Street, New York.

A NEW WORK ON THE HEART.

By DR. SAMUEL S. FOWLER,

Of "The Water Cure Journal," &c.

(Author of "Six Lectures on the Causes and Cure of Consumption," "Health, its Abuse and Maintenance," &c.)

A POPULAR TREATISE ON

DISEASES OF THE HEART, ARTERIES, DYSPEPSIA,

and other Chronic Diseases, with proofs of their curability.

Also—RULES FOR

PREVENTING DISEASE AND PRESERVING HEALTH,

(especially after forty), to one hundred years.

This is a work of the greatest interest to one who are suffering with any of the diseases on which it treats, or who fear they may. It is the result of many years study and extensive Heart Disease—Apoplexy, Dyspepsia, &c., may be both prevented and cured, and directions for the same are given in this popular style, and designed for the general reader.

It is a volume of 112 octavo pages, handsomely bound in muslin, with six fine illustrations. Price at the office, 75 cents; by mail, post paid, one dollar. It will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any one applying for it, and then the price, 75 cents, and Post Office address and stamps or otherwise, after it is received and approved. Let no reader of this fail to send for a copy, as the practical discount made to dealers. Apply, giving address in full, to the PUBLISHER OF THE WATER CURE JOURNAL, New York.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE.

$120 a year pays Board and Tuition in Common English Studies, Washing, Mending, and Medical Attendance. A Limited number of each of the Nine Departments. Superior advantages for Pupils in Music, Drawing, and Foreign Languages and Accessory the Mozia. Term opens April 13. Write for Catalogues. Rev. A. FLACK, Clavarack, Columbia Co., N. Y.

A Nuisance—Its Remedy.

"FELLOW'S" hero they style their boasts and hoards. A regiment may be found in every city, town, and village. Of this they are the embodying of whom time has forgiven. Nobody is described, yet all are known. Nobody dwells, yet carelessly speaking. Every barber has a sign of hair-dye. The quantity of that forlorn swindle sold must be immense."—N. Y. Tribune.

"That's a fact. You can always tell persons that use hair-dye. It gives the shoeblacking tint, which can not be mistaken. We will, however, just whisper to our gray-haired friends who wish their "Crown of Glory" as it was in youth, that HIRSCHTEIN'S RESTORATIVE, which is now so extensively advertised, will restore it to its former gloss. Apply, privately for samples and original circular, to

W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

APRIL.

Again as Spring, with radiant wing,
To greet the greening earth advances,
Our April sky, like Laura's eye,
In mingled tears and laughter glances.
One sunny hour, and then a shower,
A glow of heat, and next a shiver;
To-day the rose half open and blows,
To-morrow ice is in the river.

Through breathing trees the spring life flows,
The sap is swelling leaf and blossom;
In warmer hues the unwilling blood
Now leaps through every human bosom.
Dear Annie's eye, though still and shy,
Yet glistens with a tenderer meaning,
And though to cry to own her joy,
We see her bosom is heaving.

O Month of Change! in all the range
Of seasons gentle and most mutable!
We give advice beyond all price—
A maxim worthy Captain Cuttle!
Let all who'd hear thy varied air,
The sudden call, the fast that smothers,
Just see and try, next choose and buy,
The new spring clothing of SMITH BROTHERS.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.

THOMAS J. SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

} NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

GEO. WM. CURTIS'S WORKS.

THE POTIPHAR PAPERS. Illustrated from Drawings by Hoppin. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 85.

These papers made the reputation of the periodical in which they were first given to the world. They were hailed with delight by the whole American reading world, who acknowledged in their amusement author of new star in the literary firmament. A graphic and telling descriptions of a peculiar phase of American society, the result of observation; the fresh and sparkling wit, the genial humor, and keen and truthful satire with which "our society" is described, have delighted thousands, and made "Mrs. Potiphar" a proverb. Inspirit and humor like these have marked the writer as a rich, full, and genial humorist, and the reader will see in these letters not a breath of sneer or bitterness, but a broad and wholesome sense of human nature, a keen appreciation of absurdity, and a generous delight in seeing evil seldom away a very hour.

NILE NOTES OF A HOWADJI. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 85.

In this brilliant volume of Eastern travels the genius of the youthful author, who has already attained such eminent distinction, was first revealed to the literary public. Written in a style which combines the voluptuous softness of an Oriental atmosphere with the sunny splendor of its imagery, it has the freshness and vigor of a new revelation. Its descriptions of Egypt are rendered with the utmost care and beautiful sense of nature, and the recollection of delicious life, and exquisite and strange incidents of a unique tour in language of wonderful vividness and warmth.

THE HOWADJI IN SYRIA. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 85.

A second volume of Oriental travel, distinguished for the same bold and striking characteristics which give such a decided impress to the first volume of the Nile Notes. It abounds in picturesque descriptions of the scenery of Syria, and in graphic sketches of the people and their manners. The same delicate appreciation and keenness for the sacred scenes which it calls forth will be found in this volume.

LOTUS-EATING. A Summer Book. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Kenrick. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 65.

This delightful volume is a record of the summer rambles of the author, bearing graceful testimony of the most interesting sports in American scenery, and giving a series of lively and graphic pictures of the varied and fashionable resort. Humor, pathos, and sentiment are generally blended in these sketches, and the reader will find himself in the midst of the scenes described. The summer's visit, painting is relived by an undercurrent of genuine feeling, and the charm of glowing descriptions give a new charm to familiar objects.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy SEWING MACHINES which will not perform the work the purchasers expected them to do, are informed that SINGER'S MACHINES never fail to do any kind of work. No one's ever disappointed in these machines.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway.

MEDICO-PHYSIOLOGICAL BOOK, third thirth edition, over 400 pages, 12mo, cloth, and about 150 Descriptive Engravings. Price $1. By celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, out of New York Practice. Containing more useful knowledge the bands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge not to be found in the whole range of medical books, and mailed to any part of the country, by W. A. TOWNSEND & CO., No. 127 Broadway, New York.

Will soon be Published:

From Wall Street to Cashmere.

A JOURNAL OF FIVE YEARS IN ASIA, AFRICA, AND EUROPE.

COMPRISING

Visits during 1851, '52, '53, '54, '55, and '56, to the Dansmara Iron Mines, Plains of Troy, the "Seven Churches," Palmyra, Jerusalem, Petra, Mount Sinai, Desbur, Sebastopol, and Suez,

WITH ALL THE SCENES OF THE RECENT MUTINIES.

CASHMERE

Peshawur, and the Khyber Pass to Afghanistan, Fava, China, and the Mauritius.

Nearly 100 full page Illustrations.

BY JOHN B. IRELAND, Esq.

A POPULAR TREATISE ON GEMS,

IN REFERENCE TO THEIR

SCIENTIFIC VALUE:

A GUIDE FOR THE TEACHER OF NATURAL SCIENCES,

AND THE

LAPIDARY, JEWELLER, AND AMATEUR:

Together with a

Description of the Elements of Mineralogy, and all Of economical and Architectural Materials.

With Elegant Illustrations.

BY

DR. L. FEUCHTWANGER,

Chemist and Mineralogist, Member of the New York Lyceum of Nat. Hist., American Assoc. of Science, of the Philosophical Societies of Jena, Altenburg, etc.

NEW YORK:

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,

Publishers, Wholesale Dealers in School, Classical, Theological, Standard, and Miscellaneous Books, Blank Books, Foreign and Domestic Stationery, &c., &c.

Harper & Brothers'

New Descriptive Catalogue

is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in postage stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form libraries or to add to their present collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in the various branches, COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES —which are offered, in most instances, at much less than half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, etc., who may not have access to a reliable guide to purchasers of books, it is thought that this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, application for such publications should be addressed to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.—FACTORIES, MILLS, AND STORES, No. 229 Pearl Street, Harper's Buildings. Brushes of every description on hand, and for sale at the lowest prices. A Silver Medal was received from the American Institute, in 1849, for superior Brushes.

JOHN K. HOPPE.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

THE NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are attracting universal attention. In all essential good qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

Select Family School for Boys

AT

SOUTH WILLIAMSTOWN, BERKSHIRE COUNTY, MASS. (ESTABLISHED IN 1845.)

Summer term of twenty-six weeks will commence Wednesday, May 4th.

The location is healthful and pleasant.

Number of pupils limited to thirty.

For Circulars address the Principal,

BENJ. F. MILLS.

March, 1859.

Prof. Peck's Elements of Mechanics.

ELEMENTS OF MECHANICS. By W. G. PECK, ARTHUR PROF. OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, COLUMBIA COLLEGE. This Book is designed for Colleges, Academies, and High Schools. Price $1.50.

Just published by

A. S. BARNES & BURR,

51 and 53 John Street, New York.

Publishers of Davies' System of Mathematics and Bartlett's Analytical Mathematics, and the Text-Books of West Point, Free Academy, &c., &c.

JUST PATENTED. ELECTRO-THERAPEUTIC BATTERIES AND MACHINES. The greatest scientific discovery in the Healing Art ever made. Invaluable in Gout, and Rheumatism. Call for Circulars and Pamphlets. For description, terms, &c., inclose stamp. Office, 5 Beekman Street, N. Y. Factory, 500 and 502 West 34th STREET, Cincinnati, Ohio.

OBSERVE. I want the Address of 100 Tea-bone Intelligent, Young Men who want employment. $100 clear of all expenses per annum. This is agenuine offer of no kind. Inclose stamp. NO PAY.

Address D. WRIGHT, Detroit, Mich.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

In the whole history of medical discoveries, no remedy has performed so many or such remarkable cures of all affections of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest; of Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Asthma; of CONSUMPTION itself, as this Far-famed, but tried, and justly celebrated Balsam.

Unlike other advertised, it is only genuine has the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "SETH W. FOWLE & Co., Boston," on the outer wrapper. For sale every where.

BIRDSEY BLAKEMAN,

OF THE LATE FIRM OF

SHELDON, BLAKEMAN & CO.,

HAVING ASSOCIATED WITH HIM

ALBERT MASON,

UNDER THE NAME AND FIRM OF

Blakeman & Mason,

WILL CONDUCT THE

Publishing and Bookselling Business,

At 310 Broadway, New York.

(Four doors above Duane Street)

We will keep constantly on hand a complete Stock of

Miscellaneous and School Books,

in general demand, and offer them to the Trade

ON VERY FAVORABLE TERMS.

Particular attention will be given to supplying All New Books as issued from the press, and also to early ordering, taking special pains to fill them with promptness, and as well as though the parties were present.

The Publications of

THOMAS & PETERS, H. HUTTER & CO. GOULD & LINCOLN, CHILDS & PETERSON, PHILLIPS, SAMPSON & CO. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., And other Boston and Philadelphia Publishers, constantly on hand.

From long experience and familiar acquaintance with the details of the business, we feel confident that we can make it for the interest of all Book Dealers to give us a share of their patronage.

To our old friends and patrons we think nothing more need be said.

To those with whom we have no acquaintance we will simply say, give us a fair trial, either by a personal visit or mail orders.

The Home Garden.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square),

Publish this Day

THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN:

BEING PRINCIPLES AND RULES FOR THE CULTIVATION OF VEGETABLES, FRUITS, FLOWERS, AND ORNAMENTAL TREES AND SHRUBS,

TO WHICH ARE ADDED BRIEF NOTICES OF INSECTS AND DISEASES INJURIOUS TO PRODUCE AND ANIMALS.

By ALEXANDER WATSON.

With several Hundred Illustrations.

1 vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

The author here presents, in a digested and plain form, such directions as will enable any person, who has a piece of ground, to make a garden to supply the home table with the greatest and healthiest variety in the least possible outlay of labor and expense, and add choice fruits and flowers to the family stock of fruitand, cheap, every-day enjoyments.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, PLANTERS, COFFUERS, AND BRIDAL SETS, at

361 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines has tended within the past few months—Indicates the reviving prosperity of the country. The prices of our Machines have been greatly reduced.

I. M. SINGER & CO. No. 458 Broadway.

BULWER'S NOVEL—COMPLETE.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

By Pisistratus Caxton.

A Novel.

By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart,

Author of

"My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c. &c.

8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure Patents, and will advise gratuitously whether any New Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington, D. C.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, by Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 splendid Illustrations. This work will be sold exclusively by Agents, to each of whom a liberal salary will be given. Sure Inducements offered. Applications should name the Counties they would like to canvass. For further address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WORTHY OF NOTE for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption.—Rev. Dr. LYMAN BEECHER, New York, says: "Gentlemen:—I have used your Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam myself, with benefit, in catarrhal coughs and colds, and have known it to be used with success in the early stages of Pulmonary affections in families of my charge."

Owing to an unprecedented sale and popularity of over thirty years' standing, there are many counterfeits and imitations against which the public are cautioned.

Inquire for the article by its WHOLE NAME,

"DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY."

Prepared only by SETH, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Practical Chemists, Lowell, Mass.

BARNES & PARK, Agents, New York.

Vol. IV. Household Library.

DELISSER & PROCTER,

No. 508 Broadway.

Publish this Day:

THE LIFE OF COLUMBUS.

By LAMARTINE.

EDITED BY O. W. WIGHTS.

18mo, cloth, 50 cents.

Lamartine's biography is justly regarded by scholars as among the choicest specimens of historic literature. Lamartine's glowing pen portrays with vivid effect the darkened career of the illustrious Genoese—his chimeric and dauntless spirit encountering all difficulties; the pomp and splendor of the Spanish Court, and the Spanish monarch—the glory of the age. It is a grand prose epic—a fitting monument to the memory of the Discoverer of the Western World.

THE NEW BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

By the Rev. Wm. Ellis, F.H.S.

THREE VISITS TO MADAGASCAR, during the Years 1853–1854–1856. Including a Journey to the Capital: with Notices of the Natural History of the Country and of the present Civilization of the People. Illustrated by a Map and Wood-cuts from Photographs, &c. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

By Dr. W. M. Wood, U.S.N.

Surgeon of the Fleet to the U. S. East India Squadron.

FANKWEI; or, The Sun Jacinto in the Seas of India, China, and Japan. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

By Lieutenant Page, U.S.N.

Commander of the Expedition.

LA PLATA: The Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay. Being a Narrative of the Exploration of the River La Plata, and Three of its Tributaries, during the Years 1853, '54, '55, and '56, under the orders of the United States Government. With Map and numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

By Dr. Barth.

TRAVELS AND DISCOVERIES IN NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA. Being a Journal of an Expedition undertaken under the Auspices of H. B. M.'s Government, in the Years 1849–1855. With a Map and numerous elegant Illustrations. Complete in 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $7 50; Half Calf, $10 50.

By Thomas William Atkinson.

ORIENTAL AND WESTERN SIBERIA: A Narrative of Seven Year's Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghiz Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and part of Central Asia. With a Map and numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Sheep, $3 75; Half Calf, $4 00.

By the Hon. E. G. Squier,

Formerly U. S. Charge d'Affaires to the Republics of Central America.

THE STATES OF CENTRAL AMERICA: Their Geography, Topography, Climate, Population, Resources, Productions, Commerce, Political Organization, Aboriginal Monuments, Comprising Chapters in Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Belize, the Bay Islands, and the Mosquito Territory. With numerous Original Maps and Illustrations. A New and Enlarged Edition. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

By the Rev. Dr. Thomson.

Twenty-five Years a Missionary in Syria and Palestine.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and the Scenery of the Holy Land. With the Maps, accurate Maps of Palestine, as accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several Engravings. Illustrating Manners and Customs, Topography, Natural Productions of the Holy Country, Topography of Palestine, Manners, and Habits of the People. In Two elegant Large 12mo Volumes, Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 50.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the price.

"Very able and Very Uncommon."

The New Novel, by George Eliot.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square),

Have just Published:

ADAM BEDE.

A Novel.

BY GEORGE ELIOT,

Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life."

12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

From the London Athenæum of the 26th ult.

Adam Bede is a novel of the highest class. Full of quiet power and deep observation, and, above all, constructive effect, it produces a deep impression on the reader, with the conclusion of the book he closes. It is as though he had made acquaintance with real human beings.

From the London Literary Gazette of the 26th ult.

Establishes a fair claim to a high rank in the first experience of novel writers. The story rules and a very uncommon performance, and we can hardly doubt that its appearance will give it a large and grateful public.

From the N. Y. Daily Times.

Among the many writers of fiction who have recently appeared in Great Britain, we should place George Eliot, the author of "Scenes of Clerical Life," at the head. She should be at a loss to name any English novelist of the present day who has excelled the author in his pictures of domestic life, or who has shown a higher order of talent in the delineation of individual character, than is the author of these admirable tales. They are life-like pictures of the every-day world, and the characters that people the middle class religious family—and they are wholly free from the flippancies, affectations, and maudlin sentiments which are peculiar to the so-called religious novels.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of One Dollar.

BAILEY & CO.,

619 CHESTNUT STREET,

Philadelphia.

(Adjoining L. J. Levy & Co's)

The largest manufacturers of

BRITISH STANDARD SILVER WARE

in the United States.

Guaranteed to be of the above quality. All Silver Ware sold by them is manufactured on their premises—Assayed by J. L. Booth, Esq., of the U. S. Mint.

DIAMONDS, PEARLS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, PLATED WARES, BRONZES, &c.

Star Collection of Instrumental Music.

Arranged for Violin and Stringed Instruments, and for the use of Small Bands and Orchestras. By J. W. MORE. Price $1 50.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co., Boston.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

THE GREAT AMERICAN REMEDY

For Purifying the Blood.

As this season nothing can be more efficacious. For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, 141 William Street, N. Y.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 90 to 96 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

FOR APRIL.

CONTENTS:

WRECKING ON THE FLORIDA REEFS.

Illustrated by Six Engravings.

THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS OF MADAGASCAR.

Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.

THE RED RIVER TRAIL. (First Paper.)

Illustrated by Ten Engravings.

THE COUNTY KERR. A NEW YORK DETECTIVE EXPERIENCE.

PORPHYROGENITUS. By DAVIDS TAYLOR.

HEAD AND HEART.

LITTLE GREEN EYES.

LOST AND FOUND.

THE STORY OF THE TRINITY BELLS.

SALLY LEEVIS AND HER LOVERS.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL BIBLE OF FARS.

THE PAUPER'S HOME.

BORED TO DEATH.

MY FIRST OF APRIL.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

HALF AN HOUR WITH MR. THACKERAY.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

THE WITCHINGS. By W. M. THACKERAY.

The Tragedy.—The Comedy.—Hetty's Misgivings.—A Run for the Boats.—Your Head-Pieces.

CHAPTER LXIV. In which Harry lives to fight another Day.

CHAPTER LXV. Soldier's Return.

CHAPTER LXVI. In which we go a-courting.

CHAPTER LXVII. In which Harry is mixed, and two more are begun.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR POINTED FRIENDS.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

HEADS OF THE PEOPLE.

Illustrated by One Hundred Portraits.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Out-Door Costume.—Morning Dress and Child's Costume.

The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of entertaining and valuable reading than can be found in any other publication of the day.

With the present volume the commencement of the Magazine has been changed. Its appearance hereafter will be early and varied; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the present number as the best guarantee that the future volume upon the patronage of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year . . .	3 00
Five Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5 00.

☞ The postage on HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER. $2 50 A YEAR.

(From the N. Y. Morning Post, Jan. 19, 1859.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty-two numbers of this attractive and valuable publication, issued during the last year, have been gathered into a single volume, and are thus at once placed in a form convenient for all the variety, the epigrammatics, and the value of the contents. There are many persons who have taken the numbers as they issued from week to week, and have found in the variety of the pictorial and literary attractions that always tickled, and the solid and substantially nutritious that always fed the appetite. Consequently many of these will find that there are the tales and stories of Dickens, Dickens, Trollope, and other popular writers, and the pictures of men and, above all, there are those striking wood-cut representations of contemporary scenes and events, of fashions, and of costumes and countries—all contained in the volume, and which will be had for a trifle. As a grand picture-book of the human life of the nineteenth century, HARPER'S WEEKLY has already become a library class of readers, moreover, may be interested by the fine steel portraits which have appeared in the issues of business, the child and the family circle.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks . . .	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
Two Copies for One Year . . .	4 00
Five Copies for One Year . . .	8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year . . .	19 50
Twenty-five Copies for One Year .	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their house, will please send their address to the Office of Publication, or by postal money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.

ACTIVE NEW YORK BUSINESS.—"My dear Sir, I'm delighted to see you. Come to make your Spring Purchases, I. What can I do for you? Want any Dry Goods, French Wines, Handsome, Fancy Articles, Crockery, &c., &c., &c.?"

STEADYGOING CONSTITUENT. "Well, now, what I do want is a good, strong Jackass!"

These unprincipled Boys make a practice of stationing themselves opposite the Doors of Lecture-rooms, and holding Umbrellas over their Heads as the People come out.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Gifts! Gifts!! Gifts!!!

EVANS & CO.

OFFER GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO BOOK BUYERS THAN ANY OTHER HOUSE IN THE COUNTRY.

OUR NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, OF FORTY-EIGHT PAGES, CONTAINS

A larger and better selection of books than ever before offered to purchasers, including many of value or interest published in the United States. All books furnished at publishers' prices, with at the time of sale.

A GIFT ACCOMPANYING THE BOOK

The most liberal inducements to clubs, surpassing those of any other house, for purchasers of books, see page 3, New Catalogue; also great commissions allowed to agents who are willing to devote their time to our business. Particulars sent on application by mail.

Send for a Catalogue, which will be mailed free to any address to all parts of the world.

Books and Gifts ordered amounting to $5 and upwards will be presented to any one sending an order for ten books.

The following is a Schedule of Property which will be given to the Purchasers of Books at the time of sale.

	Worth from
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever and Lepines	$30 00 to $300 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jeweled, Hunting Cases, open face and Lepines	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, fine glasses and Plain Gold Bands, Engine-turned and small sizes, with and without Stones	2 50 to 12 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Florentine, Painted Lava, Goldstone, Garnet, and Coral sets of Pins and Drops	5 00 to 25 00
Ladies' Gold Guard Chains, Neck Chains, Chatelaines	8 00 to 15 00
Gent's Fine Vest Chains	10 00 to 50 00
Beta Canons, Goldstone, Painted, Mosaic, Garnet, Onyx, Engraved and Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons and Studs	2 00 to 10 00
Gold Pencils with Pens, large, medium, and small size	3 00 to 7 50
Silver Pencils, with Gold Pens, large, medium, and small size, double and single extension	2 00 to 5 00
Gent's Heavy Signet Rings, Ladies' Gold, Chased, and Plain Rings	1 00 to 7 50
Gent's Gold Bosom Pins, Cluster, with Opal, Jewel Pins, Onyx, Garnet, etc.	1 50 to 5 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns	12 00 to 20 00
Gold Thimbles, Plain Banner, Chased, and Plain Oval Shapes	3 00 to 10 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles	2 00 to 5 00
Gent's Pen and Pocket-Knife	1 50 to 3 00
Pearl and Rosewood portemonnaies	1 50 to 2 50
Pocketbooks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides	1 00 to 2 50
Gold Crosses, small, medium, and large	2 00 to 7 50
Rosaries, with corresponding Crosses, assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold. An equal variety of the whole will be given with each $1,000 worth of book.

Address all orders, letters of inquiry, etc., to EVANS & CO., Publishers, 511 Broadway, New York City.

THE CULPRIT FAY. By Drake.

Just ready, a splendid Edition of this world-celebrated Poem, handsome, elegantly printed on tinted plate paper, and illustrated, with 16 original designs, by Darley. 12mo, cloth, gilt. 75 cts.

"The Publishers offer this little volume to the public at a time of unusual interest, and in a style to please the eye, paper, and binding. The exterior will be found in keeping with the interior, and as regards a cover we have not seen from the American Press. The very moderate price of 50 cents has been fixed upon, in order to insure the wide circulation which it merits."

It will be sent by mail, and will be sent by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 50 cents.

RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
No. 130 Grand Street, cor. Broadway, New York.

YARDLEY & STATHAM'S ORIGINAL HONEY SOAP.

The superior quality of this celebrated soap are well known in Europe and America, and need any remarks. Its medicinal properties are unequaled, and necessary in all families, both as a companion to the toilet and for general use. Numerous imitations have been introduced, and purchasers should see that the makers' names are impressed on each piece of soap.

Sole Agents for the United States,

DEMILT, DUNCKES & CO.,
Importers of Dandelion Curry Combs,
51 Fulton Street, New York. 11 Milk Street, Boston.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and will paint or Dye the Persons Hair.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is indisputable. Every family is annoyed with the presence of annoying pests. This powder in the course of a few days covered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the forest of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insect destroyer in every segment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to retain the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Belgium, and the powder is now in general use in Europe and fashionable circles in America.

Letter from the President of the U. S.

WASHINGTON, CITY OF WASHINGTON, March 4, 1858.

"MR. LEMUEL LYON.—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the Vestal's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

"HILARD THOMSON, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

NEW YORK, October 1st, 1858.

"MR. E. LYON.—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly free from poisonous matter, and that they will certainly destroy those pests, Bedbugs and Insects.

"JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
"JOHN C. DRAPER, M.D., Professor."

Mr. JOHN L. ROSE, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says: "I have used your Powders, and find they are roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powder, and finds it an immense value."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in so valuable a discovery. Refreshing can be had in the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to the Museum, President of the American Institute; Lyon's Powder Depository, Geo. Whitfield Secon. Cooper, W. Lee, L. Gaylord Clark, Dr. Hall, Dr. Hosack, Dr. Francis, &c., &c. Mme. Mapes says, "The discovery of Prof. Lyon is of national importance. The Farmer's Club have voted it thoroughly." It will destroy Roaches, Ants, Bedbugs, rats, moths, bugs, and all vermin. Garden plants can be preserved, and flowers improved.

Arrangements are now made through Messrs. BARNES & DARE, of No. 8 Park Row, to have it sold through the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be sure

To inquire for NEW YORK, November 8th, 1858.

"In selling from Messrs. Barnes & Dare, the Insect Powders and Pills, Letter-Patent, and the certain purifying fumes, to Messrs. BARNES & DARE, we have found a genuine article, and we have brought from the interior of Asia, and is unknown to any other persons. The genuine and effective article is put up in the cases here, and will continue to bear my name.

"E. LYON."

Rats and mice can not be reached by a powder, but are killed by a MAGNETIC DEAD GRAIN thrown by any machine.

Dr. Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
Dr. Lyon's Powder is not mixed for rats and mice.

Sample Flasks, by mail, post paid, 25 cents, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions. Dip for Animals and Shavaglio.

BARNES & DARE
8 and 13 Park Row, New York.

PICTURES of COUNTRY LIFE.

BY

ALICE CARY,

Author of "Married, not Mated," &c.

One volume 12mo. Price $1 25.

TAKE IT TO YOUR MOTHER.

If you have a Sister, get it for her.

If you have a Friend, get it for her.

The Home Journal thus heatifully titles the book:

"WORD PAINTINGS."

Her stories are always interesting."—Boston Transcript.

"We cannot but to commend this most excellent volume."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

"An attractive book in the highest merit."—New Haven Courier.

"And a writer to be merry and wise."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

"Thirteen pictures, well drawn and daintily colored."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

"A charming writer, whose thoughts are always refreshing."—Observer.

"They are true to nature."—Buffalo Courier.

"Will be warmly welcomed."—Springfield Republican.

"Full of truth and humanity."—Troy Whig.

"The book is a choice one."—Daily Wisconsin.

"They will be read with genuine pleasure."—Boston Evening Transcript.

Copies sent by mail, post paid, on receipt of the price, by DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

Douglas & Sherwood's PATENT Tournure Corset.

This article combines in one garment a CORSET of SUPERIOR SHAPE and FINISH, and a BUSTLE of PERFECT MODEL, insuring free and healthful action to the lungs and comfortable support to the spine. It has been pronounced by all who have seen it among whom are the most eminent members of the Medical Faculty, the BEST and MOST PERFECT article of the kind, either artistic or physiological. No lady can well do without it.

D. & S. still manufacture their

Expansion Skirt,

so well known for its durability.

Also, their celebrated

Matinee Skirt,

together with over Seventy other different Styles, the latest of which are

The Palmetto AND THE New Skeleton Skirt,

Containing 13, 17, 20 and 30 hoops, made of the SUPERIOR QUALITY OF STEEL which has always characterized these Skirts.

All articles of theirs manufacture are for sale at the principal stores in the United States and Canada.

☞ SEE THE STYLE OF THE NAME OF DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD IS UPON THEM.

THE BEST AND Cheapest Article FOR THE HAIR, PHALON & SON'S COCOINE,

Prepared from Highly Purified COCOA-NUT OIL.

This preparation possesses extraordinary properties for preserving and beautifying the hair, and also restoring its natural lustre and glossy appearance.

One application, however harsh the hair may be, renders it soft and glossy.

ALSO,

MAGIC HAIR DYE, CHEMICAL HAIR INVIGORATOR, PARISIAN LOTION,

For the Skin and Complexion.

PHALON & SON,
Perfumers and Distillers,
Nos. 197, 497, and 517 Broadway, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. Depot, 10 Astor House, and 1 Howard Street, Boston.

Inquire for Phalon & Son's COCOINE. BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S ROSEMARY

is the best dressing for the hair known.

The Rosemary will restore hair to bald heads.

The Rosemary will remove dandruff.

The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.

The Rosemary has not been and can not be surpassed, according to all a clean, healthy and wonderful hair.

The Proprietor can furnish proof to sustain the assertions above. Those who will admit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.

Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 21 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.

Sold by Dealers generally.

ROSE MARY

GLEASON'S LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP.

This splendid new weekly is increasing very rapidly in its circulation, and is now in its fourth week. The paper is furnished to clubs at the following remarkable low rates:

2 Subscribers, one year	. . . .	$3 00
5 " "	. . . .	7 50
10 " "	. . . .	10 00
20 " "	. . . .	20 00

and one gratis to getting up a club of 20.

Single Subscription being $2 00 per annum.

These wishing to Subscribe, or form clubs, will have sample copies sent free, by addressing F. GLEASON, Boston, Mass.

Gleason's new Enterprise is highly spoken of by the Press.

We here give a few of the many favorable notices we have seen.

MR. GLEASON has the experience, the enterprise, the tact, and the capital, requisite to sustain a good and successful paper.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

GLEASON'S WEEKLY.—This is the best pictorial and literary paper published in the United States, and to family should be without it.—Local News, Wiscasset, Me.

GLEASON'S WEEKLY is full of every thing to please the eye and the mind. The new illustrated weekly comes a great excitement in newspaperdom.—Regatta Register, Erie, Pa.

GLEASON'S WEEKLY LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP is before us. We do not hesitate to pronounce it the best literary and pictorial journal published in the Union.—Hopkinton Watchman, Monticello, N. Y.

GLEASON'S LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP.—This new weekly is, without question, the largest and handsomest literary sheet in the Union. It is freighted with a splendid cargo of sketches, tales, poetry, biography, editorials, wit and fun.—Zeitgeist.

GLEASON'S NEW WEEKLY LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP.—F. GLEASON, Esq., that prince of publishers, has launched again in the field. His well-earned popularity is a sufficient guarantee for the success of his new enterprise.—Bellefonte, Pa., Democrat.

GLEASON'S NEW PAPER is what might have been expected from the experience and skill of the gallant commodore and editor, elegant in its typography, illustrations, and reading matter. Every thing that good taste and experience could suggest to render it have been brought into requisition.—Ledger.

GLEASON'S NEW WEEKLY.—This story, by the illustrious Gleason, is illustrated with excellent engravings, and is a most excellent reading number. The first number has never been issued from this press. Gleason is a fortune in the shape of a name, and is conducting it well.—Dubuque Times and Sun.

GLEASON'S LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP.—The largest edition ever printed of the first number of a paper, either in America or Europe, was that of the "Line-of-Battle Ship," by Commodore Gleason. One hundred thousand copies were issued and sold.

This is truly wonderful, and shows what tact, talent, and a union of beauty and art can do, when controlled by a master spirit.—Morning Star.

P. P. P. PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated impurities and carcasses from the system; they impart strength; they are divided in sections, will yield to the motion of the body; they are porous; all impure secretions pass off, and they can not be removed, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster, and are cheaper at 25 cents than others at 10. Where Their Plasters are, pain can not exist. Wonderful cures, palsy, paralysis, deafness, &c., &c., are met with daily, chest, or back pains, should try them. Don't be deceived by the name. Ask for Park's. Don't be cheated by the counterfeiters. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp and each Signature.

BARNES & DARE, 13 and 18 Park Row, N. Y.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Premature Loss of the Hair, which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of

Burnett's Cocoaine.

It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

Burnett's Cocoaine

is the same thing, for the same purpose, in the form of a fluid. A delicate application will render it soft and glossy for several day.

It is a delightful article for a half year bottle.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 119.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ADVERTISEMENT.

In this number of HARPER'S WEEKLY we commence

A New Serial Story,

ENTITLED

TRUMPS.

BY

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

ILLUSTRATED BY

AUGUSTUS HOPPIN.

A perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the day.

No other publication gives so MUCH AND SO CHOICE MATTER, or so fully illustrated a history of the times in which we live.

More money is paid to AMERICAN ARTISTS AND ENGRAVERS for illustrating this publication than for illustrating any other paper in the United States.

This is the CHEAPEST AND BEST family illustrated newspaper in the country.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because VISITED BY THE EYE OF MORE PEOPLE throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West—than advertisements in any other publication.

We refer families to our printed list of terms on the fifteenth page of each paper. By forming clubs, people in the country can obtain the paper on very advantageous terms.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF HON. D. E. SICKLES.

HON. D. E. SICKLES was born in the city of NEW YORK in the month of October, 1821. His ancestors were of the old Knickerbocker stock, having emigrated from Holland to New Amsterdam, or Long Island, while that province was under the jurisdiction of the Dutch nation. In his childhood he was remarkable for a determined resistance to corporal punishment; always open to the force of reasoning or persuasion, the moment the rod was raised (no uncommon thing in these days) he became vicious. This was instanced by his conduct in school at Glen's Falls, where he had been placed by his father. The preceptor having exerted his authority pretty severely, Sickles, with that self-reliance which has been a marked characteristic of his whole career, quietly left the school, and entered the office of the Glen's Falls Messenger, in order to learn the art and mystery of printing. Here he remained a year and a half, and obtained considerable proficiency in his trade. While in this office, the son of a wealthy man, but disdaining home luxuries in the pursuit of an almost fanatical worship of independence, he was visited by his parents, and in their company was a gentleman who probably has exerted more influence in moulding his character than any other human being. This was DA PONTE the younger, who, being on a tour through that portion of the State of NEW YORK, was delighted to find in Sickles a lad who, with the local knowledge and daring of the frontiersman, blended the instincts and deportment of good breeding.

At about this period the elder Mr. Sickles met with great reverses of fortune, so that the printing acquirements obtained by his son under an impulse of boyish rebellion and an excessive idea of independence became of real value to the family, for he was able to earn good wages by "working at the case," in the office of Mr. Tarney, of Fulton Street, NEW YORK. It is the unanimous verdict of his fellow-"printers" (the public will pardon and printers will understand the slang of the craft) that at this time he "set" a goodly number of types per hour, and always had a clean proof; a fact of little value except as illustrative of the thoroughness and neatness which has always distinguished him, and which, down to this hour, prompts him in a dungeon, charged with a capital crime, to make his toilet, morning and night, with scrupulous exactness. After a time the family prospects began to brighten, and Mr. Sickles (the father of Hon. D. E. Sickles) engaged in transactions in real estate. Just then, in 1835–36, property in NEW YORK took a sudden start, and values ran up with an amazing rapidity; so that, after two great reverses, the elder Mr. Sickles found himself the possessor of so much property that he was justified in opening an office in Wall Street for the transaction of his business. In this office Daniel spent two years.

The success of Mr. Sickles's father had enabled him to retire from business; having twice "marched up the hill" of fortune, and twice "marched down again," he prudently resolved that thenceforward his means should be invested in real estate. Purchasing a beautiful place a few miles from the city, at Livingston, New Jersey, he spent, as two hundred farmers usually do, large sums upon its improvement and ornamentation. Here the father strove to direct Daniel's attention entirely to scientific and practical agriculture; but the adventurous spirit of youth chafed under the constraint of a rural life, which only middle and old age can properly appreciate. Thirsting for knowledge, burning with a desire to distinguish himself, and, to this end, willing to undergo the ordeal of scholastic preparation, the boy begged, coaxed, and demanded to be sent to the city for education. Yielding to the paternal authority he remained on the farm at Livingston one year; but at the end of that period, finding that there was an apparently irreconcilable difference of opinion between his father and himself, and that the former, in the exercise of his parental authority, manifested a resolution which amounted to stereotaxes, he tied up a change of linen in a handkerchief, and, on a calm morning before daybreak, walked out of his father's house with a few shillings in his pocket, and turned his steps toward Philadelphia. He walked to Princeton, a distance of thirty or forty miles, and there found, what a great many others have experienced, that the best fortune for a young man is a proficiency in some trade; illustrating on the old Greek maxim, "He who does not teach his son a trade teaches him to steal." Entering the village of Princeton hungry and dusty with his travel, he sought the office of the one newspaper then published there, and brought "Father Horner" for employment. This good man, although he really needed no help, allowed Sickles to go to work, with the hope that his expressed wish to enter Princeton College might be gratified. A day or two after he commenced his labor some tickets were sent to the office to admit "the press" to the approaching Commencement exercises; to the great joy of his new journeyman, Mr. Horner presented him with one of these; and on the night "big with the fate of Cæsar and of" the Freshmen, Daniel found himself for the first time an auditor in classic halls; but not being quite reserved from his fatiguing journey, after his intellect had been fed for an hour or two, he fell asleep, and, to his utter dismay, was at last awakened by the janitor, who politely informed him that the show was over, and, except himself, the auditory had retired—an example which would probably conduce to his comfort if followed before morning.

THE HON. DANIEL SICKLES.—[FROM A MEDALLION.]

While in Princeton he made several attempts to enter college, but found his means were insufficient, and gradually became disheartened and desperate. Just then came news—great news. First there came to Princeton a rippling murmur, in general terms, of trouble on the Northern frontier; and at last the tempest burst in all its fury. The Canadians had sent the Caroline over the Falls of Niagara wrapped in a shroud of flame. Young America was aroused, and Sickles determined to abandon the mighty "composing stick" for the more glittering but less potent weapon of the warrior.

Fortunately, the more matured counsel of Mr. Horner prevailed over the illhustering instincts of youth, and instead of rushing to Navy Island, Daniel, having paid his bills and finding himself master of a whole dollar, once more took up his staff and started afoot for Philadelphia. Arriving at Bristol at night, he found his fortune had been reduced to twenty-five cents; with commendable frankness he went to the tavern and told the landlord the exact condition of his exchequer. Notwithstanding his want of funds, he was kept all night and kindly cared for, and leaving next morning, he approached Philadelphia, as Franklin did, with a loaf of bread under his arm and sixpence in his pocket. Just before reaching the city he stopped at a farm-house, and, heated and dusty, requested a glass of water; he was greeted by a beautiful girl who, instead of cold water, begged him to accept a bowl of milk. He entered the city of Philadelphia late in the evening. To a young adventurer there is no experience so utterly heartbreaking as the sensation of loneliness in a vast city; but Sickles's will was fresh and vigorous, and instead of skulking under shandries or retiring to the hospitality of some friendly hay-mow, he walked boldly to the door of one of the most fashionable boarding-houses situated near the Exchange, and all travel-stained and baggageless as he was, with a princely air demanded boarding. With great propriety, judging from appearances, the landlady at once rejected his petition; but looking carefully in his face and weighing his tones, she seemed to understand that it was no vagabond who sought her hospitality, and with maternal considerateness, said,

"Yes, you shall stay with me."

He was accordingly shown into an attic-room, which he occupied for some time, until his address and appearance had so improved one of the boarders that he insisted upon sharing his elegant suit of rooms with Sickles. The next morning he obtained work in the office of Burton's Magazine, then publishing in Philadelphia under the editorial control of W. E. Burton, Esq., since famous as a comedian. As might have been expected, he was soon recognized by a friend of his father, from whom he shortly received a remittance and the assurance that if, for his mother's sake, he would return, all should be forgiven, and his wishes with regard to education and a liberal profession should be gratified. Returning to his parents, he was, by his own urgent request, placed in Dr. da Ponte's family, to be prepared for college.

The Da Pontes lived in Spring Street, NEW YORK, and, for many reasons, were people of such remarkable characteristics as to deserve a separate article. The elder Da Ponte was a man of rare poetic genius, magnificent presence, courtly manners, and great classical attainments. He had been poet laureate at the court of the Emperor Joseph II. of Austria, and the day before his death, at ninety years of age, wrote a beautiful ode, entitled Partí de la Vita (Farewell to Life). He son was also a person of great attainments, as is evident from the following incident: For some cause or other a decided difference of opinion sprang up between the faculty and the Council of the University of NEW YORK, in which Da Ponte, Jun., filled the chair of Italian Letters; on the eve of the annual examination all the professors except Da Ponte resigned, intending to coerce the Council into according to their terms. On examination day, six days before Commencement, Chevalier Mathews went to consult the only remaining professor. The latter, to his great surprise, after a brief conversation enumerating the various branches of study pursued in the University, turned to Sickles and said, "Dan, I can examine all the classes with your help." For six days and nights Da Ponte recited to Sickles, and, on the following Monday, the Faculty having requested the former to name the class he would fill, instituted, for the first time in America, the chair of Philosophy of History, filled in Europe by Guizot, Sieloski, Guizot, Heeren, and Michelet. To Sickles the result was equally gratifying, for, as a mark of consideration for his services, he was invited to a gratuitous use of all the privileges of the University.

Before this, however, Professor Bagioli, having arrived in NEW YORK as Grand Maestro of the famous Montrosor Opera Company, was a constant visitor at the house of the Da Pontes, and the elder Da Ponte had adopted the future MRS. BAGIOLI, the mother of MRS. SICKLES. The elder Da Ponte, in dying, bestowed his benediction upon his pupil, and shortly after, just as a most brilliant career opened to him, the friend with his counsels and love slept by death, and Bagioli, having married the adopted daughter of Da Ponte, became the head of the household. At this period of our narrative the unfortunate MR. SICKLES was a beautiful child of four years of age, and it is important, as an explanatory of his intense devotion to her, that the reader should know that MR. SICKLES has known his wife from her infancy, and, in his marriage, consummated his first pure dream of boyhood.

His grief at the death of his friend and instructor was so great that Sickles could not bear to enter the recitation rooms of the University again, and, without graduating, he entered the law-office of H. F. Butler, who was the Attorney-General under TYLER. Here his professional studies were aided by Kent, Butler, and Clerk, all eminent jurists. Here it was that he formed the political opinions to which he has ever since adhered. Butler was a leading Democrat, and indoctrinated his student with the democratic devotion to the views of that party. In 1843, having passed a highly creditable examination, he was admitted to the bar; and in 1844 commenced his distinguished political career, by issuing, in the city of NEW YORK, a campaign paper, advocating the election of POLK and DALLAS, containing only original articles from his own pen.

Prior to this he had distinguished himself at the bar, having elicited the marked commendation of WOODWORTH and BUTLER, while conducting the opposition of Woodworth and Wilson to the renewal of Stevenson's Patent for Flaming Anthracite, a case which was heard at Washington by a Board of Commissioners consisting of Ellsworth, Penrose, and Ewing.

In the winter of 1847–'48 he was elected to the Legislature, and was the most prominent during two sessions in the important legislation growing out of the then recently revised Constitution.

At this period he won from the late Governor MARCY the declaration that, as a debater, he excelled any man of his years, just as, ten years later, Governor RAYMOND, who was President of the Senate during SICKLES's career, bears testimony that, as a debater and parliamentary leader, he is unsurpassed. But he was compelled to engage in a severer contest than any political campaign.

For four or five years previously to his first entrance into legislative life he had experienced the tee common fate of young men of good family cation. The offer was a flattering one, but involved the relinquishment of his office, and the consequent loss of its large salary and emoluments. His mind, however, was instantly made up, and he closed with the offer to serve under so distinguished a politician and diplomatist as a mission that would necessarily be a stepping-stone to a career in the higher walks of statesmanship. In entering the Washington Cabinet, he came into with President Pierce, during which he received his nomination, and was on the way back to New York.

In Europe he was always accompanied by Mrs. Sickles; her beauty attracted the marked attention of the English, Dutch, and French courts, and during her whole residence there she received the most flattering attentions from many persons whose names are historical, and was especially distinguished by Lady Clarendon and Lady Ashburton. She divided with Miss Lane and Mrs. Colonel Larocque the complimentary title of the "Three American Graces."

In the course of his diplomatic career Mr. Sickles has become relation to one of the most important facts in American history. In the Life and Public Services of Martin Van Buren, by the Black Warrior affair, he was sent to the United States by our European Ministers to report to the President and his Cabinet the condition of affairs in Europe; and it was out of his statements, in reality, that the Ostend Manifesto was framed. During his short stay in Washington he was domiciled in the White House, and attended to his business in person. A dispatch usually took a week to be prepared and presented a memoir, addressed to the President, "On the Complete Change in Feeling upon the Policy of the United States;" making oral communications, furnished suggestions, and sometimes carried out the plans contained in the same steamer that brought him, armed with dispatches which rendered the Ostend Manifesto. With these he hastened to London, Paris, and to Mr. Soulé, then Minister to Spain.

Mr. Sickles's friends would like dispatches correct. Owing to what he conceived to be an insult to the American nation in the conduct of a German on the Fourth of July, he felt compelled to leave the table of George Peabody, the banker. A long and acrimonious correspondence with Mr. Peabody sent by Mr. Sickles to Peabody, and declined by the latter.

When the news reached this country of Mr. Sickles resigned and returned to the United States, in order to prepare the way for the subsequent presentation of his own resignation. Mr. Buchanan, for the Presidency. At that particular juncture the appointment of a diplomatic mission vice not very cheering to his friends. As I raved against him were Pierce, Douglas, and Marcy, and the latter, in 1856, a year before he left his position to the absolut management of Daniel E. Sickles as to the Presidency. Before he left his return to New York Mr. Sickles was nominated as a candidate for the State Senate. The contest of 1856 was a severe one, and Mr. Sickles's talent and relentless war waged even in New York city; the Democratic party, which, in spite of existing bad elections a test of the incipient of Mr. Buchanan by the Democratic party, and which, in the election apparently insurmountable, he came out of the fray a victor, owing to his own indomitable energy and the unflagging zeal of his friends.

His two years in the State Senate, associated with a minority of three members, developed all the tactics and parliamentary skill which always harassed and often baffled the triumphant majority. In the course of the Legislature of 1857 he completely exhausted that erratic genius that the vessel of State was then steering, and that it was rushing on sands, and regard it as their Magna Charta to this day. While the gratitude and friendship of such men as Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Irving, Mr. Cooper, and Mr. Sickles's talent and energy to him, his highest reward was the knowledge that his unflagging and inexhaustive argument was an answer to his mother's request to him to defend what she deemed the rights and the charter of the Empire City.

He was now about to be transferred to the wider and field of metropolitan life, when a reverse of fortune, which was to prove so disastrous a residence, he was called to his beautiful country-seat at Fredericksburg, on the bank of the Hudson, and on the hillside of which York, where he had established with Mr. Bayiolt for his daughter's residence; a beautiful place, where many of the old forest trees remain.

Mr. Sickles was first elected to Congress in 1856, a large majority, his term of office to begin with the last having expired. In November, 1857, the Democratic party carried the city of New York by 16,000 votes. Mr. Hamilton Fish, a distinguished citizen, was nominated for mayor; he was opposed by Fernando Wood, who took the field against him. Mr. Bayiolt for his daughter's residence; a beautiful place, where many of the old forest trees remain.

Mr. Sickles was first elected to Congress in 1856, a large majority, his term of office to begin with the last having expired. In November, 1857, the Democratic party carried the city of New York by 16,000 votes. Mr. Hamilton Fish, a distinguished citizen, was nominated for mayor; he was opposed by Fernando Wood, who took the field against him. Mr. Tinsman. The latter, as is known, was elected by a majority of three thousand. The campaign of the latest stirring and exciting ever known in the brilliancy for its brevity.

A last attempt was made to defeated, notwithstanding the opposition of a portion of the Democratic party, headed by Dickinson and Wood, acting more or less in connection with the Republicans and Know Nothings. But his election against such tremendous odds is a signal proof of the popularity he had won in the great devotion of a large circle of personal friends. Few elections have so completely concentrated and defied all opposition.

In his Congressional career he has taken a high rank; occupying a prominent position on the Committee of Foreign Affairs, he avoids the discussion of mere partisan questions, and bestows the whole force of his intellect, and the results of his extensive experience, upon matters of foreign policy. In all matters of detail that nature he takes a leading and influential part.

The recent events in his history have already been written in sufficiently full outline of detail; from the bright of happiness a few short hours bring him down, down deeper than plummet ever sounded. Whatever he may have to charge against himself in the matter of youthful follies, a hundred proofs can be furnished of his perfect devotion to the most intimate attachment to his unfortunate wife. In Washington it would be difficult to find a man, especially in public life, more domestic in his tastes, more irreproachable in his habits, or more devoted to his family, than he has been during his residence at the capital.

MADAME LA MARQUISE.

BY OWEN MEREDITH.

THE folds of her wine-dark violet dress
Gleam over the sofa, fall on fall,
As the sea creeps in the hollows of evilleen
With a smile for each and for all.

Half of her exquisite face in the shade
Which o'er it the screen in her soft hand flings:
Through the gloom gives her hair a look as odorous bright:
By the fire-light see sparkling her rings.

As she leans—the slow smile half shut up in her eyes
Between the white fan, long, silk-soft lashes lunatic;
Through her crimson lips, stirred by her faint replies,
Breaks one gleam of her pearl-white teeth.

As she leans—there your eye, by her beauty subdued
Droops—from under worn fringes of bewildery white
Of a gleam of the diamond buckle at instep,
For one moment, then slip out of sight.

As I bend o'er her bosom, to tell her the news,
Know the look, which betrays the agreement in her cheek,
The vague warmth of her breath, all my senses subdue
With magical power. On the couch by her side

So she sits in the curtain'd, luxurious light
Of that room, with its porcelain, and pictures, and flowers,
When the dark day's half done, and the snow flutters
white,
Past the windows in feathery showers.

All without is so cold—'neath the low leaden sky!
Down the lane, which is white as the ghost, the gaudy dame
Sticks coldly: a distant carriage home by—
All within is so bright and so warm!

Here we talk of the schemes and the scandals of court,
Of the Empress's toilette, the Emperor's health.
We put bores on the heads of our friends, just for sport
To laugh at the looks of the victims by stealth.

Her warm hand, at parting, so strangely thrilled mine,
That at dinner I scarcely remark what they say—
Am lost in a maze, and I wander, I dream, I repine.
Then go town at my favorite play.

But the glare and the glitter, the noise to behold her,
With her fair face half hid, like a ripe peeping rose,
'Neath that veil—or the velvets and furs which enfold
her,
Leaning back with a queenly repose.

Is she happy in this world, I—I—Would any she was made
To be a bride in a carriage, all day, with a smile!
And at dusk, on a sofa, to lean in the shade
Of the lamps, and be wept for by one, her fate!
But what the heart's like, we must guess.

With five women and men to be found in the world—
Little children, and dogs, and a few that will with passion—)
She could live with a doll, though its locks should be curl'd,
Or a pettiseate friend'd in the fashion?

'Tis no fair!.....would my life, if I bit it, draw blood?
Will it cry if I burn it? or could if I kiss?
It is made, with its mouth, only for food
.....Is it worth while to guess at all this?

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1859.

THE EFFECT OF A EUROPEAN WAR ON THE UNITED STATES.

THE intelligence from Europe points distinctly to a fresh European war as the only solution for the problem of European politics. We have so often said that Europeans overthrow that but few Americans give themselves the trouble to study and comprehend them. It may be said truly that the reason for fifty years in an unnatural condition, her best provinces being trampled by foreigners—Austrians; that Italy is the battle-ground of the French, who for seven or eight years has very prudently garrisoned Rome in the interest of order and good government, and Naples by their evil Sovereigns, including Austrians, shall evacuate Italy, and leave the Italians to govern themselves as they will, and that Austria, which is mostly sympathize with Austria, and the English, whose ruling principle is often prejudice against foreign nations, oppose Napoleon; but it is quite obvious that he will carry his point whatever it may cost. Italy can not forever remain in its present state of disorganization. This is not a bad time to apply the cautery, and Napoleon is going to do so. The Germans will inquire, and the English have, but if Austria does not yield, Napoleon will use his cannon in a just cause, and will undoubtedly succeed.

It is an interesting question how the war will affect us. As customers of Europe and purveyors of breadstuffs, cotton, and provisions for the Europeans, a European war is, on the face of it, an undesirable accident for us. For war is destruction, and destruction is labor and material. The money spent for soldiers' pay, guns, powder, shot, transportations, and other unproductive objects, would, in time of peace, be expended in commercial pursuits; and the United States, as the most important commercial correspondent of Europe, would benefit accordingly. Every event which tends to impoverish the great commercial countries of Europe, must naturally tend to the injury of all countries with which they trade.

The great principle laid down, it must not be denied that the United States were a source of great profit to this country. Whether the withdrawal of a million of men from peaceful industry may have had an equally unfavorable product of Europe, we will not undertake to say; but it is certain that the crop of cereals in Europe was shorter than for years, and it has usually been before that event. While we last lasted the demand for American breadstuffs and provisions, and for cotton, enormous to Western producers; and owners of shipping —who constitute a large section of the people of the sea-board—reaped an equally unfortunate harvest. The demand for cotton goods was not materially reduced by the war, and the consequence was that the price of cotton continued to be governed by the same laws of supply and demand as prevail in time of peace. On the whole, the United States have made by the war. Whether it was the effect of the war, or simply a mere coincidence, this country has had for several prosperous years than those of the great Russian war.

It is yet too soon to speak positively with regard to the effect of the Italian war. What, in this connection, will depend on the extent of the contest. If it be merely a fight between Austria and France, and the latter return to the plains of Lombardy, it can not make much difference to the commerce of the world. But if this has been the case, the French would easily blockade her solitary sea-port. Some extra provisions and flour would probably be required by the troops; but the cotton trade could not be materially affected. If, on the other hand, Germany, as to the issues of the war, Austria—if Great Britain or Russia should deem it necessary to interfere, the war would assume a different aspect. For then the United States are involving all the leading powers, would necessarily operate to the advantage of American shipping, the manufacturing interests of America, and breadstuffs. Soldiers must be fed and transported. And if the maritime powers are involved, immediately the whole provision trade will be in essential demand on all sides. Our cotton would suffer in such a case. But after the profits of the war were made, the planterocracy can afford to lose something.

It is very consoling to know that, however the intelligence from Europe may, the States can not suffer materially. If the European powers go to war, we shall feed and carry their soldiers from place to place, and if they remain at peace, they will have the more money to buy our breadstuffs and our cotton. In any event, we shall have active advantage, and shall ourselves enjoy the blessings of peace.

THE RECOVERY OF THE WEST.

It is yet too soon to speak confidently with regard to the Western crop. Advices from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Wisconsin generally encouraging. Still it is early. But until the end of April it will be too soon to boast of the future. What proportion of the winter wheat has been killed, and what the prospect is for the spring wheat, can not be determined till then. Our WESTERN FRIENDS will on this the safest and most accurate information on the point.

There never was a year when the Western crop was of so much consequence as it is at present. At least five hundred millions of dollars have been expended in the construction of Western railroads, whose future is directly dependent on the crop. It failed in 1857 and 1858, and the consequence was that the construction of all kinds of trade and enterprise in the West. Real estate in some sections has fallen fifty per cent, and the product of wheat at $140 has proved insufficient to satisfy a claim of $300. Merchants in a prosperous business have failed because of the low prices of grain, every dollar of debt, obliged to suspend payment. The railroads have been forcibly embarrassed, and the Illinois Central, the Michigan Central, the Galena, and the Chicago and Rock Island have earned one-third less in 1858 and 1859 than in 1856 and 1857, being prudently and honestly managed, have been enabled to live through the hard times, and to pay their debts, but other Western roads, which it is unnecessary to name, have not only failed to pay profits to their owners but have defaulted on the interest. Such has been the fruit of two short years' crops in the West, supervening upon an unprecedented, and in 1858 and 1857 a railway administration.

We are now entering upon a new year, and it is a great thing to feel that we enter upon it under new and sound auspices. Grain of all kinds is at a minimum price. Flour, which two years ago sold at $10 a barrel, is now in the market at $4 and $5. Corn which in 1856 was worth 650 an acre, is now hard of sale at 200. Railroad stocks which were then quoted at 60 @ 80 a share, are now dull at 40 @ 60.

And it must be remarked that all these articles are really worth more now than they were then. Land, for instance, is worth more from the fact that the area brought into the market is steadily diminishing. The inducements which formerly led speculators to locate new lands and offer them for sale have ceased to exist. For some time to come no new lands will be placed in the market. The crisis has improved agricultural methods. The great staple of 1858 will in all human probability be better of its kind than the product of any previous harvest. Cruel experience has compelled the farmer to hesitor more care than usual on their fields. They have learned that it will not pay to produce an inferior article where care, labor, and science can secure a superior one. It is so with the railroads. The crisis set all the companies to work to curtail expenses. The companies have been that roads which used to cost seventy-five per cent. of their gross receipts to work them are now actually worked at fifty-five per cent. On the best ordered roads all the old leaks have been stopped. And a stop has been put to the construction of new roads. No one is tempted, after the experience of 1857, to invest money in the construction of new roads. The consequence of the revulsion is, in a word, the reorganization of the railway system, and a wholesome check to all the improvident and unsound schemes which contributed so largely to the crisis of 1857.

The main question of the recovery of the West still depends on the crop. But even should it prove a poor one, the West will still do better than might have been expected, so largely have its resources been developed, so thoroughly has speculation been checked, and so completely has the necessity of economy and retrenchment been forced on corporations and individuals.

THE VIRGINIANS.

OUR colaborer, the Lounger, has so ably replied to the cavils which have from time to time been raised in weekly papers against statements made in Mr. Thackeray's new story "The Virginians," now appearing in Harper's Magazine, that it has been unnecessary for this journal to allude to the subject.

At the same time, there may be readers of the Weekly who are unaware that the finest novel in the English language is now appearing in the Magazine. Mr. Thackeray, whatever criticism may say of him, is undoubtedly one of the most finished scholars and most admirable writers in the language. Comparisons between him and Mr. Dickens would be invidious. Both are so delightful that the idea of losing either is appalling. But it is of Mr. Thackeray that it is necessary to speak in terms of the highest praise in the habits and spirit of the last century. Mr. Thackeray is, so far as our reading goes, with a rival, if not in the delineation of human feeling and human passion he is equal to the greatest masters of the art.

If Thackeray's "Virginians" had no other merit than the light the work sheds on the character of General Wolfe, the conqueror of Quebec and of Louisburg, it would deserve to be a standard work in every town and village library. But James Wolfe is only one of the eminent characters whom the great novelist depicts in a true, and hence a new light. General Braddock, Mr. Benjamin Franklin, Sir John-son, the soldiers, the statesmen, the wits of the age, are all depicted in "The Virginians" with a fidelity and a charm which have been hitherto unapproached. No one who has not read "The Virginians" can thoroughly appreciate the most who heralded its publication Revolution.

The day will come when "The Virginians" will be an American standard work of reference. It is now appearing at a cost which is really nominal, in the pages of Harper's Magazine.

CORRESPONDENCE.

We have received from a resident of Louisville, Kentucky (who of course gives his real name), a letter desiring us to print a vindication of the citizens of Hawesville from the charge of murdering the late Mr. Lowe. The vindication would occupy over a page of this journal, and we, therefore, cannot find room for it. The circumstances of fact contained in it are true, and they appear to be attested by the most respectable men in the place, the original judgment formed on the evidence of fact considerably modified. The vindication states:

"The question naturally arises here, why it was that an inoffensive citizen, such as Lowe undoubtedly was, met with apparent impunity. The reason of this is obvious to those acquainted with the character, life, and habits of the deceased in the community to which he lived, and a knowledge of whom, it is believed, is necessary to be known to perceive unquestioned with the facts to enable them to form a just and correct judgment, based upon those facts which preceded and accompanied his death. Since Mr. Lowe came to the county scarcely has a circuit court passed in the county in which his name did not stand on the docket for trial, under indictments found against him for shooting at some person, or for carrying such deadly weapons. The truth is, he was a habitual stabber of the and a constant disturber of the peace and quietude of private families. His daily walk was in utter disregard of the laws of the land, and his repeated bribing out of obnoxious indictments attempts to shed blood and take life in this community without cause or a sufficient provocation, made him an outlaw in the estimation of the community. He was a constant terror to peaceable and law-abiding citizens, not unfrequently endangering the lives of women and children who, perchance, happened to be upon the streets of Lexington and Hawesville during his residence in these places."

The names of ten persons are given whom Lowe is said to have assaulted with deadly weapons; and it is added that so great was the terror inspired by this man that no constable could be found to arrest him. "Many of the hundreds families had been afraid to pass or to let their children pass his residence, lest they might become the victims of a random shot" fired by him. "Parents feared to send their children to school from the same cause." "His violence and frequent use of guns and pistols . . . destroyed, in a measure, the business and property of Lexington." He was at one time resided; and "the trade of Hawesville has suffered greatly from the same cause."

We give these statements to the people of Lawesville, simply remarking that, if Lowe was such a character as they describe, they appear to have been some more legitimate way of getting rid of him than by shooting him at night in his bed.

THE LOUNGER.

A POINT OF HONOR.

In his recent letter to Mr. Thackeray Mr. Dickens, recurring to his own statement, says in his friend Mr. Yates some very bad advice. It seems that Mr. Yates had sent Dickens a review of some kind, for which the novelist was deeply grateful; and upon the explosion of the Garrick Club difficulty Dickens took the part of Yates; but declaring, if possible, to accumulate the difference, wrote to Thackeray for a note of the facts. Mr. Yates, saying, if nothing could be done, that their letters had better be burned, unferrating, for his own part, to destroy Thackeray's reply. If Mr. Thackeray would do him the same favor with his present communication.

It is a droll fact that nothing was done; and yet Mr. Dickens's letter is published.

But the principle is a droll one. Dickens says to Mr. Thackeray that, when Yates came to consult him, he said to him that, whatever in his article was not to be defended; but I convinced him in his opinion that it was not reasonably possible for him to set himself up as the critic of the receiving of a letter couched in the very strong terms you had employed."

But why not? If A has done a wrong to B, on which B naturally angry, and calls him roughly to account, why should C, being also at a next friend, declare that A's act was inexcusable, for because B was angry he need make no amends? It is not perfectly clear that Yates was not the ding-off of an injury in an honest man's mind? A, if he is a gentleman, will, if C is correct in saying that the offense is inexcusable, say to B, "I first of all, I have done you a wrong, for which I spoke gross." Then B will say, "I see, in my high language to me, which you must explain." There method of settling a quarrel of honor between each other.

Mr. Dickens was certainly wrong.

THE LOUNGER MAKES A BOW.

It is many weeks since the Lounger has tried to find a place for his many correspondents who have been quietly hung upon the proof-readers' hook like unclaimed hats. But now he has been resolved to let them all sing together with the other birds of spring. So here goes.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—SIR BROWN, Allenton, tells us that letters and lectures we have read that remind him that she and her friends were especially delighted (as many a Lounger has been this winter) with Holland's discourses upon "American Social Life." She says that she and her sister might "have been interested in him after the lecture; but we were considerate girls, and did not like to swell the number of his admirers." You have written well, sir, delighted lecturer. If Dr. Holland had been a bachelor—I've changed my mind; I won't finish that sentence!

She concludes her note by saying that the good sense of the lecture thoroughly met an effect in the house of her father, where cheerfulness is no longer proscribed.

—It seems that, after all, Thackeray was sound upon the mulberry-gut question. OLD JEFFERSON has published proof.

"A 'Frontier Woman' says that 'Mr. Thackeray has made a most unwarrantable attack upon the ladies, instead of sugar.' Mr. Thackeray was perfectly correct in his statement. The undersigned was present at the lectures of 1855, in the town of Indiana, Jefferson County, New York, from the top of about one hundred mulberry-seed boxes filled with sugar, and not maple sugar. The spring following these same trees were equally provided with sweet material, and not maple sugar."

—MEDICUS sends this little sketch of Dr. Garth, because, he says, he infers that a correspondent of the Lounger's intimates a doubt "whether one of the Lounger's predecessors ever lived in London."

"To die is but to lend upon some silent shore."

"Dr. Samuel Garth deserved from a good family in Yorkshire, England, and obtained his degree of M.D. at Cambridge in 1692. He seems to have attained a high professional rank in the metropolis within a few years thereafter, and also among the élite in literature gained the friendship of Addison and Steele.

"His first published poem was the 'Dispensary,' of which Pope, Dr. Johnson and others have spoken highly against the intrigues of interest, and of regular learning; against licentious usurpation or medical authority; and was, therefore, favored by those who read and can judge of poetry.

"Garth was a most esteemed member of the 'Kit-kat Club,' and was one of Pope's earliest friends, intimate alike with Addison, Warton, Congreve, Steele, and others.

The Doctor died previous to the year 1719, when Pope writes thus to a friend: 'If ever there was a good Christian, without knowing himself to be so, it was Dr. Garth.' The following encouragement to desire the reader or respondent will make it improbable that Garth wrote poetry, and that he was not a scholar and a gentleman.

—PENSERO, Philadelphia, courteously differs from the Lounger's reply to his Boston correspondent's questions in the Letter-Box of February 12. Pensero thinks every question can be answered. The Lounger is not persuaded. It is true that the brain has been forged, and that the existence or exaggeration of certain organs produces the phenomena called Ellery; but the essence of the mind, of Ellery, is divine method, literally unknown. The functions of the body, and the proximate causes of disease and its cure, may be scrutinized and classified, but what is the secret of life? To explain the operation of certain material organs is but to answer any question about the real difficulty. You do not tell what beauty is when you have described a sunset, or a rose, or the face of a lovely woman. It is the reticence of the rose that we want explained; and that longing in the divine allurement that draws the mind out eternally.

—From some verses called "MARY-HEAD VIEWS," written upon passing St. Helena, and dropped in the Lounger's box, he finds these lines to Napoleon:

"Immortal Child! on history's future page
Thy name shall stand the wonder of each age;
Thy vast achievements and thy virtues, too,
Have only lately had historic due.
By "historian true," the Lounger understood the late writer to be Mr. Abbott. But he knows he came certainty upon encountering this couplet:

"Eon Walter Scott, immortal though his fame,
Sought British history here through Napoleon alone:
But now the Hero's virtues brightly gleam,
Through Abbott's pen he's very dulcis redeem."

—FIFTH AVENUE asks:

"Can you tell me who that King was, who, for reasons of state policy, although a lady and hearty old fellow, for seven years kept the invalid Queen Dowager himself constantly to bed? It is true, meantime, he drank great gallons of ale and smoked great packets of beef, and occasionally by night stole out and rode on a furious bread, pot, notwithstanding, he persisted in proclaiming himself a helpless, sick man."

FIFTH AVENUE confesses that her "ideas are misty," but she does not mean, then, the old Pope who feigned extreme illness and infirmity (Hildebrand, we think, was his name), that he might be elected, and the moment he was so, threw away his crutch and began to govern, a hale, hearty man? There is a fine picture of the scene in the Luxembourg in Paris.

—CONVIVIN, Kingston, New Hampshire, wishes to know, for himself and friends, what are the original and best moral effects of dancing and also hasheesh. The answer is given at length and with considerable research in the "Book of Recollections of an Opium-Eater," and in Ludlow's "The Hasheesh-Eater." Let C. and his friends procure both those books—the former published by Ticknor & Fields, the latter by the Harpers—and they will be satisfied.

"Shall I, wasting in despair,
Pine because a woman's fair?
Oh, no!
If she be not fair for me,
What care I how fair she be?"

—J. F. H. takes the Lounger severely to task for answering the question about the epigram attributed to R. Balcarr Eglisa, as if he were ignorant of the great Scottish name, which it is. He says he was reading for 'ever so many' years, and admiring but the more I read." In regard to the epigram itself he says:

"I may be wrong, but the more I think of it the more I doubt that our genial scholarship is Sir Robert Eglisa. I do not pretend to be accurate, but by circumstances I was interested at the time when Hallam's book was in many, if not quite, twenty years ago, and they were then given as having been produced on some publication at the *Spectators*re. True, this does not prove that Sir E. was the author of the epigram, but it certainly makes it earlier times and an older head than twenty years ago; and a head quite as likely as Drummond's."

The Lounger begs J. E. H. to wait a little, and he will hear all about that epigram.

—A Portin Eastport, Maine, sings Elder. But the song is very shaky, as if he treated through heart," "a half heart," etc.

—. . . For it has long since been demonstrated that the human heart has but one feeling, four nerves, and seven sensibility than any other organ, and, withal, is the most sensitive and delicate of the whole human organ. And evil for the perpetuity of the human race it is so; for there is not a man, or even a woman, now living that would not otherwise have long ago died of a broken heart in reality—sixty or seventy sound knocks against the ribs every minute, in one of its tender, soft, and melting moods, would disturb the organization. But, as we have seen, the heart is made of sterner stuff, and endowed only with the purely mechanical function of giving impulse to the red blood circulation: which was wholly unknown to the ancients, and hence this powerful, mysterious, self-moving organ was regarded by them as the very throne of all our affections and passions."

Our philosopher closes with a grave inquiry:

"Which of the two is the more deleterious to the progress of civilization and good morals—the duelist or the slanderer?"

—TALENT seeks the Lounger a translation of Heine's Lore-Lei:

"Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten." It is faithfully rendered in the following from the occasion. The best translation the Lounger has ever seen was made by C. P. Cranch, the painter, now in Rome. It is printed in Mr. Curtis's Lotus-Eating, and the Lounger quotes it here as a remarkably fine specimen of translation:

"I know not what it presages,
This heart with sadness fraught:
'Tis a tale of the olden ages
That will not from my thought.

"The air grows cool and darkles,
The Rhine flows calmly on,
The mountain summit sparkles
In the light sun, setting sun.

"There sits in soft reclining
A maiden wondrous fair,
With golden clasping shining,
And combing her golden hair.

"With a comb of gold she combs it,
And combing, sings a song
A song of a strange, sweet sadness,
A wonderful ancient song.

"The sailor shudders as s'e sin
The strain comes floating by;
He sees not the rocks before him,
He only looks on high.

"Ah! round him the dark waves dinging
Their arms to clasp him over!
And this with her wild sweet singing
The Lore-Lei has done."

—E. T. S., Trenton, Grundy County, Missouri, if he will take the sincerest advice of the Lounger —which he solicits—will try no longer, however much he loves it, to write. He is read, his kind be writes, and his mind is dictate. If my memory serves me, this was the opinion of Ludlow to the Empire Juliet, usually called the 'Apostate.' Was the remark true of both, or neither? If either, which?

It was Julian, the apostate, of whom Gibbon says: "He possessed such flexibility of thought and such firmness of character that he could employ his hand to write, his ear to listen, and his voice to dictate; and pursue at once three several trains of ideas without hesitation and without error."

—DEBY desires "to contribute my might to your department." The judgment of the Lounger must, reluctantly, be declined.

—MR. LOUNGER.—As there are at least ten Pikes seventeen in many different States, in Uncle Sam's vast domain, can't you manage to have Pearl Junker to add the name of the State to the county when he speaks of the "Pike county ballads?"

A SENSITIVE RESIDENT OF ONE OF THE COUNTIES.

Poore Junkins will grieve himself accordingly.

—C. C. D., Detroit, Michigan, who finds that "the world is wearisome," and that she is "weary," revives a little when she speaks of her city:

"Indeed we are a splendid people, and a thriving place, with the usual complement of gossip and scandal and backbiting, and you—Philadelphians—have a considerable share of slander, and its several accomplices and pretty generous allowance, the two cities are even with her full, clear, rich-ring voice and queenly presence, with a dignified, quiet, gentle glide in style," etc., etc., etc.

—PENSERO, Philadelphia, differs from the Lounger's view of the possibility of finally and satisfactorily answering any question about the mind, or the relation of soul and body. It is useless to carry on a discussion like that. Pensero must remember that, after all, he speaks only of phenomena, not of the essence. The Lounger thanks him cordially for his courtesy.

—A SUBSCRIBER, King George County, Virginia, sends a little letter of a little girl upon her little mother's death. But it would be of very little use to the great public.

—E. P., Connecutville, Pennsylvania, has written a new song of the Bucket that hung in the Well—"The bucket taken hold of by the iron bucket" which the late Samuel Woodworth sang, and the popular heart echoes and repeats. The new song is intrusted to the Lounger's discretion. The public shall have one sip from it, and only one:

"But it is old objects to greet.
When by Time and Decay they seem to have fell:
Hard it is then to recognize what we were.
Here is the bucket that once hung in the well."

It does not seem to the Lounger equal to Woodworth's.

WRECK OF THE "DROMAHAIR"—SEEING THE STEAMER.

THE WRECK OF THE "DROMAHAIR."

We illustrate herewith one of the most terrible scenes of shipwreck ever recorded. The ship Dromahair, bound from Quebec to Greenock, and laden with timber, experienced a succession of heavy west and northwest gales until December 26; while lying-to in a tremendous gale was boarded by a sea which swept the decks of every thing—houses, bulwarks, rails, stanchions, wheel, with the man, and sprung a leak; kept pumps going, and got her free, but the gale continuing, she filled again, and became perfectly unmanageable, every sail set having been blown from the yards; was in this situation for twenty-one days, and subsisted for fourteen days on half a biscuit per day, and what water they could catch running down the masts; the other seven days they lived on small strips of salt pork only. During these twenty-one days three of the crew died from exhaustion and starvation, and two others died after being seen by Captain Caulkins, of the Centurion.

The mate of the Dromahair, Mr. John Elliott, has published an account of the shipwreck, from which we make the following extracts:

"About five o'clock on Sunday morning, the 19th of December, the little bark shipped a tremendous sea, which carried away the port, bulwarks and stanchions, split the covering board, carried away the cook-house, tore the life-boat from the deck, where it had been lashed; carried away the companion and the steerage-wheel. Mr. George M'Intosh, the pilot at the wheel, was struck by the mountain billow—

"'Dashed from the helm, and plunged headlong in the main.'

"The little boat hanging at the starboard davits was also swept away, with a large portion of the standing and running rigging. Nearly all the sails were at this time blown from the yards. At the time the wave struck all the men were at the pumps. They jumped for their lives, and when the water cleared off they found themselves jammed into corners about the deck. One man was high up in the rigging. The waves swept as high as the maintop. The water ran into the cabin, tore the bulk heads, and flowed into the bread-room, destroying nearly all the bread in it. They had only one barrel of bread left after this calamity; it happened to be stowed away in a spare locker. The cabin stairs were carried away, and every thing torn up that impeded the course of the inundated waves. Sea after sea swept over the labouring ship, the men seeking merely to cling to her, knowing that, as she was loaded with timber, she could not go down. Whenever they could they worked at the pumps, trying to keep down the water as much as possible.

"All day Sunday the storm continued, but not quite so violently. About eight o'clock Sunday night the pumps were utterly disabled by a sea. Then the skies began to moderate, but the water gained on us.

RESCUE OF THE PASSENGERS BY THE "CENTURION."

DESTRUCTION OF ST. PETER'S COLLEGE, TROY, NEW YORK, BY A LANDSLIDE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"At one o'clock on Monday morning there were thirteen feet of water in the vessel. Seeing there was no hope but in the pump, we commenced to repair it, and as the wind had somewhat abated, we got it to work and the ship free from water by noon of Monday. We clewed away the wreck as much as possible, and tried to get some canvas on her to steady her. We made a tiller, and got her so we could work her pretty well; but at eight o'clock Monday night there arose a tremendous gale—a wind even more furious than we had heretofore had—dashing the sea over the ship fore and aft. The storm was so violent we could not remain at the pumps. The wind continued to blow all night fearfully.

"The waves were mountains high and steep.

"At six o'clock Tuesday morning the water was up near the cabin floor. We were all obliged to go into the cabin to save ourselves from being washed overboard, as the bulwarks had been torn away. But as sea after sea swept over us and filled the cabin, we were compelled to run from it and get into a small forecastle-house on deck, built in with the rise of the keep, about three feet above the deck.

"When the Bremadaire was used as a passenger ship this house was used as a second cabin. When we were forced to leave the cabin we got thirty or forty pounds of bread, put it into a bag, and took it along with us to the little deck-house. We had no water, and no other food except some salt meat which we got afterward. The storm continued, and we remained in the house for a few days; then the hulk-heads of it were knocked down and the water got free access to it, passing through it at every notch of the vessel. The hulk was now completely water-logged, and would have sunk had she not been loaded with lumber. The storm struck us on the 16th of December, and we remained in this condition till the 24th of January. On the 23d or 24th of December a steamer passed within two or three miles of us; she was standing to the southward; appeared to be propelled by a screw. She could see us, but made no sign whatever to come. She could not see us, but made no sign whatever to us. We lived on half a biscuit a day. A barrel of salt beef and a barrel of salt pork were under the forecastle, and after the storm somewhat abated we could get at them by watching our chances between the seas. This was all the food we had. We had no water except what we caught when it rained; there were several little showers—one almost every day; we could just get a mouthful of water, not enough to set all satisfy our burning thirst. We got it by putting our mouths to the mast and licking off the water as it trickled down them. Our sufferings were most intense. The salt meat, eaten raw, created a fever and inflammation in the bowels, causing a burning thirst.

"About the 22th of December one of the men, John M'Innis, began to show symptoms of insanity. He had drank salt water, and its effects could be seen upon him. He died on the 31st of December, and was buried, or thrown overboard, on the 1st of January.

"Henry Frost had become deranged previous to the death of M'Innis, and on the 2d of January he jumped overboard, not knowing what he was doing; though in the sea he at first clung to the side of the ship; ten men held hold of his hands to hold him in, but he finally broke from them and was drowned.

"On Tuesday, the 4th of January, the boy, James M'Grail, aged about seventeen, was washed into the cabin and drowned there. The rest of us lived on as best we could. The biscuit gave out on the 5d of January, and after that we had nothing to eat but raw salt meat.

"On Saturday, the 8th of January, John Murray and Samuel Cockran died, after having been crazy for some time. We buried them on Sunday morning, the 9th, just before being taken off the wreck.

"To satisfy our thirst we tore up the deck to get at a cask of fresh water which had been left there, but great was our disappointment when, after two days' labor in getting to it, we found it with the bung out, and filled with salt water. We saw no vessel except the steamship before alluded to, and a craft of some kind that passed near us during a dark night—she could not see us; we only saw her lights—until Sunday, the 9th of January, about noon, the ship Centurion, Captain Cauldkin, from Glasgow to New York, came alongside and picked us up. It was blowing hard, so it had been during all the time of our wreck, and a high sea was running. The mate of the Centurion, with a crew, came alongside in a boat, removed us into it, and carried us on board the ship. This was no easy task, as most of us were unable

LANDING OF THE NEAPOLITAN EXILES AT QUEENSTOWN, IRELAND.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

DESTRUCTION OF ST. PETER'S COLLEGE BY A LANDSLIDE.

ALT, who are familiar with the city of Troy know Mount Ida, the beautiful hill that overlooks it, and which has long been a favorite resort of the town. Since the year 1853 the hill-side has been rapidly encroaching upon the landlubbers—the one occurring in that year having left such terrific marks that, to this day, Troy is looked upon somewhat in the same light as the villager standing at the foot of Vesuvius. In the dim hill-side, some of the occupants of three thousand tons in weight, gave way with a most terrible crash. In a moment stores, houses, and human beings were covered. Many of the latter were overtaken flying. Many were smothered in their beds. The fall occurred early in the morning. The whole city was engaged exhausting the dead and rescuing the living. One woman was found dead in bed with two children in her arms. Another was beat over a stove, half consumed. A man had been sawing wood; the accident struck him before he could drop the saw, which fell under him, and in his struggles to disengage it from under it, he died. Many other equally terrible incidents were connected with it; and under the circumstances it will create no astonishment that the old fear has been somewhat awakened by the late occurrence.

St. Peter's College was dedicated on September 19, 1858, by Bishop M'Closkey, and was intended as one of the handsomest Catholic educational institutions in the country. Up to this time $25,000 have been expended on it. It was 150 feet long by 50 wide, and would have five stories in height. It is situated on a flat surface, about four acres in extent, lying at the entry feet of the base of the hill, and was reached by a broad flight of steps.

The slide occurred on the north side of the hill, an immense mass of the hill moving gradually down until it reached the rear wall of the college. Here, for a moment, it seemed to have the power to gain a new impetus by the accession of a large avalanche. Striking the walls it burst, with a noise that was heard for miles, carrying away the heavy walls and timber like so much paper. The college is a heavy; so much so, that it has been officially announced that a transfer of the site is to take place from Mt. Vincent, Troy, to the old bank of the Pastenkill Creek. It is a matter of some astonishment to those who are familiar with the terrible effect of these slides, that it is announced that St. Peter's College was thus located. The hill is now a very dangerous one, and many of the occupants of the houses in the western part of the city are removing to places of greater safety.

ARRIVAL OF THE NEAPOLITAN EXILES IN IRELAND.

WE gave, in our last number, an account of the arrival of the former Neapolitan exiles in Ireland. It will be remembered that in the ecstasy of their joy, many of them fell on their knees, on landing, and kissed the soil. We give, on the preceding page, an engraving of the touching scene, from a sketch by an eye-witness.

One of the most illustrious of those exiles, Dobo Cairnouchina, has published a brief account of their sufferings, from which we make the following thrilling extracts:

"On beautiful day in February, 1858, the 6th, mysteriously alone were collected from the prisons of Isella, Procida, and Nisida, and suddenly taken to a steamer in the harbor, and there were confined for several days in the utmost at Naples, with irons on their hands and feet, they were then removed to the prisons of Santo Stefano, three of Monte Pasco. Among the fifty who are here at present were the Commendatore Baron Carlo Poerio, the Cavaliere Pica, Vincenzo Doss Stephano Mellico, Cenzo Braico, Nicola Nisco, Nicola Nisco, Gaetano Ricciardi.

"Oh, how the memory of that spot where my groans were lavished that day with terror, and I pray you to pardon with unspeakable horror! It still poisons my joy, even in the midst of the happiness that I feel, and alone the dread of Monte Pasco, with its criminals, with its dungeons, with the dark cells, its unspeakable miseries, namely set with hate, through which, day and night, the freezing wind penetrated, that I might be covered with its terrible isolation, separated from all human intercourse and affection. I there soon was deprived of health and arrived at premature old age, which I brought upon me by the horrible sleepless nights at Monte Pasco, lying on the bare earth, our diabolical guards who were dressed as satisfaction, deprived of books and even materials to write to our families.

"Monte Pasco was for ages the placeshere most fearful troubles of the human race contemplating, and there only left for the gilbert. The horror of those accursed walls so evoked upon the mind, and which fill it with repugnance, and moved the sense of humanity of the country, that although, some time before 1859, by order of the Provincial Council of the Principato Ulra, that fearful dungeon was closed, and the prisoners who were saved every thing, even of the human race, which so horror chained our arms, to each two and two, and upon one of those who seemed a particular dangerous, the chain to us was visited with dreadful penalties. They were tied by mouth and eyes, and dragged to the punishment parish priest. Gangi, in the solemn performance of the duties of his office, standing near to the altar, where the grating gave us its blessing, and instantly they seized this and sent him in a distant dungeon, until in this hour he is settled and persecuted. A nightingale, as if on a solution from Nature, apparently feeling for our sorrows and solitude, used to come to the loophole of a mulberry-tree, and with its plaintive song he expressed our griefs, because we found in our friend, the friend of our very heart, we used to throw to the prison bars to listen to and treasure his melodious plaint. And, feel, he with his tender deity awakened suspicions among the police that we had communication with the exterior by unmeaning, indeed, which they trusted had ended for us. They shouted with their voices, and hurled sticks, but in the evenings the little nightingale came again and again with his song of solace to us, and his sympathy for patriotism brought his doom—he was shot! Whoever was taken to the hospital or medical relief was placed in a stinky bed, a chain which was riveted to his foot was bolted to the floor, which almost fixed the unfortunate patient in a continually unchanged position; death alone freed them from this almost unbearable torture. Many Mollies, one of my most distinguished companions, received a reprieve from this accursed confinement, when he was attacked with typhus fever, but when the convalescence of to-day was abridged on the morrow. Oh, how dreadful was the sight of those days! The sick were ill dead, it is well; if not, replace the fetters." The order was always enforced, even when the unfortunate was dying with a priest at his side, was recommending his soul to God.

"After a time it was allowed us to see our families, but under such conditions that it was a torture, and not a consolation, for they made it a violence and wrong to our affections, and the visits were always made in a most tyrannly short. The mode in which the interviews were held was this: We were led into a room separated from either, and six paces apart, at the grating of which, and between two guards, were we to see, talk together. Oh! The soldiers, guns d'armes, bayonets, and agents of police, were present at the interviews, and were attentive to the words and surest sight of those learned families. Ah! Many were the tears which were suppressed by the sages men, who stopped their discourse at pleasure, and as they could not follow the familiar intercourse, they stood motionless and silent, and were compelled to hear the counsels in these places born testimony to my words. Ah! Many were the scene! Every time that my poor Staglione came from the extreme of Calabria to visit to me, he was always followed by two of the gendarmes who was almost passed, until they lost their only to interchange a few words. Ah! Many were the scene! Imagine her—her that she should leave. She had not the heart to leave me, and I had not the courage to send her away. I declined neither prayed that at least as amends for her life to her disappointment, she might be allowed to live with her longer the hard of her child; and to pass it through the hands of the hard jailers, and to see the tenderness of agents of the police cried out that it was treachery, and the poor mother and wife was driven away with violence and from each other's longing eyes, although if her arm was extended through the grating to embrace me, and once before she could reach him. They adopted every expedient to secure the ties of blood.

"I was the unfortunate companion of our cruel Governor's sons. The decree of the 27th December condemned to life 21 Neapolitans, and I was one of the number. My youth was broken down in strength, and his limbs so paralyzed that he can only work with a cruch. The very persons who were plotting him on board the Stromboli were so avoid at his misfortune, that, at their own pain, they carried him back to shore. Lambert, for a long time, was confined in a dungeon of Nisida, completely shattered in health. Bonne is over 70 years of age, and deserves the more to be treated with respect and confidence in oneure prisons. Poerinos are dead, and among them the most noble of all, Settembrini, who, although his health not satisfied with perpetrating injuries to the living, has also violated the last memory of the dead by inciting their names in this decree."

LITERARY.

MANY readers will recall with pleasure the Polynesian Researches of Rev. Mr. Ellis—a book of extraordinary and deserved popularity in former years. It is a great pleasure to welcome a new work from the same author. It is called MADAGASCAR REVISITED, and has for its subtitle DESCRIPTIVE VIEWS TO MADAGASCAR, published by Harper & Brothers, is a fine octavo volume, with numerous engravings and a colored map. Since the last visit of the author to Madagascar, in 1835, the island has undergone many changes, and the explorers were not allowed to visit the interior. They returned to Mauritius, and no attempt was made to penetrate the country. Large sums and dollars damages claimed by the Queen of Madagascar was paid by Mauritius merchants; the Queen died, Radama reigned, and Mr. Ellis was enabled to visit the country and remain there for some time, renewing thereby acquaintance with many of the people and their institutions. The work is not second even to Livingstone in novelty and interest. It is not just that Madagascar will be so great a subject of interest to Americans, but it is a fascinating study of the island surprises those who have not considered it. Mr. Ellis says it equals all of Great Britain and Ireland. It is fruitful and productive. The inhabitants are not savages, but are, in fact, far advanced in civilization. They are intelligent, industrious intelligent, and not to be despised. The Queen is violently opposed to Christians, while the Prince is a firm friend of Christians. Among the Princes, which Mr. Ellis took with photographic accuracy, there was a Mohammedan, who had a fine bearing, and on his arm a dark but not disagreeable-looking lady. There is a princess, an adopted daughter of the Queen, who is a Christian, and who, pretty, though strongly Malay in cast.

THE WAYS AND MEANS OF PAYMENT, by Stephen Colwell, published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., is a book which should be studied by those who use money in commerce. We do not think the second title of the book, "A Full Analysis of the Credit System," is precisely descriptive of the work, which contains a critical history of the growth of that system, and of the aids to commercial transactions which have been invented in different periods and nations. It demands a more extensive notice than our limits permit, and we can but hint at its contents. Taking up the 13th chapter, we find a history of BANKS OF DEPOSIT, including bills, 112 in its growth and changes from that time. Chapter 14 gives us the Bank of Genoa; Chapter 15, most attractive to American merchants, yet by no means most valuable, gives us the origin, rise, and progress of the Bank of England; and other chapters discuss the introduction of various forms of exchange and paper into the commerce of the world. The value of gold and silver, the changes in their value, their place in trade, and their relative positions in commerce form a considerable portion of the treatise; which is, on the whole, an important addition to the literature of every mercantile and financial economist.

HARPER & CO., of Boston, send us THE LIFE OF JOHN H. W. HAVENS, the great temperance reformer, compiled by his son.

THE Duchess of Hutchinson we have MATRIMONIAL BROKERAGE, a volume of New York inquiry and society, by the CAPTAIN, a VOICE of New York civilization.

THEOSILIAN AND HIS FRIENDS is Dr. Shelton MacKenzie's contribution to Methodist history. The book is a collection of brilliant tales, readable any where and every where, many of which are models in the polished scholarship of their well-known author. In passing, let us beg Dr. Mackenzie not to think that there are two Paul Jones's in history. He is a problem. It is but a trifling remark that he makes on page 40, and we speak in order to don't like it, but a false impression given on a subject of so much religious historic interest.

THE Illustrated Library of Country Life, from Derby & Jackson, are delicate and judicious pictures. What could be better?

Rudd & Carleton publish ERIC, or LITTLE BY LITTLE, a tale of English school life; and SISTER'S SACRIFICE, by Mrs. Mary J. Holmes.

THE SERIOUS'S DAUGHTER, CASTLE DAGGERS, and THE BLACKSMITH'S DAUGHTER form the latest issues of Tichnor & Fields's Household Waverley, now complete; and we congratulate the publishers and the public on the completion of a work which is an opportunity to refer to the entire edition more at length hereafter. We cannot refrain from saying that the remaining readers of the abundant praise we have given it during the two years of its publication.

We have had occasion to refer for some time a new volume from the press of James Challen & Son, Philadelphia, LITURGIES, EAST AND WEST, by Rev. Henry S. Osborn. The volume is a wonder of typography, exquisitely gotten up and printed. The work is a contribution to the appearance of the book attractive. Professor Osborn and his Dr. Challen & Son have done their work in the outline of his journeying to and around Jerusalem. He does not profess to make discoveries, but gathers from the works which have been accumulated him to use in illustrating Bible history. He that we have received a valuable and valuable contribution to our knowledge of modern and ancient Palestine. Every traveler who visits the sacred soil will find this book a valuable guide, and to the confirmation of the Christian faith. Our author is, perhaps, more than usually reverent in this respect. His work is not to be compared or contrasted with DR. THOMSON'S LAND AND THE BOOK, but it is a valuable and full work. Professor Osborn gives the result of a lifetime passed in comparing the land with the record of its ancient history in the original languages. The illustrations of the engraving traveler, impressed at every step with the truth of the Scriptures, are from Dr. Thomson. The work abounds in evidences of the extensive familiarity of the author with Oriental literatures and history. He writes freely, frankly, and without fear.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

DEATH OF PETER'S PEAK.

MR. WILLIAM H. BRADLEY, of the Denver City, has brought to Leadwood's 2-0 worth of gold dust, which he dug in a single week from Peter's Peak. Mr. Bradley and Curtis, who left February 16, tells the editor of the Denver Tribune that they washed out from the walls from five to eight dollars a day during the summer, and that they have now struck a vein which is yielding from $20 to $30 per day. Among the miners are Gregg, Dry Creek, Platte River, and Vasquez Park.

The discovery of gold in Peter's Peak, and the stimulus at the mines are satisfied with their prospects, and the Tribune says that great discoveries will be made in the mountains.

THE WILLIAM A. WHEELER APPOINTMENT.

We read in the Savannah News: "Some of our citizens on the railroad yesterday had the pleasure of witnessing in our streets of a beau fils live African, who occupied a seat in the Congress of the United States. A fine and second equally delighted with the ride and the attention he received from the crowd. He was not exactly clothed in a savage manner, but still raised to intelligence above the brute, and in the eyes of the law was a citizen and a taciturn or sense of duty. Judge, then, of their surprise and delight at the genius of our free institutions, when he gave a bright, intelligent-looking boy, somewhat shabbily dressed, a seat in the Congress of the United States and unopposed, taking off his hat with true African politeness to the crowd. Such is the fact, and we have the pleasure of introducing to our readers the young gentleman in question. He seemed much attached to 'Mass' Charley, as he called him, and was very much pleased with the ride to Isaac, among others Mr. Collector Bacon, to whom he paid a little visit. Success and happiness to Isaac."

SALE OF BARTON KEY'S EFFECTS.

The administrator's sale of the furniture and household effects of the late Barton Key was commenced at Washington on Tuesday, and will be continued during the auctioneers. The first day that at the house, and the auctioneer's rooms were crowded with people. The furniture, though more plainly furnished than was anticipated, especially in the matter of carpets, was of a very good class, and rooms, however, made amends in the solid mahogany furniture.

Mr. Key's chamber, fronting on C street, was furnished with a large mahogany bedstead, with a high canopy top, and the walls adorned with a single print—Fanny Elssler.

In the dancher above this, a common group were exhibiting the contents of a small chest which held the military regalia and equipments of the deceased—a pair of old-fashioned brass horse-pistols, a handsome sword, and an a heavy shelf a hat-box, containing the military, inscribed "Montgomery Guards" cap worn by him when a member of that company. The cap was of black felt, and about a fine size, with barrel sights.

The dining-room adjoining was attracted to a beautiful mirrorwork brown, some five feet in height, and a high, with its top gross sliced, carpeted room, and curtained and glazed windows, must have been the reveal and delight of the children for whom it was procured.

COLLISION ON THE OHIO.

A collision occurred on the Ohio River on Sunday night, between the steamers Nat Holmes and David Gibson, by which a shocking loss of life was occasioned. The Nat Holmes was bound from Pittsburgh to St. Louis, with one hundred and fifty passengers, principally emigrants for Platte Park, in Kansas. David Gibson was bound from New Orleans to Cincinnati, with but few passengers. The boats struck each other between Madison, Indiana, and both boats immediately sank. At least 40 lives are known to have been lost, and it is feared that 60 lives, and one account puts the number still higher.

THE MOUNT SOLITUDE (CINCINNATI) TUNNEL.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Times says a stupendous happened in the English Church in Pittsburg Valley, on Wednesday night, March 19, 1879. It is the largest probably one of "the three thousand," from a neighboring town was present, and I will not attempt to describe his text, he had not gone far when he said to the assembly, "I am not a temperance man, I am a prohibitionist of abolitionist or republicanism; but I must serve my God." Then he said, "I am not a temperance man, I am a prohibitionist, and I will serve my God." His expression you have read and said, "Shall not?" His expression you have read and said, "Shall not?" His expression you have read and said, "Shall not?"

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE REFORM BILL.

In the House of Commons Mr. Roebuck suggested to Lord John Russell the expediency of allowing his proposed amendment to the Reform Bill into a series of resolutions, as in the case of the India Bill last year. He stated that the adoption of the amendment would put an end to the necessity of long debates and useless motions to office three times the House last year drove out. Lord John Russell said he was hoped to satisfy us that there was no right in thinking his resolution an objection to the bill. The bill was to come up for its second reading on the 31st March.

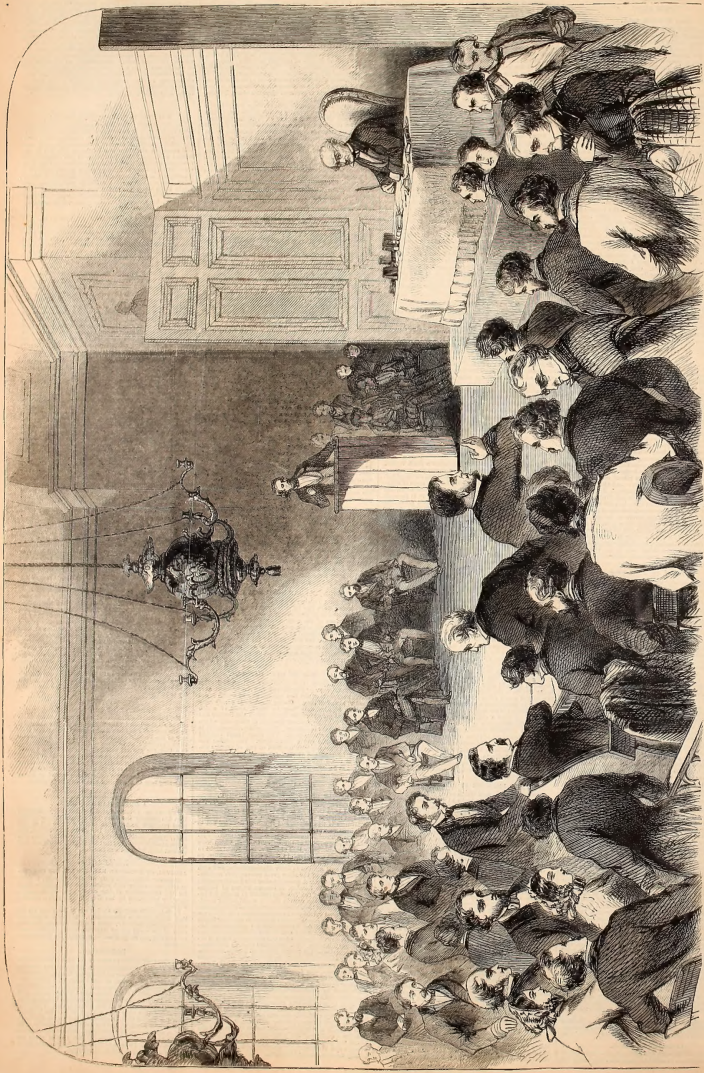
The Reform measure continued to be actively canvassed in England. Lord Grey, one of the leaders in the Whig party, had written a letter strongly objecting to Lord John Russell's reform proposition, and declaring that there was as far as to say that Ministers contemplated the withdrawal of the bill, which would probably be followed by more than consent to some important modifications. Another Sunday demonstration took place in Hyde Park, in opposition to the bill. The London Herald (ministerial) says that the Duke of Norfolk is stating that in case Lord John Russell should succeed in carrying the bill, and he called upon to form a cabinet, he will give the Queen the names of Messrs. Bright, Cobden, Ayrton, Roebuck, and Horsman—a combination calculating instead of startling.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

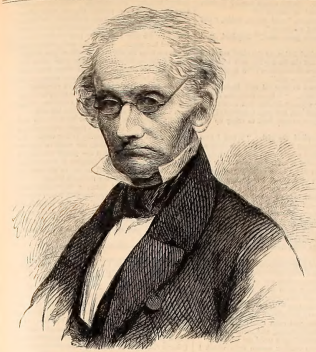
The London Times has an article on the present state of the Atlantic telegraph enterprise. It says that the leading submarine cable-makers are now willing to contract for the successful submersion of a cable on the following all the risk of loss or damage upon themselves, in regard to the refusal of the Government to which the enterprise is to be confined to such course by the fact of no other Government having been applied to, and the proposing to lay cables between the British Islands and the Governments at all. One of these Companies, we are told, is now ready to commence operations with the object in view at its own risk and expense, without troubling the Government in any way. The principle offer of a conditional guarantee of eight per cent is said to be connected with it, provided the Government of the rough Company shall give up the monopoly granted to them for fifty years for landing the cable. Should this monopoly the Atlantic Company had, to a certain extent, consented to abandon, it is not at present supposed by Government are not definitely known, but they were still under consideration by the Ministry.

ARRIVAL OF THE NAPOLITAN EXILES IN ENGLAND.

A British Journal says: "The Neapolitan refugees have arrived and are now at Southampton. Their former proprietors were made to give them a hearty welcome. As the steamer Stromboli, with the unfortunate refugees inscribed with the word 'Welcome' over bold and, and the Union Jack flying from the mast-head, steamed up, cheers were delivering. But little disappointment seemed to be felt when it was discovered that the leader of the escaped exiles was on board. Signor Baracchi was observed enthusiastically to wave his hat and to run towards general round him, trying to shake his hand and express to him the warmest sympathy. Signor Settembrini was introduced one word of the English language, but he expressed his thanks in the most touching terms in his native tongue. Several of the refugees had been provided for him, but no sooner had it entered it made a rush for the shore, and some fifty or sixty volunteers placed themselves between the poor exiles and their friends. Some of the latter, more tenderhearted, drew the Signor through the principal streets cheers of which were received with the greatest delight by the refugees



THE TRIAL OF THE HON. DANIEL E. SICKLES FOR THE MURDER OF P. BARTON KEY, ESQ., AT WASHINGTON, D. C.



JUDGE CRAWFORD.—[From a Photograph by Brady.]

DISTRICT ATTORNEY OULD.—[From a Photograph by Brady.]

THE TRIAL OF HON. DANIEL E. SICKLES.

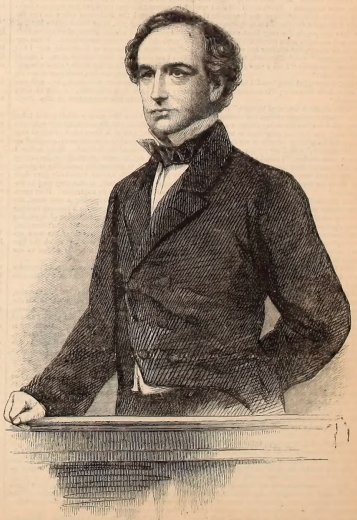
The accompanying illustrations, for the fidelity of which the well-known accuracy of the photographer Brady will vouch, will enable our country readers to realize the great trial which is now pending at Washington. Considering every thing, the nature of the charge, the standing of the prisoner and the deceased, and the circumstances generally, the case will undoubtedly be the most striking of American causes cel-ebres.

We give in another part of this paper an elaborate review of Mr. Sickles's career, prepared by a friendly hand. It must not be forgotten that Mr. Key, too, had a history. He had advantages of birth over Mr. Sickles, and in the Washington and Baltimore circles in which he moved he occupied an enviable position, as popular with men as with women, and universally esteemed a man of high honor, chivalrous disposition, gentle bearing, and generous soul. Since the fatal catastrophe which deprived him of the power of defending himself, numerous stories to his prejudice have been current in the papers. He has been accused of inordinate vanity, and a habit of lately boasting of his successes among women. We believe that, on investigation, these charges will prove to be base inventions, circulated by some overzealous and unscrupulous friend of Mr. Sickles, in the mean hope of influencing the jury. That the deceased had his faults—God help him!—the miserable event which has led to these illustrations proves but too clearly. Still let us not exaggerate even his sins.

The trial now pending will, in all probability, form a valuable precedent for our courts. It is being closely watched by the whole people—especially by that part of them who are not in the habit of restraining their passions within the limits of law and morality.

THE CITY HALL AT WASHINGTON, IN WHICH THE TRIAL TAKES PLACE.

MRS. SICKLES.—[From a Photograph by Brady.]



THE WITNESS BUTTERWORTH.—[From a Photograph by Brady.]

BARGAIN-HUNTING.

MR. WARREN and his niece Marion had been waiting in the drawing-room for the arrival of his sister-in-law and her three daughters for more than an hour, and the old gentleman was getting impatient for his tea. He had been invigilged up to town at least three weeks before his presence would be necessary at the wedding of one of those young ladies; and though, during all that time, he had been subjected to their endless colloquies about "shopping," and their triumphant pains over their "bargains," the evanescence was by no means complete yet.

In that late autumn evening the female fury were still chequered in silks and muslins in the accustomed manner.

It was not the present inconvenience, however, which, to the lion justice, was troubling Mr. Warren, so much as his reflections upon the system which the ladies were then thought fully pursuing. He could not now forbear giving Marion his opinion upon the matter, although, in consideration for the happy event which was in such close prospect, he had hitherto spared his niece.

"I can recollect the time," said he, "when people paid for the quality of what they bought; but now, when the world goes so fast, the people are all changeons, and we hear people boasting of their bargains, forgetting the many who, in consequence, are half-clad and hungry; and when they see much health gone, what has it to look to? Think of the department-stores conducted by female chiefs! Inform me: think of the numbers of young females who annually lose, many their sight, and many their lives, while working into the night and morning in the millinery and dress-making establishments of our country."

"Yet what can be done, uncle?" inquired Marion. "What can be done? What can I do? I have no influence. I can do nothing to help."

At this moment a loud ring at the door-bell announced the return of the carriage with the fair visitors. Again of a few moments they were all gathered round the tea-table, and the business of tea was commenced.

"And now for the news," said Lucy; "we have done a great deal this evening; and, to confess, I think it is only fair that Aunt Mary and Marion, left at home to amuse themselves, should partake in our exertions."

"I really think we have a right to know them," said Aunt Mary, benevolently.

"The explanation, then, is this," replied Lucy, in a low tone, "that we were all bent upon going, where we were not to tell; and that we have done her part of the day, to one of those extraordinary shops where one gets things almost for nothing, and where, I suppose, in a few years, a pressman will be offered to any lady who will be so kind as to lend and oblige" to accept of their articles—"

"We certainly have made some extraordinary purchases," said Aunt Mary, smiling at the word "such bargains I never saw!" and she proceeded to enumerate various little fancy articles.

"And the dress," continued Ella, "they certainly were bargains. Flushington told us we should not get them anywhere else for double the money; because he deals with a manufactory where they give the people the very least return for their work, and employ a great number. They are industrious, to be sure, but are they not very lively?"

"Stop, stop!" cried Aunt Mary, hastily, and unscrewing the cloth; "I am a yard short, and here is a great hole!"

"Oh! never mind that," said Lucy, as though she enjoyed the discovery; "it was cheap, and that is enough."

"Well, we shall not mind it, then," continued Julia; "there is enough without us wearing yard-long bones; we have learned many things we did not much want, just because they were so temptingly cheap; but the great bargain by far was the shawl."

"The mittens," said Lucy; "yes, certainly the mittens were wonders. I bought plenty for a couple, and sometimes some weeks ago, to make a pair for myself, and here we have got mittens beautiful enough to walk for actually, that I paid for the materials."

Here Elizabeth placed upon the table a bundle of beautifully finished black lace mittens.

"They are all hand-wrought," said Aunt Mary, taking up one of them; "and are singularly cheap as much time must have been spent upon them."

"Yes," said Lucy, "I know that from experience; mine go on at a snail's pace. I would not make a pair for any one under three times the sum we paid for these. We were just leaving the shop when we observed them, and I prized one pair, which was not more than half done, and bought the materials; but we had already bought so many things that we thought we might get them still cheaper; so we left Flushington to wait for the parcels, provided we took the whole parcel of them—there are so many of us, we shall soon get over it—and after some deliberation he gave us them and certainly they are bargains."

"Wonderful bargains!" repeated the other two sisters.

"But we have not done yet, Julia; the dress for Mrs. Philips—you must not forget that."

"Oh! I do not forget it," said Julia. "We bought a shawl, which I am to wear on Monday evening, Marion."

"On Monday evening!" repeated Marion—"and this is Saturday night; surely it can not be made so quickly, and with all the bustle-trimmings you wish."

"Oh yes, we have managed that too! We went to Mrs. Primrose and told her it must be done—in short, that it was indispensable. At first she said it was impossible; but after hinting about further orders she said it should be done."

"Bustle-trimmings and all," added Elizabeth; "for I heard her whisper to her forewoman to tell a young person—who, I know, is her best worker in bustles—that she could not get away that evening; so I am sure it will be done, and well done, too."

"And now, uncle," said Lucy, "now that our narrative is over, have we not been most actively and most creditably employed?"

There was no answer from Mr. Warren for a few seconds, during which time the quick-sighted Marion discovered that his cogitations were not of a pleasant nature.

"Lucy," he at length said, "do you with a candid answer to your question? for if so, I am sorry that I have given it a moment's consideration at all, in the midst of so much hilarity, and so many pleasing anticipations, I feel grieved to say any thing that may damp your spirits; but when I remember that Julia is about to take her place as a matron, I can not refrain from speaking openly upon the subject."

"Julia, my uncle," continued the old man, affectionately, taking her hand, "you are about to become the wife of a very noble young man. I am glad it is at your option to-night to say that you are quick-sighted, and his heart is too generous, not to have been wounded by the recital of your economical transactions. But you have come to Marion and I were talking of the sad state of thousands of our fellow-creatures, and how long and weary hours in an atmosphere fatal to health; while thousands of their more enlightened and highly-favored brothers and sisters, knowing all this, in the frantic struggle for cheapness, do all in their power to add them still lower in the appreciation of life; while, while it often kills the body, oftener slays the soul. In every department, go where we will, we find the poor compensated at a rate which renders the work or very low wages. I do not mean to distinguish Flushington's establishment, for it is nothing of him; but I know that many shops are opened by young men who begin by advertising that they will undersell their neighbors, and many of such people have two prices. The bargain-hunter enters one, and finds the goods cheap; and that either he must sell his goods under their value or lose his customer; consequently he is tempted to compromise the rights of his employer or some other person, or by reducing still further the already miserably-reduced ratios of many hand-labor connected with his business.

"These things are crying sins, and they are unusual sins; but I would fain think of the influence they possess in all shopping transactions when they come to be considered, and thus become encouragers of fraud and cruelty. I consider it the duty of every lady to endeavor to acquire correct ideas of the value of the articles she purchases, more especially under her own inspection. Make it a rule never to purchase any thing without knowing its real value. If a tradesman offer you a piece of goods which you are quite convinced is under its worth, reject it. Say to him that you can not, if it is offered you by a poor vendor in evident distress; take, if you like the bargain."

"No example could more fully suit me at present than that painful affair of the black lace mittens. Lucy could not possibly be aware of the value of the materials and the labor of the work. They were offered to her at a price which left much too cheaply to repay the waste of some poor fellow-creature's eyes; and yet you were not satisfied, but from the mere consideration of the possible risk of offending you, or of bleeding the heart of some poor creature to an extent of which she never dreamt, and which we can never know. When any of you come to visit me at Rockwood, may I beg that I may not see a single article of dress, or any thing else, but I may have the words 'hand-wrought' engraved upon me, and that some poor unconscious woman, in consequence, not worsping in a cold garret; but I have done with this. I wish to say a few words about the entertainment at Mrs. Primrose's.

"We all know the great mortality that takes place annually in the dress-making and millinery departments; and it is likewise to be feared that there is considerable loss of human existence among the secret hours of the Sabbath. Many ladies, I am glad to say, are now endeavoring to put a stop to these occurrences, to prevent the possibility of giving any pretext for the system, invariably give their servants the Sunday to rest, and attend church, established with ease before its expiration. If an emergency can undoubtedly, requiring a more time, the considerate lady will never for a moment hesitate between the convenient gratification of appearing in a new dress and the possible necessity of causing to fagl her vanity, a fellow-sister has been oppressed and deprived of the rest given to the Eye which looks upon all impartially wishes to see man universally enjoying."

Here the old man entered the room, whispered a few words to Aunt Mary, which broke off the conversation.

"Helen Campbell," said Aunt Mary, in surprise, "is she below? Yes, I will see her. Tilda's in bed, Marion, I shall she, perhaps, excuse me, seeing," about whom I wished to interest you; I should like your opinion of her. Poor Helen! poor Mary is simply this: She is the support of an aged mother, who has once seen better days, and is now in extreme poverty and ill health. I will be down directly."

"Perhaps," said Mr. Warren, "the sight of so many new stuffs here"—but there was no time to finish the sentence, for she immediately opened, and Helen Campbell, a slight, delicate, gentle-looking young girl, with a pale complexion, entered the room and anxious expression with which one might enter a crowded room, and yet was not in search of any one, the mind and thoughts being concentrated elsewhere.

"My poor Helen," said Aunt Mary, kindly, taking her hand, and placing her on a chair, "I fear you have bad news; is your mother worse to-night?"

"Oh yes," said the poor girl, as the tears began to chase each other down her thin cheeks. "She is greatly worse, and they tell me she is going that she can not live over."

"Who are they?" inquired Aunt Mary, anxiously.

"When I saw her in the beginning of the week she seemed better. In her cough worse? is there any new symptom? or what is it?"

"No new symptom," said Helen, sadly, "but weakness, dreadful weakness."

"Is her appetite gone, Helen?" inquired Aunt Mary.

"No, no!" replied Helen, as the blood mounted to her forehead, and she hid her lip, as if trying to maintain a measure of composure; "it is not gone, but she—has nothing to eat."

"I am distressed to hear all this, Helen," interrupted Aunt Mary; "I have not seen you for some days past, thinking you were not in need. When I saw you last you expected plenty of money to buy wine and food to bring up her strength."

"So I did," replied the girl. "When I saw you I was full of good hopes, but they are all gone now. I had worked nearly night and day for three days, and received great remuneration for my work. Day after day I have called for payment, and have always been put off, and when at last I entreated for some money to-night, Flushington told me he has been obliged to sell the things for considerably less than cost, and that he can pay me by and by."

"Flushington!" said Aunt Mary, much amazed, and taking up one of the bargain-gloves which still lay upon the table, "are these your work, Helen?" she said.

"Oh yes," said poor Helen, clasping the mitten in both hands, and bursting into tears; "on which I built so many hopes—food and wine, and life, and comfort, and, oh! my neighbors, who have all with every new row, and all is gone!"

Julia crossed the room with both hands, and her sisters became very thoughtful. Aunt Mary rose and poked the fire, and even Uncle Warren took out his pocket-book and wrote a few lines in pencil—a note that poor Helen's sobs could not be heard.

"But there must be some mistake, my child; I thought you were to get money, Helen—your sister?"

"Yes, yes," replied Helen, "so I thought; she was to have been home to-night with her earnings, and I was expecting her every moment; but she did not come, and on going for her to Mrs. Primrose's I was told at the door that I could not see her—that she could not leave the room—that she was busy again with more bagle-brimmings—that she could be home in an hour. I am afraid that she now works in finished, which must be by Monday evening."

Aunt Mary again poked the fire, and Julia, uttering a faint cry, sunk her still-covered face upon the table.

"Oh, ma'am, forgive me," said Helen, suddenly starting to her feet; "forgive me that once more I take you the history of my poor mother's ills, and she is starving."

In a moment Mr. Warren's hand was on the bell. "Get a coach instantly," said he to the servant who appeared; "and, Mrs. Warren, get me and your niece's bonnets, for we will both go with this poor girl. Julia, get your cloak and bonnet. I will go with you, Helen."

"Sir," said Helen earnestly, "may I ask you to take out the wine? Mother is expecting it, there may be no delay when we arrive—there is no nerve near us, and she has so longed for wine!"

This took place in Mrs. Julia, and Helen Campbell were soon on their way.

"I have a very alarm your mother at this hour," said Mr. Warren.

"Oh no, Sir," replied Helen; "the door we enter by is at the back, and as to the room, which she filled with wine, and hastened to refresh her by some of those for whom we have been labouring. Oh, how I wish we were there!"

The way was long, however; but in due time the coach stopped at the entrance to a dirty passage, and down a narrow stair, they found themselves in a low and miserable looking room. Mr. Warren seated Julia along with himself on two wooden stools, while Helen, rushing in with the basket, took from it the wine, and some cups, which she filled with wine, and hastened to refresh the lady whose form they saw on a miserable bed. Mr. Warren's view. It was with delight that Mr. Warren witnessed what had so often before melted his heart—the influence of wine upon the poor. Several wretched-looking women, hard worked and worn out, had kept up the woman's heart within them, stood around the sick bed; and as Helen approached with the little broken cup and the wine, one of them with the utmost tenderness, laying her hand gently on her arm, said, kindly:

"Miss, Miss, she's past that now; she'll never pass mair o' the fruit o' the vine in this world."

"Wine!" cried another woman—"it's wine?—and she was not for any thing else!"

"Dear mother," said Helen, fondly bending over her, "you must take it—it will soon revive you; and see!" said she, holding up the basket, "here is bread and sago, and many things to make you well."

"Was a me!" said one of the women; "and her that's had anething but could water and crusts this day."

"Dear mother," continued Helen, "will you not drink? It will revive you, and I am sure it will make you live."

There was no answer. The poor widow's sorrows were over.

Taking one of the women aside, Mr. Warren put a guinea into her hand, desiring her to un it as she thought best for poor Helen's comfort, when he should see again on the morrow. He then took Julia out of the room, kindly leading her through the dark passage up the narrow stair, after which she hurried to the carriage, into a corner of which she sunk overcome by a flood of tears.

Some time passed, during which he did not distant. At length, taking her hand, "My dear Julia," he said, "it is enough. This evening has been one of the most painful of your history unchequered life. We shall say no more of the earlier transactions of the evening, but will now only consider how we may best assist poor Helen Campbell and her sister. But suffer one parting word of advice from an old man who loves you dearly. Do not too easily dismiss from your mind the events of this night. Think of them often, and place them before you; and by their example act in your future life, and you will be rewarded by finding daily you are thereby becoming a fit companion of the generous and excellent young man who has chosen you for his bride. Julia, my child, will you promise me this?"

Julia's only reply was another flood of tears, and a silent pressure of her uncle's hand, as the carriage stopped at the door in which he has lived so long. Instantly smoking her desk, she wrote a note to Mrs. Primrose, saying that she could not require her dress on Monday, and begging as a particular favor that Miss Campbell might be allowed immediately to return to her mother's house.

The short interval between that memorable evening and the long-expected 25th found Julia occupied in comforting and consoling the sorrowing sisters, who now only remember it as the night on which they were made happy. The 25th is now past, and the young bride has become a matron.

WHAT I WENT THROUGH TO GET HER.

SIR is miss at last. No more doubts, no more fears, no more inexplicable eccentric relations! She is mine, body and soul, and I am content. I will let them thousand settled upon her), mine. It is my fortune that she is now mine, and such a time about tying on her head. Well may I triumph; neither Jason in pursuit of the Golden Fleece—myth epitomizing a rich fancy—nor Ulysses in the odyssey-like adventurer felt remarkably stronger—but Aladdin, now the hero of your own (I flatter myself) love-tale, ever went through a more trying ordeal than I. But let me calm these transports, that I may relate, in a more methodical manner, what difficulties I had to surmount antecedent to the happy union of Miss Sarah Potts with me.

When I heard that Miss Sarah Potts was likely to inherit the property of her paternal uncle, Colonel Sir George Potts, of the Bengal Artillery (the adventurer felt remarkably stronger—but Aladdin, now the hero of your own (I flatter myself) love-tale, ever went through a more trying ordeal than I. But let me calm these transports, that I may relate, in a more methodical manner, what difficulties I had to surmount antecedent to the happy union of Miss Sarah Potts with me.

When I heard that Miss Sarah Potts was likely to inherit the property of her paternal uncle, Colonel Sir George Potts, of the Bengal Artillery (the adventurer felt remarkably strongly supposed, I will just finish a little pressing matter I was engaged upon when you came in, and my time shall not be long."

He left the room by the outer door, and presently after I heard that of the next room open and shut, and then voices.

"Which—which—shall—wish—shish."

"Well, my dear, what the dickens am I to say?"

"Hush—sh—sh—sh—sh! Which—shish—shish."

"Wurrawurrawurrar, 'e'ic, etc.

The Colonel had got his other commanding-officer voice. In about ten minutes he came back.

"Pardon me," he said, "for keeping you waiting so long. Now for this matter we were speaking of. First, let me explain to you how far my authority extends over my wife. Of course, of course, many ideas she places; but if I did not approve of such a match I should not consider myself bound to do any thing for her; if, on the other hand, I and—and Mrs. Potts—were pleased with her choice, she would consider me as her father, and at present occupies in my will, and I should pay down as her marriage-portion—"

The voice went on, but what it uttered was inaudible to my mind for the next five minutes. So was my consented joy so far exceeded my expectations that I was left, bewildered, breathless with anxiety at the terrible idea of losing my dearest friend: never had my imagination painted her charms in such glowing colours.

"And now," the Colonel was saying when I had somewhat recovered, "I should like to see you a few privations. It is my duty, as a parent, to depreciate the advantages of birth and blood, to use they are of vital importance. I consider that there is as much difference between a gentleman and a plebeian as between a race-horse and a donkey. I should like to hear a few details about your family."

While I was yet descanting on the merits of my forefathers a dark object, which I could not identify the skin of the door, was suddenly launched, the sustaining forward impetus of the projectile, and, being a singular coincidence, Lady Potts immediately afterward entered the room. She was a tall, stout woman, with a florid complexion, piercing, muddy green eyes, sallow complexion, and lean forehead. She was dressed in a dark-coloured silk gown, wonderful black hair, a small lace cap, and chains, rings, and bracelets costly enough to make a gamester howl at the sight. I think she never ventured out on foot after dusk. Her age was about—Whither are you hurrying me, pen incorrect?—

It was very hard work, but I at length succeeded in making a favorable impression on Lady Potts. Potts made a sign to her, who, being well trained, immediately took up the cue.

"Well," said he, "to return to the matter you have called here to speak about. We must know a little more of you before I can consent to your proposals."

We leave this the day after to-morrow, and return to Norfolk, to be in time for the hunting in winter. Can you shoot and help me to murder the partridges. Are you a good shot?"

I left the house thinking I was not trembling. I had secured a footing, and a good one; but what a trial was before me! An examination as to my deadshooting gear put in order, and extensive purchases of clothes, and assorted the Montgomery Park, Norfolk, and Bartholomew's Eve (partridge poisoning).

The coach put me down at a small inn called the "Montgomery Arms," where I found a dog-cart waiting for me, and then I had a three-mile drive through the Potts estates.

The Hall was a handsome building of white stone. As the footman and a dashing "buttons" was playing a tune on a bugle; and before I had time to wonder at a servant being allowed to eat, while his mouth was full of a bugle, I found myself necessarily among the whole household, the most curious and pamelliated of which came up to me, and said, "The Colonel has given orders, Sir, that you are to go to your room at once; that is the drawing-room; that you are to dress, and you will come down into the drawing-room." And he subsided on my heels into a respectful attitude of attention, whither my luggage had preceded me.

I dressed myself as fast as I could, in hopes of getting a word with Potts before dinner; and the dearest girl anticipated my wish, for, on opening the drawing-room door, I saw her there alone.

Time was precious, the one minute devoted to rapture long over, I said, "Adored one, can you give me a hint?"

"Yes," she made a favorable impression at Scarborough, and will easily get on; at least, I always do. They both spoil me. Never mind a few roughnesses, they mean nothing. Potts is the dearest, most lovable, kindest of women, so long as she has her own way and is not contradicted. She is rather a bigot; so you had better put your liberalism to your pocket. And she thinks a good deal of her family—a Miss Montgomery, and brought into estate in order."

"Ah! and Sir George?"

"Well, you must be very good, and keep your temper. Uncle is a dear, dear man, but rather inclined to order people about. He is very generous, so he likes to rule others. His temper is sometimes—but, violent as it is, it never comes round if not opposed, and then he tries to atone for what he has said or done while angry. Oh! I almost forget: above all things, be very punctual; if you are ever late for breakfast or dinner I will not answer for the consequences. And is there any thing else? Yes: if you could take snuff it would please him. There goes the bugle!" And to the tune of "Oh the Roast Beef of Old England" Sir George and Lady Potts entered the room.

"Welcome, Mr. Pans, to Montgomery Hall," said the lady, graciously according me her hand.

"How do do? Glad to see you," said the Colonel. "Ready for the birds to-morrow? Have a pinch?"

Mindful of the final hint I had received from Sarah, I accepted the offer, and tried to drop the snuff while pretending, with much noise and apparent enjoyment, to draw it up into my nose; but a few grains more volatile than the rest insisted on making their escape, and I found it necessary to blow that organ.

"Nice article, that, my dear, don't you think? Nith, nith! What can it be? Why, it is your handkerchief! It's musk! Young man, you are offensive! Come with me," said Sir George.

I am not over-patient by nature, and felt all the blood in my body fly to my face at this insult; but I thought of the dinner I was playing for, swallowed my anger, and followed him.

"There, there, my boy!" John, take that handkerchief away," said he, when we had reached the hall. "This way, Mr. Pans." And he led me into his study, opened a cabinet, washing basin poured water into the basin, and said, pointing to it, "Wash!"

I obeyed him, and we returned to the drawing-room.

"My lady is served," the butler presently announced; and as he did not speak literally—in which case we should have had a tough and scraggy dinner—but metaphorically, I offered my arm.

"John," said Lady Potts to the footman who brought her soup, "is Flora well enough to come down?"

"No, my lady. Susan has been trying to get her to eat something all day, but the smell of food makes her sick at once."

"Oh! the poor suffering darling! Oh! the sweet pet! I must go to her after all."

"I hope she will!" I mentally ejaculated, for a horrible suspicion flashed across my mind. What if the dog was not to be allowed to sleep with child, destined to cause the dislocation of the principal facial accessories of the dog-fancier? Dreadful thought, which I drowned in a glass of Champagne.

The hosts grew almost good-tempered under the influence of good cookery and generous wine. Sir George condescended to tell me that he was prepared to scent arose from the disguet he had acquired for musk-cats in Sarawhat Island; and Lady Potts gave me a graphic account of my predecessor's mistake of the sagacity of a favorite cat she had once had; whereupon Sir George, with unconvincing ingenuousness relating to that woefully misunderstood animal which shall not be confided to an undeserving public, broke up in the middle of a melodious tenor with a most of truthfulness.

I could not manage to enjoy much conversation with my beloved Sarah, but consoled myself with the reflection that, if all went well, I should get uninterrupted intercourse as I turned. But could Circumstances do did not?

When the ladies had withdrawn, the Colonel confessed himself in an easy-chair, and began pumping me in an obvious manner that I had no distrust of his designs. I was not sufficiently on the alert. At the end of about a bottle he threw his napkin over his head, and said,

"Ring when you want more claret. When you have had enough, go to the ladies; and make a—hem!"

And presently he snored.

When I entered the drawing-room I found Sarah asleep on the sofa, and Lady Potts hanging over a basket adorned with pink silk.

"What is the matter, my suffering angel, dear! Was a pretty creature, with its little brown eyes."

Flora, dear-sleeper! It was an infant, then, that had thus reduced the affections of the capricious lady from my Sarah—a mere infant! Surely in such a case I might, on the morning appointed, have an accident and sit on the thing, and nobody be a bit the wiser. Fortune favoured me. Flora, in jumping out of the basket, in which, to my intense relief, I saw a very fat black and tan spaniel, with long silky ears, had upset the work-table.

"What a beautiful dog!" I exclaimed. "Is it its?"

"Oh! very, very ill. Poor dear Flora! She has quite lost her appetite—she who always enjoyed her food so much! I am afraid she will have to lay the wing of a chicken and a few mouserons."

"If you will allow me, I have a recipe in my pocket-book for a spaniel; I am used to dogs. Ah! I remember short brain—finds it difficult to stand. My dear Flora, if this dog is not asleep, I will see what will do!"

"Oh, Mr. Pans. Poor Flora! what shall I do?"

"Well, I think I could save her if she were left entirely in my hands; but, above all things, we must keep her from excitement."

"Thank you, dear Mr. Pans; I will give directions that Flora be left entirely to you, and that she should prove the blessed instrument of restoring my sweet doggy to health again."

Lady Potts went to the other end of the room for some work, and I whispered to Sarah: "Will that do?"

"Ah, you dreadful hypocrite; it is quite shocking! I shall never know when to believe you in earnest," she replied, looking half-frightened, half-amused.

"It is very unpleasant. Nothing but the hope of winning you could make me stoop to such a course of proceeding."

"Oh yes; I know it was necessary: indeed, it was I who advised it. But whatever my uncle and aunt's foibles, and however they behave to others, they are most kind to me, and it pains me to see their weak points so drawn out."

The Colonel came in yawning, had a cup of tea, and then went to get the backgammon-board and play a bit with him; which I did, playing as badly as possible, and never taking him up but once, when I could not help it: on which occasion he got into so violent a passion that I was glad of my previous precaution; but as I succeeded in his gammon me that very game, he soon recovered his, what-language-he-called-it-in-good-humour.

Soon the sounds of the bugle were once more heard in the hall.

"Half past ten—a half past ten!" cried Sir George. "Good-night, Mr. Pans. Now go to your lodging. If you have a mind to read, there is a variety of books, papers, magazines, etc., in the library, and if you wish to smoke, you may."

The Montgomery Arms, etc., etc.

"Mr. Pans of Lincoln's-inn, gent., desires to see Mr. Potts of Montgomery Park, Norfolk, on business connected with the Chancery suit of Potts v. Potts. Mr. Pans will attend Mr. Potts at the Montgomery Arms, Monday, at 3.30 P.M."—Miss Potts will ride Nobet at 2 P.M. to meet the Montgomery hounds. Mr. Herrmann Pans will attend Colonel Sir George Potts in his study immediately after breakfast. Mr. Pans's dinner will be placed under the care of Mr. Pans until further orders.

There were several other directions to different servants connected with the establishment, as grooms, cooks; but nothing more affecting myself, so that the book, and handed it to the servant, who left the room. I wishes to know whether you want her brought here, Sir."

"Brought here—Lady Potts! Good Heavens! Oh, ah—the spaniel! No, no; let her be taken to the stables. My compliments to Lady Potts, and I hope she will be out of my room in time."

I fancy I detected the ghost of a grin on the face of the servant as he left the room. Leaving me impressed with one fearful fact—breakfast at eight! It hardly seemed worth while to go to bed at all if I were to get up so early; but I was not going to let him that; why, one would have to get up at seven!

However, I considered that other people had done such things, and that what man had done man could do, and so I turned in. But not to sleep was restless and broken, haunted as I was by the idea of having to get up at such an hour. I kept dreaming I was late for breakfast, starting up in a fright, and sinking to sleep again.

When I got down at eight o'clock next day, I found daylight streaming in through the window, and my watch, pulled out to ascertain the precise hour, not doubting that I had overslept myself. It was only while toweling my back that I glanced at my watch, and discovered that it was only half-past o'clock. However, I was wide awake; there was no use in turning over again in bed, and I got up and to devote an hour before breakfast to Miss Flora. when I had done dressing, I went down to the stables, and made my way the nose who had brought me the order-look the night before, carrying up my boots and hot-water, who told me that I should find the dog in the loose box dedicated to Lady Potts's mare. That highly favored animal was being exercised in the morning exercising, prancing with great patience and equanimity.

Sir George, coming out of the house, who was emitting that peculiar sibilation common to stablemen, and which must be so galling to the horses at Ashley's Academy, and to the riders of those highly-bred actors.

"Ha—h—h—h

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER I.

THE RAPE OF THE PEACHES.

ABEL'S FLIGHT.

"BIS DEVY Abel Newt!" cried a loud, sharp voice.

"Abel Newt! Abel Newt!" echoed a chorus of shrill boy voices. "Mr. Gray wants you! Mr. Gray's calling you!"

But Abel Newt, a boy about eighteen years old, although he must have heard the summons, fled like a wild horse across the play-ground, his heavy black hair shaking around his neck, as he ran, like a tangled mane; and while the boys were yet shouting he disappeared into the school-room.

"Golly! how he clips it!" said Little Malacca, looking at him with admiration. Little Malacca was so called because, according to the school tradition, he never had any father or mother, and was born far away in some East Indian region—no particular country, in fact. It was an article of faith at Mr. Gray's that Little Malacca never had nay parents, and was born nowhere.

The older boys had the privilege of the school-room during play-hours, and used it as a kind of club-room. It was serviceable to them in many ways.

As now, for instance, to Abel Newt. For as he entered, pulling, tearing, rushing, red, and red, and hot, with his trowsers' pockets distended almost to bursting with some mysterious contents, and his face smooth with intense anxiety, like the faces of smugglers who hear the coast-guard at the same moment that their keel grates the beach, and are doubtful whether they shall gain a prize or lose their freight—he met the school-room with a glance—saw that he was alone—and hurrying to his desk, lifted the lid, emptied his pockets into that charitable retreat, nodding to it at least a dozen pulpy, delicious peaches.

His then as rapidly refilled his pockets with sundry articles that distended them as before, and had scarcely closed the lid, locked it, and bent over the desk with a book, in an attitude of placid reading or study, when Little Malacca burst into the room, and standing at the door, with eyes as round and swollen as Abel's pockets, ejaculated, spasmodically, out of breath:

"Oh, Jiminy! how you did cut it! But it's no use! Won't you catch it, Abel Newt! Mr. Gray's calling—Mr. Gray wants you, Abel Newt!"

"Mr.?" said Abel, looking up quietly. "Mr. Gray want me? What's the matter?"

As he spoke he rose from his desk with a perfectly calm face; but as his pockets lifted themselves above the horizon of the lid, and came in view of Little Malacca, that small boy's imagination instantly teemed with fearful apprehension. He only shouted:

"Oh! oh! oh! what pockets!"

He then turned and disappeared, while Abel Newt, taking his book under his arm—it was the "History of England," a text-book of his class, from which they had recited that morning—transported these prodigious pockets into the play-ground.

All games were suspended, and the boys were gathered in groups waiting for the delinquent to appear. Mr. Gray stood at the door of his study, with that kind of nervous expectancy with which we may imagine the headsman passes his finger along the edge of the axe when he theories the fatal expression approaching.

"Come here, Abel!" said he, in the cajoling endearer with which the spider invited the fly to walk into his parlor. "And all boys to Mr. Gray's platform!" cried he, in a voice which was loud to shudder when a new scholar, not yet versed in the laws of the school, trod as thoughtlessly upon that consecrated locality as if they had been ordinary timber. But it was a sin of ignorance, they remembered, not a wanton profanation.

The master stood upon this dais as the boys rome up. When Abel Newt approached, Mr. Gray moved his head slightly from side to side, rolling his neck in his white cravat with the sort of motion of a bull, as if he tasted something uncommonly unctuous and pleasant, and were weighing his throat to make it longer, that the sweet morsel all the way down.

The younger scholars clustered timidly upon the edges of the throng, but the older boys, the aristocracy of the school, stood forward along the front of the platform, to support Abel, like peers at the trial of a peer.

"Well, Abel?" began Mr. Gray, with the soft snarl of a fat cat which has made a circle with its paws around the mouse. He stopped when he had said as much, and leaned upon the counsel as it to paralyze him with the full perception of the horror of his situation.

"Well, Sir," replied Abel, quietly.

"Ah! Brave boy, Abel," continued the master, "yes, you are very brave; but what do you think your poor mother would say?" and there was a slight shrivel in Mr. Gray's tone, as a raw morsel of a snivel doing duty for a sympathetic sigh.

"Say to what, Sir?" asked Abel, with a little too much innocence.

Mr. Gray stepped into the house, and instantly returned with a chair, in which he seated himself as if this interview promised to be very long and lickerous. Then crossing his right leg over the left, he swung the black-gaitered shoe slowly, as he resumed:

"How does I thought, Abel, when your dear mother (navel obligato) brought you to this school and left you in my charge, that Mr. Gray's, and hole you be a good boy, and then kissed you and went away crying—"

Here Mr. Gray wiped rapidly as if his eyes were blurred with moisture.

"Boo, hoo!" burst out Little Malacca.

"Tears understood," whispered Tom Galt, one of the older boys fresh from Latin Grammar, to Green Aboldeck who stood beside him, both narrowly watching Mr. Gray. But Muddock did not take. He never could understand the things that were to be understood either in conversing Latin books or Anglo-Saxon. He always waked why the Romans did not say what they meant and not leave it to be understood; and why, in general, people in old times could not have spoken English, and have so saved much useless study.

Clearing his throat, as if the tears had trickled into his whipple, Mr. Gray proceeded:

"How little I thought that we should ever come to this! Do you remember, Abel, how, that very day after dinner, you and Green Muddock straddlebrose of the benches in the dining-room with a central balance—and on the bench, and how you both took turns as it with a groom—and how you, Abel, took what Green called 'such everlasting great mouthfuls' that he did not get his share, and you said that you didn't know any thing about his share, but that you loved custard—do you remember, Abel?"

"Yes, Sir," answered the boy, with delicate calmness.

Mr. Gray looked at Abel and bent his nose.

"Abel, do you remember the picture of the Idle Apprentice that we were all looking at the other evening?"

"Yes, Sir."

"How he gambled on Sundays on the tombstones—how dreadfully he swore, and told lies, and played truant, and—and—and—stole fruit?"

"No, Sir," replied Abel, with candor; "I don't remember about his stealing fruit."

Mr. Gray moved, changed his legs, putting the left over the right, waggled his toes, and smoothed his shaved chin with his hand.

"Why, Abel, don't you know that a boy who would lie would also swear, and play cards on Sundays, and idle away his time, and steal fruit?"

"No, Sir, I don't. Green Muddock tells lies, but I never heard him swear; he hasn't spunk enough."

A profound sensation thrilled the crowd of boys at these words. There was even a faint shout at the extremity of the group from some of the smaller scholars, who saw that Muddock could not detect them.

"Abel Newt," said Mr. Gray, "I am afraid you are a bad boy. I pity your dear mother's fit it is necessary that there should be examples. Step up on the platform, Abel."

"Every school-day—"

"Now turn round and face the boys."

"Now turn round—"

"Boys," began Mr. Gray, "you know that the peach orchard is beyond the barn, where nobody is allowed to go. I have left it always to be guarded by your honor."

He paused and surveyed the silent young faces before him.

"Yes, I left it to your honor. I said to myself, and I always said to Mr. Jowlson when I took him in town, 'I leave my peaches to be protected by the honor of the boys; and, Mr. Jowlson, the honor of Mr. Gray's boys is the surest watch-dog in the State.'"

He looked around again, with a beaming expression, as if he wished to understand how well his theory remark with a tion of expressive silence.

Now boys are no more surprised by villainy and poetry and fine similes and happy rhetoric than they are by roses in June or chestnuts in October. But it was a great while since any of them knew them, as the crow and the rose-tree with the nightingales but never learned to sing.

And yet—and yet—sometimes when the thorn pierced a songster into an ecstasy of melodious woe, who shall say that the cawing stranger had no vague, aching, longing remembrance of that golden age—was it a hope or a memory?—before crows were black and had lost their voices!

"Now all those who think that the honor of Mr. Gray's boys is the surest watch-dog in the State will keep their right hands."

All the hands were raised.

"Very well," continued the master, "as I was standing at this door a little while ago, I thought I saw a boy come out of the peach-orchard. As I watched him I saw his pockets were both stuffed with something."

The eyes of the whole school were immediately fastened upon the enormous, uncomfortable-looking pockets of Abel Newt, who stood like a prisoner arraigned upon with an abnormal development, his fat things seeming all to have grown into his pockets instead of his stomach, which was at that moment the most humble and retiring part of his body. But his pockets were guilty and suspiciously knobby for those of a boy who had been caught making a rapid exit from a peach-orchard.

"Boys, I could not believe my eyes when I saw who it was. I thought of his poor mother, and I called to him to come to me. At the same moment he started and ran for the school-room. You heard me call, and shouted after him. He ran on as if he did not hear. All those boys who think that Abel Newt heard me call as he heard you call him, will lift up their right hands?"

It was a dreadful moment. The whole school was assembled, and Abel could see every boy in the crowd, and might possibly remember the way each rotated upon this tremendous pivot. One hand was instantly raised, and only one. It was Green Muddock's.

Abel Newt looked at the hand and its owner without the least betrayal of emotion. But as his eye moved slowly over the throng it rested upon a boyish face, looking at him wistfully, and with eyes of the two met, another hand rose slowly, as if reluctantly but irresistibly, under that glance; and at the same moment a voice was heard, as if in reply to some question that Newt had asked, although he had not spoken:

"Abel, I am very sorry; but I do think you had taken it."

Abel Newt looked quietly away, and the hand of Gabriel Bennet, a boy of about fifteen, and one of the youngest scholars, remained lifted with that of Green Muddock, one of the oldest. But they were the only ones.

Mr. Gray's left foot in the black gaiter waggled faster than ever. His neck rolled luxuriously in the white cravat, as if something were wanting very sweet indeed.

"All those boys who think that Abel Newt did not hear that he was called will hold up their right hands?"

Not a single hand was raised. Abel looked at the boys and they all knew it. The general foot waggled; and the accusing pockets of the culprit seemed to grow more apoplectic every moment. Mr. Gray snatched his face gently with his forefinger and smiled. He did not scratch as if to allay an irritation, but with that composure of profound confidence with which an advocate famous for cross-examination accosts a witness whom his manner informs that, however unwilling he may be, and however he may squirm at the hook his tongue, the truth will be as surely extracted by the questions as a cork from a bottle by the patent lever cork-screw.

"Now, then," said Mr. Gray, "all those boys who think they would have heard if they had been in Abel Newt's place will hold up their right hands!"

All the hands went up.

"Yes—I see," said Mr. Gray, chuckling pleasantly.

"Now, boys, if you think you would have heard, don't you think Abel must have heard?" asked he, in a coaxing tone.

There was no reply.

"Abel," said Mr. Gray, after a pause, "you are the boys are too generous to accuse you. But you are not a child; and you know that I am perfectly well aware that you heard me call. Of the enormity of your offence I say nothing. The boy that would steal an apple or a peach would cut his father's throat, and would probably end his wretched life upon the gallows. I do not envy the feelings of a boy in your situation, with your pockets stuffed with ill-gotten gain, which never prospers. No, Abel; I do not envy you!" continued Mr. Gray, in full swell, pulling out a huge red bandana handkerchief and waving it about his face in a swabbing manner, as if he perspired from every pore of his countenance—"I do not envy your feelings at this moment; but I think of your poor, poor mother!" and he stopped, apparently overwhelmed with emotion, and retired behind the bandana.

Some of the smaller boys were touched. "Poor boy," they said.

"No, no. Poor mother!" said Tom Galt; "poor Mrs. Newt!" and Tom winked, in the great wet handkerchief imitation of Mr. Gray in the more pathetic moments of his appeals.

"And the poor aunts!" said Green Muddock.

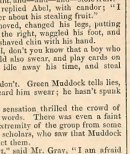
"And the poor female first cousins under twenty," said the fat boy, with promising expectations, to whom I dedicate this tear!" continued Tom reckless Thomas Galt, in a lachrymose manner.

"How the old rascal enjoys it!" whispered Gyles Blunding, who stood with Galt and Muddock, and was, like them, among the older boys.

Mr. Gray had meanwhile performed the lachrymal rites to the remembrance of Abel's poor mother, and had put his handkerchief in his pocket. Then, with feline suavity, he said to the culprit:

"Abel, why did you take my peaches, Sir?"

"I have not taken your peaches, Sir."



THE TORTURE.

Oh—such pockets! They seemed positively bloated with wares!

The smaller boys were aghast.

"Good pluck, I swear!" whispered Blunding.

"Oh, golly! golly! look at those pockets!" cried Little Malacca.

Mr. Gray was dismayed. He was an expert in scenes of this kind, and delighted to prolong and elaborate the enjoyment of exposure.

"You have not taken my peaches?"

"No, Sir."

"Well, Abel, what makes your pockets stick out so? What have you in your pockets?"

The boy was crossed again; a triumphant waggling commenced; and a thrill of horror pervaded the group of boys.

"Well, Sir," replied Abel, with entire unconcern, "I have a large pocket-handkerchief, and two or three bones, and two or three balls, and a jack-knife, and a piece of wood out of which I'm going to carve a boat, and some cord, and paper, and things. I've got a good many things in my pockets."

It was audacity unparalleled in Mr. Gray's experience, but his interest increased every moment.

"Paper and things in his pocket! Oh dear! Think of his poor mother!" whispered Tom Gait, ruefully.

"Boys," said Mr. Gray, "do Mr. Gray's boys, whose home is the best-watch-dog in the place, laugh at this shameful falsehood which Abel so unblushingly tells?"

"It is falsehood, Sir," struck in the entire mob.

Mr. Gray flushed at this audacious reply.

"Are all the boys looking?" cried he, as he rose from his chair absorbed in the interest of the catastrophe. "Are all the other boys here? Gabriel Bennet, can you see?"

"No, Sir," replied a fair voice from behind.

"Come in front, then. Here, Tom, put Gabriel by you—"

"No, No, I'd rather not," said the voice behind; "I don't want to see."

"Don't want to see!" Mr. Gray was so much confounded by this reply as a parental spider would be to hear spiderling decline a choice bit of a fat blue-bottle that had strayed into the web. Don't you love blushcote? was the question he would have asked if he had been a spider.

"Now, then, Abel Newt, take those things out of your pockets!"

Abel laid down the book which all this time he had held under his arm, put his right hand into his trousers, and drew out a large bunch-string and bladder, with peg-top, a roll of paper, and three India-rubber balls.

"That's all in this hand, Sir."

"Come here, Abel," said Mr. Gray, in profound astonishment.

The boy walked up to him, and Mr. Gray felt of the pocket. It had evidently disgorged all its contents.

"What's in the other pocket, Sir? Come let's see!"

Abel, with the same tranquillity, reduced the swelling of his trousers on that side by taking out a huge block of wood, a jack-knife, a ball of twine, and a handful of the same proportions as Mr. Gray's, with more paper, a top, and a ball.

"That's all, Sir."

Mr. Gray was confounded, for that was all, and what was a schoolmaster to do? The boys had been assembled to witness the accusation, the trial, and the punishment of a criminal. The judge had played with his victim; had eaten of him, as it seemed, more and more inextricably; had punished him a little in advance of his conviction by exposing him upon the scaffold to the public gaze, and the utter overthrow proof of his guilt which, by an arrangement of opposites not at all unusual in Providence, was producing the crowning proof of his innocence.

Mr. Gray saw the danger of his own position in a moment. But how should have remembered all his boys to witness his own disgrace upon his own platform, and that he himself could have pitifully exhausted it, was a consideration almost involving the prosperity of the school. "Could he survive the ridicule?" thought he, the boys, those most remorseless of jokers, pass the tradition on from year to year, until he should be obliged to locumtit?

It was a crisis. But he was resolved to conquer it and turn it to his own advantage. Responding on the sweetest smile—the smile with which he assured every parent that the boy in his care were "Charming boys, my dear Sir, charming boys!"—he beamed upon the group, and putting out his hand to Abel, said,

"Boys, the next best thing to making no mistake at all is to confess one's mistake. I thought Abel had taken my peaches. But I was mistaken. How glad I am that I was so! Abel, here is my hand. I trust we shall always be friends."

But Abel did not take the offered hand, which Mr. Gray withdrew in an embarrassed manner.

"Mr. Gray," began Abel, while the boys looked on in perplexity, "I have a word to say—to say—to forget that you have accused me of stealing. Mr. Gray, you and the oldest boys in the school —no, who have always been trying to be a good boy and set a proper example—no," Abel continued, drawing out the huge handkerchief which had been replaced, catching his breath and rubbing his eyes hard—"no, whose poor mother put him in your charge" (mopping his eyes)—"no, who straddled the dining-room bench and ate everlasting great pieces of custard! Oh deep!"—and here Abel covered his eyes with the handkerchief, stamped on the platform before his own boots. "Oh, Sir! I knew that a boy who would steal peaches would eat up his father's throat; and Abel waved beloved master, think that I, one of your oldest boys, would murder my own father? Oh! what would my poor mother say to that?"

The smaller boys did not quite understand the present aspect of the scene. The older boys did not dare to show how well they understood it.

"Do you remember, in our lesson this morning, Sir, where it talks about the execution of Lord Strafford?" As he spoke, Abel picked up the history from the platform, and opened it. "Here it is, Sir. When he heard that King Charles had signed the warrant for his execution, he said, 'Oh! Sir, how I pity you!' and as you remarked—" Put not your trust in princes! I feel like Lord Strafford, Mr. Gray; I feel as if I could say"—and here Abel demonstrated with his handkerchief—"put not your trust in schoolmasters!"

"Guy! how slick he reels it off!" cried Little Malacca, as Abel stopped and sank into Mr. Gray's chair, covering his face with both hands. A gentleman opening and closing his hands very swiftly—a gentleman who had put his hands into his trousers and twitching them, smiling in a sickly, spasmodic manner, and swallowing at intervals with a sort of fit, was the last to desire to prolong the taste.

After a pause, two Abel removed the handkerchief, and his eyes met those of Mr. Gray. There was no insult in the look of the man, no triumph in that of the child. The boy had a confused feeling that there was nothing for him to do. He had made no charge against him. But would you have a man turn his costumers out of doors? He had an honest living to get, and he will be busy. Costumers may make mistakes. Besides, what if your father has just received with the sanction of you—not because you are a bad man, but only vain and foolish, and therefore hypocritical? Having made a mistake, and having nothing left having been accepted, what can you do but retire?

"There, boys," said Mr. Gray, cheerfully, "Now you can go. We are all charmed to find that Abel Newt is not a thief, and that the loss of his triumphant acquittal, we will have a half holiday to-morrow."

The boys hazzaed faintly, and Mr. Gray went into the house. The crowd remained as before, and Abel sat looking at the desk with the same grave face that he had maintained throughout the whole scene, and which evidently had been allowed Mr. Gray to get out of hearing. Then raising his handkerchief and waving it like a banner-staff over the youngest of the boys, he settled his neck in his errant vein so deal an imitation of Mr. Gray's, that every face, with a cry, fell with a shout of applause. Smoothing his face, Abel then rose and said,

"Well, boys, I'm very sorry for to-day."

The younger scholars withdrew slowly, but Maddock, Blunding, Tom Gait, and the older scholars surrounded Abel as he stepped off the platform.

"Genius," said he, turning to Maddock, "you don't think I really meant to say you had no spunk, do you? I only said it to old Gray, at that when you've got to Latin Grammar he may have some excuse for you, you know; for a man can't be a fool in Latin any more than he can help having blue eyes or black hair. Isn't that so?"

"I don't know," replied Tom.

"Oh no, I understood you, Abel," replied Maddock, indignantly. "I'm not such a fool as little angry, and so I hold my hand."

"Of course, that's all right. And the other hand is for Gabriel Bennet, you want it? Come boys, now we'll go into the school-room and eat those peaches."

"Why, did you steal the peaches, after all?" asked Maddock.

"Steal, my violet!" cried Abel Newt, turning upon him with an air of heroic dignity, "choose my words! Did wings transform the golden cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

The Carnival — Countess Walewski's 2nd Costume — The Empress — Costumes of the Ladies — Mme. Adam — Asteriem Greeks — The Imperial Mask Ball — Scrivings of Napoleon — Orchestral Performances — Ash-Wednesday at the Chapel of the Rue de la Madeleine — Concerts and Dinners — The Bois de Boulogne — The Prince Imperial — War Prospects — The Princess Clotilde, etc., etc.

PARIS, March 9, 1859.

IT is well that we have entered upon this quiet season of Lent before the day came round for my weekly letter, for I do not think I could have written coherently in the midst of the maddening noises of the last three days of the Carnival. The weather was so fine that that alone would have sufficed to bring this sensitive-loving population into the streets. To this was added the holiday of the week, and the schools having holiday;—and, again, the irresistible fascinations of the "Bœuf Gras" and his noisy company. But most annoying of all, those who are inclined—and they were numerous—are allowed by the police to indulge in as incessant Mooring of horns on these days; and these unusual contributions to the daily hubbub of Paris so aggravated its intensity that I own my nerves succumbed, and I was obliged to trek relief from this din of life in the remotest corners of the Bois de Boulogne, and to renew there the strength which had once served solus, night after night, sans so utterly to exhaust.

Many entertainments have been the fêtes of these last days; but I shall only attempt a description of two of them—the last costume at Count Walewski's on Saturday, and the ball at the Tuileries on the Monday. Count Walewski, as your readers probably know, is the son of the late Empress, and was in his youth very good-looking. He is married to a pretty Florentine lady, who arranges the receptions over which her husband presides, and which allow her husband with the Bonaparte family. It is herself dressed from the illustrated Vienna work. Count Walewski inhabits the superb Palace of the Foreign Affairs (of which he is the Minister), and which is furnished in the most sumptuous of its apartments, expressly for this night of the year. The rooms are too large to be crowded, and gave ample space for the due display of the beautiful costumes and their lovely and distinguished wearers. The Empress looked pale, pensive, too, in the knowledge that the imperial party were present, though in the modest character of mask and domino; but as these were numerous, of course, every time that a gracefully worn domino revealed a face in the muzzled mask, there was a fair wearer condemned to speak to him, his heart fluttered and betrayed with the suspicion that he was receiving the notice of imperial beauty: and all the belles, marquises, and pretty flower-girls, were looking anxiously for the imperial sign of having been accepted, what can you do but retire?

"There, boys," said Mr. Gray, cheerfully, "Now you can go. We are all charmed to find that Abel Newt is not a thief, and that the loss of his triumphant acquittal, we will have a half holiday to-morrow."

The boys hazzaed faintly, and Mr. Gray went into the house. The crowd remained as before, and Abel sat looking at the desk with the same grave face that he had maintained throughout the whole scene, and which evidently had been allowed Mr. Gray to get out of hearing. Then raising his handkerchief and waving it like a banner-staff over the youngest of the boys, he settled his neck in his errant vein so deal an imitation of Mr. Gray's, that every face, with a cry, fell with a shout of applause. Smoothing his face, Abel then rose and said,

"Well, boys, I'm very sorry for to-day."

The younger scholars withdrew slowly, but Maddock, Blunding, Tom Gait, and the older scholars surrounded Abel as he stepped off the platform.

"Genius," said he, turning to Maddock, "you don't think I really meant to say you had no spunk, do you? I only said it to old Gray, at that when you've got to Latin Grammar he may have some excuse for you, you know; for a man can't be a fool in Latin any more than he can help having blue eyes or black hair. Isn't that so?"

"I don't know," replied Tom.

"Oh no, I understood you, Abel," replied Maddock, indignantly. "I'm not such a fool as little angry, and so I hold my hand."

"Of course, that's all right. And the other hand is for Gabriel Bennet, you want it? Come boys, now we'll go into the school-room and eat those peaches."

"Why, did you steal the peaches, after all?" asked Maddock.

"Steal, my violet!" cried Abel Newt, turning upon him with an air of heroic dignity, "choose thy words! Did wings transform the golden cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

The sun was setting as they passed toward the school-room. The soft summer air was full of the perfume of the violet-bed in the garden fence. There was a twittering of birds somewhere—and over the golden cherry Cherry Nay, 'twas a deed of high emprize. Go to! go to! But despite thy asinine incredulity, thou hast not lost a friend. Come to adorn thy soul sheepskin. Thou shalt have a ripe peach, Master Maddock!"

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

☞ Many communications are unavoidably laid over from want of space.

CULTURE OF THE VINE.

THE culture of the vine is rapidly increasing in America. Eight years ago, when grape culture was comparatively in its infancy, there were upwards of eight hundred acres of vineyard in the Catalina vines too young to bear, within a circle of twenty miles around Cincinnati. Year before last we attended a meeting of the grape-growers and wine-makers of Ohio in Cincinnati, where we had the pleasure of meeting many of the most famous cultivators of this country, including French, Germans, Italians, and Americans. Notwithstanding our attention was called to the best methods of the grape in this country the importation of wines from the vine-growing countries of Europe, and of our native wines is rapidly improving. There are some made in Ohio and elsewhere equal in quality to a few of the best, and many others are very superior. The wine revenue of France, in a good season, has reached the sum of twenty-four millions. What an impromptu inspiration lurks beneath the Champagne cork! Our soil and climate are admirably adapted to the successful cultivation of the vineyard; for the wild grape may be seen in festoons on our forest trees. If we have the grape but to grow for its fruit or its wine, we hope that many of the sunny slopes of America may rear vin with the vine-cloth'd Fields of France.

We read the following letter with interest:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR,—I subscribe for the W. Y., March 19, 1859.

DEAR SIR,—In connection with many of your agricultural matters about which you write, I suppose I may ask you to be kind enough to let me know, through your columns, something of the history of the Grape Vine in this State (as the grape-vine is cultivated with success; and the wine manufactured in this city); also with reference to me—such as the kind of soil necessary, the situation, and variety suited for this climate.

Our soil is sandy loam, and makes good grass farms.

Respectfully yours, &c.

Grapes have been successfully grown in almost every part of this State. Special care of course is necessary in selecting varieties.

The soil of low lands generally abounds too much in vegetable matter and moisture for the production of the vine. They are often subject to fogs, which are detrimental to the best results, as the grape delights in a free circulation of pure air.

The wine from fruit grown on low lands is seldom as good as that from the hill-side vine-yards. Valley running east and west are also objectionable, for they are swept by cold, biting blasts. The best aspect of vineyards is the hill-top, is too much exposed to severe weather. The latter, when its soil is of a friable character, is desirable, if not too much exposed. Select a southern or southeastern aspect so that the vineyard may be protected from cold winds and be exposed to the heat and light of the sun. When sunny slopes are not available, the gentle, undulating, and high lands, are a great protection if north of the vineyard. The proper maturing of the luxurious grape is a very delicate process; it is found to ripen fast between the summits and bases of elevated lands, thus avoiding the chill of the mountain-top, the moisture, fogs, and the excess of vegetable matter in the valleys. Before determining the extent of the vineyard, bear in mind that a dozen well-grown vines are better than a hundred bad ones, which are the inevitable result of the want of good preparation of the soil, propagation from the best cuttings, careful planting, after cultivation, training, pruning, etc.

As the quality of the fruit for wine-making depends so much on the chemical balance of the soil for the requirements of the plant, it will be seen that this feature of the subjects of superlative importance. The choicest wines can not be produced from fruit grown on soil out of balance. That peculiar and delightful aroma of the best wines is due in no small degree to the exact balance of the soil, its mechanical condition, and the advancement of its elements. In part of the same subject are lessons of the most beautiful and difficult problems in vegetable physiology and chemical science. The perfume of the flower and its charming colors are not entirely due to its natural place in the vegetable kingdom, for by transplanting into new soils it loses much of its fragrance and delicacy of its dissolving hues.

Very heavy or very light soils are objectionable; those of an intermediate mechanical condition being the best. And on which successive crops of clover have been grown, especially if plowed under, are admirably adapted to the culture of the vine. The action of the clover plant on the soil, both as regards mechanical condition, preparation of food, and elements taken from the atmosphere, were so fully spoken of in our articles on Wheat as to cause its introduction here unnecessary.

Under-draining, trenching, and good fertilization are the best preparation for a vineyard. We would ask attention to our remarks on the subject of Trenching in last week's column of "Gossip about Rural Affairs" in the Weekly Journal. The soil for a vineyard should be trenched in the fall, so that the frosts of winter may sweeten and mellow it, before the spring planting. And as the soil when trenching is sweetened, otherwise the "foot rests" of the vines will not have the best of food in their support. Good trenching is indispensable to great success. The roots which strike so deeply in well-prepared soil are not readily affected nor disturbed in the juries of severe drought in such as were cultivated to last should before the time of planting. Many of the best vineyards of Europe are trenched five feet deep, but the high price of labor in America prevents the most thorough preparation of the soil, especially for fruits and flowers. The subsoil of the world of the common will grope-vine contain about

10	per cent of Potash,
5	" "	Soda,
15	" "	Phosphate of Lime,
15	" "	Lime,
15	" "	Silica.

And the best contain about

25	per cent of Lime,
14	"	Silica.

These facts will be a guide to the requirements of the plant.

The Isabella and Catawba are the only varieties we would dare to recommend, notwithstanding that many new ones promise well, and are, therefore, claiming much attention. We will be glad to hear from our correspondents in relation to new varieties. The Isabella is much earlier than the York, and the Catawba has become quite a favorite in the West. Mr. Longworth says: "The Catawba is worth millions of dollars to Ohio; and in referring to the production of new varieties remarks: "Yet a better one may be found in our woods, or raised from seed."

Grapes are propagated by layers, buds, seed, grafting, and cuttings. Seeds are rarely to be relied on for variety of vines. Cuttings are better than layers; the roots of the latter are not so fine as those of a cutting, and there is a corresponding demand on the vine to furnish means to sustain their rapid development. When layers are separated from the mother-plant they lose activity for some time. In our "Hints for the Month" it was stated: Cuttings made in the fall, from the middle of October to the last week in November, are best kept in sand in a cool cellar, and set out in the spring, the latter having been dried by the sun and winds of winter, and are, therefore, not in condition to make root as readily as those that are plump in damp sand, free from frost, in a cellar. Cuttings should not be taken from unhealthy vines. Let them be from the wood of the previous year of early spring's growth, sound and of compact texture. Older or younger wood should not be used. The smaller the pith of the cutting the better. Let the lower joint be cut smooth, sloping toward the lower part of the cutting, the better. Many persons prefer putting cuttings out in place, at the top of the planters spot for the vine, and prefer to using grape roots, because of the check to the growth of the latter when transplanted, which especially if taken from a soil of very fertile character and removed to one not so rich or so much advanced.

Grape cuttings, when planted to form roots before putting out in their final place, should be set in the soil at an angle of about 35°, in rows eighteen inches apart, and six inches apart in the rows; about fifteen inches of the cutting to be covered with soil, one eye of each being left exposed. Cover the soil with the cuttings with leaf-deep with manner's barn. In May water freely.

At a future time, and before our correspondents will be ready to transplant, should the cutting at once not be put in their final places, we shall refer to cultivation of the vineyard, transplanting, training, trimming, skinning, mulching, summer rest, summer treatment, etc.

When all the language of inspiration be to us a fulfilled prophecy—"The Lord thy God bringeth thee into a land of wheat, and barley, and vines!"

THINGS WISE OR OTHERWISE.

A NEGRO man came to a Circuit Judge in South Missouri, and asked to be examined as a candidate for license. "What is the first thing to be done in bringing suit in this State?" asked the Judge. "Why, I reckon," said the applicant, "you must get a writ." "Right," replied the Judge; "and what sort of writ, now, perhaps," suggested the young Solon of the law. "Why, I reckon," replied the Judge, after sitting his eyes about and scratching his head in vain for some time, "the young man catched himself good." Less are far too green to aspire to practice in this State. "Now, Mr. Smith," said a lawyer to a witness, "you say you know that the first thing every morning you have to clean out, and empty where, in the field out if his client is good for the fees?"

The intelligence of the American people is beyond that of the nations in which a system of espionage has been established by the governments. There can be no doubt of it. We hear of one of the lads in the district in which a spy was employed, having been distinguished for his zeal in favor of a revision of the tariff. He was asked by his father what he was getting abroad that if he learned? He would get a thrashing if he misbehaved. The good people wouldn't stand that, and voted against it.

A few days since an Irish woman, of the "rale auld stock," came to my office, in Elmira, to send a telegraphic dispatch to her husband in Corning, eighteen miles west. She requested her husband to send her "in debt immediately." Five dollars was handed in, and the message was at Corning. "Oh, murther!" said she, "he still keeps around the house!" Upon further inquiring for something, when I interrogated her if she desired any thing else, she said: "No, plase your honor, the divil a thing." I then asked if she expected the money would go by telegraph. "Sure, and I don't know but God's what's keeping me here." I explained to her that the money would not go by God, but by the electric shock. "Oh, I see, your honor, you're after sending the money, an' ov course I thought it would pass by the Saints."

In Middlesex County, Connecticut, there resided a miller by the name of John Ingraham, whose competitor was a man named Bacon. Ingraham was a pious character, nevertheless John always expressed himself strongly, and when speaking of his rival, would say, "Why, after the news of General Taylor's brilliant victory at Resaca de la Palma, Bacon rode up and down the street all morning in as unjust and oppressive. Said he, "So she does any thing, Ingraham." "No, please your honor, she shows them Mexicans a bit for fighting our folks. I say let them get their brothers, and sisters, and cousins out there to force our folks to run, and didn't they send him back?" "Yes, John, I guess they did the business." "Well, then we envy, a Minister of State."

"I say," quoth John, "he was a minister, a Presbyterian minister, and I don't blame them for fighting; I'm a fighting man myself."

The misery of John's disinfection was too much for his self-esteem. He was genteel and "fetched up" and had a tiger."

A very good pun is in the point of the following, which a correspondent sends us:

"A few years since, soon after the revolution of 1848, a gentleman of this city was sitting, with his youngest daughter on his knee, at the breakfast table. Having been obliged to stretch his cruth, like others, to an unreasonable extent, he was reading on the 'ups and downs of life.' Fixing his head on his daughter's shoulder, he exclaimed, 'Oh, my dear boy, my dear, when you have grown up, married, and settled down, I will come and live with you, and then I shall be happy.' Looking up she gave his likely cock-eye: 'Yes, father,' she replies, 'I suppose you would be rich.' A roar of laughter from all sides of the table finished that dialogue."

"Do you love me, Mr. Smith?"

"To hold?"

"Why, what do you find yourself?"

"I never lose myself."

"Well, you have you been up?"

"Been—been absent?"

"Why, how do you feel?"

"Fast of me and sea."

"Good-evening, Mr. Smith."

"It's not a good morning—it's wet and nasty."

And the parties separated.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Saturday, April 2, 1859.

THE operations of the week have been large in Cotton, and the business of Dry Goods and Groceries was quite extensive, business has seldom been unusually active. Money is worth 6 per cent to favor of good paper, and the months' paper has been done as low as 5; first-class accommodation paper is usually 6 days as low as 6 @ 6. On call the brokers are amply supplied at 4, though the demand is moderate. Gold is in large supply and is firm as it was. The market was overstocked with cotton on the 1st inst., and prices declined about ½ per cent for sterling. Prices were active yesterday at full rates, 5.11 @ 5.13 to the dollar.

Breadstuffs are lower. The bears control the market, and have hammered prices down without regard to the upward tendency in values. Orders from the Government and State Stocks, and the prices of these continue to improve.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, April 2, 1859.

THE Weekly Produce Markets have been inactive and declining. An erroneous impression seems to be established, published on Thursday morning, checked buying, and the effect has been to depress the markets for breadstuffs, and we have been furnished with a copy of the Bank Statement, which we publish elsewhere on hand. The receipts for the week day-to-day down when compared with the week before, and the exports have been 1,000,000 barrels, Indian Corn, Rye, Barley, Oats, Southern, and Canadian Wheat Flour in four heads, and 1,000,000 bushels wheat, and prices are lower. Provisions have been in fair request. Pork and Lard have been freely offered, have declined materially, and not varied much. Butter and Cheese continue depressed. Cotton, however, are smoothly unchanged.

Coffee, Sugar, and Molasses are steady and unchanged. Hemp, Hops, Tobacco, Seeds, Oils, Naval Stores, and Leather have attracted considerable attention. Hops, Tobacco, Seeds, Oils, and Naval Stores have been lightly dealt in. The Dry Goods Trade exhibits no important change. The demand is somewhat brisker, but is not considered active. Stocks continue moderate for the season especially of really desirable fabrics. The assortment, however, is good. Prices exhibit no very remarkable alterations. The settlements have been quite busy. The value of the stocks reports of Dry Goods entered for consumption in the week ending March 31st, 1859, are $1,000,000, and the amount have been $2,951,779 against $15,584,141 same week last year. The imports in other commodities have been quite liberal, especially of merchandise. ... We append a revised list of the ruling quotations for the leading articles:

Unmixed State Flour, per bbl.	$4 90	@ $5 15
Superfine to extra State, per barrel	5 25	@ 6 75
Superfine to fancy Western, per barrel	5 30	@ 6 90
Extra Western, per barrel	6 25	@ 8 75
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	6 75	@ 9 00
Extra Canadian, per barrel	6 50	@ 7 00
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	5 10	@ 8 00
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 10	@ 4 00
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 75	@ 4 00
White to Inferior, per bushel	1 40	@ 1 60
Yellow to Inferior, per bushel	1 5	@ 1 62
Mixed Western, per bushel	1 42	@ 1 45
New Corn, per bushel	1	@ 1
Rye, per bushel	1	@ 1
Barley, per bushel	63	@ 80
Western Oats, per bushel	50	@ 52
State Oats, per bushel	50	@ 55
Canada and Canada, Oats, per bushel	50	@ 55
Southern Oats, per bushel	49	@ 50
Prime, mixed and yellow Pork, per barrel	17 50	@ 18 00
Mess Pork, per barrel	17 50	@ 18 00
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	15	@ 15 50
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	6 75	@ 7 00
City Mess Beef, per barrel	6	@ 7
Lard, per pound	11	@ 12
State Butter, per pound	12	@ 25
Ohio Butter, per pound	12	@ 20
Cheese, per pound	7	@ 12
Ham, per 100 pounds	8 50	@ 10
Rio Coffee, per pound	10½	@ 12½
Laguayra Coffee, per pound	11	@ 13
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	22	@ 32
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	28	@ 35
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	33	@ 40
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6½	@ 7
Oolong Teas, per pound	30	@ 37
Young Hyson Teas, per pound	30	@ 37
Hyson Teas, per pound	30	@ 37
Hops, per pound, 1857	7½	@ 8
Hops, per pound, 1858	8	@ 9
Tallow, per pound	10½	@ 10
Crude Turpentine, per 220 pounds	3 75	@ 4 00
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	52	@ 53
Tar, per barrel	3 25	@ 3 50
Common Rosin, per 310 pounds	1 60	@ 1 65
Strained Rosin, per barrel	2	@ 2
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	9½	@ 12
Seed Tobacco, per pound	10	@ 12
American Leaves Tobacco, per pound	6½	@ 9
Cuba Tobacco, per pound	60	@ 75
Java Yellow Sandal Wood, per pound	2½	@ 3
Refined Ingot Copper, per pound	23½	@ 24
Pig Green Island Tin, per pound	23	@ 24
Dry Codfish, per hundred weight	3 50	@ 4 00
Large No. 1 Mackerel, per barrel	15 50	@ 16 00
Pickled Herring, per barrel	3 75	@ 4 00
Smoked Herring, per box	10	@ 12
Am. Hemp, undressed, per ton	150 00	@ 165 00
Russia Hemp, undressed, per ton	170 00	@ 180 00
Clover Seed, per pound	8½	@ 9
Timothy Seed, per bushel	3 25	@ 3 37

Stocks of several Articles in New York about April 1.

	1858.	1859.
Coffee, packages	30,393	59,154
Cotton, bales	42,191	87,425
Sugar, hogsheads	5,164	16,751
Wheat Flour, barrels	20,000	50,000
Wheat, bushels	219,780	1,000,000
Leather, hides, sides	25,000	25,000
Molasses, hogsheads	1,000	10,124
Saltpetre, bags	3,511	6,000
Pork, barrels	29,843	31,773
Lard, packages and barrels	10,194	26,622
Rice, tierces	19,414	9,665
Spirits Turpentine	17,024	21,249
Sugars, bags	15,000	1,000
Tobacco, hhds.	1,000	10,144
Tobacco, Cronje, hogsheads	2,747	8,212
Tobacco, bales	1,000	1,000

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were less active, and prices lower, which continued to fall off. Cows were plenty and quiet. ... Veal Calves, Sheep and Lambs, and Swine were in fair supply, and sold at full rates at the City Markets during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending March 26	Week ending April 2
Beeves	1,150	1,025
Milch Cows	50	50
Veal Calves	318	854
Sheep and Lambs	5,500	6,000
Swine	4,225	8,134

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday are as follows:

Prime to Premium Beeves, per pound	$ 8	@ $ 10
Common to ord. Milch Cows, per head	30	@ 45
Veal Calves, per pound	8	@ 9
Sheep and Lambs, per head	5 50	@ 9 00
" per pound	7	@ 10
Live Swine, per pound	7½	@ 8½
Dressed "	11	@ 11
Fat Hogs, each	3 50	@ 6 00

The County Produce Markets have been somewhat brisker. Eggs continue to decline under the pressure of large receipts.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY BRUNDAGE WITTEMAN MARKET.

Apples, new, per barrel	$2 00	@ $ 3 00
Apples, dried, per pound	7	@ 10
Dried Peaches, peeled, per pound	14	@ 16
Dried Peaches, unpeeled	7	@ 10
Potatoes, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 00
Potatoes, sweet, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 00
Onions, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 00
Cranberries, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Parsnips, per bushel	50	@ 75
Beets, per barrel	75	@ 1 00
Carrots, per barrel	75	@ 1 00
Cabbage, per 100	3 00	@ 4 00
Cucumbers, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 00
Celery, bable, per dozen bunches	75	@ 1 00
Celery, dry, per dozen bunches	75	@ 1 00
Garlic, per 100 bunches	4 50	@ 5 00
Green Corn, per hundred	1 00	@ 1 50
Green Peas, per bushel	2 00	@ 3 00
Eggs, fresh, per dozen	11	@ 12
Chickens, per pound	11	@ 14
Ducks, per pound	11	@ 14
Geese, per pound	11	@ 14
Turkeys, per pound	13	@ 16
Ducks, per couple	50	@ 75
" block, per pair	50	@ 62½
" wildgeese, per pair	75	@ 1 00
" canvas back, per pair	1 75	@ 2 00
" redheads, per pair	1 50	@ 1 75
" redheads, per pair	62	@ 87
Pigeons, per dozen	1 25	@ 1 50
Partridge, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Quails, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

From the Evening Post, New York.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES are highly recommended for public speakers and singers, for the relief of colds and to clear the voice. Their efficacy is strongly attested by congressmen, clergymen and actors, and singers who use them. Among the certificates to their merits in alleviating hoarseness, we observe a letter from Henry Ward Beecher.

For sale by all druggists in foreign countries.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars free. Agents wanted. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

MESSRS. TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, announce the following Books in Press. Many of them are nearly ready, and will be published immediately:—

1. To CUBA AND BACK, A VACATION VOYAGE, by J. H. DANA, JR., Author of "TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST." 1 vol. 16mo.

2. A NEW VOLUME by TENNYSON. 1 vol. 16mo.

3. OWEN MEREDITH'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Blue and Gold. 1 vol. 16mo.

4. THE ANDAMAN, AND OTHER PAPERS. A new Volume by DR. QUINCEY. 1 vol. 16mo. 75 cents. Now ready.

5. REMINISCENCES OF GEOFFREY HAMLYN. A Novel. 1 vol. 16mo.

6. THE MOUNT KING, AND OTHER POEMS. A new Volume by ALICE CARY. 1 vol. 16mo.

7. PECULIAR POEMS, complete in two Volumes. Blue and Gold. 2 vols. 16mo.

8. STUDIES AND STORIES, by MRS. JAMESON. Rich and Gold. 1 vol.

9. MEMOIRS OF THE ITALIAN PAINTERS, by MRS. JAMESON. Blue and Gold. 1 vol.

10. MOTHERWELL'S POEMS, complete. Blue and Gold. 1 vol. 12 mo. Now ready.

11. A MEMOIR OF CHIEF JUSTICE THEOPHILUS PARSONS, WITH NOTICES OF SOME OF HIS CONTEMPORARIES, by his Son THEOPHILUS PARSONS. 1 vol. 12mo.

12. GUESSES AT TRUTH. From the fourth London edition. 1 vol. 16mo.

13. DANTE'S INFERNO. Translated by T. W. PARSONS. 1 vol. 16mo.

14. New Volume by Capt. MAYNE REID. 1 vol. 16mo.

15. Fourth Volume of ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. 1 vol. 12mo.

16. REV. E. W. ROBERTSON'S LECTURES ON HISTORICAL SUBJECTS AND PICTURES. 1 vol. 12mo.

17. ROBERT DENIS, AND OTHER POEMS, by CHRISTOPHER MASSEY. 1 vol. 16mo.

18. THE LIFE AND TIMES OF ARNOLD OF BRESCIA. A new Edition. 2 vols. 16mo.

19. GOETHE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH A CHILD. (BETTINE.) 2 vols.

20. NEW EDITION OF CHARLES KINGSLEY'S SIR WALTER RALEIGH. 1 vol. 16mo. Now ready.

21. NEW Edition of the LIFE OF GEORGE STEPHENSON. $1 00. Now ready.

22. NEW EDITION of LORD DUFFERIN'S YACHT VOYAGE. $1 00. Now ready.

23. WRITINGS OF HON. FREDERICK D. MAURICE.

24. CLARENDON'S LIFE OF WALTER SCOTT, uniform with the "HOUSEHOLD WAVERLEY."

The Trade are invited to send in their Orders for the above new Works.

TICKNOR & FIELDS'S publications sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of price.

The Usual Result.

GREEN ISLAND, N. Y., March 6, 1858.

MR. W. E. BARRY: I have used your Hair Restorative with excellent effect. It fully restored my hair, which was falling away, to its natural color, and checked it very much. My wife has also used it, and it has restored her hair, giving it new life and vitality.

J. T. GOODRICH.

Remember that this result was produced by HENRY STERE'S Inimitable, the original and only reliable Hair Restorative.

Price 50 cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.

W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

A CARD.

To MILLINERS and the LADIES generally.

Please examine our new Stock of

First-class RIBBONS,

First-class DRESS TRIMMINGS,

First-class LACES and EDGINGS,

First-class EMBROIDERIES.

MITCHELL & McLINTOCK,

No. 259 BROADWAY,

A few doors below Houston Street.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURED INDUSTRIES, at the South Western Block, No. 29 Park Street, Boston, containing a number of every description on hand, and for sale at the lowest prices. A Silver Medal was awarded from the Mechanics' Institute, in 1849, for superior Brushes.

HENRY K. HOPPEL.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Invention and procure American and Foreign Patents at the COMPANY OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.

MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE Assets $660,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive marine and inland business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of 40 per cent. The Company has also a large surplus of outstanding scrips and has redeemed the Certificates of the issue of 1858.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.

WILLIAM LUCONEY, Vice President.

BENJAMIN A. OSBORNDON, Secretary.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA, THE GREAT AMERICAN REMEDY For Purifying the Blood.

At the only genuine Depot, Fulton Ferry. For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, 141 William Street, N. Y.

DEAD SHOT

A DEAD SHOT for Bed Bugs.

SLEEP IN PEACE.

The most convenient as well as the surest of any thing ever known. Sold by druggists. Also all those destroyers of our nightly rest. Sold by HENRY K. HOPPEL, 48 Cedar Street. BERGEN & RODBINS, Wholesale Agents, 91 Fulton street.

APRIL.

Again as Spring, with radiant wing,
To greet the greening earth advances,
Our April sky, like Lotta's eye,
In mingled tears and brighter glances.
One sunny hour, and then a shower,
A glow of heat, and next a chill;
To-day the rose buds peep and blows;
To-morrow ice is in the rivet.

Through branching roots the spring life shoots,
The sap is swelling leaf and blossom;
In summer flood but nourishing blood
Now leaps through every human bosom.
Poor Austin's eye, though still and dry,
Yet glistens with a tenderer meaning,
And though to cry or sob are joy,
We see her heart is toward us leaning.

O Month of Change! in all the range
Of seasons gayest and most sainted
We give adieu beyond all price—
A maiden worthy of Adam Cuthbert!
Let all who'd bear thy varied air,
In sudden calm, the heat that smothers,
Just see and try, next choose and buy,
The new spring clothing of SMITH BROTHERS.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE. } NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.

BY THE

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S

LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A.M.; 2.15, 4.30, and 8.10 P.M.

Freights forwarded on express Passenger trains, and to not one car of wood or hay.

The regular time by the Fast Line is

To Chicago . . 48 40 hours | To Dayton . . . 30 30 hour
" Cincinnati " 36 " | " St. Louis . " 24 days
" Cleveland " 34 " | " Louisville . " 36 "
" Columbus " 32 " | " Indianapolis 38 54 hours

and OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in like good time.

Goods for points on Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, Kansas, &c., will save time by taking our line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

The most beautifully Illustrated Scientific Works ever published in America.

Casain's Mammalogy and Ornithology of the United States Exploring Expedition.

Under Commodore Wilkes. One Volume, 4to. With a Folio Atlas of OVER FIFTY COLORED STEEL ENGRAVINGS. Uniform with the previous publications of JOHN CASSIN, Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia.

Girard's Herpetology of the United States Exploring Expedition.

One Volume, 4to. With a Folio Atlas of OVER THIRTY ELEGANT ENGRAVINGS COLORED FROM NATURE, executed under the superintendence of Dr. CHARLES GIRARD, of the Smithsonian Institution. Price, $20.

☞ Only 150 Copies of the above works will be published for both the American and European market.

American Numismatical Manual

Of the Currency or Money of the Aborigines, and Colonial, State, and National Issues of America. With Historical and Descriptive Notices of each Coin or Series. By M. H. DICKEMAN, M.D., Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, &c., &c. One Volume, Quarto. Illustrated with 12 plates of over 300 Facsimiles. Price, $2.

The Mammalia of North America,

Including Descriptions of ALL THE KNOWN SPECIES, chiefly contained in The Museum of the Smithsonian Institution. With 155 FINE PORTRAITS, illustrating the Genera and Species, with details of their external form and anatomy. By Prof. SPENCER F. BAIRD, of the Smithsonian Institution. (In Press, and will be ready in a few days.)

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
Philadelphia.

New York Purchasing Agency.

W. M. LAFFLEY, No. 25 Nassau Street.

Procures drafting of any description for all the New York or any articles, large or small, of one or luxury, from a Book to a Steam Engine. Attends to Custom House and their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, at 5 per cent. commission charge. Refers to G. L. Sampson, Esq., Cashier Long Island Bank, Messrs. John Jaudon, Son, Brother, Hamilton, Plympton & Co., New York; J. D. Dickerson & Co., New Orleans.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $70 are astonishing universal favorites. In all essential good qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

SPRING FANCY GOODS.

L. J. LEVY & CO.,

Nos. 320 and 311 Chestnut Street,

Adjoining Bailey & Co.'s,

PHILADELPHIA,

Are now opening a large and very choice assortment of

NEW GOODS FOR SPRING,

Selected for the most part in Paris and Lyons for their RETAIL SALES from the choicest productions of the looms of FRANCE.

They invite the inspection of Wholesale as well as Retail customers to the most beautiful assortments for its extent of new fabrics for which can be found in this country.

LADIES' SPRING DRESSES

In all the newest styles and DRY GOODS, such as INDIA CASHMERE SHAWLS,
CHOICE SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS,
PARIS PRINTED FOULARDS,
SUPERB ORGANDIE and BAREGE ROBES,
NEW SPRING and SUMMER SHAWLS,

their assortments are continually being increased by the arrivals of the Steamers from Europe.

PHILADELPHIA, February, 1859.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,

822 Chestnut Street,

Opposite Girard House,

Philadelphia.

Fine Watches,
Rich Jewelry,
Silver Ware, Sterling,
and
Choice Plated Goods,

Chiefly of our own importation and manufacture.

Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

Grover & Baker's

Celebrated

FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.

New Styles, Prices from $50 to $125.

Hemmers, $5 extra.

Offices of Exhibition and sale:—
495 Broadway, New York.
18 Summer Street, Boston.
730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore.
58 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati.

Agencies in all the principal Cities and Towns in the United States.

☞ Send for a Circular. ☜

FRED. S. COZZENS,

WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of his own importation, viz.:

RARE OLD MADEIRAS,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
72 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad Depot, New York.)

PICTURES FOR GRECIAN AND ANTIQUE PAINTING.

ARE ONLY PUBLISHED by
J. E. TILTON & CO.,
161 Washington Street, Boston.

Who forward them, post paid (with full and special directions), to any address in any address. Send for a list and other information gratis.

Dealers and Agents supplied.

PIANO FORTES, MELODEONS, AND HARMONUMS of first-class makers at the lowest terms.
J. M. PEIRCE,
341 and 343 Broadway, N. Y.

French, French, French!

LA FLEUR DE LIS,
THE FRENCH MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For Schools and all who read the language.
Price $2 per annum.
A SPECIAL AGENT WANTED IN EVERY CITY, TOWN, AND VILLAGE, to receive 15 cents.
H. H. LLOYD & CO., 17 Appletons' Building, 348 Broadway, N. Y.

AMERICAN GUANO.—To Farmers and Dealers in Guano.—The Chincha, from Jarvis Island, is the best guano ever imported. It is a mixture of feathers and bodies of fishes, and the most valuable fertilizer known. Orders for the genuine article will be promptly executed. Pamphlets containing full information and particulars, address for

President of the American Guano Company,
No. 2 Wall Street, New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines—it has trebled within four months—indicates the reviving prosperity of the country. The prices of our Machines have been greatly reduced.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

"THAT STANDARD MEDICINAL ARTICLE, the Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam, prepared by well-educated Physicians, and called by the Author a Cure, of this city, is, we have good authority for stating, entirely Compounded, ever since it has been offered to the public. It has stood the test of all tests, time, and has sustained its reputation for more than TWENTY YEARS.

Physicians of the highest respectability prescribe it, and Clergymen of Families speak of it as found a standard family medicine.—Boston Journal.

Inquire for the genuine. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

"VEGETABLE PULMONARY BALSAM."

Prepared only by HALLETT, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Boston. Price, large, $1; small, 50 cents.

BARNES & PARK, Agents, New York.

Will soon be Published:

From Wall Street to Cashmere.

A JOURNAL OF FIVE YEARS IN ASIA, AFRICA, AND EUROPE.

COMPRISING

Visits during 1853, '4, '5, '6, and '7, to the Desertes, Iron Mines, Plains of Troy, the "Seven Churches," Palmyra, Jerusalem, Petra, Mount Sinai, Bombay, Scringapatam, and Delhi.

WITH ALL THE SCENES OF THE RECENT MUTINIES.

CASHMERE

Peshawur, and the Khyber Pass to Afghanistan, Ava, Ceylon, and the Mauritius.

Nearly 100 full page Illustrations.

BY JOHN B. IRELAND, Esq.

A POPULAR

TREATISE ON GEMS,

IN REFERENCE TO THEIR

SCIENTIFIC VALUE;

A GUIDE FOR THE TRACING OF NATURAL SUBJECTS,

THE

LAPIDARY, JEWELER, AND AMATEUR:

Together with a

Description of the Localities of Mineralogy, and all ornamental and Architectural Materials.

With Elegant Illustrations.

BY

DR. L. FEUCHTWANGER,

Chemist and Mineralogist, Member of the New York Lyceum of Nat. Hist., American Assoc. of Science, of the Philadelphia Societies of Jesus, Allenborg, &c.

The subscribers, having newly fitted the store No. 79 Park Row, are now prepared to offer the trade and buyers generally, a large, fresh, and well-selected stock of School, Classical, Theological, Medical, Standard, and Miscellaneous Books and Stationery. Blank Books of every kind and quality, Letter and Cap Papers in large variety, English and American Staple Stationery, &c., &c.

Every inducement, as far as regards prices, styles, qualities, and assortment, will be offered to first-class buyers, either for cash or credit.

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,

Publishers, Booksellers, and Stationers,

No. 29 PARK ROW,

(opposite the Astor House)

NEW YORK.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy SEWING MACHINES which will not perform the work that purchasers expected them to do, are informed that GROVER & BAKER'S machines never fail to do any kind of work. No one is ever disappointed in these machines.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

PHELAN'S IMPROVED BILLIARD TABLES,

COMBINATION CUSHIONS,

PATENTED FEB. 19, 1856; OCT. 28, 1856; DEC. 9, 1857; JAN. 19, 1858.

NOVEMBER 24, 1858.

For sale only by the manufacturers,
JOHNSON & COLLENDER, 51 and 53 Ann Street, And the patentee,
• MICHAEL PHELAN,
762 and 764 Broadway, New York.

MOUNT PLEASANT INSTITUTE.—A select Boarding School for Boys, at Sing Sing.
H. C. NASH, A.M., Principal.

A NEW WORK ON THE HEART.

Just Published,

Of No. 714 Broadway, New York,

(Author of "Lectures on the Causes and Cure of Consumption," "Health, its Aids and Hindrances," &c.)

DISEASES OF THE HEART, APOPLEXY, DYSPEPSIA,

and other Chronic Diseases, with proofs of their curability.

ALSO,

PREVENTING DISEASE AND PRESERVING HEALTH;

(especially after forty), to one hundred years.

This is a work for the million. It is addressed to all who are suffering with any of the diseases on which it treats, or who wish to avoid them. The author proves clearly and conclusively that Heart Disease, Apoplexy, Dyspepsia, &c., may be both prevented and cured, and also tells how. It is written in a plain, popular style, and designed for the general reader.

It is a volume of 117 octavo pages, handsomely bound in muslin, with the fine steel portrait. Price at the office, 25 cents; sent by mail, 56 cents. It will be sent by mail, post paid, to any one sending for it, and then the price (56 cents) may be remitted in postage stamps, or in a letter. Address, DR. TRALL, as above.

If not received in a few days, write again. A liberal discount made to dealers. Apply, giving address first, to S. S. FITCH & Co., No. 714 Broadway, New York.

Select Family School for Boys

AT

SOUTH WILLIAMSTOWN, BERKSHIRE COUNTY, MASS.

(ESTABLISHED IN 1842.)

Summer term of twenty-two weeks will commence Wednesday, May 4th.

The location is healthful and pleasant.

Number of pupils limited to thirty.

For Circulars address the Principal,

BENJ. F. MILLS.

March, 1859.

A. WINCH,

Chestnut Street, near Third,

Philadelphia,

Keeps constantly on hand a full supply of "Harper's Magazine" and "Harper's Weekly."

PANSBRON'S A B C OF MUSIC, or progressive Lessons in the Rudiments of Music and Solfeggi. The very best book of Elementary Instruction ever published. In cloth, price $1.00.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co., Boston.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, N. Y.,

Have just Published:

THE LIFE OF NORTH AMERICAN INSECTS. By J. ADAMS HAVEN, Professor of Zoology and Botany in the College of New Jersey. Assisted by H. C. FREEMAN, M.D. With Illustrations. With Microscopic views in the Cabinet of the Author. 12mo, Muslin, $1.00.

MORE ABOUT JESUS. By the Author of "Reading without Tears," "Step of Life," &c. &c. Beautifully Illustrated. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

THE ROMANCE AND ITS HERO. By the Author of "Magdalen Bathurst." 12mo, Muslin, $1.00.

THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN. Being Principles and Rules for the Culture of Vegetables, Fruits, Flowers, and Shrubbery. To which are added brief Notes on FARM CROPS, with a Table of their Average Products, and Manurial Combinations. By ALEXANDER WATSON. With several Hundred Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1.50.

ADAM BEDE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, $1.00.

ELLIS'S MADAGASCAR. Three Visits to Madagascar, during the years 1853—1854—1856. Including a Journey to the Capital, with Notice of the Natural History of the Country and of the present Civilization of the People. By the Rev. WILLIAM ELLIS, F.R.S., Author of "Polynesian Researches." Illustrated by a Map and Numerous Fine Engravings, &c. 8vo, Muslin, $2.50. (Condensed and unconditional.)

THE OLD PLANTATION, and What I Gathered There in an Autumn Month. By JAMES HUNDLEY, of Maryland. 12mo, Muslin, $1.00.

FARKWEI; or, The Sea Jackals in the Seas of India, China, and Japan. By WILLIAM MAXWELL WOOD, M.D., U.S.N., late Surgeon of the Fleet in the United States East India Squadron, Author of "Wanderings Sketches in South America, Polynesia, &c. &c. &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1.25.

THE MARINER'S MANUAL. A Scottish Story. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Days of My Life," &c. 18mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

LA PLATA: The Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay. Being a Narrative of the Exploration of the River La Plata and Tributaries, undertaken during the Years 1853, '54, '55, and '56, under the orders of the United States Government. By THOMAS J. PAGE, U.S.N., Commander of the Expedition. With Map and numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $2.00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by Mail, post-paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for "LOSSING'S POPULAR FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION," in Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing Eleven Hundred Pages and Numerous Illustrations. This work will be sold exclusively by Agents, to whom liberal and Digested Terms will be made. Inducements offered. Applicants should name the County or Counties for which they desire to act. Address WOOD, ELLIOTT, LOSSING & HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains a Table of Contents for the next ensuing number of that publication, so that subscribers may know what they are receiving.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of valuable and attractive reading than will be found in any other publication of the day.

At no period since the commencement of the work has it been more ably conducted, or been more sought and valued; and the Publishers intend that the Number for the Periodical for the past as the best guarantee for its future claims upon the patronage of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one Year, $5.00.

The Volumes from "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-four Cents a Year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 00 A YEAR.

(From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 13, 1858.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty numbers of this attractive and entertaining publication, issued during the year 1857, have been completed, and the volume is now before us. It contains, in addition to a large amount of carefully-prepared and reliable news, and the value of the contents of the Editorial Department, a full and interesting history of the year—there are many dissertations on the leading topics of the day, which are generally sound and temperate, however, but profoundly instructive of the Loungers—and there are pleasant and stirring stories of domestic history, &c.—there are the records of jokes, new and old—there are poems, and there are pictures, and copies or representations of contemporary men and things, of fellies and fashions, of the progress of the arts, and of the progress of events, and of the world's doings, all of which are executed within a single volume, and to be had for the trifling sum of two dollars. Indeed, we know not of the like among the cheap literature of the day, and we do not wonder that, in this country, in all parts of the land, the publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY are receiving the names of subscribers, moreover, may be interested by it—the old and the young, the young and gay; the men of business, the child and the woman.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Five Copies for One Year 7 50
Twelve Copies for One Year 15 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 30 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

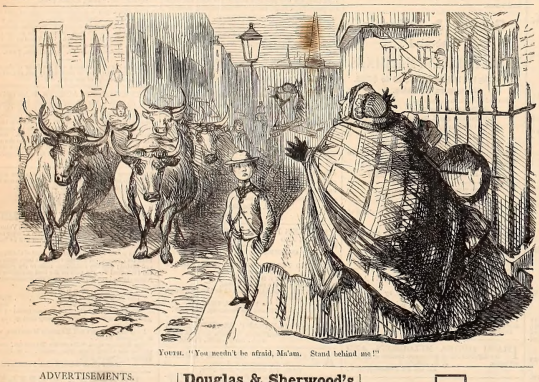
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for a Month or Quarter.

Persons living in the City of New York will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY by Carriers, for Three Cents a Number, payable to the Carrier when delivered, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

NEWLY MARRIED DAUGHTER (about Husband's Account to be off mag flasp, decidedly limited). "And see here, Papa dear, we are getting on so beautifully with our Furnishing! We bought these Lovely Gold and Silver Indian Elephants at a Sale the other Day, and only gave Two Hundred Dollars for them, wasn't it cheap? We only want a little Cracked China to make the Room quite comfortable!"



YOUTH. "You needn't be afraid, Ma'am. Stand behind me!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

P. P. P.

PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They wash pain; they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated impurities and corrosive from the system; they impart strength: they are divided in sections, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous, all impure excretions pass off, and they can not become offensive, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster, and are cheaper at 25 cents than others at 10. Where these Plasters are, pain can not exist. Weak persons, public speakers, delicate females, or any afflicted with the chest, or back pains, should try them. You will find them what we say they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp and our Signature.

BARNES & PARK, 13 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Premature Loss of the Hair, which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of

Burnett's Cocoaine.

It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

Burnett's Cocoaine

is, at the same time, unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

It costs fifty cents for a half pint bottle.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, FEATHERS, COFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, at 361 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

Douglas & Sherwood's
PATENT
Tournure Corset.

This article combines in one garment a CORSET of SUPERIOR SHAPE and FINISH, and a BUSTLE of PERFECT MODEL, insuring free and healthful action to the lungs and comfortable support to the spine. It is highly recommended by all who have seen it (among whom are several medical members of the Medical Faculty) to be the only Corset that has no objection, either artistic or physiological. No lady can well do without it.

D. & S. still manufactures their

Expansion Skirt,

so well known for its durability.
Also, their celebrated

Matinee Skirt,

together with ever Seventy other different Styles, the latest of which are

The Palmetto
AND THE
New Skeleton Skirt,

Containing 15, 17, 20 and 25 hoops, made of the SUPERIOR QUALITY OF STEEL which has always characterized their Skirts.

All articles of their manufacture are for sale at the principal stores in the United States and Canada.

☞ SEE THAT THE STAMP OF DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD IS UPON THEM.

STATEN ISLAND
Fancy Dyeing Establishment.

Barrett Nephews & Co.,
Office, 5 and 7 John Street.
(3 doors from Broadway),
New York.

PHALON & SON'S
COCOINE
For Dressing and Preserving the Hair.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Price 25 and 50 Cents per Bottle.

THE NEW BOOKS.

THE CULPRIT FAY. By Drake. 50 cents.
BUCKLAND'S CURIOSITIES. $1 75.
MILES STANDISH. Illustrated. $6 00.
AFTERNOON OF UNMARRIED LIFE. $1 00.
TWO WAYS TO WEALTHOCK. A Novel. $1 00.
ERIC. A new School Tale. $1 00.
SOUTHWOLD. A new Novel. $1 00.
BABIE BELL, and other Poems, by Aldrich. 75 cents.
ETHEL'S LOVE LIFE. A Novel. $1 00.
, Sold everywhere, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by
RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
130 Grand Street (near Broadway), N. Y.

GOING TO THE BALL—THE FINISHING TOUCH.

PATENT.

THE India Rubber Pen
IS A NEW WRITING INSTRUMENT
MANUFACTURED UNDER
Goodyear's Patent
BY THE
INDIA RUBBER PEN COMPANY,
57 Liberty Street,
New York,
AND IS FOR SALE BY
Booksellers and Stationers generally.

These Pens are particularly adapted to the wants of professional men, and especially to all those who desire to write with rapidity, clearness, and ease. They possess all the good qualities of the quill without any of its evils.

On the receipt of three dollars, a gross of these pens will be mailed (post-paid) to any address in the United States.

Address INDIA RUBBER PEN CO.,
57 Liberty Street, New York.

F.Y.S.

BALLOU'S FRENCH YOKE SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway,
Premium Shirt Manufacturers.
Shirts made to order from Scientific Measures, of the best materials, sewed by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the usual prices.
BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S
ROSEMARY
is the best dressing for the hair known.
The Rosemary will restore hair to bald heads.
The Rosemary will remove dandruff.
The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.
The Rosemary has not been and can not be excelled for the toilet. It will make a thick, healthy scalp and beautiful hair.
The Proprietor can furnish proof to sustain the assertions above. Those will not admit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.
Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 57 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.
Sold by Dealers generally.

A NEW BOOK BY MACAULAY.
PUBLISHED THIS DAY.
THE LIFE OF PITT.
BY
MACAULAY.
Price 50 cents.
Being the Sixth Volume of the Household Library.

DELISSER & PROCTOR,
568 Broadway.
☞ Sent by mail, pre-paid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 120.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ADVERTISEMENT.

In the last number of HARPER'S WEEKLY we commenced

A New Serial Story,

ENTITLED

TRUMPS.

BY

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS,

AUTHOR OF "THE NOTES OF A HOUADJI," "LOTUS-EATERS," "THE HOWADJI IN SYRIA," "THE POTIPHAR PAPERS," AND "PROUE AND I."

ILLUSTRATED BY

AUGUSTUS HOPPIN.

A perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the day.

No other publication gives so MUCH AND SO CHOICE MATTER, or so fully illustrated a history of the times in which we live.

More money is paid to AMERICAN ARTISTS AND ENGRAVERS for illustrating this publication than for illustrating any other paper in the United States.

This is the CHEAPEST AND BEST family illustrated newspaper in the country.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because THEY MEET THE EYE OF MORE PEOPLE throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West—than advertisements in any other publication.

We refer families to our printed list of terms on the fifteenth page of each paper. By forming clubs, people in the country can obtain the paper on very advantageous terms.

SPRING FASHIONS.

The accompanying engraving will recall to the memory of many a young and many an old lady pleasant days spent at a fashionable dry-goods store in the selection of spring dresses. If ever there be a time when shopping is grateful to the rightly constituted female mind, it is at this season—when delightful weather tempts every one into the streets, and when daily arrivals of the most exquisite products of foreign industry stock the fashionable dry-goods stores with dazzling wares. To do the ladies justice, they seldom fail to appreciate the occasion. So buy, ladies, buy! and pay, gentlemen, pay! but take care that your paying bear such proportion to your buying that you shall neither repent the latter nor overdo the former.

THE CORCORAN WEDDING.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WASHINGTON, April 6, 1859.

IF ever, non cher rédacteur, this skeleton metropolis reminds one of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," it is just at this vernal season of each odd year, when the old Congress has just breathed its last, and the new Congress is not as yet elected. The stars and stripes no longer float from the Capitol, to announce that honorable gentlemen are in session; the broad trottoirs of Pennsylvania AVENUE are no longer swept by the trailing products of Lyons looms; a corporal's guard of melancholy waiters mount guard over the vacant rooms at the hotels; hackney-coach horses are gaining flesh as they rest from their labors; and even "ye gallant gamblers," who serve as the garde royale of King Faro, have closed their barracks and left, to pitch their tents at the seaside or where the healing waters flow. Washington has, in fact, no fashionable or political existence just now. The legal people and the press-scriveners find some occupation at the court-room, but the "unfortunate events" which gave rise to the trial are of course tabooed in the recollections of all in society.

The bourgeois here (clever people some of them) endeavor to persuade themselves that the vacations are delightful; and insipid parties are given in the parlors recently let to members or to claim-agents. I also found mint in the tureens, and strawberries at Gautier's; nay, I met a man who had courageously appeared with a white hat—but spring has not arrived with the shad in the Potomac for all that. Cold blasts sweep down the valley from the Cumberland mountains, raising Saharan-like clouds of dust; and Mr. Buchanan has to wear his surtout as he takes his constitutional. In a few weeks he will quietly run (by rail, of course) down to North Carolina, and accept the proffered hospitality of Governor Branch; after which he will visit "Wheatland," to see that his crops are in. Miss Lane, on dit, will go to your busy city, to pass some time with Mrs. Judge Roosevelt, and then reach Newport at the commencement of the season.

ABOUT THE WEDDING.

But here I am gossiping, when I sat down to chronicle the wedding, last night, at the palatial mansion of W. W. Corcoran, Esq., who gave his only child in marriage to the Hon. George Eustis, a member of Congress from the New Orleans district in the two last Congresses. Into a few weeks have elapsed since we received across the ocean fabulous accounts of a wedding in the Rothschild family at Paris, but to that none but the members of the family were admitted. Mr. Corcoran, who may be styled the Rothschild of the United States, as he has amassed his colossal fortune by government loans, was more liberal. Nearly fifteen hundred invitations, gotten up in Broadway, were distributed the Union over, and, when I opened mine, I could almost see inscribed upon it a quotation from Shakspeare: "I come to fetch you to the capitol." Of course I accepted, especially as I had promised some fair friends to tell them all about it.

THE SCENE OF THE FESTIVITIES.

Mr. Corcoran's house (which fronts on President's Square, and lies in its rear spacious gardens with conservatories) is that once purchased by the solid men of Boston for their champion expounder, but, like the frigate Constitution, there is very little of it left as it was then. The saloons and hall have been lavishly decorated, and numerous additions have been made, including a large picture-gallery, a princely dining-room, and a quaint library, well stocked with rare works and choice engravings.

At one end of the picture-gallery, in a bay window which forms a fitting shrine, stands the original Greek Slave, by Powers. On the walls are a few paintings by the old masters, including a Holy Family by Raphael Mengs, which was brought from Europe by Joseph Bonaparte. The collection, however, is chiefly American, and has fine specimens of the genius of Cole, Doughty, Fisher, Sully, Huntington, Leutze, Lamman, and a score of other artists. For one of Leutze's small compositions, Milton playing on the harpsichord before Cromwell, the artist received upward of four thousand dollars.

THE CEREMONY.

The appointed hour was eight o'clock; and before that hour the select circle invited to witness the ceremony had arrived, and were received by Mr. Corcoran. The house was profusely decorated with rare exotics grouped in high pyramids, filling vases or formed into baskets or bouquets; and myriads of wax lights added to the brilliancy of the gas. Every thing was done that could have been done to give éclat to the scene; yet Bishop M'Ilvaine, who had been invited for "said acquaintance" sake to officiate, was son est occulus. He probably was accidentally detained; and Rev. Dr. Pyne, of St. John's Church, was invited at a late hour to perform the ceremony.

At eight o'clock Mr. Corcoran stepped into an adjoining room, and soon reappeared with Dr. Pyne in full canonicals. Eagerly was his brilliance of repair to the picture-gallery accepted; but I doubt if any one of the crowd which followed him thither was prepared for the impressive and beautiful tableau which presented itself.

At the far end of the gallery, as a presiding divinity, was the exquisite chef d'œuvre of Powers, surrounded by the rarest exotics, pure and white as the eloquent marble itself. Before the pedestal, however, were dense clusters of scarlet azalias, which formed an effective back-ground for the bride, who was, of course, the "observed of all observers." Never was there a more lovely victim at the altar of Hymen, and never did she appear more beautiful. Rather petite, with a full face, expressive eyes, and graceful carriage, her portrait then would have been worth a king's ransom. She wore one of the marvelous combinations of modern mantua-making, which almost baffles description, unless by one much adept at the business purveyor for Harper's Magazine. The dress proper was of white silk, which was entirely covered with puffed tulle, over which was a white lace shawl, embroidered skirt of the richest point appliqué lace. Orange-blossoms and lace for corsage and veil, and a bridal pair of rare lace hung in heavy folds, and glistening diamonds, her father's gift, set off her attire."

OPENING OF THE SPRING FASHIONS.

The bridegroom, who is a sleeping, plaint-looking young fellow, combines the Beacon Hill haut ton of his paternal ancestors with the Southern quality of manner and genial disposition of his sunny home. Next the bride was her cousin, Miss Hill, who, as the first bridemaid, wore white flowers in her hair; and Mr. Eustis was flanked by his youngest brother. On either side were three couples of the remaining dozen attendants. Sidney Webster, Esq., well known as the private secretary of President Pierce; M. Camille Dubliez, Secretary of the French Legation; Messrs. Wright and Miles, of the House of Representatives; Mr. Bates, of Boston, formed a fine array of gentlemen. Of course they all sported the bridal favor in their button-holes. As for the ushers, Mr. Schermerhorn, Misses Fay, Corcoran, Campbell, Howe, Pennington, and Clews, uniformly attired in white studded with tiny pink bouquets, they reminded me of the old poet's description of the queen's attendants in the "Flower and the Leaf":

"A train less fair, as ancient fathers tell,
Seduced the sons of Heaven to revel
I pass their form, and every charming grace
Less than an angel would their merit abase.
But their attire, like liveries of a king
Simple yet rich, in fresh within my mind."

Dr. Pyne pronounced a grace in front of the couple about to be wedded, Mr. Corcoran standing at his right hand, just in his rear, the attendants being on either side. The remainder of the story was filled with the interested witnesses of this imposing ceremony. Never was a bridal party of the church more impressively read. Mr. Corcoran gave the bride away; the wedded couple knelt upon two prayer-cushions placed before the altar; and no sooner had the clergyman said "Amen!" than they saluted each other with a kiss.

Then commenced the congratulations. Next after Mr. Corcoran was the venerable grandmother of the bride, Mrs. Commodore Morris, with three or her daughters, all of them, I believe, the wives of surgeons in the army. Other relatives and intimate friends were warm in their wishes for the future happiness of the young couple; and after receiving their congratulations they passed into the drawing-room. When they had left the gallery a quadrille band entered, and performed during the remainder of the evening. As it is Lent there was no dancing, although many a tiny foot tapped time to the music.

THE GUESTS.

Macaulay once said that genteel eloquence was the most vapid of all eloquence, and he might possible is it to catch the evanescent, kaleidoscopic colors of a bal-in-ton, in such a manner as to make them residual? It is stupid—perhaps as stupid as hospitality—to tell the head-roll of guests, neither is it possible to record the dresses rich in their dainty fabrics, or floating like costly cobwebs. There were exquisite bend-dresses, coquettish wreaths, brilliant gems, and—but I will spread that all beside—eyes that sparkled with intelligence and love. A few must be singled out for description, as the classic brick was sent as a specimen of the whole edifice.

A PANTHER.

[The Executive Mansion, it was whispered about, was not favored with any invitations, l'entente cordiale between the two sides of the square having been ruptured, although it was in that very house that Mr. Buchanan, as Mr. Corcoran's guest, was saluted at one minute past twelve on the morning of March 4, 1857, by Gilmore's Massachusetts Band, playing "Hail to the Chief." Mr. Buchanan evidently has no desire to retain friends, although he does not object to use them.]

THE DRESS OF THOSE THERE.

General Cass has rather given up evening entertainments, but his charming grand-daughter, Miss Ledyard, was a prominent representative. Appearing with his open, pleasant face, the diplomatic Secretary Thompson, and the western inheritor of departmental indefinitude, Postmaster-General Holt, appeared to enjoy themselves, as did several of the "ladies of the Cabinet." The Senate was well represented by the accomplished Mr. Kennedy of Maryland, and burly Mr. Bright of Indiana. The daughter of the latter, recently married to Mr. Riggs, was there in her bridal dress, and very rich was the lace on the gown.

Lady Napier is at Annapolis with her family, ready to embark in the Curaçoa when Lord Lyons has landed, and I doubt not that the latter will not go. My Lord was present, basking in the smiles of beauty as usual; and very attentive was he to Mrs. Conrad, who was charmingly dressed in elaborately puffed white tulle, trimmed with violets.

The Count de Sartiges (who is anxiously awaiting permission to go to Paris on a congé) was accompanied by his American wife, who never looked better than on this occasion, in white and blue; and the best-dressed lady present, after the bride, was the wife (not long since Miss Hoffman, of New York) of the Vicomte Jules Treillhard, First Secretary to the French Legation, whose paint here, worn over white satin, was alike admired and envied. M. De Vaugrigeuse, the Chancelier of the Legation of France, has also married in this Republic, and his wife bears a name which was pronounced superb. M. Van Limburg is another of the diplomatic corps who has married a capital alliance here; and the many friends of Miss Field Cass will be pleased to learn that she is at attracting the attentions with the same success that she did before she passed under the flag of the Netherlands. Mrs. Gilmore was present in white, whose beauty was heightened by her plain white dress, in a subject of the Czar, but chef. M. Stoeckl, in full uniform, was with his charming wife. [Madame De Bodisco, by-the-way, is also there, for some days, on a visit to Georgetown.] As for the foreign chargés, they were out in full force, showing the lack of all foundation for the absurd rumor that they considered Mr. Corcoran blamable for his treatment of their colleague Mosquera, who has just made himself sufficiently conspicuous in attempting to win Miss Corcoran's affections.

Edward Everett was of course a "star," and was surrounded by many friends, as was his accomplished daughter Miss Lilly Everett. The stalwart form of Mayor Berrett; the veteran General Jesup and other officers in full uniform; Colonel Seaton of the National Intelligencer, who last week celebrated his "golden wedding," as it is to be hoped Mr. Buchanan will his "golden union"; Chemistry the scholar and orator, with a bright bud of promise by his side; Riggs of this city, and Fay of Boston, with others whose autographs make a goodish paper gilt-edged; Eames the editorial diplomatist; Mr. Corcoran's private secretary, venerable men there, and nearly all were accompanied by ladies in elegant costumes. Let me not forget Dietrich-Hermann Ould, whose Saxon face is perfectly portrayed in Harper for this week, and whose pride is one of the most valuable and accomplished ladies of the faubourg of Georgetown—that is saying a great deal.

THE SUPPER.

There was a ten-room open all the evening, and at the extremity of a flower-decked corridor was a table, upon which was a tried and true collation, all filled with delectable beverages. Later in the evening the dining-room was thrown open, and a supper-table there which would have been worthy, or to the skill of Carome, or Soyer, or Tatel. A high bank-bill of course tempered over all, but there was a profusion of pates, terrapin, game, oysters, salads, and confectionary of every description, with the profuse and elegant wines thereto. The happiness of Mr. and Mrs. Eustis was of course an unending theme. Nor did the generous host fail to give themselves up to "mirth and merriment, which bare a thousand harms and lengthens life."

LES ADIEUX.

As midnight approached the guests began to depart after again paying their respects to the happy pair. [Mr. Eustis will to-day or next again at a "wedding-dinner," to be given by Mr. Corcoran; and to-morrow there is to be a fête champetre at his country-seat, upon which he is now having great agricultural improvements. And so passed off this much talked of wedding, which really merited this hasty chronicle from

Your faithful correspondent,
GEO. WASHINGTON JENKINS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1859.

SETTLEMENT OF THE PARAGUAY DISPUTE.

SINCE the last number of this journal was published intelligence has been received that the long-pending dispute with Paraguay is at length settled. The President of the Argentine Confederation, Urquiza, whose portrait will be given in a subsequent number, has come from Brazil, offered their mediation; and with their aid a compromise was effected between the United States and Dictator Lopez. The dictator Lopez agrees, it is said, to grant indemnity to the family of the person killed on board the Harpy. Mr. Hopkins, and to the salute to the flag. Mr. Hopkins was the representative. Beyond these facts nothing is yet known of the nature of the settlement.

It is of course satisfactory to think that, notwithstanding all the warlike preparations that were making, notwithstanding all the cannon, and the shells, and the rifles, and other engines of war that were sent out to Paraguay in the largest fleet ever dispatched from this country, and notwithstanding the terrible menaces of the Paraguayans and their doughty chief, there is to be no bloodshed after all. Peace is always better, and a good deal cheaper, than war; and in no event could the United States gain much glory by going to war with Paraguay. On this head, then, let us rejoice at the news.

And let us trust and hope that the compact which Commissioner Bowlin has made with President Lopez will be faithfully observed on both sides. The amendments of the Paraguayan dictator might justly cause the gravest fears in regard to the fulfillment of his share of the bargain. Neither he nor his predecessor, Dictator Francia, were ever remarkable for truthfulness or good faith. On the contrary, it is due to history to state that both have been notorious for breaking their word and evading their agreements whenever any thing was to be gained by so doing. The records of the State Department furnish pretty full evidence of the habits of Lopez in this respect. If, therefore, Commissioner Bowlin departs on his way rejoicing without any better security for the honest fulfillment of the new undertakings of Lopez than the plighted faith of that potentate, it is possible that we may be disappointed, and that the country may be called upon to vote more millions for other expeditions to Paraguay.

The real difficulty in our present relations with the Spanish American states has been the impossibility of relying on their good faith. We have with all of them the most extensive treaties, which, if they were honestly carried out, would prevent the possibility of misunderstanding or warlike proceedings, and would render us "a band of brothers." The misfortune has been that no sooner have we concluded a treaty with any of these colonies than there is a instantly broken, and some trumpery or fraudulent excuse offered. It is true that the United States have been so frequently and so grossly cheated by Nicaragua, New Granada, Paraguay, Mexico, and the other southern republics.

The feeling of jealousy in Europe, when they exact reparation for injuries from smaller states and conclude treaties for the future, frequently arises upon reading inadequate guarantees for the faithful fulfillment of the promises made to them. There seems to be an impression among most statesmen that it would be treasonable or irregular for the United States to exact mercantile guarantees. On what clause of the Constitution or other ground it is based we know not, we are unable to say. Should Commissioner Bowlin's mission to Paraguay prove a failure through the faithlessness of Lopez, it will become important to inquire whether there really exists any valid reason for the coupling of material guarantees with all future promises made to the United States by the Spanish American republics.

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION AND RAILWAY PROSPECTS.

EVEN since the 1st of March railway stocks have been on the decline in this market. The leading Western railway stocks, such as Galena, Rock Island, Michigan Southern, and Northwestern, have fallen from three to ten per cent. Among the railway stocks nearer home, New York Central, which labors under peculiar disadvantage in being generally distrusted by the public, has declined from 79 to 75. At the board of Brokers in Wall street railway commission business has been long since banished, nine out of ten members are operating for the fall.

The ostensible ground for the decline which has already taken place, and for that which is anticipated, is the failure of the recent growing agricultural improvements. And so passed off much talked of wedding, which really merited this hasty chronicle from

Your faithful correspondent,
GEO. WASHINGTON JENKINS.

shares, these deliveries could only be made at a heavy and perhaps a ruinous loss.

Nor is it unreasonable to suppose that such a demand may arise. The prospects of the crop are most flattering from New York to Minnesota; the verdict of farmers is, that the area sown in wheat is larger than usual, and the prospect more promising than ever before at this season. The West only needs a good crop to renew the activity of 1856. Nor is this all. The revulsion of 1857 compelled all the Western railways to adopt measures of economy. Needless expenditures have been curtailed; unnecessary employés have been discharged; the rate of working the railroads has been reduced with, on the narrower roads, a saving. To take the Michigan Southern as an example, the working expenses have been reduced from seventy-five to about fifty per cent on the gross receipts.

It is natural to suppose that these economies and the improved prospect of the West must tell in the end.

We therefore advise our friends who own railway stock not to pay with it at present prices; but to hold on to it. The stock is dear at high rates, and if they have money to spare, rather to average their interest at the present low rates than to sacrifice their property for the benefit of the Wall Street jobbers.

QUESTIONS FOR THE NEXT CONGRESS.

It is now pretty clear that the Democracy will be in a minority in the Congress which will meet in the autumn of 1859. And of this fact, it is curious to speculate on the probable fate of some of the leading questions which that body will be called upon to consider.

The only new States which may be confidently expected to apply for admission are Colona and Utah. Colona, which is the name of the Pike's Peak gold region, may have population enough to demand admission as a State, if the principal part of the gold region be falsified; whether Congress would insist on its remaining a year in the Territorial condition is not certain. Utah, with Brigham Young, will probably give the Northern party two more votes in the Senate. Utah will demand admission as a State; this failing, it will remain a Territory, the Mormons will then demand a realization of the popular sovereignty in their Territory, namely, the right to elect Territorial officers in accordance with the views expressed by the leaders of the Democratic party on the Kansas Question. That the petition will be granted is certain; but the embarrassment of some of the Northern advocates of squatter sovereignty will be severe.

It is possible that applications may be made for the organization of Arizona Territories to be carved out of Texas, or other portions of the South. Arizona may demand admission as a State. This would please the South, and the increasing gains of the cotton growers, will naturally induce them to seek a counterpoise to the increase of the Free States by the application for admission by a Southern Territory like Arizona would revive the slavery controversy in a more violent form than ever.

Had the Democracy possessed a majority of Congress, the endeavor to reopen the slave-trade would probably have been renewed. As it is, a test vote may be taken to see whether, as is commonly supposed, the advocates of that measure are on the increase.

From the evident temper of the country it is not probable that any further efforts will be made to introduce the Cuba or Kansas bills at the present. These questions will be left open for us at the next Presidential election. Nor is it likely that the tariff or the national finances can occupy much of the time of the new Congress. By the time it meets the country will be recovering from the panic, a proposal to increase the customs duties will receive attention.

Comparing the prospect with that of former years, the case is pretty clear for new questions.

THE LOUNGER.

A WORD WITH THE HON. YANKEE DODDLE.

"A FRIEND OF COMFORT" writes to the Times to know why railroad companies should not make distinction in the comfort of travel according to those of accommodation at hotels. Why should every body be compelled to travel like every body else, whether he wishes to or not, whether he could willingly pay twice the fare for greater comfort or otherwise; in a word, why should a man of money suddenly stop at the window of a ticket-office, and ten dollars buy no more pleasure and comfort in a day's journey than a dollar and a half?

The moment before, in the same city, the ten dollars would purchase better lodging and fare than the five; and the same sum, directly the traveler reaches Boston, will have a similar power. But the moment it touches the rail it is paralyzed.

Nobody who has traveled on any European railway but has noticed the admirable variety of accommodation, and the incessant recognition of the individual. An English railway carriage is a room. The coupé in a German train is equally so. The proverb of travel, indeed, extremely cur-

* Mrs. Dubleiez, whose husband is in the Treasury Department, and whose ideas are financial, told me confidentially that these diamonds cost $2000, and that the lace was worth at least $2000 more. If rumor is about becoming in her to thus estimate, and will repay her in her own coin by rendering that in Europe which would make her husband gobbled and pocketed at supper were worth at least a V.

rest among travellers of limited means is, that Europe, fools, and Americans travel first-class in summer. Then princes, fools, and Americans. A very sensible people. And why should not Americans do at home what they find so delightful abroad?

The old diligence in Europe offered the utmost choice in the most limited space. There was the coupé, in front, with glass windows all round, so that the three travellers—it held no more—could see every thing and be entirely private. Then there was the rotonde part, immediately behind the coupé, with doors at the side, like an ordinary close carriage of four seats, and a fifth strapontin. Behind the rotonde, with a door at the back and seats at this side, like an omnibus, inside all the dust, and a little smaller price. And last of all, over the cops, in front, and on the top of the whole, the imperiale—the top of the coach, to be invaded at a stage-coach—with a chain-top and leather apron, sometimes, but oftener open to the weather, at the price being least of all.

Here, in a vehicle carrying about those seasons, there were four rates of fare.

The obvious objection to corresponding arrangements with us is, of course, that it tends to deprive us of those differences of rank that we do not recognize. "Go to thunder with your coupés, and your first-class and second-class!" says the free-born Yankee Doodle in Tammany Hall. "We're all men, Sir!—A man's a man for a' that, Sir, Quirinius!" Three cheers for the Hon. Yankee Doodle, and a groan for the coupés!

Exactly so, Mr. Chairman. But a man is not a rich man for a' that; and since we have the Everlast House, and Astor, and the Metropolitan Hotel, and the taverns in Water Street, and every body is united to his mind and his means—and since, fellow citizens, we are all free and equal, rules and emigrant cars—and since, even in this free and enlightened country of ours, in the midst of the Millennium, dirt is dirt, and stench is stench—why shouldn't money buy as much comfort as it does of every other marketable commodity?

Dirt is not democracy, and inconvenience and squalor are not the rights of man; and since the special object of the Hon. Yankee Doodle, whether he speaks in Tammany or in Congress, is to make money, why should he be so anxious to deprive money of value?

Upon the New York Central Railroad the spirit of improvement has recently introduced shelves upon which passengers may lie down, and the right "to sleep—perchance to"—lie awake, as the "Mount Vernon Papers" have so pathetically inculcated us. That is a long step in the right way of six seats next, like the English carriages, so that parties may have a drawing-room to turn and the pleasure of a private carriage—which is still permitted, we believe. The Honorable Yankee Doodle has not yet discovered the private carriage. Honest man! He speaks with admiration of the long ride "drives his own carriage." "I thought 'on a parliament house on legs a-gig'!"

In any case let the honorable gentleman state clearly that if it is unconstitutional to make different rates and accommodations in journeying, it is to have them every where but in the cars, and that for that proposition at his leisure, and report at the next meeting.

Meanwhile Mr. Lounger moves the first reading of the bill entitled An Act to secure the Worth of Money in Railway Traveling.

THE LITERARY PROFESSION.

P. D., Jun., writes to know something more about the literary profession, and desires to know if there is a neglect upon the discussion of which the Lounger should never close his columns. Granting, he says, that without genius no writer can rise above the lowliest position, but claiming that every young man of average ability "can by proper exertions succeed in any thing he chooses," he asks, "what is the writer's preparation?"

Of course a question so broadly asked, contemplates the writer not as an author in any particular department of science or art, but in general literature, in what is called "belles lettres." Where do we ask P. D., Jun., a question in turn. What should be the preparation of the man who proposes to write upon botany—upon comparative anatomy—upon the age of Elizabeth—upon the ethics of Raphael or the Greek drama? Is there an answer to that question involves the reply to his own.

That is to say, if a man would write with literary facility, "with a great taste and inclination for and willingness to make the greatest exertions to pursue the profession of Literature," he must devote himself to it, he evidently means to choose general literature, and not to write a botanical book, novels, criticisms, and perhaps to concentrate himself at length upon some history, or serious and solid work.

His preparation, therefore, must be the study of general literature, and the acquirement of a good for its accuracy, profundity, and extent upon circumstances of health, time, pecuniary means, and temperament. Dr. Johnson, Sir Walter Scott, Leigh Hunt, and in the leading modern languages, there is a certain classical pure literature apart from the scientific. With that literature such an aspirant must make himself somewhat familiar. At the same time a man's natural bent, or rather a peculiar tendency, will lead him to some knowledge of the chief authorities.

But this cultivation is but oiling his limbs. Without the muscle all the oil, and the desire, and the resolution will not enable him to wrestle. With the muscle it sometimes adorns, sometimes bunches his action.

There is no recipe for rainbows, and who wants to make only a cloud? Sir E. L. Lytton—dear, delightful Bulwer!—with his superb fingers of philosophy, in his brilliant "Pelham" describes the preparation for writing a novel. "All authors," he says, "in the field the novelist should cultivate self—truth the moral he should strive to bring home. For me, if I were to write a novel, I would first make myself an acute, active, and vigilant observer of men and manners. Secondly, I would, after having thus noted effects by action in the world, trace the causes by books and meditation in my closet. It is then, and not till then, that I would study the lighter graces."

That is to say, the novelist must know men and books thoroughly. But ought not the historian to do the same to write history properly? Is there any possible knowledge that he can dispense with or remotely, be of great service to any man writing upon any subject? Is the passage from Macaulay's brilliant bulwer leads us gently by the silk waters of platitude, as usual.

The practical difficulties of the literary career at this time and in this country have been already considered by the Lounger in No. 150 of the second volume of the Weekly. If any young man disbelieves what is said there let him make the trial, and, while he makes it, take with him the Lounger's heartiest sympathy and warmest wishes for success. Let him remember that the author beats, the polar cold, the equatorial storms, and the long death of Pacific calms. He knows also the soft acquiescence with which the world hails balmy Trades. When the landsman hails him, and that simply to avow that it is all soft scudding with stu'n-ol's sot?

If he does, you have but to read the words aloud to hear that he answers like a goose.

THE VOICE OF "COLUMBIA."

The eyes of Europe are fixed upon a chair from under some one who is seating himself, so that he falls on the floor and breaks his arm or jars his nerves; the eyes of Europe are fixed upon fingers against doors at night to fall upon the nails who open them, and who, in consequence, lose fingers; pouring pails of water out of windows upon persons passing in the street, etc., are performances of which the humane Lounger is only startled by the sparkling wit of knocking a man on the head with a club, picking his pocket, and then selling him back a knife. Where do capital jokes these things are! What fun it is! What racines of invention these jokes show! What a delicious vein of genial humor!

But the best witticism of this year, and one which adds another very great name to the list that adorns our literary youthful lovers of our cherished "Columbia," was the announcement published in the newspapers of Monday last, of the death of Professor Dridler, of Columbia College. We see from the same paper that the cause is related. How his friends out of the very room he relished the joke! Those of his family, in all its branches, must have enjoyed the exhilarating humor of the thing. How they must have laughed! How they open their morning paper, and stumble upon the notice in the next record of grief, which is implied in the obituary announcement! How they laugh! What a vision of hilarity and innocent mirth rises before the mind's eye!

If we could only know the author of this excellent comedy, it would give us great pleasure to introduce him to our readers as he writes, and the delicate flush of his cheek at the first sight of a pity is that whoever is guilty of it is not "shrieked" at by the world.

THE APOSTLE OF HUMBUG.

The path of Barnum in Britain is not altogether strewn with roses, notwithstanding the stores of his successful wife. Mrs. Hall, the "Apostle of Humbug" went to Bristol to lecture upon his subject and art. The Barnums went to Bristol to pay. That was all delightful to the Apostle. Payees always find the process of payment endearing. Mrs. Hall was received in every human breast, and an element of folly to attach to every human endeavor, and the consequence was that lecturing and awaiting being "done"—room-posts are increased by the consequent delay—and another lecture, and another, and new tricks to augment his profits—this being has been the constant practice of the unabashed lecturer for years—ere monsters—has made his baby, his mind, his soul, his whole existence a mockery and a shame. Can the various commodities in a market where every purchaser is a cheat and a fool be so seriously, or a vogue ambitious to excel in the art of swindling."

This is a strong statement, and yet what is the Apostle of Humbug but the illustration of the necessary result of a mercantile principle which may be summed up in the words "Take in the public as the kindness?" The processes of stock-gambling are not an iota superior in morality or respectability to the practice of the Apostle of Humbug, and are not half so innocent.

The Apostle has said it before, and he will very probably say it several times more. In the case of the Apostle, whose career is so unpleasantly contemporaneous, there is a difference of degree in what we may, if we are nervous, call guilling, but if we are in good humor, call the art of taking in the public by scribbling, cheating, et cetera, a difference in degree but not in kind from that of the merchant who sells a case of goods at the last in the world, when there are fifty more up stairs, or in fact commits any other of the innumerable dodges of trade which are called "sharp," "clever," "darned shrewd," et cetera.

Success is a pleasant kind of tinsel! It covers up so much rubbish with such a pretty gauzy hue and texture through which we all play so hard that we can not see just as we admire the sofa on which we are sitting, as a sofa, without a thought or consciousness that it is or ought to be—but or, as when a man is dining with a friend and hears the children in the next room relating how mamma said she wished that stupid Mr. Higginbottom wouldn't be always coming to dinner, he pretends not to hear, but talks cheerfully of the pleasant spring weather and the shocking Sickles business.

If the Apostle of Humbug, having invested a comfortable million, had settled quietly somewhere, and kept his name out of the papers, ten years hence wouldn't he have been a little impolite to allude to woolly horses, and mermaids, and India rubber serpents? Suppose he had purchased a house in Bristol, England, and held his tongue, he would have been quite the same man, his income would be based upon acquisitions made in the doubtful manner, but would the British Advertiser have felt called upon to denounce him "this foul brained apostate from humanity?"

Was it not said of old time, "It is good to have a scape-goat?"

"THE CULPRIT FAY."

THE recent republication of this charming poem of Drake's by Messrs. Redd & Carleton has given occasion to some correspondence in the papers.

The poem was announced as illustrated by Ehninger, and with the fresh recollection of his exquisite drawings of the Miles Standish, of which the Lounger spoke warmly at the time of their issue, but none too warmly, of the delightful type for which the publishers are noted, and the airy grace of the themes to be illustrated, promised a fine book.

It came, and was a very pretty book, with a small vignette of a quasi-Culprit upon the boat—which was the sum of the illustrations! The artist immediately put himself right with his friends by declaring his knowledge of the intention to represent him as illustrating the poem.

Of course the poem was not illustrated (and and whoever purchased the book, although he would not get an illustrated edition, would get a delicately printed, and bound copy of the pretty poem.

But literally upon Mr. Ehninger's letter came another from Mr. Joseph Rodman Drake DeKay, announcing that the edition was published without the authority of the family of the late Dr. Drake, and that "the sole is preemptorily stopped." He added: "I do not believe that the author that his poems should not be published; and to prevent it, a few copies of this and others were printed some years since for private circulation, and a copyright registered. It is doubtless in ignorance of these facts that the gentlemen acted as they did. Several other editions of 'The Culprit Fay' have appeared at various times, which have, as in this case, been issued unauthorizedly.

This would seem to be final, nor has any one the right to dispute the authority of the heirs of Dr. Drake. But it is distinctly stated in Duyckinck's Cyclopedia of American Literature that "a fastidious author, including 'The Culprit Fay,' was made from Drake's poems and published in 1836 ('37) by the poet's only child, his daughter Joanna."

That work is certainly a publication. Another is stated to appear as he writes, and the dedication is, "To her father's friend," and on the title-page, "New York, George Dearborn, Publisher, 1835." What does this mean? Forgeries?

And if it were, what a pity! The Cyclopedia, quoting some notes of Mr. James Kirke Paulding, Drake's friend that when copies of all his poems that could be collected were brought to Drake's family, and he said, "Burn them; they are valueless."

But should a manly modesty at such a moment be accepted as a prohibition of the publication of such poems? Drake himself had published in the newspapers some of the stanzas of "The American Flag" was among his contributions under that name. And now that the world has gained years "The Culprit Fay," now that it is almost unique in literature as a creation of the pure fancy, unmarred by the slightest admixture of accessories of romance; now that his ode to our flag is familiar to all American hearts as the finest national song in any flag; now that his name is enshrined in our literary Pantheon, and his poems in our homes are a part of our household, ought there to be any more suppression? Are not the memory of such a man, his works and his fame, in a higher degree, the property of his nation and mankind?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

THE box is so full that the Lounger would gladly show it to his many friends, that they might see how generously and how widely they contribute to it, which they intend to have printed in full, receive so brief a word of acknowledgment that they are all read by the Lounger—so they have their revenge, after all!

—NELLIE FAY, Camden, New Jersey, will be glad to learn that C. H. Webb is a person, and not a name merely. Nellie thinks that he is a poet.

—JANE, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, who writes of the family perplexity, might refer the matter to the family physician, or the neighboring d—nk—y. Or does he suppose the Lounger to be a kind of Vicar of Bray? If he be anxious let him write again.

—The Lounger adds the last word to the previous correspondence. J. H., of Natchez, Mississippi, feels aggrieved by his answer to the questions of the presidency of the Panama Railroad. The Lounger suggested that to ask him such a question was like inquiring for a royal Bengal tiger at a toy-shop. He had no idea that his correspondent asked him seriously.

—C. H. W., Podunk, criticises the statue of Eve by Bartholomew, of which a print was published in the Weekly of March 19. He says that she seems rather to have eaten a poppy-bud than an apple; and that, in fact, the fruit lies at her feet "unbitched." The other point of his criticism is the negligence of the very simple drapery of the figure. But if C. H. W. will look upon it as a figure of Eve dreaming of the Paradise she has —it was so sweet and fair?—he will be reconciled to her face. And for the drapery, he has to remember that the one he sees may not be the first apple, but one that has fallen from the same tree; and if it be the same apple, then the leaf hides the bite. The drapery seems to the Lounger eminently proper, for this very reason that it is not precise.

—CHAPEL HILL wishes to know of the artist-novelist, a calculating machine mentioned some time since in the Independent office, which it there stated to be in use in the houses of the Rothschilds, and for which the writer propheseies as general a use as for letter-presses. Who will tell something more about it?

—SARAH JANE's lines to the author of "Mary Ann" are respectfully declined.

—A WOODLAND FENCER, Washington City, desires illustrated directions for fencing in the Well-ly. But does he think they would be of interest to "the thousands" who do not care about the agile art? The Lounger will answer his other question next week.

—A. PRY COT, Philadelphia, sends a very pleasant letter describing the flowering of an apricot-tree in the yard behind a house in the lower part of Walnut Street, in Philadelphia, and of a swarm of busy bees that have settled near it as in hedrock. "A bunch of bees" seems growing up beside a cottage in Wall Street" says the Lounger, much surprised him more.

Where could the bees have come from? Clearly from the nearest hives—from West Philadelphia, with acres of brick and mortar and the Schuylkill River flowing between.

—JOHN HAWKINS, Louisville, Kentucky, answers Karmel the Scout, who wishes to know the place "where hops are worn no more," by saying that in Trigg County, Southern Kentucky, "he can see three ladies walk s' terbakker-row"—which is about three feet in breadth.

—TOMMY TITLY-MOUSE reminds the Lounger that Dickens did not originate spontaneous combustion as a means of disposing of his characters, but that Captain Marryatt had applied the same process to the father of Uncle Ned's Family.

—EMILIE asks the author of the lines—

"It is a bitter task to count
Each hour by throbs of pain."

—G. S., New York, writes tolerable verses, if "Love Comes the Handsome Spring" is a specimen. But he knows, as we all do, that tolerable verses are intolerable.

—"A MAN'S ANSWER to 'A Woman's Poem,'" in the Lawrence Journal of Harper's Magazine, is good, but too long.

—D. W., Covington, Kentucky. "My Excellent friend Home" is pretty; but is it hardly poetry. Is it?

—M. S. B. D. S., Early Grove, Mississippi, who agrees with the Lounger's view of the Washington tragedy, is heartily thanked for his generous note. But it would not be fair for the Lounger to reprint his own words at such length.

—B. E., Canajoharie, wishes to know the name of the author of "The Vestiges of Creation." It is useful to answer the question, which certainly is conclusively settled every year or two. The authorship was given with great confidence for a long time to Robert Chambers, of Edinburgh. Chambers. Sir Richard Vivyan's claim is not yet disproved, we believe.

—BESSIE BEE, Dunkirk, Illinois, declares, in her letter, that "they" could not have been as they are"—by which the Lounger understands the inhabitants of that town—"if words to be lost in admiration." That is not an opinion peculiar to Dunkirk, Illinois. The city of New York is of the same mind.

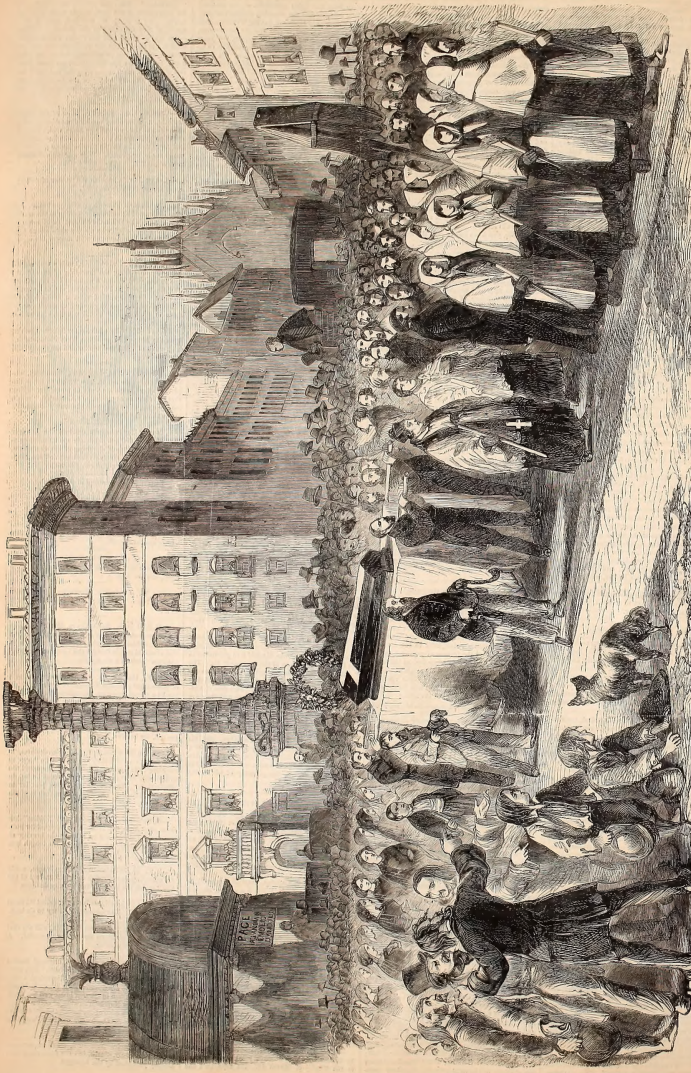
—S. L.'s poem of "Ladies and Biddies" has some good lines, but is much too unequal for publication. Let him not be hurt by the brevity of this notice, but try again—and put the length into strength.

—J. G. M., Wilkinsburg, Pennsylvania, sends "a voluntary contribution to the Literature of the Age," which the Lounger respectfully declines.

—B., Wilmington, North Carolina, will see that it is better to make no unnecessary enemies. A rule worth remembering.

—YOUNG DEBATER, Hannibal, Missouri, desires a list of works on the Art of Extemporaneous Debate. But surely the wit of a society in the Mississippi valley which is able to discuss questions is able to invent them? Find them in current history all the time. Thus: Is Louis Napoleon an able, or only a lucky, man? Was the coup of the second December morally justifiable? Ought our national Post-office department to be self-supporting?

—D. M., Elmira, New York, sends an interesting account of the Dr. Cheever case to the facts have been already published by the Lounger.



THE FUNERAL OF EMILIO DANDOLO AT MILAN, ITALY.

VICISSITUDES OF THE CRAVAT.

THE FAST MAN'S NECKERCHIEF IN 1800. THE FAST MAN'S NECK-TIE IN 1859.

THE FUNERAL OF EMILIO DANDOLO, AT MILAN.

THE engraving on opposite page will not only be interesting to Americans as a faithful portraiture of a funeral procession in Italy; it will claim their attention as an important landmark in history. The person whose corpse was borne to the grave in the procession depicted on the preceding page was one of Italy's foremost patriots. Though only twenty-nine years of age, Emilio Dandolo had already attracted general attention among his countrymen.

The son and heir of one of the richest and greatest nobles of Milan, Count Dandolo, Emilio had, at an age when but few youths have any serious aims, obtained a commission in the Piedmontese Bersaglieri, and had served gallantly during the campaign of Charles Albert. Returning home at the close of the war, he had closely identified himself with the party known as "Young Italy," whose platform is the sentence of the immortal Maria—"We do not desire reforms in the Austrian administration in Italy; we want to get rid of Austrians altogether." Emilio Dandolo, whose rank, address, and military service rendered him eminently conspicuous, was soon acknowledged as a leader of his party. It was the hope and belief of the people of the Milanese that, when the day came to strike a final blow for Italy and against the foreigner, their young noble would then be found in the front of the fight. And when that fight had been won, and Italy had been declared independent, they believed and hoped that their young champion would again be found foremost among those who contended against French intrigue and domestic cabal for the sake of establishing a safe and united Italian government.

So, when death bereft Italy of Emilio Dandolo, there was weeping and mourning throughout Milan.

It was on Washington's birthday they buried him. The Austrians tried to prevent the funeral. They would have thrust the corpse into any ditch. But the popular feeling was so explosive, the rank of the family so eminent, that the foreign despots were fain to swallow their desires, and Emilio Dandolo was publicly buried. The chief mourners were all young men, friends of the deceased; men, for the most part, who had borne arms during the brief and unsuccessful struggle for Italian independence in 1848. They bore the corpse into the church, and there were met by Austrian officers, who, after the priests had performed their office, forbade the carrying of the body to the cemetery; adding that a youth of such rank should not be interred with the populace.

The father, the aged Count Dandolo, a stern, iron-gray noble, replied:

"I am satisfied that my son shall rest with his people in the common cemetery."

And the cortège moved on, the people declaring that, as the Austrians had prevented the digging of a grave, they would dig one with their knives and their nails. When the procession, led by friars and nuns, and accompanied by ten or twelve thousand people, passed the Lion of the Porta Orientale, some headstrong youths rushed forward and strewed the bier with white and red camelias, which, with the leaves, constituted a tri-color—red, white, and green. Shouts of "Italy forever!" "Long live Independence!" accompanied the corpse to its last abode; and the orators of the day, warming at the sight, delivered speeches which, at any other time, would have secured them a perpetual lodging in an Austrian dungeon.

Needless to remark that, as soon as the throng dispersed, the Austrian spies designated, and the Austrian police seized, the leaders in the ceremony, who were forthwith incarcerated. The intelligence of the fact aroused great excitement among the Italians, but strong patrols of horse kept them down. Should war break out, however, the funeral of Emilio Dandolo will be remembered by the Italians as one of the precursors of the struggle—as memorable to them as the disputes of John Hancock with the colonial authorities of Massachusetts were in the history of the American struggle for Independence.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

LITERARY.

THE METRODIST is a novel, strange as the title may seem, and a good novel, with an introduction by a worthy and trustworthy clergyman. The scenes and characters are found among that noble army of men—we had almost called them martyrs —who have made the wilds of America resound with prayers and praise. These scenes are well sketched, and the lives of Methodist clergymen in the distant circuits furnish a wealth of romance for the pen of Miriam Fletcher, the author. (Derby & Jackson.)

MORE ABOUT JONES is the pleasant title of a little gem in the line of children's books published by Harper & Brothers, by the author of "Peep of Day," etc. It contains many of the incidents in the life of Christ, told in simple words for the capacity of the very young, illustrated by excellent cuts, and altogether making the best extant book for a mother or a teacher to use in impressing on the mind of a child the story of Jesus.

THE LIFE OF NORTH AMERICAN INSECTS, by B. Jaeger, is a timely and excellent work from the press of Harper & Brothers. The colored plates are thoroughly acquainted with his subject. He has made it his specialty during a large part of his life. No one is better qualified to write such a task, and no one could better accomplish it. The agriculturist will find here much that he never before knew of the habits and usefulness of certain of the insects he daily encounters; every one will find a fund of information, a world of romance in insect life, made manifest by the researches of our author.

THE ROMANCE AND HIS HERO (Harper & Brothers) is a novel of another uncommon delicacy and finish. The dreams of a dreamer become so realized, yet, like all the dreams of life, not realized as hoped, form the web of the story. A more quaint, delightful companion for an evening's reading than this story can hardly be imagined. It contrasts, in this respect, so decidedly with many of the popular novels of the day, and, indeed, with the popular style of novel, that it is more refreshing on this account.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. W. H. (Cold Spring). On reconsideration you will find that Problem No. 2 can not be answered in three moves.—E. F. (Jersey City). Problem No. LXIX., have shown XI to 9 do. Check, for White's second move!—C. F. The match just concluded in Paris between Messrs. Morphy and Mongredien was played even. In points was in nearly so an one could expect under the circumstances, namely, Morphy 7, Mongredien 6, drawn 1—total 14. Many other friends who have favored us with communications regarding Problem No. 2 will have the same explanation between their present and ensuing our next issue. We did ourselves, with the opportunity to answer in our next issue. We did ourselves, with the opportunity to answer in our next issue. We did ourselves, with the opportunity to answer in a large quantity of blood—a quart at least; altogether the amount of blood was between three and four quarts. There was a mortal wound. The body must have been in a most convenient posture when this wound was inflicted. Jones extracted a ball from this wound (ball produced in court). There was another wound two inches below the groin. The ball passed entirely through the thigh, and came out in the groin. The wound was about as large as a finger. It was not the main artery, just above the thigh. It passed through a wound could not be severe, but would cause instant death in a long time. There was a slight wound on the middle finger of the left hand. There were no other wounds about the body. The wounds were not mortal—they were combined. In witness's opinion, the last blow in the combination was found in the head. The evidence of this witness was confirmed by Dr. Shoe. The

WAR IN EUROPE

James N. Reed (recalled) states that Key had nothing with him but a cane at the time affray. It was a light stick, and not one whether either party had any thing in his hand.

CHARLES H. WILDER

took charge of the body of Key at the hotel till the Mayor arrived. The deceased's pockets contained case of an operaglass, keys, and some memorandum.

THE DERRINGER PISTOL AND BALL were notwithstanding objections by the defense, offered in evidence and exhibited to the jury.

BUTTERWORTH, WALKER, AND WOOLDRIDGE.

The case of the prisoner closed here. The counsel for the prisoner now asked the Court to compel the prosecution to place Messrs. Butterworth, Walker, and Wooldridge on the stand, as they had been witnesses before the Coroner's inquest. The prosecution objected to this, on the ground that Butterworth was a confederate, and that the master not be compelled to criminate himself on the back of the prosecutor. The Court declined to grant the motion.

ROOM IN WHICH SICKLES IS BEING TRIED.

The Prisoner corresponds with the size of the room. Court is held in an apartment about the size of the largest of the rooms ordinarily used in the Supreme Court of New York for jury trials. On one side are the desks of the Clerks and Marshal, upon the left of the Judge, and on the other the jury box and witness' stand. The Court and Counsel are crowded, and the prisoner sits with an aisle, with a brass pendulum, which ticks directly over his head, between him and the jury box. He is a fine looking person, and has decided military bearing. He is dressed in a dark frock coat, with velvet facings, and is profusely supplied by fresh air, more than qualified by the heat of the room. His counsel are near him, some of them, and lean over the high bar which incloses the room. Behind them, and on the same side, there is a desk, looking like a cattle-crate perched close to the bar, over which people look into the body of the room. The passage-way between him and his counsel was not closer to-day, but the crowd was more compact, and effectually prevents that immediate intercourse between them which is valuable to the prisoner, and would be more especially so to a prisoner who is himself a lawyer.

THE PERSONS OF THE COURT.

"It was evident to-day, not only from incidents susceptible of repetition, but from the tone, the manner and expression of jurors under examination, which were not without their effect upon the audience, that public opinion the seem man in its box, that, however the public sentiment of Washington as a whole, or that the sentiment of this class or that class may incline, those who had an opportunity of observing the demeanor of the Court were happily in favor of the prisoner. Of all excitement, only one has been observed, and that was of a cursory opinion. He rose, however, to his feet, and left the room. The gentleman who remarked that, in his opinion, 'it would be a shame to hang Sickles,' and that 'he knew those examined yesterday there may have been others of his way of thinking,' is the only one who were more than one or two, if any, of the seventy-five called to-day, excepting a few who were excused, who did not sympathize with Mr. Sickles. A gentleman who sat next to me, and who, with a number of his acquaintances, says that seventy-two of the seventy-five were in favor of Mr. Sickles. He represents that the feeling is universal—manifest irrespectively of personal ones are often contradicted. The distinction is not expressed every case—even the District Attorney, I am told,

HOW THE PRESS WAS TREATED.

"Washington should feel that the trial is a Fourth Estate. Washington, the centre of politics and political news, and just now the centre of attraction to all the world politicians, doesn't know its own mail, without the aid of which its importance, as well as comfort, would be less. Like certain Members of Congress who read only when it suits them, newspapers are not read here. Yesterday, Washington's newspapers were not received. The reason for the omission was amusing. Such were presumed to be reporters, desirous to read the news, that it was voted to an undesirable one, but preferred to remain within the law, where our reporting is safe.

"'But you can't stay there long.'

"'Why?'

"'Because this space is reserved for members of the bar;' and my valuable friend shared the fate of being thrown within rules.

"Luckily, I was sure admitted to the New York bar. At the announcement of this fact, proof: what a change! Surname became surname, and Christian name Christian name. I was suffered to retain my seat until—pretty literally it was announced that I was the last of the New York lawyers. Then I was politely requested to step outside. Politely—I encamped myself opposite the counsel, and in close proximity to judge, jurors, and witnesses.

THE MORMONS QUITTING DOWN.

Additional advices were received last week at the War Department from Capt. Reid, dated Fort Bridger. He reports his expressed as being on the route, and speculating from his journey of that locality, that the principal settlement of the Mormon leaders, however, still exhibit feelings of hatred to each other. Many of the Mormons have gone almost decided, and it is alleged in small parties to California, while others are preparing to leave the territory. The Indians are also preparing to cause the southern provinces of Mexico, and also in Central America, to which place it is said to found a new settlement, where he will be out of danger and away from Federal influence. The Territorial Government has also much difficulty in the administration of law, arising from obtaining juries of the Mormon faith, whose decision is a frequent subject of complaint. The army is represented to be in fine spirits. The Indians in the northern part of the Territory were troublesome.

UTAH APPLYING FOR ADMISSION.

The Mormon Legislature has passed the following memorial to Congress:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, respectfully pray your honorable body to so amend the boundaries of the Territory of Utah as to extend to the people of this Territory the right of the elective franchise, and permission to form their own Governor, Judges, Secretary, as well as other officers, and to be represented in the National Congress, and in the Senate of the United States.

"Your memorialists believe that the appointing of strangers to administer the laws of the United States in Territories through a time-honored custom, is to say the least, a relic of British colonial rule, and a direct infringement upon the rights of self-government, and opposed to the genius of our free republican institutions. Your attention to this important subject is respectfully requested.

"As your honorable body are well aware that no permission can be or is granted to Territories to form a constitution and receive them, in a Territory, as those citizens of the United States who are permanent residents of the same, the consummation of this valuable reform is respectfully requested to be made immediate, as in England, will your good

THE CONNECTICUT ELECTION.

The Connecticut election, which took place last week, resulted in a majority of between 600 and 700 for Buckingham. Returns received indicate the election of all four of the Democratic candidates for Congress, together with the Republican State ticket, and a Republican majority of the Legislature.

MRS. HARTUNG TO BE HANGED.

Governor Stanton has refused to commute Mrs. Hartung's sentence. In a letter to her counsel he says:

"If Mrs. Hartung, in the full possession of her husband, she is guilty of a cool, premeditated murder of the most revolting character. She has had the benefit of every of the opportunities the marriage state gave her to administer poison, and has selected the most inconspicuous murder by poisoning in the worst sort of murder, and has committed it in the worst way. She has not only disguised as well as administered the poison, but appears to be committed in any other way, there is often the possibility that some one may detect the poisoner in time, but in the case of poisoning there is no room for doubt. The victim is helpless, suffering, and unconscious that he is being necessarily to the crime; and while every application for executive clemency should be carefully heard in its own peculiar facts, I can not conceive that I should feel authorized in interposing in favor of a more premeditated guilt is clearly proved; least of all can I interfere where the life of society requires the law to be executed.

"If, therefore, Mrs. Hartung is guilty of the crime of poisoning her husband, as charged in the indictment, and of which she has been found guilty by the verdict of a jury, and which is confirmed by their verdict—considering the circumstances of premeditation, the fact of her guilty of this crime, and the Judge, whose fairness and humanity are unquestioned, and whose charge was accompanied by warranted by the testimony.' After a careful examination of the evidence and the charge of the court on the statement, I am unable to say that, had I been one of the jury, I could not have rendered the same verdict. I believe her to be guilty of the deliberate murder of her husband by poisoning.

WOMEN NOT EXEMPT FROM HANGING.

"It is urged upon me that the sex of the prisoner should be considered; that her punishment should be commuted to imprisonment for life. I do not think so. I do not deem, as women will ever again be convicted of murder in this State, that executive clemency will be found in no reason for my interference. It is not a matter to be left to the discretion of the executive power in cases, to have not had time or inclination to scan the evidence carefully, and where the law has made provision for the question to capital punishment in general, or by a horror of hanging a female, that the power of the executive to public opinion in a case like this is to induce additional cases where a commutation will be demanded when public opinion is arrived at. Moreover, though there is, undoubtedly a strong repugnance in the community to the infliction of capital punishment upon a woman, it is not to be supposed that the community would not think it is therefore committed a greater crime.

"I am not, then, commute the punishment of Mrs. Hartung. She must suffer the penalty the law has imposed upon her; and I request you will communicate this decision to her. I will be glad to cease to hope for Executive clemency, but to devote herself at once to preparing to meet her approaching fate. I will be glad to see and receive forgiveness from Him who alone can grant it.

(Signed) "EDWIN D. MORGAN.

"To WILLIAM HARRIS, Esq., Albany."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE ARMY BILL.

The debate on the Reform Bill was resumed in the House of Commons on the 28th ult. Messrs. Bright, Cromelly, and others spoke against it, and Sir E. Bulwer, Lytton, Lindsay, and Disraeli in favor of it. The debate was then adjourned until the 30th. The London Spring News says that Mr. Bulwer Lytton's speech on the Reform Bill was thoroughly successful as an oratorical effort, but it was generally felt that the Government had remain to the working classes, as subversive of the fran-chise proposed by the present bill. The Times also takes precisely the opposite view of Sir E. Bulwer's speech, and considers that the effect of it will be greatly to change the sentiment of the House. The Ministry, however, has not consulted his interests.

On the 29th, in the House of Commons, the debate was continued on the Reform question, the House being divided, on a vote, while the settlement motion was undismissed. Speeches in opposition to the Government bill were made by Messrs. Gibson, Bernal Osborne, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Bright, etc., while it was supported by Messrs. Lindsay, Horsman, and others. The debate on the Reform Bill was resumed on 30th. Mr. Cardwell and Mr. Disraeli spoke in favor of the bill, and Mr. Gladstone against it. The latter actively repudiated all Bolters principles, and declared that the Government bill would most not be repudiated as a party measure. Lord John Russell ably and successfully defended the Government, which bill were made by Messrs. Gibson, Bernal Osborne, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Bright, etc., while it was supported by Messrs. Lindsay, Horsman, and others. The debate on the Reform Bill was resumed on 30th. Mr. Cardwell and Mr. Disraeli spoke in favor of the bill, and Mr. Gladstone against it. The latter actively repudiated all Bolters principles, and declared that the Government bill would most not be repudiated as a party measure. Lord John Russell ably and successfully defended the Government, which

The Times publishes a letter from Constantinople, to the effect that the Ottoman Government has consented to the proposal of the Russian Cabinet, but the Cabinets of London, Vienna, and Berlin have not yet returned an official reply.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times of a late date, had subsequently to the meeting of the Emperor and Queen, had refused the proposition for a congress on Italian affairs. Under these circumstances, the time per cent consoling dull at 66 francs 85 centimes for money, and 60 francs for account.

AUSTRIA AGREES TO IT.

A dispatch from Vienna states that Austria, on the 25th, agreed to the proposition for a congress, would probably meet at Milan by the 1st of May. Russia and Prussia also readily give their consent.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that certain conditions, but that they are not of much importance. It is reported that the words, "at the request of," course, insist on a strict maintenance of the treaties of 1815, but that the Emperor Napoleon has given a verbal assurance of special treaties with the Italian States.

The Paris correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph says that Count Walewski has returned to Paris, and that Count Cavour would resign. The Count Cavour would not yet upon the Sardinian Cabinet has addressed a communication to the five great Powers, announcing that Sardinia will not consent to the deliberation on the affairs of Italy; and a Paris correspondent of the London Times says that the Government of Sardinia has positively refused to accept the French Government consents that Piedmont and Prince Italian Legion should be disbanded.

Prince Napoleon had personally insisted upon the admission of Piedmont into the Congress, and had represented to his father-in-law that the Congress would not be not being admitted, Count Cavour would resign. The Vienna correspondent of the London Times says the Congress, but, in that event, admission could not be resisted by Germany. The Paris correspondent of the London of Parma; Naples and Modena being naturally excluded from participation, and the interests of Italy being thus exceptionally represented, Modena because it has never been at war with Austria.

The Paris Patrie says that the Conferences of the five London and St. Petersburg have agreed to the proposal of Prussia, and that Austria has given her adhesion. The Cabinet of Berlin may also consent, in which event Austria can no longer refuse to take part in them.

A LAW-CASE AGAINST THE EMPEROR.

The Paris Constitutionnel writes: "There has come off before the civil tribunal of Paris a trial which is attracting expectant public. It is a suit of M. Ledru Rollin for the defendant. In 1851 he sought to raise money in London by a mortgage on his house on the estate of Montmorency Horbuse, his mother's property, confiscated in 1815. Forty feet of land were sold to the Emperor by two Belgian bankers, De Cock and Verwegnen, became possessed of the property. The Emperor, however, refused to recover the money—the tribunal decreed 'that Louis Napoleon is bound to pay the sum of 40,000 f. to the heirs;' and that 'by a decree of the 31st January, 1852, the Emperor has illegally and tumultuously taken out of family inheritance whatever.' Plaintiffs non-suited.

THE CASTLES IN SPAIN.

"Strange whisperings are flying about regarding the Princess Clotilde. She is said to be of a most eccentric nature, and the exiles want of any thing like anxiousness, either to return to their native land or adopt this country, is reported to have shocked her greatly. 'When I go out with my husband,' jokingly replied to a friend of hers, 'he is a Bonaparte, and I am a Bourbon; but when I am alone I am a Princess of Savoy.' Her Royal Highness, as regards the people, if I follow my devotions at my marriage, almost on the very threshold of the altar and half string their shoulders, as if I were committing an act of idolatry. Her Royal Highness is supposed in no way, but unless half contemptuously, as on a silly child. She is, in fact, the last thing she ever gave pain habituated.

HERCULANEUM AT THE OPERA.

"A very magnificent work has been brought out at the Grand Opera, entitled 'Herculaneum.' The music becomes more than doubtful; but as a splendid exhibition of scenic display, the opera is worthy of being witnessed any thing to equal it. The scene is laid in the city of Herculaneum, about on the eve of its destruction. We are introduced to the Queen, surrounded by a crowd of courtiers and ladies, and the first act opens in a grand manner. The Queen is about to be married to the popular Roman Centurion Celsus. There we have the personnel of the whole piece. Next day the nuptials are to take place in the introduction of Satan himself. Unfortunately, the gas caught fire in the middle of the second act of the opera, and although Madame Guyonvarch executes some difficult vocal exercises, although she has received some of the enthusiasm of the audience, still, only as a scenic representation, the opera of Herculaneum work maintains its ground, if it does at all."

AUSTRIA

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.

A letter dated Vienna, March 18, says: "It is reported at Lombardy, and the rumor is regarded as true in this city, that there is to be a general rising in Central Italy on or about the 25th of April. Should the revolutionists assemble in force in Parma or Modena, and endeavor to cross the Austrian frontier, there will be chances are that the Austrian Government will send a living corps against them, and that the Austrian Secretary also favors this opinion.

"The Archduke Albert will soon leave for Verona, as he intends to see with his own eyes the condition of the army which is now concentrated in Lombardy and Venice. Count von Radetzky has returned to Verona from Milan, as yesterday, and a part of the Court Gendarmerie has received orders to be prepared to go to Verona. Three days before yesterday no fewer than 100 heavy guns were conveyed from the arsenal to the railway station by the southern Railroad. Persons who saw them taken across the bridges state that they were an entire train of more than 50 one. Yesterday a tremendously long train left Saint-Andreas, for Verona, with 200 wagons loaded with ammunition. All the navy,' says an eye-witness, 'were sent across-bales, rafts, rockets, etc.'

ITALY.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE STRUGGLE.

What is true of the preparations in Austria is also true of the preparations on the part of Sardinia. A letter from Turin, dated March 18, says: "Negotiations are not neglected. On the contrary, they are carried to the extent that can be accounted for only by a premeditated conviction—not to say a complete certainty—on the part of the Government that they will lead to nothing. Daily arms and hours of military movements, all in the direction of the frontier. A number of pontoons were sent off yesterday; three batteries of artillery left this morning. I am informed that the artillery at the Venetian, on artillery depot out for from Turin, is under orders to move; the garrison of Turin is under orders to march northward, and the military service of the whole State is formed by the National Guards. In conformity with the new French organization, the Sardinian army is divided for the purpose of mobilization, which means just the same as the Austrian. Each division has a regular name, and those fixed for each duty—will be sent to furnish garrisons at points where it is intended to withdraw the regulars. In short, according to all appearance, every trained soldier that Piedmont possesses, with the exception of sick, and perhaps of a small detachment here and there, will soon be in the vicinity of this frontier. The Duke of Genoa has left Turin, and is expected to arrive at Verona (? Ed.), Joseph, the neighborhood of Alessandria, which places it left of Casale, and Piedmont did but broken himself to Genoa, to organize the sections there assembled into some sort of legion—on very peasant task, but one which that officer, he has had considerable experience in several services, is doubtless very well qualified to perform.

THE EVACUATION OF ROME.

At a conclave of Cardinals, the Pope referred to the evacuation of the Legations, and declared that he would not abandon his unarmed subjects to the mercy of those with the calmness assistance as a nectar and ambrosia to the gods. Nothing could be more unfounded than it was only to exert a conflict which might lead to a greater. The Pope declared that indeed there was a wish to withdraw of the foreign garrison.

THE PAPAL BONDS FOR NAPLES.

The Neapolitan police have been warned that cases of explosive materials and fulminating powder, concealed under layers of gunpowder, have been sent to Naples from Rome. The Neapolitan Government has received orders from the heads of the Custom-house to their agents, enjoining the strictest search and detention and examination of every thing arriving from Genoa. The letter is in manuscript, and utterly confidential.

AMERICANS AT ROME.

There was a grand ball at Rome on Washington's birthday. The American resident at the Piazza was of the illustrious presence: "The sparkling, delicate beauty of the Roman ladies was enhanced by the rich dress of the Turkish and Italian nobility, and I will look in the list that the credit to say that I heard of but one instance of a lady appearing in a dress not of her own country, which, considering the number of exclusive always travelling Americans, is remarkable. Dancing was kept up vigorously among the dancers till a late hour, was the splendid library, and the refreshments were of the most recherché and costly description. The Americans were out in force, and the Roman nobility were delighted to see them. Mr. Browning, with his keen, snapping eyes and unpointed moustache, I noticed in the ball-room.

"And this reminds me of other literary celebrities in Rome. Hawthorne I frequently see in the street, swinging along with a sort of land-measuring pace, smoking, and occasionally talking to a friend. Story is always busy and otherwise illustrious face. He avoids all society, and is said to be hard at work on some new work of fiction, of which is not even known by his wife.

"Miss Cushman is also here, as, by many English critics, the greatest living histrion. I occasionally meet her in society, where she is said to be a very agreeable woman enough, and where she is the star of the first magnitude. She is still engaged on her historical work. The Roman mentioned in my last letter as having made a terrible access, have afforded him additional material for his labors."

RUSSIA.

SIGNS OF DISTURBANCE.

A disagreeable sensation has been produced in official circles at St. Petersburg by the declaration of the committee of the government of Kiew, in Southern Russia, that the nobility express the opinion that this region is to form a new Russian State. The unanimous demand recognizes for the lands ceded to the peasants, and for which they are to pay a rent, a proportionate share with them. The document indicates a profound sentiment of tolerance and liberality.

SPAIN.

CUBA AND THE UNITED STATES.

In the Cortes on the 19th ult. a debate has been made for the production of the papers relative to the negotiations between the United States and Spain, in relation to the acquisition of Cuba by America, the Minister of State declared that the Government had received no official communication from the Administration of Washington or the President of the United States expressing the same. But it was true that the American Minister at Madrid had not administer Cuba well, and that the United States, on account of their higher intelligence, had a moral right to it, but that the Government had not yet made any proposition to that effect. The Government could only refuse to negotiate on the basis of the integrity of the Spanish territory. It was contradicted. All Governments had labored to improve the condition of their Islands, and the Spanish Islands had been constantly occupied with measures calculated to put the Islands in a state to be loaned. Any one had a right to possess in their internal administration, without consulting the wishes of the mother country, and the latter had been accepted if it became ill-to-not think any and was not to be considered as a cause of complaint. The Government had, in fact, done so. The Spanish Government hoped St. Radia would be satisfied with the explanations given, and withdrew the motion.

GREECE.

REVIVAL OF THE OLYMPIC GAMES.

A rich Greek, Evangelis Zappas of Scharlazi, has given to the Greek nation the handsome sum of 800,000 drachmas for the purpose of reviving the Olympic games. The money is to be invested in the funds, and the interest is to be devoted to a meeting of the philosophers, at which the prizes shall be awarded for the best work of the year presented. The principal philosophical work of the year is to be published at the expense of the fund. On the second anniversary prizes will be awarded for the best work on the aforesaid a trial of speed of native horses. On the third anniversary prizes will be awarded for the best agricultural products; in the aforesaid a gymnastic exhibition is to take place; prizes are also to be given for money and laurel crowns. The last Sunday is allotted to the distribution of prizes for the dramatic pieces; in the evening a new drama, selected by the Academy, is to be played, in the presence of the whole Greek competition, for which prizes will be awarded. The first Festival will be in October, 1859.

PARAGUAY.

SETTLEMENT OF THE DIFFICULTY.

Intelligence was received last week of the peaceful settlement of our difficulty with Paraguay. It appears that this speedy and satisfactory adjustment has a necessary been accomplished through the friendly offices of President Buchanan. Copy of the correspondence between the precise terms upon which the settlement is based will be communicated to Congress at the present session. A national salute will be fired in honor of the peace to be on board the steamer Water Witch, and also to the company represented by Mr. Bigelow.

THE SICKLES TRIAL.

We give this week, in illustration of the great trial which is now pending at Washington, a portrait of the leading counsel for the defense, Mr. James T. Brady, of New York, and a fac-simile of the fatal anonymous letter which first aroused the suspicions of the prisoner, and led him to commit the terrible act for which he is now on trial.

Mr. Brady is as well known throughout this country as any other criminal lawyer. His connection with leading criminal cases has now lasted upward of ten years; the skill, science, and eloquence which he has uniformly evinced have placed him, by common consent, among the first criminal lawyers at the bar. Latterly, he has been devoting his chief attention to civil practice, which, if less fruitful of immediate éclat, is more productive of profit; he is recognized in this department, also, as one of the ablest lawyers at our bar. Unsurpassed in the examination of witnesses, he is without an equal, perhaps, in the art of fascinating a jury; while the soundest judges on the bench listen to his exposition of knotty legal points with a deference seldom awarded to so young a man.

Mr. Brady's parents were Irish. He himself was born in the city of New York about the year 1811. He received a good education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar about the year 1836. Early in life he attached himself to the Democratic party, and became one of the leaders of Tammany. None of the young chiefs of the wigwam ever attained more popularity than he; when he was announced to speak the hall was always crowded; when he spoke the crowd was always hushed. Latterly he has seemed to desire to withdraw from the front of the political battle. No doubt he wisely sees that, should he devote a few years to the acquisition of wealth and the conquest of a first-class legal reputation, he may hereafter re-enter the political arena to great advantage.

Within the past few years Mr. Brady has been frequently selected to deliver orations on topics of popular interest, and never has he disappointed his audience. Some of his speeches on such occasions at the annual reunion of the Dramatic Fund Association, have been models of classic oratory. His oration at the Burns Festival was perfect; coming from a man who had occupied a leading position in the party with which he has been affiliated, passages in it commanded marked attention, and conciliated no small respect for the speaker.

Nor has Mr. Brady's connection with the Women's Rights question been less beneficial to his fame. Engaged on behalf of a husband in a case involving marital rights, Mr. Brady was understood to utter views which would appear to justify the husband's absolute bodily control of his wife. This view being warmly controverted in some of the papers, and Mr. Brady's gallantry impeached—he is a bachelor—he replied in an admirable and humorous letter, defining his real position, and exculpating himself from the charge of being an advocate of marital tyranny. His letter attracted so much attention that he was solicited to deliver a lecture on the rights of women. He complied with the request, choosing for his theme the legal disabilities of the sex. We presume that his lecture had no small influence on the Legislature at Albany, which has just passed a measure relieving married women from some of their most obvious grievances.

We should have been glad to have given portraits of Mr. Brady's colleagues in the Sickles case. Our space, however, forbids. Persons who are not subscribers to the Weekly will find portraits of Judge Crawford, Mr. Attorney Ould, Mr. Butterworth, Mr. Sickles, and Mr. Sickles in the last number of this journal, together with views of the Court-house and Court-room, and a very full but graphical sketch of Mr. Sickles. We now subjoin the graphic sketch of counsel employed, from the reporter for the associated press:

JAMES T. BRADY, ESQ.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

"Mr. Gold is a fine square-built, athletic man, of some forty years of age, with eyes small and gray, though without the expression of keenness usually attributed to such optics. He has a broad forehead, straight black hair, and a rather pleasant expression of countenance. Indeed, he looks more like a friend to be honorably trusted than like a lawyer to be depended upon. His colleagues, Mr. Carlisle, possesses more of the qualities usually associated with the idea of a legal practitioner. Wiry, and restlessly active, nothing seems to escape his attention, and the defense seem to realize that they have more difficulty to regret from him than from the Government prosecutor. His voice, like his person, is thin and wiry, but manner and style are nevertheless pleasant.

"On Mr. Brady, of New York, rests most of the labor of the defense. Studiously polite to Judge, jury, counsel, and witnesses, he seems to have more faith in sweetness than in blustering. Even when he thinks the Judge is wrong in the decision of small matters, he prefers to submit gracefully rather than consume time and exasperate feelings in disputation. At the same time, where material principles of law or evidence are involved, none more determined than he, and few more able to defend to the last extremity the interests of his client. He is decidedly the most popular of the counsel for the defense.

"The counsel who next to him seems to be most relied on for the defense is Mr. Stanton. This gentleman is in constant communication with the prisoner, and sits or stands beside him most of the time. What Mr. Brady lavishes in the suaviter Mr. Stanton makes up in the fortiter. There is no ceremoniousness about him. He comes up to the point with a sledge-hammer earnestness which stands out in contrast to his colleague's extreme politeness. He is a man just a little beyond the middle age of life, but with all the vigor of one of thirty. He talks with rapid utterance and great vehemence, though the reporters say he might improve his argument by diminishing his word fluency.

"Mr. Phillips was a member of the Thirty-third Congress, from the State of Alabama, who, in preference to returning to that State when his term expired, resolved to practice law in Washington. I believe he is an Israelite in faith, though entirely restricted to the organization of the party.

"Thomas Francis Meagher is too well known throughout the country to need description here. As one of the junior counsel in this case, he contents himself with eagerness to his seniors. His is the pleasantest face at the lawyers' table.

"Mr. Bradley has the reputation of being a keen lawyer, up to all the arts of the profession. He is a practitioner at the Washington bar.

"Mr. Chilton is a highly respectable and intelligent-looking elderly gentleman, whose very appearance is calculated to have a favorable impression on the jury. He and Mr. Brady are to sum up for the defense.

"Mr. Magruder has but recently come to practice at this bar. He is favorably spoken of. His part of the defense, however, like that of Mr. Phillips, seems, I believe, with the organization of the jury.

The anonymous letter needs no description. It will be noticed that the handwriting is feigned, and that omissions of words here and there appear to indicate haste on the part of the writer. The best judges of handwriting affirm that it is in the hand of a lady, disguised. Public rumor ascribes its authorship to one of two ladies, who are supposed to have been actuated by jealousy of Mr. Sickles.

THE LONG AGO.

Oh! a wonderful stream is the river Time,
As it runs through the realms of tears,
With a faithless rhythm and a musical rhyme,
And a beautiful sweep, and a surge sublime,
And blends with the ocean of years.

How the winters are drifting like flakes of snow,
And the summers like buds between,
And the year in the shroud—as they come and they go,
On the river's breast, with its ebb and flow,
As it glides in the shadow and sheen.

There is a magical isle up the river Time,
Where the softest of airs are playing;
There's a cloudless sky and a tropical clime,
And a song as sweet as a vesper chime,
And the Junes with the roses are staying.

And the name of this isle is the Long Ago,
And we bury our treasures there:
There are bars of bright gold and heaven of snow—
There are heaps of dust, but we loved them so!
There are trinkets and tresses of hair.

There are fragments of song that nobody sings,
And a part of an infant's prayer;
There's a lute unstrung, and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows, and pieces of rings,
And the garments that she used to wear.

There are hands that are waved when the fairy shore
By the margent is lifted in air;
And we sometimes hear, through the turbulent roar,
Sweet voices we heard in the days gone before,
When the wind down the river is fair.

Oh! remembered for aye be the blessed isle,
All the day of life till night—
When the evening comes with its beautiful smile,
And our eyes are closing to slumber a while,
May that "greenwood" of soul be in sight.

FAC-SIMILE OF THE ANONYMOUS LETTER INFORMING HON. DANIEL E. SICKLES OF THE INFIDELITY OF HIS WIFE.

ERUPTION OF THE VOLCANO OF MAUNA LOA, HAWAII.

VARIOUS SHAPES ASSUMED BY THE VOLCANIC ERUPTION.—[FROM A SKETCH BY HENRY M. WHITNEY, ESQ.]

THE last mail brings us advices of a great eruption on Mauna Loa, in the Sandwich Islands. The eruption was first observed on the evening of the 23d of January, a small light appearing on the summit of the mountain. This summit light continued only for five hours after first being observed. A new crater then broke out about 7000 feet above the sea, and about half way down the side of the mountain. This crater continued in action during the night of the 23d and part of the next day, when still another and larger crater broke out about 500 feet below this, which still continued to eject immense quantities of, lava up to the latest dates received from the Islands. During the continuance of the eruption the atmosphere about the whole of the Sandwich Islands was very much obscured by smoke from the crater.

Hawaii, the largest of the Sandwich Islands, is made up principally of three lofty mountains, Hualalai, Mauna Kea, and Mauna Loa. During the last half century eruptions have been known only on Mauna Loa, and these occur every four or five years—the last previous one having occurred in 1855. These mountains are among the finest in the world, and are about 14,000 feet in height. Mauna Kea (the White Mountain) has not been known to break out in eruption since the discovery of the Islands. Rising from the sea to a height of 14,000 feet, with its summit covered with eternal snow, it forms a grand sight. On its sides have been counted over eighty extinct craters.

Mauna Loa, which is about the same height as Mauna Kea, is the only active volcano in that archipelago. The crater of Kilauea, on the side of this mountain, has been celebrated as one of the largest active volcanoes, and has been so often described that we pass it by with the simple remark that no unusual action has been noticed in it during the present great eruption. The peculiar formation of Mauna Loa is such that, from the sea, it forms one of the most magnificent views. Its sides and summit are so smooth as an earthen vessel; and rising at it does above the clouds, with its summit covered with snow, it is a most remarkable mountain. The present eruption was on the western slope of the mountain; and whether we consider the amount of lava ejected or the height to which it is thrown out (1000 feet), it far surpasses any eruption previously known on those islands.

A party from Honolulu, the capital of the group, visited the volcano shortly after the eruption. Their report caused so great an excitement and desire to see it that five vessels sailed, all filled with passengers, to visit the scene. Among these vessels were H. B. M. ship Calypso, who took thither his Majesty King Kamehameha, the British Consul-General, and a number of others. From an account furnished us by an attentive correspondent we give full particulars of the eruption, and illustrate the same with sketches taken on the spot:

"Our camping-ground is located on the elevated table-land lying between the three great mountains of Hualalai, Mauna Kea, and Mauna Loa, sixteen miles inland from Kailua, and some ten miles in an air line from the ocean, which lies over against us on the side of Mauna Loa, distinctly in view. This plain is some 5000 feet above the sea.

"During the daytime the light of the crater and of the lava streams is hardly perceptible. The night is the time for observation. Soon after the sun had set the molten streams began to show their courses, while the upcoling of the lava from the crater became more and more distinct. The reflection of the numerous fiery streams rolling rapidly down the side of the mountain and across the plain lit up the overhanging clouds, making it as bright as moonlight for many miles around. As night advanced, and every little stream and light became more and more distinct, the scene was grand.

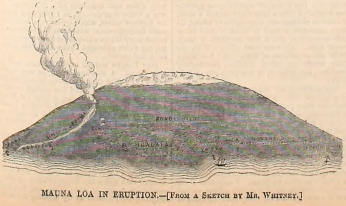
"This new crater, for which we can find no native name except 'Pele hou' (the new eruption), is located on the northern slope of Mauna Loa, at an elevation of say 6500 feet above the sea, and an equal distance from the summit of the mountain. It is some ten or twelve miles westward, and about 4000 feet lower down than the last eruption of 1855, known as that of Mokuaweoweo. The course of the stream, from its source to the sea, is nearly N.W. by N. The crater bears due east from Kailua by the compass, and is about twenty-four miles from that harbor in a straight line. Its latitude, as near as we are able to determine without instruments, is 19° 31'; long. 155° 40'. By referring to a map or chart its position on the island can readily be noted. Over figures, we wish it understood, are only estimates, and accurate observations may prove that we are in error in some of them.

"The actual size and form of the crater can only be determined by visiting its immediate vicinity, which we were not prepared to do. From the distance at which we observed it, about ten miles, and from various points of observation, it appeared to be circular, its width being about equal to its breadth, and perhaps 800 feet across the mouth. This may be too moderate an estimate, and it may prove to be 600 or even 800 feet in size. The rim of the crater is surrounded or made up of cones formed from the stones and scoria thrown out, those cones constantly varying in extent, now growing in size, and again all tumbling in. The lava does not simply run out from the side of the crater like water from the side of a bowl, but is thrown up in continuous columns, very much like the Geyser springs, as represented in school geographies. At times this upseting appeared to be feeble, rising but little above the rim of the crater; but generally, or if anger to escape from the pent-up bowels of the earth, the jets rose to a height nearly equal to the base of the crater. But the columns and masses of lava thrown out were ever varying in form and height. Sometimes, when very active, a spire or cone of lava would shoot up like a rocket or in the form of a huge pyramid to a height nearly double the base of the crater. If the mouth of the crater is five hundred feet across, the perpendicular column must be eight hundred to one thousand feet in height! Then, by watching it with a spy-glass, the columns could be seen to diverge and fall in all manner of shapes, like a beautiful fountain. The accompanying outlines of the appearance of the crater at various times may help the reader to form an idea of it.

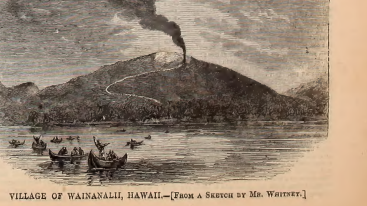
"This part of the scene was one of true grandeur—no words can convey a full idea of it to our readers. The molten fiery fountain of the lava, ever varying, ever changing its form, from the simple gurgling of a spring to the largest fountain conceivable, in a scene that, when viewed, will be pointed, in all its splendor and magnificence, on the memory of the observer till death. Large boulders of red-hot lava stone, weighing hundreds if not thousands of tons, thrown up with inconceivable power high above the liquid mass, a distance of one thousand feet, could be occasionally seen falling outside or on the rim of the crater, tumbling down the cones and rolling over the precipice, remaining brilliant for a few moments, then becoming cold and black, were but among the issues of surrounding lava. So awfully grand, so beautiful was this ever-varying scene, that one who sees it from a good position can not help watching it with intense delight and increasing excitement for hours together; the only drawback being the severe cold of the night, against which traveler should be provided.

"A dense heavy column of smoke continually rose out from the crater, but always on the north side, and took a northeasterly direction, rising in one continuous column for above the mountain, to a height of, perhaps, 10,000 feet above the crater. This smoke hovers over that island, and, indeed, all the islands, and most at times, when the trade wind lulls, obstruct the view.

THE SACRIFICE TO THE GODDESS PELE.



MAUNA LOA IN ERUPTION.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. WHITNEY.]



VILLAGE OF WAINANALII, HAWAII.—[FROM A SKETCH BY MR. WHITNEY.]

During our stay, however, it passed off from the mountain, leaving the lower atmosphere quite clear. We watched closely to observe whether any steam could be seen issuing, either from the crater or from any of the streams of lava, but could not see any thing that could be called steam or vapor, unless occasionally very slight hallations along some of the lava streams. Some rose from the crater itself—only a dense, heavy smoke, which came up out of the mouth itself. Considerable smoke rose along the stream as the molten lava came in contact with trees and vegetable matter, but the smoke was not steam, but the smoke itself. Steam was noticed in various places on the plain, issuing from the fissures, and was the heat was less intense that a tea-kettle could be boiled over it. But the most remarkable steam was that of the flowing lava, which was about a mile distant, coming in contact with pools of water in some places.

"On leaving the crater, the lava stream does not appear for a considerable distance, on sight of which the guide in his way through a deep ravine or gulch, which hides it from the eye. This ravine, which is a mile in length, conjectures, it being impossible to get near enough to look into it, but it is probably several hundred feet deep. The first, then, that we see of the lava after being thrown up in the crater is its branching out into three several distances below the fountain-head. Instead of running in one large stream, it parts and divides into two, and another—perhaps as many as fifty—spreading out over a tract of five or six miles in width. The first of these rifles from the crater the descent is very rapid, and the flow of the lava when from four to six miles distant according to the descent. But after it reaches the plain, where it is level, it moves slower. Here the current appears to move very slowly, there being a principal one which varies and is very tortuous—the whole of which is a quarter mile in width. Through these are frequent divert branches running off from it. This principal stream rushed the sea at Waimanalo, a distance of about fifteen miles from the port of Kawaihae, on the 31st, after a flow of eight days from the crater. The eruption commenced on the 23d of January. This stream, on reaching the sea, spread out to about three miles in width. The night of it as it poured into the ocean, forming clouds of steam several hundred feet high, which, assisted by those who see it to very beautiful.

"At Waimanalo, the village which was destroyed by the eruption, contained a population of sixty or seventy persons. Not a vestige of a habitation or tree of any description now remains, the lava having swept over the village, and left it covered to the depth of from twenty to thirty feet. The natives say that the lava came so suddenly upon them that they had barely time to escape, many having to climb trees, while others fled to the mountains. They also report that a woman and child were isolated by the fiery stream and consumed. The lowland between Waimanalo and Kawaihae is a barren waste, and without presence of mind to attempt to save his property, fled for his life. The village of Kawaihae was soon awaked by the noise, but only to find her house surrounded by the lava flood. Concerned about the safety of those dear to her, she left her house, and, with her child in her arms, made her way to the beach, and succeeded in getting up a canoe-trot; but still the stream advanced and soon reached the canoe, leaving it, with the child in it, and woman and child were thrown into the liquid rolling mass, and perished—a terrible, a horrible, a fearful fate, to their leathen goddess, Pele.

"Some of the streams of lava that were the cascades or falls formed in it before the stream reached the plain. Two streams of water, of about equal magnitude, to be changing and now once formed in different localities as new streams were made. One, however, which was formed on the plain for two days, was about a mile and 80 to 100 feet in height. First there was a fall, then below it were cascades. The color of the water during the night when the bright red-hot stream of lava was flowing over it was of the most beautiful red, and the whole was a cascade of fire, and still the stream advanced and soon reached the ocean, leaving it, still red, to the sea and my ears, and then my hair, which afterward he dried in the towel and combed out before the fire. When all this was done, Dorr led me before a glass, and I looked at myself clean and combed for the first time in my life. I could also see his face in the glass, and on it was a pleased expression. I felt glad, therefore, that I was clean-faced, for I saw he liked me better; and then, and for all time forward, I would have done all things to please him.

I hope I shall not dwell too long on those days, and still to my memory there is a charm about them beyond all telling — that emerging from a state of callous animal wretchedness to a new life and humanity! Oh! the many charming little things that happened! I was like one to whom the senses of sight and hearing had been restored. The dresses, the shoes, the clothes, and the many as I can well imagine, that to me were as new and fascinating me a new soul, made it in likeness of his own.

I grew in body as in mind. I had no instructor but Dorr. He, making my toil a pastime, led my gradually up from the first letter in the primer set out to me the letter A, until I stood side by side with him in his readings and longings. In all things had I changed — except in love. He had always no longer be Mary, I should be called Walt; and Walt I became. I was Dorr's boy — his child.

Not in one single thought did I ever dream of an opposing element. Were not our minds created from one great whole? Were not the shades the tides flesh and brushed into to the breath of mind? He was myself; I could not oppose myself.

And the years went on, while I learned more and more to worship him. I was a child to him, a weak word. I knew none else. I spoke with none else. To me there was no person in all the world. When he was present I was complete, and could commune within myself. When he was absent myself and went and sat in the shade where he went I knew all his goings and comings, his turns, his hopes, and his sorrows, and in my heart he was away from my sight as though he were present. I did not require him by my side that I might speak with him. His presence was not only in body.

And the years, as I say, rolled away, and I was very happy. And as a natural sequence of my happiness came beauty. I know it came to me, even without his telling. Except in my reflection in the water, I could not see with the air of peace and love stamped upon it. And I was very beautiful to look at; I had been of my first clothes, because it pleased him. He sent the blood thrilling to my heart by saying so. He had no other motive than that of gratification. For even after he had introduced me in a great gathering, on which he had come to set the seal of reputation, he led me one night to the Academy, and placed me where I could hear not only the praises of his art, but the commendations of the critics who selected out this figure as the ideal of all their standard of loveliness. I know that all this sounds like egotism, but it matters so little to me now, save only to show the nobility of his nature, that I tell it regardless of egotism.

I was seventeen. Eight years I had been with Dorr Vaughn, and as I turned over in my mind one night the opinion of the world, I could not tell what their expression might have been with regard to this. I knew not, and cared not, whether they believed him my brother, my father, or my benefactor. I knew him as my world, and I was seventeen by my estimated birthday, which by me had made by counting no nine years old the day he brought me home. I had no other record of my birth. And on that day I was seventeen. It was a bright, cold day, and I remember that I was awaiting his return anxiously that day more than common. It had always been a holiday with us, but more so on this occasion by the occasion of a new carpet to our large room, and several articles of furniture, which I had heard Dorr secretly bought with the money paid for my first picture. I was now an artist; I had been paid for my pencil. He came in with a face full of beauty, and gazed around with such a look of boyish delight. Ah! such a change as had been wrought in those three rooms! Comfort had been added for my sake! I came there! We would not leave the rooms we had occupied by the association of a new carpet to our large room, and several articles of furniture, which I had heard Dorr secretly bought with the money paid for my first picture.

I was now an artist; I had been paid for my pencil. He came in with a face full of beauty, and gazed around with such a look of boyish delight. Ah! such a change as had been wrought in those three rooms! Comfort had been added for my sake! I came there! We would not leave the rooms we had occupied by the association of a new carpet to our large room, and several articles of furniture, which I had heard Dorr secretly bought with the money paid for my first picture.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER II.

NIGHTFALL.

"LITTLE MALACCA, where were you born?"

"North."

"You are a new one, or you'd have known that. All the boys know that.

"I mean, where do your father and mother live?"

"Why, I ain't got none."

"Haven't any father or mother? poor fellow!"

"I'm not a poor fellow. I've got plenty of money. Look here!" and the boy straightened himself in his pretty clothes, and pulled two or three bright copper cents out of his pocket. "I buy a seed-cake every time the steamer comes and Saturdays I get a lemon-cake; but then old Green Maddock catches me, and pounds me till I give him half—and if he pounds a great while he takes the whole, 'cause he says I've made him work, and he must support exhausted nature. So I generally give up, except when I'm very empty."

"Who sent you to this school?"

"I don't just know. I guess Nussy did. 'Cause I remember a long time ago she tried to teach me after I'd been to a woman's school. But I sat up on the table the first day and swung my legs; and when she told me to get down and study, I said I wouldn't. Then she asked me why not, and I said 'cause hers was a nasty school. Then she said I called every school nasty. Well, I said, yours is the nastiest of all.

HOMAGE TO A HERO.

So they are nasty—all schools are nasty."

"How old are you?"

"Well, I suppose I'm fifteen," answered Little Malacca. "But I don't just know."

"Who are your friends?"

"Why, all the boys. I don't fight with 'em. But, by golly, I wish Mr. Gray had stripped Abe Newt."

"Isn't he your friend?"

"I don't know. He gives me gingerbread, but I guess I don't like him."

"Why not?"

"I don't know. But what are you asking me all these things for, Gabriel Demar?" asked Little Malacca, suddenly, turning full upon the other with his great black eyes, and shaking the curls away that hung upon his velvet jacket, over which a smooth white collar was carefully turned. He had the air of a handsome foreign child, but he spoke English as nimbly and purely as his companion, who seemed to be about the same age, and was a delicate-featured, but robust and ruddy boy.

"Come," said Little Malacca, "why don't you answer?"

"'Cause I haven't any thing to say," replied Gabriel. "I'm sure I don't know why I asked you."

"By George! that's real funny," laughed the other. "Hollo! the fellows are playing French and English: let's go and join in."

The two boys ran off together and mingled in the game. It was already dusk, but the summer evening is the best time for play. The sport was at its height, and the hot, eager, panting boys were shouting and scampering in every direction, when a man ran in from the road and cried out, breathless,

"Where's Mr. Gray?"

"In his study," answered twenty voices at once. The man darted toward the house, and went in; the next moment he reappeared with Mr. Gray, both of them running.

"Get out the boat!" cried Mr. Gray, "and call the big-boys. There's a man drowning in the pond!"

The game was over at once, and each young heart thrilled with vague horror. Abel Newt, Meaddock, Blanding, Tom Galt, and the rest came rushing out of the school-room, and ran toward the barn in which the boat was kept upon a truck. In a moment the door was open, the truck ran out, and all the boys took hold of the rope.

Mr. Gray and the stranger led the way. The throng swept out of the gate, and as they hastened silently along, the axles of the truck kindled with the friction and began to smoke.

"Carefully! steadily!" cried the boys all together.

They slackened speed a little, but, happily the pond was but a short distance from the school. It was a circular sheet of water, perhaps a mile in width.

"Boys, he is nearly on the other side," said Mr. Gray, as the crowd reached the bank.

In an instant the boat was afloat. Mr. Gray, the stranger, and the six strongest boys in the school grasped into it.

"Let fall! give way!" cried Mr. Gray, and the boat moved off, gliding swiftly into the darkness.

The younger boys remained hushed and awestricken upon the shore. The stars were just coming out, the wind had fallen, and the smooth, black pond lay silent at their feet. They could see the vague, dark outline of the opposite shore, but none of the pretty villas that stood on its rising insects and the regular ruffled line of the oars over the water. The boys strained their eyes and held their breath as the sound suddenly stopped. But they listened in vain. The lazy tree-toads sang the monotonous hum of the night were all.

Gabriel Demar held the hand of Little Malacca.

"Isn't it dreadful?" whispered the latter.

"Yes," said Gabriel, "it's dreadful to be young when a man's drowning, for you can't do any thing. Hark!"

There was not a movement. Every ear heard a dull, distant sound.

"I guess that's Jim Greenwich," whispered Little Malacca, under his breath; "he's the best diver."

Nobody answered. The slow minutes passed. Some of the boys peered round them timidly into the dark, and drew closer to their neighbors.

"There they come!" said Gabriel, wearily, in a low voice, and in a few moments the beat of the oars was heard again. Still nobody spoke. Most of the boys were afraid that the boat appeared they should see a dead body, and they dreaded it. Some of the younger ones began to cry. The throb of oars came nearer and nearer. The boat glimmered out of the darkness, and showed at the same moment dull by the shore. The solemn undertone in which the rowers spoke told all. Death was in the boat.

Gabriel Demar could see the rowers step quickly out, and with great care rwo the boat upon the truck. In a few minutes the boys all moved together and grasped the rope.

"Forward!" said Mr. Gray.

Something lay across the seats covered with a large cloak. The boys did not look behind, but they all knew what they were dragging. The homely funeral-car rolled slowly along under the stars. The crowd followed in the solemn tiditudinous voice of the summer night murmured on every side, mingling with the hollow rumble of the truck. In this manner the procession turned into the grounds, and the boat was thrown to the platform.

"The little boys may go," said Mr. Gray.

They dropped the rope and turned away. They did not even try to see what was done with the body; but when Blanding came out of the house, afterward, they asked him who found the drowned man.

"Jim Greenwich," said he. "He stripped as soon as we were well out on the pond, and asked the stranger gentleman to show him about where his friend sank. The moment the place was pointed out he dove. The first time he found nothing. The second time he touched him"—the boys shuddered—"and he actually brought him up to the surface. But he was quite dead. Then we took him into the boat, and covered him over. That's all."

There were no more games, there was no other talk, that evening. When the boys were going to bed Gabriel asked Little Malacca in which room Jim Greenwich slept.

"He sleeps in Number Seven. Why?"

"Oh! I only wanted to know. But what a splendid fellow he must be!"

"So he is: and so strong!"

Gabriel Bennet could not sleep. His mind was too busy with the events of the day. All night long he could think of nothing but the calmness of Abel Newt upon the platform, and the strong figure of Jim Greenwich erect in the summer night, then plunging silently into the black water. When it was fairly light he exercised on his clothes, and passing quietly along the hall, knocked at the door of Number Seven.

"Who's there?" cried a voice within.

"It's only me."

"Who's me?"

"Gabriel Bennet."

"Come in, then."

It was Abel Newt who spoke; and as Gabriel stepped in, Newt asked, abruptly,

"What do you want?"

"I want to speak to Jim Greenwich."

"Well, there he is," replied Newt, pointing to another bed. "Jim! Jim!"

Greenwich roused himself.

"What's the matter?" said his cheery voice, as he rose upon his elbow and looked at Gabriel with his kind eyes. "Come here, Gabriel. What is it?"

Gabriel hesitated, for Abel Newt was looking sharply at him. But in a moment he went to Greenwich's bedside, and said, shyly, in a low voice,

"Shall I black your boots for you?"

"Black my boots! Why, Gabriel, what on earth do you mean? I, of course you shall not."

And the strong youth looked pleasantly on the boy who stood by his bedside, and put out his hand to him.

"Can I brush your clothes, then, or do any thing for you?" persisted Gabriel, softly.

"Certainly not. Why do you want to?" replied Greenwich.

"Oh! I only thought it would be pleasant to do something—for—for—he's all," said Gabriel, as he moved slowly away. "I'm sorry to have waked you."

He closed the door gently as he went out. Jim Greenwich lay for some time resting upon his elbow, wondering why a boy who had seemed by ever spoken a word to him before should suddenly want to be his servant. He could make nothing of it, and lay down again for a morning nap, for he was tired with the exertions of the night before. He knew that he had plunged into the cold water and brought up a dead body; he did not know that he had dived into a living heart.

CHAPTER III.

PEEWEE PREACHING.

THE Reverend Amos Peewee, D.D., made a suitable improvement of the melancholy event narrated in the last chapter upon the following Sunday. He enlarged upon the uncertainty of life. He said that in the midst of life we are in death. He said that we are shadows and pursue shades. He added that we are here today and gone to-morrow.

During the long prayer before the sermon a violent thunder-gust swept from the west and flashed against the old wooden church. As the Doctor poured forth his petitions he made the most extraordinary movements with his right hand. He waved it up and down rapidly. He opened his eyes for an instant as if to find something. He seemed, altogether, to be closing imaginary windows—and so he was. It looked out the next day at Mr. Gray's that Dr. Peewee was telegraphing the sexton at random —for he did not know when to look for him —to close the windows. Nobody better understood the danger of draughts from windows, during thunder-storms, than the Doctor. Nobody knew better than he that lightning-rod upon the church. Death was his protection at all, but that the iron staples with which it was clamped to the building would draw it, in case of a bolt striking the church, to drive its whole force into the building. As a lord much beloved over the village in the midst of his sermon, and showing frightfully near the storm was, his voice positively quavered as he said,

"Yes, my brethren, let us be calm under all circumstances, and death will have no terrors."

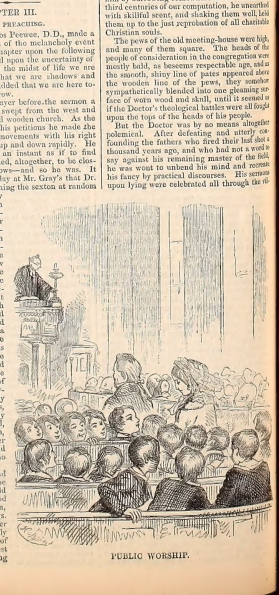
Dr. Peewee had been settled in the village of Delafield since a long period before the Revolution, according to the boys. But the parish register carried the date only to the beginning of this century. His best friends said nothing worse of him than that he was cowardly and insincere. His worst enemies frankly allowed, what it was folly to deny, that he was the dullest of preachers. He wore a silken gown in church and a woollen gown in winter, and black worsted gloves, always with the middle finger of the right-hand glove slit, that he might more conveniently turn the leaves of the Bible, and the hymn-book, and his own sermons.

The Reverend Amos Peewee wished to make Jordan as easy a road as possible for all travelers. He wanted to put down Twaddle under his feet. And yet no man who loved the thing that make for peace he was sometimes rather too hard upon the old Jews and the sinners of Mesopotamia. In truth, he had no bowels in the early sinners. He smote Cain, in particular, hip and thigh. He gave the antediluvians no rest. Yet he did not confine his denunciation to wrong-doers before the flood. On the contrary, he discharged the most tremendous broadsides of invective against the luckless sheep who strayed out of the fold a few centuries before the Christian era. The doughty Doctor did not spare that stalwart sinner Samson: with some belated offenders, who sought to escape him by burrowing somewhere in the second or third centuries of our computation, he unearthed with skilful scent, and shaking them well, let them up to the just reprobation of all christian christian souls.

The pews of the old meeting-house were high and many of them square. The heads of the people of consideration in the congregation were mostly bald, as becomes respectable age, and the smooth, shiny line of pates appeared above the wooden line of the pews, they somewhat irregularly inclined into one another, in reverence of worn wood and shell, until it seemed as if the Doctor's theological tussles were all forgotten upon the tops of the heads of his people.

But the Doctor was by no means altogether polemical. After defeating and utterly confounding the fathers who fired their last shot a thousand years ago, and who had not a word to say against his remaining master of the field, he was wont to unbend his mind and nestle his fancy by practical inferences. His sermon upon lying were celebrated all through the relage. He gave the insidious vice no quarter. He charged upon it from all sides at once. Long hadn't a single foot left to stand upon. White lies, black lies, blue lies, and green lies, lies of ceremony, of charity, and of good intention disappeared before the lightning of his wrath. They are all children of the Devil, with different complexions, said Dr. Peewee.

REV. AMOS PEEWEE, D.D.



PUBLIC WORSHIP.

And the liar! why, he described him mimetically. He knew the fellow through and through; his shifts, his quirks, his wriggings, his cunning. He knew when to accompany his words with the uniformity of the knobby line of shiny heads and sometimes disturbed by some respectable villager looking up curiously to watch the Doctor's face. His portrait of the liar was, after all, his best pulpit performance.

So with the sins of stealing, swearing, covetousness, sensuality of all kinds, slander, arson, and murder. Doctor Peewee had a word upon with them. But then the shepherd must be very, though! he. Sometimes discretion is a virtue, and moderation always is, said he. Like other clergymen and most laymen he had his own theory of preaching. The pastor is a shepherd, as any Latin dictionary will show to the most unreflective. His people are his sheep, his church is the fold, and temptations are ogres. The duty of the shepherd, therefore, is to cry "Wolf, wolf!" the instant the ogre is to beware. But if the hungry rascals, the wolves of entrance, of which every sermon is caught any of the flock, "Wolves! wolves!" cried the shepherd. "Yes, yes," cried the flock; "at what time? what kind?" "Why, you great sheep-ook-ers, my brethren," answered the pastor.

"My dear Mr. Gray," said the Doctor, putting his gentleman when he was about establishing his school in the village and was consulting with the Doctor about his plans, "you must preach—"My dear Mr. Gray," said the Doctor, putting down his cigar and stirring the coals (he was out of an earlier day), "where would society be if the sins of individuals were to be rudely assailed—were more than by general terms? A man's sins are like his curses. Neither the shoe nor the sermon must be too tough. I am a clergyman, but I hope I am also a man of common sense, a practical man, Mr. Gray. The general must love and the surgeon must probe. Men are in proper themes of the preacher. And less there ought be an intended personal application of general truth supposed in the pulpit. The pastor ought to understand the individual characters and pursuits of his parishioners."

"Clearly," said Mr. Gray.

"For instance," resumed the Doctor, as he slowly stirred his toddy, and gesticulated with an skinny forefinger, occasionally sipping as he went on, "if I have a drunkard in my congregation, commendable economy has perhaps ripened, developed, let us say, into parsimony, and, in fact, has gradually slipped out of the category of extermination and an extreme tenacity of hold upon the substance necessary to life. I am aware that his family suffers, his wife pines, his daughters sicken, and his son keeps pace in the house by going out of it, in a manner, Mr. Gray. But as his pastor, know what every body in the village knows, preach a sermon against parsimony, society, a society of brothers? Of course they were of course we must be. Shall we brothers love one another. Let us dwell together, my brethren, in unity," said the Doctor, putting down his glass, and looking at the ceiling as Mr. Gray's study, "and please give me your arm while I show you the morning the coquetry of burning widows upon the funeral pyres of their husbands."

This was the Peewee preaching and practice. And after such a sermon the deacon has been known to say to his wife upon the way to the house, which had a settled shade, like the tint of twilight at vallejo from which the sun has long been gone, though it is but now set—

What shocking people the Hindoos are! They actually burn widows! Very dear, how grateful we ought to be that we live in a Christian country where wives are not burned.—Abram-ham! if you put another cinder on the floor, I'll skin you alive, Sir. Go to bed this minute, you wicked boy, or you will be bad enough to be a widow, my dear, let alone the burning."

CHAPTER IV.

AVE MARIA!

Mr. Gray's boys were several years, which he could command with his eye from his seat in the front pew. Every Sunday morning at the first strokes of the bell the boys would scroll toward the church. But after they were seated, and the procession had assembled, and Dr. Peewee had gone up into the pulpit, the wheels of a carriage were heard outside—there was a slight scuffling and treading, and old Christopher Burt, the oldest and richest of the parishioners, entered. His head was of the purest white, and he wore a queue. His coat collar was slightly whitened with the powder, and he carried a gold headed cane.

The boys looked in admiration upon so much respectability, powder, age, and gold cane united in one.

But who came behind?

O dread of years roll back! O eyes of Youth return! Through the gallery of memory, linked and reverent, she glides forever, as along the aisle of the old village church, almost with queenly scorn as with queenly tread, yet with a calm benignity of womanly beauty. They sail on Indian seas—they fish in Severn streams—they dig in California sands—they climb the Pyrenees—they sleep in France—they smile in Germany—they dream in Italy—all over the world they have been and are, who recall the lovely presence of Mary Gray, the youngest child of old Burt.

All Mr. Gray's boys were in love with her. They went to church to worship her. They went home to talk about her. They went to bed to dream of her. They read Miss Austen's stories from Shakespeare, and Hope Wayne from Austen. They impersonated Imogen; but above all others, she was Juliet. They died for Arabian Nights," and she was all the Arabian Princesses in the unpronounceable names. They read Miss Edgeworth—"Helen," "Belinda," "Leonora," "Harrington!" they cried, and dropped the book to think of Hope.

As day by day walked home after church on Sundays they looked at her, read Hope, thought of Hope Wayne. In the evening of the day on which the Doctor preached the drowning, and exhorted his hearers to be brave, Mr. Gray asked Gabriel Bennet how he liked the Doctor's sermon.

"I hated it," replied the boy.

"Why, my son?" said the boy?

"Because I don't want to hear a man talk about being brave who locks his wife out of his study-door when she goes to see if there are robbers in the house."

For four years this was in circulation, fully believed by the boys then, and believed by them to this day, that one night the Doctor, being awakened by Mrs. Peewee, who reported burglars below, requested that grothy woman, who had a cleaver, to go down stairs, to go and ascertain the facts; and upon her appearance, in order to save Dr. Peewee from being carried off by the burglars, the Doctor immediately locked the door after her.

Mr. Gray did not push the gossip further. He asked merely;

"Where was the text?"

"I don't know, Sir," replied Gabriel. As he spoke there was the sound of warm discussion on the other side of the dining-room, in which the boys sat during the evening.

"What is it, Gyles?" asked Mr. Gray.

"Nothing, Father," said he, nothing. We were talking about a ribbon, Sir."

"What ribbon, Gyles?"

"A ribbon we saw at church, Sir."

"Well, whose was it?" asked Mr. Gray.

"I hadn't seen Mary Hope Wayne's."

"You believe, Gyles? Why don't you spell out?"

"Well, Sir, the fact is that Abel Nevit says she had a purple ribbon on her bonnet—"

"She hadn't," said Gabriel, hotly and impetuously. "She had a beautiful blue ribbon, and lilies of the valley inside, and a white lace vail, and—"

Gabriel stopped and turned very red, for he caught Jack Long's eye, and remembered the fire.

"Oh ho! the text was there, was it?" asked Mr. Gray, smiling.

But Abel Nevit only said, quietly—

"Oh well! I guess it was a blue ribbon after all."

CHAPTER V.

ECCLESIASTICAL.

Forty years ago Mr. Savory Gray was a prosperous merchant in Boston. No gentleman on Change were more punctilious, more blocker broadcloth. His ample white cravat had a set of candor and honesty which quite neutralized any little suspicion that might lurk in his eye. It was so very white that his fellow-merchants would look once and twice at the cravat that he had taken the church on his way down town, and had so purified himself for business. Indeed, Mr. Savory Gray was so good a man that he seemed to be recommended as a corrective and sedative. He advantages were very much familiar to the clergy; and even, in some desperate case, a physician have found a resort to it of signal benefit.

Mr. Savory Gray's prosperous glow in banks and insurance offices of the comfort and ultimate propriety of his life, together with highly polished shoes, it is of inestimable remembrance and moment.

Mr. Gray prospered in business, and, probably was sorry. He had some natural cunning, but a good heart was his. He enjoyed his practical joke and his glass of Madeira, which last he drank at least three voyages round the Cape. His temperament was good humored, and sanguine enough to enable him to slip comfortably through life; and he had married an admirable woman —it was part of his good fortune—who was simple, intelligent, thrifty, motherly woman, to whom the world was a world of duties and not of denied children. Their home was cheerful and hospitable. They were liberal subscribers to respectability, and offered worship to God every morning, noon, and night.

Mr. Gray was a Tory politics in those days, although it was as much the fashion for the Boston merchant to be a staunch Federalist as to wear a white shirt-frill. In fact it is doubtful to this day—and State Street still shakes its head over the question—whether black cravats and plain shirt-fronts did not come in with the Jeffersonian Democracy. The Federal merchants, with vindictive alliteration, did not hesitate to call the political disciples of Mr. Jefferson.

Happily Mr. Savory Gray had but a speaking acquaintance with politics. He was not a blue Federalist, and he never d'd the Democrats. In the summer, noon or the meeting of directors, when his neighbors waxed furious upon values over some old carriage of that old French infidel, Thomas Jefferson, as they called him, sending him and his gun-boats where no man or beat wants to go, Mr. Gray would lay his neck in his white cravat, and waggled his black-gaitered feet, and beamed, and smiled, and blew his nose, and said, "Ah! well, well, well; said, "Ah, indeed?" "Quite so!" and held his tongue.

He was among the second administration of Monroe—"the era of good feeling"—that our friend was a prosperous merchant and these tremendous political discussions ceased. For the era of good feeling was, in our political history, the Revolutionary times; and the Federals and Democrats were the Cow-boys and Skinners who fought there amongst them. Anybody, unconscious shill Mr. Gray shot the angry rapids of Democracy, and, swept by a rare instinct, toward the quiet water on which he liked to sail. People praised the resolution with which he kept his course—forbore to look at the right or prospects—"O wife and children!" he cried, steering steadily, never counting-room.

"My dear Jovilson, you must not give way in this manner. You must control your feelings. Has not your husband been treated by Mr. Gray, as a clerk brought in a letter, which the merchant received from a political editor, as he counted, "that riches have wings and flee away?" he ejaculated, springing up, "I am a ruined man!"

So he was. Every thing was gone. Those pretty villas were shipped and were sung to him as he fled them; they had all gardens and bright plumage, like a troop of singing birds—have we not always been taught that they might, Mr. Jovilson?—and had flown away.

To understand how this was can be a question. His friends said, "Poor Gray! what shall he done?" For they liked him, the sturdy Revolutionists were made of colder stuff than he. They liked his feline humor; his practical, lively jokes; his respectability—and his holding his tongue.

He could not do any thing; that was clear. He could not go into any of the learned trades, shoe horses, nor lay stone-wall, nor take bread, nor keep school. He could be educated to be shoemakers, carpenters, blacksmiths, stonemasons, or book-binders. Ignorant people will not answer for any calling. "Ah! well, well, well!" Threadly merchants pondered and pondered, but could not think of any thing to do during planning. He could not preach, nor practice medicine, nor surgery, nor law, because men must be instructed in these professions, and people will not trust a suit or a thousand dollars, or a case of life or death, or limb, in the hands of a man who has not fitted himself carefully for the responsibility. What could he do? Nobody regarded an insurance office, or an agency for diamond mines on Newport beach; for although it was the era of good feeling, it was not quite the Millennium, and those enormous humbugs for commercial invalids were not yet invented.

"I have it!" cried Jovilson, one day, rushing in on one of Gray's despairing consultations, and never holding a council about their friend Gray without it, that he had met in a book-parlor, and were talking about the matter. "I have it! I read how dull we all are! What shall he do? Why, keep a school, to be sure! Go and open a school! Take children, and be a parent to them!"

"How dull we all were!" cried the gentlemen in a chorus. "A school is the very thing! A school it shall be!" And a school it was.

Every body who knows Boston know the neighboring village of Dedalsid, and its pretty pond, with sloping shores and white villas and villages, and spire—the whole like the vignette of an English annual picture. In the rural vicinity of Boston the tranquil ripeness of old civilization is more than its perverse country where else in the country. It has a pleasing, picturesque, settled, den-like air. It is the same smooth and composed look that gives the landscape that garden of the American eye in England.

Upon the main street of the pleasant village Savory Gray, Esq., erected a large house with an avenue of young linden in front, a garden on the side, and a spacious play-ground in the rear. Here he turned from importing pongees to instructing principles. His old friends sent some of their children to the new school, and persuaded their friends to send others. Some of the Boston merchants sent their young sons of the world, not entirely satisfied with the Asian and East Indian systems of education, shipped their sons to Mr. Gray. Good, easy man, he was glad to see them. He was not very learned, and therefore could not commence knowledge. But he played his pranks with the school are, while he tried very hard to be respected. The boys did not learn any thing; but Lord and motherly Mrs. Gray took strict care of their wardrobes and their linen, their meals and manners; and had an untiring sympathy with their childish sorrows. She was always loved and honored by them all.

Is it not amusing and interesting for us of today to remember that, forty years ago, in this very country, a man who was not considered sufficiently accomplished to raise cabbages or cobble boots or shoe horses was thought fully competent to take children and youth from home and develop their minds and characters? What a droll old era of good feeling it was, to be sure! But then, how it has passed away! Eheu, Posthume! Posthume! Posthume! where are those ridiculous years gone?

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE

Lovely Spring—The "Vrai Monde"—Paris Promenades—The Tuileries Improved in his Gardens—Dangerous Nurses—Infidels, Devil and Democrats—The Old Women who lived in a Shoe—Conversation Lozenges, etc.

PARIS, March 17, 1859.

After all, how depressing are the warnings of experience, how chilling the results of disagreement with the natural hopefulness and trust of the human heart! How I should like to believe that this early, radiant spring was true in its promises; that the balmy green leaves and abundant blossoms were destined to feel no wintry blasts to destroy their prospects and send us again shivering to the stoves! . . . Alas! I know it but too well. April will howl at us the desolation which winter, and even as late as March, March, must be here forgotten; and if it is not April, it will be May or June that will perform that pleasant office.

These were the reflections of me, as two hours yesterday in the garden of the Tuileries, out of the sun-shine, and where it was so cold that though not quite under the shade of the trees, yet looking up to the sky, I could see no positive green leaves. There is a tree in these gardens which will be in May 30th of March," because it is always in leaf on or before that day. This year it is more advanced than I ever saw it before; nor is it alone, for there are several others which have already put on the lively green of spring, though the days are the very most forward, and is surrounded by adhering to the rule, as above, one after another, to see how faithfully the old tree keeps its promise. I for one am to be on my ever considered a prognostic of wisdome to the good city of Paris.

It is not very often that one goes to the Tuileries Gardens, except in May, when they are the fashionable resort and promenade, for then the Champs Elysees were impassable from mud, and dark and dreary with their trees just removed into their present comfortable state, and the Boulevard Malesherbes, to be described by me as the "Bois de Boulogne," which is accessible now by railroad, and thus within the reach of those even who have neither the advantage of a horse or a carriage of their own. But the Tuileries garden has been, too, very much improved in the way of shade, which makes it less damp, and the parterres are kept in good order, and are bright with all the flowers of the season, while there are also many new trees planted.

Last year a large bit in front of the Palace was abstracted from the public and made private, for the convenience of a play-ground for the Prince Imperial. Here, as there are but few little nurses from his drive, the little Prince may be seen amusing himself like any other child with a wheelbarrow and spade, his drum and his gun; and watching, outside the railing, by an eager and delighted crowd, who, with the true French enthusiasm in regard to fine children, do full justice to the merits of this little fellow's remarks.

"What a beauty!" "What a darling!" "Such a sweet cherub!" is the repeated exclamation.

This garden is quite that of children of all Paris, and given up to them and their noisy gambols and their nurses.

These last cause, most of them, from the same part of France. The Burgundy which furnishes this nidi of brown bodies is the best in France. It is a source of wealth to a peasant there when a child is born to him, as the nurses of the rich, outside, eats all for Paris, and is inscribed on the register of the office of vest-nurses. Then when some young wife of the higher classes finds she has become a mother, twenty or thirty of these peasant-nurses will at once assemble at the office, which is made from among them of the most promising as to health and appearance. They soon become truly attached to their little charges, and are faithful and devoted; for, of course, their continuance in place is a consequence to them, as they look forward to other opportunities of the same sort; and as they are always neatly dressed at the expense of their new mistress, and receive the most valuable presents as well, upon occasions such as baby's christening, baby's tooth, or some other important existing event, they can save all their earnings and send them to their own country, where the husband lays them out generally in the purchase of a field, that coveted possession to the French peasant.

You will, perhaps, my readers, think this an odd subject for me to write upon, but I assure you that I have been led into it by my visit yesterday to "the tree of March," and I thought, as being an institution so peculiarly French, "the Nurses of Paris" might not be without interest for you.

Of the Nurses, nothing more remains to be said in the French character than their fondness for children, dogs, and parrots. The importance with which all children are treated by their nurses is extraordinary, and rather wearisome to those who have none and have no intention of having any. Toward the hour of five o'clock, in this garden you see almost all the young mothers coming in search of their babies and their bonne and accompanying them home—in their carriage, if they have one, or on foot, if belonging to the numerous class who have none. Thus for the babies.

For the dogs and parrots this tenderness and solicitude are much less pardonable and enfurable.

I know a lady with all to make going into the world a pleasure, and who rather enjoys doing so, and yet who never goes out of an evening because her dog "Tiny" is so lonely in her absence, and when he sees his mistress putting on an evening dress begins to pine and whine, which she can not resist, and gives up her engagement to remain and see that "Tiny" has tea tea comfortably." In the hotel where I live there are ten French families, of whom all have dogs, some half a dozen, with a regular servant to attend upon them, and no other business it is to do so. Imagine the sprawl and annoyance of this to one who hates dogs and who dislikes dogs. As for the parrots and parrakeets, my indignation will not allow me to speak of them, and such is the force of the association in my mind that I never see a smelly, gaudy-colored-incident and Frenchwoman in a block they are always without thinking of an odious parrot; and, nice ocean, all parrots seem to me transmogrified old French women.

But there are nobler dogs nor parrots in the Tuileries garden, and the children have now come to their homes. The last of these that linger playing about are a band of nine or ten very young ones, in charge of an aged woman, who takes care of them during the day while their respective mothers are out at work. She looks a little above the station of "the old woman who lived in her shoe," and I dare say her poor room is not much bigger than that marvelous abode; but she seems clean and respectable, and the children are evidently happy with her. She has also had her share of toil by day for each child, and the mothers leave a little bread and something to make their little soup, and when the weather is not inclement she also brings them here, and it is evident the poor body had pleasure in the thought of still being good for something.

But another hour has passed, and the last little grocers are going home to their dinners; and I will follow their example without inflicting upon you, as it was my intention, a continuation of my observations, which were obvious ones, suggested by the proximity of the oil palaces and the strange changes I had also intended to have witnessed during the commencement of the building by Catherine de Medicis.

Instead of this, shall I ask you to accompany me again into some of those saloon which, since Lent began, have opened for conversation; and as I am having been to the Carnaval balls, I am bound to appear, sometimes in the train of two or three in a evening, for the week has but seven days, and those receptions must therefore often fall together? My performances in these conversazioni are small minds me of the "Mother Hubbard" rhymes:

"The dame made a courtesy, the dog made a bow."

The dame said "good-evening" and the dog said "Bow-wow!"

for it is often not much more in the way of conversation. At other times I have the pleasure of listening to most interesting and animated discussions upon literary and political events, although for the most best able to do them justice from their position and avocations are enormous; and all the news as from American inner-office.

But I must return from to-day for some remarks upon fashion in dress, the mild weather having brought out changes in this respect sooner than usual; and though I can give in outline only something the amplitude of the subject, I have not much space, I must crowd it into the few inches sent to me by a very fair and considerate friend.

"Bonnets are larger a shade, and very much more advanced upon the head; pokes they are not at two colors, of which black or white is one. They are extremely simply in their trimmings, which are mostly of lace. Dresses, also! are more elaborately trimmed in the skirts than ever, the novelty having run to a dozen flounces, (a great deal of waste of material!), and bound either in velvet or in silk of another shade. Skirts are either full or trimmed to quite plain. Black is still universal for morning and out-door dress."

This is all I have to give you to-day, fair ladies, though much remains untold. As ever!

THINGS WISE OR OTHERWISE.

"In careful how you drink, or you will wash the color off your cheek," said a gentleman, as he handed a glass of water to a lady. "There is no danger of your ever being worn down to remove the color from your cheek," was the retort.

One afternoon about four o'clock the marshal of the Court, who had been but lately installed in office, and hardly knew the judges by sight, met a well-dressed gentleman, who was sitting all solitary and alone in his chair awaiting the hour.

Our marshal not having a watch with him, ventured to ask his honor what time it was. "I am a lawyer, sir," answered he.

"No, your honor," said the marshal; "but as you have a watch, and I have none just now, I thought I might as well ask you as not, for I'm sure you can tell me."

"Well," said his honor, "if you want to know what time it is, you must go to the other end of the room and look on Wyman's dial."

"I can't see it from the window, your honor," answered the simple man.

"Go out, then, on the steps of the court-house on Market Street, and there you can see it," cried the judge, more crabbedly than ever.

"If your honor insists on my going to see what time it is," rejoined the marshal, getting angry, "I'll go down to the court-house and see, for it is only a step;" and he walked off down town, and let the Court adjourn itself that day.

Strolling leisurely about Uncle Sam's big ship-yard, in Washington, the other day, we observed a regular hard-weather sailor chap from a man-of-war, who, in turn, was watching two men dragging a seven-foot cross-cut saw through a huge live-oak log. The saw was dull, the log terrible hard, and there they went—sea-saw, sea-saw—pull push, push pull. Jack studied the matter over a while, until he came to the conclusion he was going to see who could get the saw, and as one was a mere boy big enough to be his son, he thought he could do it easily. Accordingly he stepped up to the boy, clip under the saw, disengaged him and over and, he put the end of the log, and, giving it to the small one, sang out "Now run, you beggar!"

A California correspondent sends us the following: A few years since, in the vicinity of American River, a trial was held before a justice of the peace of the township to determine the rights of two respective parties. Upon the hearing of the cause, one of the attorneys, a gentleman from Columbia, moved the Court that he dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction. This was resisted by Mr. ——, the gentleman opposite, on the ground unknown to the legislative records of the State, the Court was in doubt, and therefore not sure about worrying what he should do in the premises. In the mean time, the counsel for the defendant, friend of the plaintiff's attorney, called to the latter, and, with a wink, quietly informed the justice's wife (who was the best half of the justice) that her husband was in a terrible dilemma, and trying to make her husband believe that he was no justice of the peace, and had no power to act in the case. "Now Mrs. W——, don't you know that your husband is a justice?" "Of course I do," said she. "Well, turn that upstart from Columbia to-to," and going to the door, he pointed to the sign of the "Jackass" hotel, standing somewhat directly opposite, "and tell him to clear out." Upon this the lady, who had been listening to all there, left in a great hurry, and when she had reached the justice's bench, she called him down, and told him that he was no justice of the peace, and that he was right to try this case? You just do it, and I'll be bound you are." The Court returned to his seat, denied the motion to dismiss, heard the testimony, rendered a judgment for plaintiff, who must willingly paid the ——— bill counsel, following them to the bar-room, to Captain M—— for his victory.

It has been truly said that the first thing that rather the mother-in-law of a soldier is the color, his dress and difficulty, is his mother. She is the only one who is not dazzled by the glitter of his forgetfulness and hardened indeed by a veteran. Her heart is unchangeable, and her love is the only one brother her name. The soldier who learns the lesson of piety from his mother, and lays into the heart of her infant son, should always find this a friend in need and a friend indeed, and should he die, but she has left behind her an influence that will wait for her. They say he is broken, but the soul is free, and will do its office.

When Governor Brooks was Commander-in-Chief of the militia of the ancient Commonwealth of Massachusetts, he, with his Adjutant-General and his Aide-de-Camp, rode on horseback to attend a review of the troops a few miles south from Boston. It was a severe hot day, and he came an old acquaintance and friend, who, with his family, resided in Dedham, England, a gentleman more remarkable for sarcastic and satirical than for amiable qualities. He hailed the passing cavalcading, even of his Bible. The General invited the Governor to dine with him on his return from review, and they repaired to the General's house. After partaking of the usual family and social hospitality, the General was deconed on independence part of military duty, the General speaking of the troops under his command. "Why, Governor," said he, "I could not have procured a regiment of soldiers to attend a review in honor of the Governor, but I could get the whole town of Dedham, which will be a review, will do as much as the Governor of Massachusetts."

From the Indianola Courier.

Standing at Point Prospect, and looking at Nagle Pain, one bright morning last summer, my attention was attracted by an elderly man in a shooting jacket. The dress and air of the man spoke clearly of one who was not a sailor, and I was curious to know something about his wealth gave him. Ranging himself alongside of me, and looking at the same object, he asked me, in a drawl, "What is that?" I told him it was a sea-gull. He looked at it with amazement, and at last exclaimed, "Did you ever see the like? I never saw one but built by human hands?" He looked foolish enough, and I could not help myself, I never saw one but built by human hands?" He looked foolish enough, and I could not help myself, I never saw one but built by God, so a wide berth very quickly. There have been innumerable discussions of Nagle's Pain, and many a joke; but I do not recollect ever seeing one from the point of view of the man of sod by means of which I got rid of this earthly pain.

It is well known to most of our readers that the extraordinary excitement has overthrown the Democracy in all directions from this State to the Kentucky line, and that the Democratic Governor of Kentucky, Magoffin, that they would be glad to get back into the United States. Indeed, we have seen at the State line, with no prospect of their being extended. The Democratic party of Kentucky is in a bad condition; when the roads are soft, and there are frequent rains in the latter, receiving himself with a vehement execration, inquired,

"Will not the thunder is the matter?"

"Nothing," responded the driver, busily plying with the whip and lines, "only we're stuck in the mud."

Our traveler, in relating his experience, said he had never seen such mud before, and he had been pretty light sleeper, and been known to have been awakened by the roll of railroads, and upset in stages—but that was the first time he had ever "rim against a mud-bank," and the hotel-tour of the box below the water line; the horses' head and the driver's seat only pointed at the heavens. The unlucky dogs mile Kentucky; and if he does not drop in on the river

APRIL.

Again as Spring, with radiant wing,
To greet the grieving earth advances,
Our April sky, like Laura's eye,
In mingled tears and laughter glances.
One sunny hour, and then a shower,
A glow of heat, and next a shiver;
To-day the rose half opes and blows,
To-morrow ice is in the river.

Through branching roots the spring life shoots,
The sap is swelling leaf and blossom;
In warmer flood the swifting blood
Now leaps through every human bosom.
Dear Anna's eye, though still and shy,
Yet glistens with a tenderer meaning,
And from my cot to own her joy,
We see her heart is toward us leaning.

O Month of Changes! in the range
Of seasons gayest and most selfish!
We give advice beyond all price,—
A maxim worthy Lapidus Collet!
Let all who'd hear thy varied air,
In sunless colds, the hurst out-breathes,
Just sac and ivy, next choose and buy.
The new spring clothing of SMITH BROTHERS.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140
Fulton Street,
Between Broadway & William St.,
THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
EDWD. SMITH,
NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.
The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.
All Freight Forwarded with the Greatest Speed BY THE AMERICAN EXPRESS CO'S LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A.M.; 3.15, 6.30, and 8.30 P.M.

Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and at as low rates as by any other line.

The regular time by the Fast Run is

To Chicago . . 48 hours | To Dayton . . . 36 hours
Cincinnati " 36 " | St. Louis " 72 "
Cleveland " 52 " | Pittsburgh " 24 "
Columbus " 32 " | Indianapolis 54 hours

ANOTHER EXPRESS TOWER in the good time.

Goods for points on Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, Kansas, &c., will have time by shipping by our Line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

Harper & Brothers'
New Descriptive Catalogue

is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application in person or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in postage stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in the line of country, designing to farm Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—EMBRACING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar publications in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, etc., who may not have access to a reliable guide in purchasing books, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a matter of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books are to be obtained any bookseller who is not a local agent, applications with remittances should be addressed to the Publishers, and will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy SEWING MACHINES which will not perform the work that purchasers expected them to do, are informed that Grover & Baker's Machines never fail to do any kind of work. No one is ever disappointed in these machines.

No. 495 BROADWAY.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

AMERICAN GUANO.—To Farmers and Dealers in Guano.—The Schr. Orion, from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, containing 99 per cent. of Phosphate and Ammonia, and no sweet weed which is so well known, is offered for sale, in large or small quantities, at about two thirds the price of Peruvian.

For full information and particulars, address
C. S. MARSHALL,
President of the American Guano Company,
No. 56 WALL STREET, NEW YORK.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR
FLOWERS, FEATHERS,
CORPUSCLES, and BRIDAL SETS, at
361 Broadway, 5 doors from Franklin Street.

MEDICO-PHYSIOLOGICAL BOOK, thirtieth edition, over 400 pages, 12mo, cloth, and about 100 Microscopic Engravings, by R. T. Trall, M.D., Professor of Theory and Practice of Medicine and Surgery, New York Medical College. This interesting book should be in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have a right to, for the value in any other field, and cannot be obtained elsewhere. Sold, and SENT & C., by the Author, at his Office, No. 15 Laight Street, New York. No. 46 Walker Street, New York.

A NEW BOOK BY MACAULAY.

DELISSER & PROCTOR,
508 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
PUBLISHED THIS DAY:

I.
The Life of Wm. Pitt,
BY
MACAULAY.
Preceded by
The Life of Pitt, Earl of Chatham.
12mo, cloth, 50 cents.

II.
The Life of Frederick the Great.
BY
MACAULAY.
18mo, cloth, 50 cents.

Being the Fifth and Sixth Volumes of the Household Library.

Copies sent per mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!
LYON'S KATHAIRON FOR THE HAIR
USED BY ALL SOLD IN EVERY WHERE
ONLY 25 CENTS, PER BOTTLE.

WORTHY OF NOTE for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, on the Lungs.—Dr. LINCOLN BROWN, New York, says: "Gentlemen—I have used your Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam, myself, with benefit, in catarrhal coughs and colds, and have known it to be used with good effect in the early stages of Pulmonary affections in families around me."

Owing to an unprecedented sale and popularity of over thirty years' standing, there are many counterfeits and imitations palmed upon the public for unwary purchasers.

Inquire for the article by its WHITE WRAPPER.

Prepared only by "DR. SWAYNE'S ORIGINAL BALSAM."
Prepared only by SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Druggists, Boston. Price, large size, $1; small size, 50 cents.
BARNES & PALM, Agents, New York.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

In the whole history of medical discoveries, no remedy has performed so many or such remarkable cures of all affections of the throat, chest, and lungs, such as Colds, Bronchitis, Influenzas, Whooping Cough, Croup, Asthma; of CONSUMPTION itself, as this far-famed, long tried, and justly celebrated Balsam.

"Considering all others, I find only genuine has the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed name of the proprietor, on the outside wrapper.—SETH S. ARNOLD, M.D., on the outer wrapper. For sale every where.

PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 211 BROADWAY.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $850,000.

This Company continues to do a safe and exclusive marchandise business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-five per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has reduced the Certificates of the issue of 1858.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LECONEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN G. CHAMBERLAIN, Secretary.

The Home Melodist.

CONTAINING Sixty of the most popular Songs and Ballads. For the Social Circle and Fireside. Price 25 cents.
Just Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

FAIRBANKS'S
STANDARD SCALES.
Adapted to every branch of Business where a CORRECT and DURABLE Scale is required.
Call and Examine, or send for an Illustrated and Descriptive Catalogue.
FAIRBANKS & CO.,
189 BROADWAY, New York.

A NEW WORK ON THE HEART.
Just Published.
Dr. SAMUEL S. FITCH,
Of No. 13 Lafayette Place, New York,
(Author of "Six Lectures on the Causes and Cure of Consumption," "Health and Its Hindrances," &c.)
A POPULAR TREATISE ON DISEASES OF THE HEART AND VASCULAR SYSTEM,
AND
other Chronic Diseases with Peculiar Phases of their
Also—RULES FOR PREVENTING DISEASE AND PRESERVING
HEALTH,
(especially after forty), in one hundred years.

This is a work of the greatest interest to all who are suffering with any of the diseases upon which it treats, or who wish to avoid them. The author proves clearly and conclusively that Heart Disease, Apoplexy, Dyspepsia, &c., may be both prevented and cured, and shows how. It is written in a plain, popular style, and designed for the general reader.

It is a volume of 112 octavo pages, handsomely bound in muslin, with six fine illustrations. Price at the office, 75 cents; sent by mail, 87 cents. It will be sent by mail, post-paid, to any one applying for it, and will be sent by express, with the bill to collect on delivery, at the option of the purchaser, if not received soon after it is ordered, write again. A liberal discount to dealers. Agents wanted. Sample sent in full, to S. S. FITCH & CO., No. 714 Broadway, New York.

NEW WORK BY REV. J. H. INGRAHAM.
JUST PUBLISHED:
The PILLAR of FIRE;
Or, Israel in Bondage.
By the Author of "The Prince of the House of David."
BEING AN ACCOUNT OF THE WONDERFUL SCENES
In the Life of the Son of Pharaoh's Daughter, Moses,
From his youth to the accent of Sinai; completing, at the same time, the Story of his Ancestors.

HIS MIRACLES BEFORE PHARAOH,
PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA, AND RECEPTION OF THE LAW AT MT. SINAI.

Containing an elaborate and richly colored Description of the Architecture of the Egyptians, their Manners and Customs in Peace and War, in the Temple, Palace, Camp, Field, Chase, Mart, Home, and Hall of Judgment.
Land of Bondage: together with
PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF THE
Hebrews under their Taskmasters,
Of Scenes, Processions, and Spectacles upon and beside the Nile, and Legends of the Obelisks, Sphinxes, and Pyramids, and of their Founders before the Flood.
DELINEATIONS OF BEAUTIFUL WOMEN,
Mirth, Amours, Loiters, and Gallants.
AND OF WONDERFUL MEN,
Aaron, Hophni, Phinehas, and the Prince of Uz (Job).
Narrated in a Series of Letters from a Syrian Prince traveling in Egypt, to his Royal Mother, Queen of Tyre.

The volume abounds in characteristic passages of high, if wrought beauty and dramatic interest.

To the 160,000 readers of "The Prince of the House of David" we need only say, that this book is by the same Author, and needs nevertheless a brief and enticing notice.

One Vol, large 12mo, 600 pp., Illustrated.
Price $1.25.

Sent to any address by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

COUNTRY NEWSPAPERS giving this Card two insertions shall be sent a copy of the work by Mail, post-paid, upon sending a copy of the paper containing the notice.

PUDNEY & RUSSELL, Publishers,
79 JOHN STREET, N. Y.
AGENTS WANTED.

DEAD SHOT
A DEAD SHOT for Bed Bugs.
SLEEP IN PEACE.

The most convenient, as well as the surest of any thing ever known, curling up and laying out these destroyers of our nights rest. Sold by first-class Druggists everywhere. McKESSEN & ROBBINS, Wholesale Agents, 91 Fulton Street, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.,
Have just Published:

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. A Novel. By the Author of "Mary Powell," "Deborah's Diary," "Peg Woffington," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. (Ready on 21st Week.)

THE LIFE OF NORTH AMERICAN INSECTS. By B. JAEGER, late Professor of Zoology and Botany in the Royal Academy of Agriculture, Hohenheim. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. With numerous Illustrations from Specimens in the Museum of the Author. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

MORE ABOUT JESUS. By the Author of "Reading without Tears," "Peep of Day," &c., &c. Beautifully Illustrated. 18mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

THE ROMANCE AND ITS HERO. By the Author of "Magdalen Stafford." 18mo, Muslin, 91 50.

THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN. Being Practical and Scientific Rules for the Culture of Vegetables, Fruits, Flowers, and Shrubbery. To which are added brief Rules for the Treatment of Bees. Illustrated by a Map and Wood-cuts from Photographs, &c. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00. By CHARLES MACKAY and others.

THE OLD PLANTATION, and What I Gathered There in an Autumn Month. By JAMES HOBERMAN, of Maryland. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

FANKWEI; or, The San Jacinto in the Seas of India, China, and Japan. By WILLIAM NAVARRO WOOD, M.D., L.L.N., late Surgeon of the Fleet in the United States East India Squadron, &c. &c. "Wonderful Sketches in South America, Polynesia," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE LAIRD OF NORLAW. A Scottish Story. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Days of My Life," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LA PLATA: The Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay. Being a Narrative of the Exploration of the River La Plata and Adjacent Countries, during the Years 1853, '54, and '55, under the auspices of the United States Government. By THOMAS J. PAGE, U.S.N., Commander of the Expedition. With Map and numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works to any person who may post, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

A. WINCH,
Chestnut Street, near Third,
Philadelphia.
Keeps constantly on hand a full supply of "Harper's Magazine" and "Harper's Weekly."

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
The Best Spring Alterative and Tonic.

We take pleasure in recalling our numerous friends and the public to the fact that the well-known Sands' Sarsaparilla may be obtained by the use of this most excellent and reliable medicine. It is the best alterative and tonic and especially for children afflicted with scrofula.

Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 141 William Street, N. Y.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which foster in the blood at this season of the year. By the timely expulsion of them many rankling disorders are nipped in the bud. Multitudes are slain, by the aid of this remedy, snare themselves from the influence of foul eruptions and noisome sores, through which the system will strive to rid itself of corruption, if not assisted to do this through the natural channels of the body by an alterative medicine. Diseases out the vitiated blood whenever you find its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find its foulness retarded and sluggish in the veins. Cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your feelings will tell you when. Even when no particular disorder is felt, people enjoy better health, and live longer, by cleansing the blood. Keep the blood healthy, and all is well; but with the slightest taint of life disordered, there can be no sure health. Sooner or later something more or less telling, and the great machinery of life is disordered or overthrown.

IT CURES

SCROFULA AND SCROFULOUS COMPLAINTS, ERUPTIONS AND ERUPTIVE DISEASES, ULCERS, FEVER SORES, BOILS, TUMORS, SALT RHEUM, ITCH, HEAD, STOMACH, AND SYPHILITIC AFFECTIONS, MERCURIAL DISEASE, DROPSY, NEURALGIA, OR THE BLUES, DEBILITY, DYSPEPSIA, AND INDIGESTION, LIVER-COMPLAINT, OR BY DERANGED FUNCTIONS, and the kindred chain of complaints arising from impurity of the blood.

In order to secure their complete eradication from the system, the remedy should be judiciously taken according to the directions on the bottle. Prepared by

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, MASS.

Price $1 per Bottle; Six Bottles for $5.
Sold by all Druggists every where.

Select Family School for Boys
IN
SOUTH WILLIAMSTOWN, FRANKLIN COUNTY, MASS.
(ESTABLISHED IN 1842.)

Summer term of Eleven Weeks will commence Wednesday, May 4th.

The location is healthful and pleasant.

Number of pupils limited to thirty.

For Circulars address the Principal.

BENJ. F. MILLS.

March, 1859.

$32 50 ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Ashland PER QUARTER. Monument, Mass., opens September commencer May 4. For circulars, &c., address the Rev. RICHD. FAY, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars free.—Agents wanted.
J. LAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

EXPERIENCED AGENTS WANTED IN all the principal towns in the United States for "LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION." To be published in Monthly Numbers, (making upward of 1000 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations,) the first of which will be sold about June 1st, in each of whom a reported District will be given. Sure inducements offered to the enterprising men and Booksellers they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. CHILDS, Publisher, CLARK & BROTHERS, New York.

THE Cheap Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 19 to 50 pages—and from one dozen to one hundred and fifty engravings, according to the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of valuable and attractive reading than will be found in any other periodical of the day.

At no period since the commencement of the Magazine have its literary and artistic resources been more ample and varied. Each of the Publishers' Periodicals is of that Periodical for the past as the best guarantee for the continuance and improvement of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . . . 2 50
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together one year, $5 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER PUBLISHED IN THE U.S.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $3 00 A YEAR.

(From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 15, 1859.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty-two numbers of this attractive and deservedly popular publication, forming the last year, have been gathered into a single volume, and the publishers have done well to issue a second edition of the same, for the benefit of those who have lost the earlier numbers. There is a complete history of every thing of interest to the public during the year, and many illustrations of the leading topics—there are the graceful tributings out always trifling, but always and deservedly instructive of the Exhibition; there are the tales and stories of Dickens, Dickens, Thackeray, Bulwer, and many and to be had of no other; and, above all, there are those striking wood-cut representations of the most important of the public and fashions, and of customs and countries—all sustained at a high standard of merit, and to be had of no other. It is a grand picture-book of the human life of the nineteenth century, and will be found a most valuable work for every family circle, instructive, entertained, by Parlor, old and thoughtful, the young and gay; the man of business, the man of leisure.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

Advertisements will be received by the Publishers for insertion in the Weekly Magazine or more.

Persons in the City or State of New York wishing to subscribe for HARPER'S WEEKLY, can have their numbers left at their houses, will please send their names and residences to the Publishers, or to any of their agents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE MODERN TANTALUS.

The sympathies of the Benevolent are solicited for this unfortunate Lady, who is perishing with thirst in the presence of the most admirable Lemonade. Alas! she can not reach it herself, and the gallant page vainly endeavors to charm the inventor of happy which surround her.

Fifth Year of the Enterprise!

NEW LIST OF GIFTS, FOR 1859.

CATALOGUES FREE TO ALL.

G. G. EVANS,

AT HIS ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK STORE,

No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia,

Commenced business in 1854, with an enlarged Catalogue, a greater variety of Gifts, increased facilities for buying Goods and for other business, and is now prepared to offer greater inducements to Book buyers than ever before.

The Gift Book system, which from its first commencement EVANS is determined to sustain, and in it he will always be conducted under that system in a more liberal and impartial manner than any other. Buying Gift Books almost all upplicable, and having the legitimacy of his plan of operation acknowledged from Maine to California, he can afford to be generous. Try him, and judge for yourself.

SCHEDULE OF GIFTS.

Patent English Lever Gold Watches, $100 00
Ladies' Patent Lever Gold Watches, 50 00
Ladies' 18k. Extra Gold Lever Watches, 25 00
Ladies' 18k. Case Gold Lever Watches, open dial, 20 00
Gents' Silver Lever watches, 20 00
Gents' Silver Lever Watches, 15 00
Gents' Silver Lever Watches, 12 00
Parlor Time Pieces, new pattern, 10 00
Ladies' Engraved Block 18K Breast Pattern, 10 00
Ladies' do. Plain do. do. 12 00
Ladies' Cameo Sets, (Pin and Drops,) extra fine 10 00
Ladies' do. do. do. 8 00
Ladies' Gold Breast Pins, Stone Settings, 10 00
Ladies' Gold Bracelets, plain or engraved Band, 5 00
Ladies' Gold Bracelets, Stone Settings, new pattern, 7 00
Gent's best English plated Vest Chains, 5 00
Ladies' Gonds, or Cincinnatus Chains, choice, 3 00
Large Gold Spring Lockets, with double cases, 5 00
Large Gold Snap Lockets, do. do. 5 00
Medium size, No. 3, Lockets, do. do. 3 00
Heavy Gold Pencil Cases, with Gold Pens, 2 50
Superior Gold Pens, with Holders and Ink, 2 00
Ladies' Gold Pencils, 2 00
Gents' Heavy Gold Pencils, 3 00
Gents' Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Pencils, 2 00
Ladies' Gold Pens, in Boxes with Pearl Holders, 1 50
Ladies' Mosaic Gold Stone Sets, 10 00
Ladies' Mosaic Gold Pins, (Pin and Drops, 10 00
Ladies' Mosaic Gold Pins, do. do. 5 00
Ladies' Lava, do. do. 3 00
Ladies' Cameo Pins, large size, 5 00
Ladies' do. do. medium, 3 50
Ladies' do. do. small, 2 50
Ladies' Gold Stone Pins, small, 2 00
Ladies' Gold Head Miniature, 2 00
Ladies' Plain Gold Pins, new pattern, 2 50
Ladies' do. Ear Drops, 2 00
Misses' do. Gold Pins, 1 50
Gents' Cameo Pins, oval centre, 2 00
Gents' Cameo Scarf Pins, 1 00
Gents' Engraved Gold do. Bosom Studs, 5 00
Gents' Engraved Gold do. do. 2 50
Gents' Plain do. do. 2 00
Gents' Stone Bosoms, 2 00
Ladies' do. do. 2 00
Ladies' Pearl Card Cases, 3 00
Ladies' Cameo, Mosaic, or Gold Stone Ribbon Pins, 1 50
Ladies' Pearl Pocket Knives, 3 blades, best quality, 1 50
Misses' Lava Pins, 1 50
Gents' Gold Watch Keys and Pencils combined, 1 00
Gents' Gold Toothpicks, with Slides, 1 00
Gents' Gold Watch Keys, with Slides, 2 00
Ladies' do. do. 1 50
Sets Silver-Plated Tea Spoons, 9 00
Silver-Plated Butter Knives, 3 00
Ladies' or Gents' Parte-monnaies, 2 00
Gents' Gold Watch Keys or Vest Hooks, 1 00
Ladies' Florentine Breast Pins, 3 50
Ladies' do. do. 2 50
Ladies' Mosaic do. do. 2 00
Ladies' Cameo Ear Drops, 2 50
Misses' do. do. 2 00
Misses' Ear Drops, with Stone Settings, 2 00
Misses' Gold Bracelet, Half Round Band, 4 00
Misses' do. do. 2 00
Gents' Scarf Pin, 2 00
Gents' Jet Studs, 1 00
Gents' Jet Sleeve Buttons, " 1 00
Miscellaneous Gifts, not enumerated in the above 25 cents to $50 00

List, varying from

☞ $500 worth of the above Gifts will be impartially distributed among Purchasers with every $1000 worth of Books sold. All Books sold at Publishers' lowest prices. All Books that Evans does not publish himself are bought direct from the Publishers, and in large quantities. Books to suit every taste are to be found on his Catalogue, at prices which would be an inducement even without the Gift System, which offers so many additional advantages.

Works by the most popular authors, living and dead, in all styles, from the most costly to the plain and substantial at astonishing low prices.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

Bayard Taylor's Travels,	Works of Dean Swift,
Works of Ben Jonson,	" Judge Haliburton,
" Burns,	" Washington Irving,
" De Foe,	" Fenimore Cooper,
" Addison,	" Sir Walter Scott,
" Thackeray,	Works of Benj. Franklin,
" Dr. Johnson,	" Thos. Jefferson,
" J. T. Cooper,	" Charles Dickens,
" A. T. Headley,	" Mrs. Southworth,
" Frank Forrester,	" Mrs. Hentz,
" Hugh Miller,	" Miss Sedgwick,
" Capt. Marryat,	" Virginia Townsend,
" Charlotte Bronte,	" S. M. Smucker,
" Washington Irving,	" T. S. Arthur,
" Grace Aguilar,	" J. B. Jones,
" Mrs. Sigourney,	" T. B. Thompson,
" Capt. Maryatt,	" Sam Slick,
" Peter Parley,	" Jane Austin,
" Mrs. Moodie,	" Morton Harland,
" Smollett,	" Mary Howitt,
" Fielding,	" Charles Lamb,
" Perry,	" Edward Everett,
" Wilkie,	" Wm. Howitt,
" Alison,	" Lord Bacon.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY BY THE MOST CELEBRATED AUTHORS:

Alison,	Bancroft,
Hume,	Macaulay,
Marmsley,	Russell,
Prescott,	Ferguson,
Gibbon,	Robin,
Robertson,	Lord,
Headley,	Sparks,

And a host of others, too numerous to mention.

THE ANCIENT AND MODERN POETS.

Bailey,	Milton,
T. S. Reid,	Spenser,
Mrs. Landon,	Chaucer,
Byron,	Mrs. Hemans,
Scott,	Mrs. Norton,
Moore,	Keasbie,
Dryden,	Longfellow,
Pope,	Tennyson,
Gray,	Whittier,
Leigh Hunt,	Lowell,
Mrs. Sigourney,	Bentley,
Bacon,	E. W. Ellsworth,
Southey,	Hood,
H. Kirk White,	Tupper,
Shelley,	Goldsmith,
Mrs. Jamieson,	Wordsworth,
Alice Carey,	Shakespeare,
Allen,	Bryant.
Edgar A. Poe,

He has the same to cover in all styles of binding, from plain cloth to the finest calf and antique, to suit all classes of purchasers, as he has in all parts of the country, and also in the country, besides the additional advantages of a Gift with each book sold.

ALBUMS FOR THE LADIES.

Albums of all sizes and all styles of binding, to suit all tastes, profusely illustrated with steel and colored Steel Engravings.

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, AND HYMN BOOKS.

Methodist Hymn Books,	Episcopal Prayer Books,
Baptist Hymn Books,	Catholic Prayer Books,
Lutheran Hymn Books,	Presbyterian Hymn Books,

Of all sizes, and bound in all styles, Antique, Turkey Morocco, Antique, Velvet, &c., with and without clasps.

GIFT BIBLES.

A large assortment of Family Bibles, of all descriptions and all prices, from $1 to $100, containing only a few engravings, printed with large type, on good paper and in various styles of binding, from the simplest to the most ornamental. Also, Pulpit Bibles, in various styles, at low prices.

☞ A complete Classified Catalogue of Books, in every department of literature, containing a complete List of Gift Books, full instructions and a plan of the system of forming Clubs, will be sent free to any part of the Union. Persons wishing to form Clubs, should send for it at once, a large number being now making out their lists. Send for it, and you will be convinced of the elegance and variety of the Books, besides being pleased with the liberality of the system.

Orders from the country promptly and satisfactorily filled, and goods sent by mail or express to any part of the country. Any Book published in the United States, the retail price of which is One Dollar or upwards, will be promptly sent by mail on receipt of publisher's price, with postage as per catalogue.

Liberal commissions allowed to all persons forming Clubs. Persons acting as Agents for us can reap all the advantages of the Gift system without any cost to themselves,thus getting a library of good books in a very short time; besides which, the Gifts received with the commission books, will sell for more than enough to pay for the time spent in getting them.

Agents wanted in every town in the Union. Persons wishing to act as such, and all those desirous of a Catalogue, will confer a favor by sending their address to

G. G. EVANS,

Gift Book-Store and Publishing House,

439 CHESTNUT STREET,

Philadelphia, Pa.

P. P. P.

PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They mouth pain: they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated impurities and accretion from the system: they impart strength: they are divided in sections, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous; all impure secretions pass off, and they can not become offensive, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster, and can be kept at 25 cents from others at 50. Where these Plasters are, pain can not exist. Weak persons, public speakers, delicate females, or any affected with sick, chest, or back pains, should try them. You will find them for sale at all the Drug Stores, and recommended by the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp with each Plaster.

BARNES & PARK, 12 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.

JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Premature Loss of the Hair, which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of

Burnett's Cocoaine.

It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

Burnett's Cocoaine

is, at the same time, unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

It costs fifty cents for a half pint bottle.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S ROSEMARY

ROSE MARY.

is the best dressing for the hair known.

The Rosemary will restore hair to bald heads.

The Rosemary will remove dandruff.

The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.

The Rosemary has not been and can not be surpassed, securing to all a clean, healthy scalp and beautiful hair.

The Proprietor can furnish proof to customers that these statements are true. Bonn will send the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.

Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 17 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.

Sold by Dealers generally.

PHALON & SON'S

COCOINE

FOR PRESERVING AND PREBEAUTIFYING THE HAIR

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Price 25 and 50 Cents per Bottle.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Moths, Ants, Flies, Mosquitoes, and the Vermin Kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is inestimable. In warm weather all such insects become very annoying fees. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A Professor of Botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the ferns of Asia, observed that all insects in search upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night quarters from those intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to retain the effect of age and exposure. Numerous certificates have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and from celebrated and horticultural editors and scientists.

Letter from the President of the U. S.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1853.

"MR. EDWARDS LYON,—DEAR SIR: I have pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commissioners of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

"MILLARD FILLMORE, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

NEW YORK, October 1st, 1858.

"MR. E. LYON,—DEAR SIR:—We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.

"Yours, respectfully, DR. CHILTON."

"LAURANCE HALL, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital."

Mr. John L. Rome, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powder, and finds an immense relief."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in a powder of this kind. Reference to be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Hall, President of the American Institute; James Gordon Bennett, Gen. Winfield Scott, Capt. W. J. Hall, A. M. Frank, of the New Orleans Picayune, &c., &c. Judge Meigs says, "This discovery of Prof. Lyon's is a great blessing to the world." Horace Greeley has tested it thoroughly. It will destroy insects, grubworms, ants, moths, bugs, and all vermin. Trees and plants can be propelled, and insects annihilated, &c.

Arrangements are now made through Messrs. BARNES & PARK, of New York, to have it sold throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!

"NEW YORK, November 8th, 1858.

"In retiring from business, I have sold all my Insect Powders and Pills, Letters-Patent, and the secrets pertaining thereto, to Messrs. BARNES & PARK. The process is a discovery made by myself, and brought from its native home in Asia by a botanist known to my employers. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin cans, with my signature on the label. E. LYON."

Bats and mice can not be reached by a powder, and are killed by Lyon's Magnetic Pills. Sweep them through any crevice.

But Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
Lyon's Pills are mixed for rats and mice.

Sample Packages, prepaid by mail, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions. Use Forty and thoroughly.

BARNES & PARK,

12 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.

GET NO OTHER. — If you are suffering from colds, wounds, sores, bruises, chapped hands, erysipelas, eruptions, chilblains, or any skin disease, you will find the greatest healing remedy ever discovered. Sold by all druggists, 25 cents a box.

☞ Prince Imperial Champagne

DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,

As used at the

IMPERIAL TABLES OF THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE.

Can be had at all the leading hotels, and from all the principal dealers throughout the country.

E. V. HADDEN & CO., Importer,

CORNER OF BROADWAY AND BARCLAY STREET.

Genin's "607 Style."

☞ THE HAT FOR YOUNG MEN. ☜

☞ A Wonder. ☜

☞ A Season of Wonders! ☜

☞ NO ONE OLD IDEA ABOUT IT! ☜

☞ THOROUGHLY ORIGINAL. ☜

☞ THIS ☜

☞ COMES TO HIM. ☜

☞ GENIN, 507 Broadway. ☜

For Spring and Summer Reading.

PICTURES OF COUNTRY LIFE. By ALICE CARY, Author of "Married, not Mated," &c. One vol. 12mo. Price $1.

STAR PAPERS; or, Experiences of Art and Nature. By HENRY WARD BEECHER, 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

TRUE TO THE LAST; or, Alone on a Wide, Wide Sea. By J. T. HEADLEY. 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

MADAME DE VERTI'S SOUVENIRS OF TRAVEL. 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

THE METHODIST; Its Incidents and Characters from Life in the Baltimore Conference. By MIRIAM COLEMAN. 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

TRAVELS IN ALGERIA. By Gen. L. DESVAUX, Author of "The Para Papers," &c. 1 vol. 12mo. $1.

WILD NORTHERN SCENES; Or, Sporting Excursions with Rifle and Rod. 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

MARRIED, NOT MATED; Or, How they lived at Woodside and Throckmorton Hall. By ALICE CARY. 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

THE SPARROWGRASS PAPERS. By F. S. COZZENS. Illustrated by DARLEY. 12mo, cloth. $1 25.

For sale by all Booksellers.

G. P. PUTNAM & JACKSON,

Publishers, New York.

The publishers will send either of the above by mail to any part of the United States, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 121.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

I have been in a house in 15th St with Mr Key, how many times I dont know x x x

MRS. SICKLE'S CONFESSION.

THE fac-simile on the preceding page is another link in the painful tragedy which is now being worked out at Washington. We give in our own columns a full report of the trial as far as it has gone. On the fac-simile, the only remark we will make is, that the contrast between the neat, close, small writing with which the document begins, and the large, skrawly penmanship of the close, shows the fearful struggle through which the unfortunate woman had passed.

MY LIFE IS WRONG.

BY E. H. STODDARD.

WHAT shall I do to live aright?
My life is wrong, I feel it so:
I have been a muffled wave,
I perish with a nameless blight.

When I was young I suffered more,
But I was happier, wiser then;
I lived my life like other men,
I bore the burdens that they bore.

There was a sweetness then in tears,
There was a bitterness in pain;
Nor sweet, nor bitter, now remain,
They perished with my early years.

I lived, I know not how; but now
I know too well the way I live;
But what does all my knowledge give?
Another beauty, an aching love.

This is my sorrow day and night,
The secret of my troubled song,
"My life is wrong! My life is wrong;
What shall I do to make it right?"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1859.

PROGRESS OF SCIENCE AND ART.

IT is quite evident to any one who gives him self the trouble to think on the subject, that the absence of hereditary fortunes in this country must in the nature of things lead to a more lavish expenditure of money here for the gratification of artistic, literary, and scientific taste than is witnessed in any foreign State.

When a man makes money abroad, he sets at once to work to found a great family. He buys an estate, on the revenue of which he designs at least one of his sons to live in idleness — "like a gentleman," as the silly phrase goes; the balance of his means is absorbed in providing for his other children. Thus but little is left for the encouragement of science or art.

Here precisely the contrary is the rule. Overwhelming prosperity has converted every man of this person that the worst service a father can render his son, in the United States, is to leave him a fortune; and few of our wise rich men now commit the blunder. The sons of the rich—as a general rule—are bred to work. The natural impulse of the father, if he be a sound-minded man, is to drive out of his son's mind any hope that he may hereafter rely on a patrimonial fortune. The wiser the father, the less the son is taught to expect from him, and, consequently, on the one hand, the son becomes a useful and self-supporting member of society, while, on the other, the father enjoys ample means of encouraging art, science, and letters, by a judicious use of his fortune.

We do not say that this is always the case. There are among us foolish fathers who live meanly in order to leave fortunes at death to thereby ruin them. But these unwise persons are, we hope and believe, becoming every day more exceptional cases.

The rule is, that every year more and more money—amounting in the aggregate to a sum which would appear European—is annually available for the encouragement of art, science, and letters in the United States.

Evidences of the fact surround us on every side. Professor Agassiz the other day suggested that a museum of geology, conchology, etc., should be erected at Boston. The rich mass of that city came forward at once, and $75,000 have already been subscribed for the purpose. In New York we shall shortly have an Astronomical Observatory, which will probably be the most complete on the globe—such the cost will, of course, be defrayed by individual contributions. There is some talk of a zoological collection in the new Central Park. This will probably likewise be realized. Of the Peter Cooper Institute and the Astor Library it is unnecessary to speak.

Art, too, is being encouraged in a new and liberal manner. We believe that painters of the rank of Gignoux and Church now obtain prices for their works which would be considered very handsome in Europe. All the American artists who have shown respectable ability obtain orders enough to keep them busy. Our sculptors have not always been so fortunate; but the demand for "marbles" is on the increase. We may mention that a citizen of this city has just given an order to a New York lady, Miss Emma Stebbins, now at Rome, for statuary which will probably cost several thousand dollars. It will be a most admirable investment.

The demand for books increases steadily. Even during the revulsion, when all other branches of business fell away, the book trade continued active and healthy. Fewer failures occurred in the book than in any other trade. Public taste in respect of books is improving. People prefer large books that are well got up to cheap, shabby publications. Yellow-covered literature is on the wane. Men are forming libraries all over the country; they desire solid books, well printed, on good paper, and with substantial bindings. The market for very handsome books, with elaborate illustrations, is now very large. Expensive gift-books, if intrinsically valuable, sell far more readily here than in England.

Yet this is only the beginning of the development of sound taste in the United States. The citizen of New York who boasted that, though he hadn't a picture or a statue in the world, his drawing-room chairs cost him fifty dollars apiece, is a type of only yesterday. A few years hence he will be an extinct species.

THE CONTEST IN EUROPE.

SOME of the English journals, which view European politics through the film of a decided prejudice against the French Emperor and the Third, desire the people of the civilized world to refrain from sympathizing with Italy, because, they say, if the Italians deserve freedom, they will achieve it themselves. An infinitely respectable, though a toast-and-water poet, Mr. Cowper, conveyed the same idea in some of his mild verses.

History, however, teaches that nations never secure permanent freedom, have seldom recovered their liberty without foreign aid.

The only two tolerably free countries on the earth are Great Britain and the United States. Neither of the two have ever been subject to despotism. In theory, the Tudor reigns in Great Britain were despotic. In practice, they uncommonly deferential to the barons, and even the rights of the common subject were respected, in a general rule. In the American Colonies, prior to the Revolution, the British Crown assumed to exercise all unlimited power, but it tried to exercise that sway in practice. It was met by so uncompromising and resolute a resistance that it never persevered in that one; and that one experiment led to Lexington. In neither country has despotism practically prevailed for over a year at a single time.

Looking abroad, on the contrary, we find every where evidences of practical despotism asserted and successfully maintained for centuries. The Austrian, French, Russian, and Spanish people enjoy more real freedom to-day than they ever enjoyed before. Then there existed no free press; but, till lately, their sleeping and waking were settled by royal edicts. True, they have the right of assemblage as free agents, but till within a few years, citizens of these countries dressed and traveled under the special favor of royal permits. The clear conclusion of history is that for centuries despotism has been the rule in these countries, now under one name, now under another; but practically the same in essence.

There are four countries in Europe (besides England) which have struggled for freedom. These countries are Spain, Italy, Greece, and the long struggle in Italy. These countries are Poland, Switzerland, Corsica, and Greece. All these countries not one but a series of partial efforts the object sought by its people. Poland committed the error which is now breaking the back-bone of Mexican liberty. The most admirable native methods adopted by the Polish patriots were defective; and, however unjust in theory the dismemberment of Poland was, practically she forced little when it was blotted out from the map, and a final end was put to the endless Polish war. Corsica contended for independence for six hundred years; it, too, failed, chiefly in consequence of the jealousies and strife among its leading families. Switzerland, with a history teeming with noble deeds, heroic exploits, and splendid victories, has never succeeded to liberty. Corsica is one of the most tranquil departments of the French Empire. Switzerland and Greece are politically subject to their more powerful neighbors. Switzerland dare not resist the commands of France. Athens has been occupied by French, Austrian, and Bavarian troops for years. Neither the Swiss nor the Greeks enjoy real independence.

In one word, then—disheartening as the proposition may seem—it is true that, so far as history teaches, no nation which has ever lost its liberty has ever regained it.

To decry the efforts of the Italians, therefore, on the ground that, if they deserved liberty, they would extort it from their oppressors, is unjust. If they did so, they would present the first instance in history of such an event. The only chance for them appears to rest on the hope that foreign aid may help them to liberty, and, after a certain period of foreign tutelage and education in self-government, that they may be able to shift for themselves.

Greece, which has been dependent on foreign powers for protection against its own people, and which has had to struggle against an absurd monarchy forced on it by the great powers of Europe, is steadily recuperating, and will, perhaps, presently be in a condition not only to dispense with but to resist foreign interference. Under Divine Providence, the history of Italy will be the same.

If the European dynasties do not prevent the consummation of the struggle which is now about to begin, Italy will shortly be a free country under the protection of at least one leading power. A generation will probably elapse before its people are competent to discharge the new duty of self-government. During that time foreign aid may be necessary to secure order and peace to the hero, and among the people; but, in the end, the experiment may be successful.

At all events, it is not wisely for those who have never had to contend against a rooted and firmly-seated despotism to decry the efforts of the Italians, and to ignore them, because they are enslaved, therefore they do not deserve freedom. As reasonable would it be to exact that men who never saw water should know how to swim.

THE CONTEST IN AMERICA.

WHILE the last general census was taken, it appeared that American sea-going vessels of all kinds had, during the previous decennial period, increased so much more rapidly than the British, that the former nation had risen to a clear prospect that the sceptre of the seas would soon devolve to the United States. This country had, at that time, far more tonnage than any other nation except Great Britain, and we were fast gaining on her.

When the next census is taken these glowing hopes will not be realized. It will appear, on the contrary, that while the merchant navies of Great Britain and France have been advancing steadily, that of the United States has made but little progress within the past half dozen years. It behooves us well to realize and reflect upon this painful fact.

We have but no ground in the sciences of ship-building. On the contrary, our models of merchant vessels have improved of late years. The recent improvements which have been introduced into the clipper build are obvious improvements on the extreme clippers that were built here some years back. Our China ship sail faster and carry more cargo in proportion to their speed than any other sailing ships in the world. Our New York steamers are known as the finest in their way. There seems no reason that this is the only step in advance that has been made by the science of naval architecture since the days of Fulton and Ericsson. On the contrary, the yachts now building will probably best his best craft, just as the Vanderbilt has surpassed the Collins steamers.

But it is evident that the maritime commerce of the world is to be carried on hereafter not in sailing vessels but in steamships. And in these the United States are lamentably deficient. The Atlantic is covered with fine screw steamships from Liverpool, London, Glasgow, Havre, and Bremen. We have not a single screw in all our merchant navy. For three or four years the subsidy of Great Britain has been incessantly active in the construction of screw steamers. The English have laid on lines from all the principal ports of Great Britain to New York, and they are steadily driving our ships out of the market.

Six or seven years ago there were several weekly lines of sailing packets between London, Liverpool, Havre, and New York. They used to sail full of cargo, and return freighted fortunes, and ships could not be built fast enough for their requirements. They sailed from this side with a full cotton, tobacco, provisions, ashes, etc., as they could carry; they brought home ample returns cargoes of emigrants, of goods, of specie, of bullion, and other merchandise.

Now, these lines have dwindled away to almost nothing. Where four ships used to sail from Havre every month, Iadea deep with cotton, but one now, and she has had hard work to fill up. For the screw steamers monopolize the passenger business, and time is of more value than freight in the present import of the United States are dispatched by the same vessels. Our ships can still compete in carrying cotton and other commodities of bulk; but on the other side they are forced to take any freight that offers and at any price, if they do not desire to return in ballast. This is the secret of the depressed condition of the shipping interest, and of the miserable rates that rule for freights.

If the United States are to retain their position as a maritime nation, they must have screw steamers. Whatever they cost, and wherever they are built, they must be had if we are to continue to contend with England for the sceptre of the seas. It is all folly talking about new sloops of war, and splendid clippers; while we are bragging England is carrying off its trade. Unless we have screw steamers in some way or other to supply us with screw steamers of equal capacity and equal speed with the Kangaroo and the new French screws, the United States must infallibly withdraw from the contest for the carrying trade of the world.

RAILWAY COMPETITION.

ALL the railroad world is aware that the famous St. Nicholas Convention, by which the four great railroad lines between the West and the sea-board agreed, last October, to keep certain general rules of action and a common tariff of fares, has been scattered to the winds; and that, in some respects, the sharp competition of 1858 is being renewed. A controversy is pending between the New York and the Pennsylvania Central as to the cause of the ruptures. The New York road claims that it broke the Convention because the Southern Railroads were carrying away business from New York. The Pennsylvania road claims, on the contrary, that the Convention came to an end because the Erie could not trust the Central.

We are inclined to think that the Pennsylvania road is correct in this and that Albany brethren. It is notorious that the New York Central managers did openly and repeatedly violate the Convention; and though we believe that it is true that the effect of the alliance was to give the Southern lines undue advantages over their rivals in York rivals, still we doubt whether the New York Central would have taken the responsibility of annulling the contract if it had not been for the immediate chance of maintaining it. It was only when the President of the Erie declared that he would no longer be bound by an agreement which was treated by his co-obligees as waste paper that the Central managers proclaimed their discovery that the contract was hurting the New York.

From whatever quarter the death-blow came, however, the compact is now dead, and practically we will every where return to the present time to the consequences of its demise. These consequences we perceive already in the adoption of rates for transportation of freight which can leave very little if any profit to the road. Such rates, we believe, three distinct reductions of forty, all initiated by the New York Central, and acquiesced in, as a matter of necessity, by the Pennsylvania, the Erie, and the Baltimore and Ohio. Meanwhile is now being carried to and from the West at merely nominal charges for passengers. The passenger tariffs have not yet been altered: but when people begin to travel, it may be expected that this branch of the business will be affected also.

We notice that some of the newspapers congratulate the public on the reduction of cheap transportation for freight and cheap travel, in consequence of the competition. It is not in the power of the press to withhold the manner of congratulation. One hundred and fifty millions of dollars are invested in the four lines now competing for the trade of the West. If competition leads to the adoption of losing fares or chess roads, this large amount of property will remain unproductive; and the failure of income from it will cause very serious inconvenience to hundreds of thousands of person among whom it is distributed. And while a few shippers and travelers benefit, these hundreds of thousands will be straitened in their means, deprived of their ordinary comforts. Such a disaster would be widely felt throughout the community; it would tell even upon persons who have no direct connection with railways.

The great railway problem is working itself out in this country just as it did in England. From 1600 to 1830 there was no check to the construction of railroads throughout the North and West; and no limit to the extravagance, recklessness, and corruption with which the roads were administered. Far-seeing observers perceived in 1856 where this must end; and the commercial crash of 1857 was the crisis of 1857. For the past eighteen months the various companies have been undergoing a process of liquidation. Dividends have been paltry, bonds been funded, dividends suspended, expenses reduced, leaks stopped, frauds exposed, economies introduced, and extravagance put down. The process, which has been going on before the public eye, is that public confidence—as long with it must be—be restored to railway finance.

The question for the four leading lines at present is, whether that result can be attained or not? It is in their power to prevent the revival of public confidence by pursuing a system of reckless competition and of ruinous rivalries in the hope of ruining each other. If they continue for three more months to carry freight at rates which are not paying, the public will have less to do with railroad property in August than they have now. If, on the contrary, they exercise common prudence and judgment, the railways of the North and West must participate in the general recovery of industry, enterprise, and commerce. It is a very simple question; they must settle it one way or the other, and the sooner the better. Mr. Corning, Mr. Moran, Mr. Thomson, Mr. Garrett, and their associates, have a heavy responsibility resting on their shoulders. Let them see to it that here there is no one fatally changeable with something worse than the mismanagement of the property placed under their charge.

THE LOUNGER.

MARRIED WOMEN.

It might puzzle the most profound jurist to say why a drunken man should have the right to spend the hard gotten earnings of a sober woman, any more than a drunken woman should have a similar right toward men. That a woman who, having passed through the trials of maternity, is compelled to work hard to put food in the mouths of her children, should have no defense in civilized society against a drunken thief who steals that food, is something so monstrous that it is incredible. And yet until very recently that was substantially true of married women in the United States, Christian countries; and even in the Empire State it is only now proposed to put an absolute and final period to such criminal absurdity.

We may poke as much fun and fury as we please at what we call feudalism, and yet it is only the fanatic who play the part of pioneers in all great movements of human progress. Roger Williams, George Fox, Ignatius Loyola, John Wesley, John Calvin, and Martin Luther, were all fanatics; that is, they were men so hot with an idea that they could not dull all other men who had any inflammable sympathy in them. So it is the teetotaller, and not the moderate drinker—that is to say, he who is the temperance fanatic, who pushes forward the cause of temperance. It is the drip, drip, drip, of the same opinion in the same spot that wears the rock away; every devoted merchant, or trader, or farmer, or mechanic, or even man in other society, is a fanatic in his especial calling. Cyrus Field was a fanatic on the ocean telegraph affair. He insisted, as though rich and thin that it could be laid, and should be laid, and it was laid. Robert Fulton was a fanatic. George Stephenson was a fanatic. Christopher Columbus was an arch-fanatic.

Here are often seemingly extremely tiresome and how weary the Princes and Kings must have been of seeing that Genoese sailor coming in with his sacred diagrams, and Calling and Re-calling Western Canoe! How we Kings and Princes of to-day must pity and shake at the earnest Abolitionists, and some fellows and tiresome bores, who butter, and butter, and butter away upon their plans and prophecies!

It is precisely so with the advocates of all social reforms. They are to us what Cassandra was to the men eternally do expo. For Heaven's sake put not a fresh step! For mere pity give us something that will not weary our ears! Give us a little humanity nation!

Precisely. It is just what the old tree says to the axe. "Don't keep hitting in the same place. But the axe says to the tree, "How else shall I get you down?"

The constant agitation of social wrongs, or if you prefer, the constant inquiry whether alleged wrongs are such or not, is the price we pay for their toleration and eradication. Our staple Spring pills for several years have been the Rights of Labor convention. The public criticisms of that topic, whether they have been furious or funny, have been equally valuable. And while it is true that no denied that there have been a great many monstrously ridiculous things said and done in the course of time, it is equally impossible to deny that the whole movement was indicative of the sentiment in the public mind, and was consequently a powerful help in such acts of legislation as the one of which we have spoken. It is the old story of the use of philosophic mind that, because certain women make speeches upon a public platform, it does not follow that all our legislation is to be framed to suit women, or that sensible and thoughtful women might not speak or wisely upon public platforms as they overtly sing.

Undoubtedly we owe it to the very fanatics at home we laugh that the most important laws we have are put in the way of removal. Let us think of them, then, a little more kindly. Why is it not quite as well to be fanatical in generosity as in narrowness?

A METROPOLITAN MEDITATION.

At a late meeting of the Historical Society, Mr. William C. Prime, whose knowledge of Egypt and the East is practical, and not merely bookish, strongly urged very warmly and eloquently the purchase of Dr. Abbott's Egyptian Museum, which has been for some years past has been, exhibiting in the city.

It is not only one of the best collections in the world—one for which the Egyptologists in England and elsewhere are longing, and which they would undoubtedly buy if we do not—but it is one of those treasures which every great city ought to contain. New York is not rich in art treasures, historical or historical collections. The spirit of New York, which is finally called a Spirit of Trade, or of brokers, is far from metropolitan. Individuals do truly. Are there not the Astor Library and the Cooper Institute? Yes, and they are noble examples of course, the great public charities?

Mr. Prime's suggestion is timely and timely. How much longer are we to be satisfied with the round-trip place in the means of education? How much longer are we content to be ignorant of abroad for those advantages which we can have at home by paying the price, and that not a very large one?

There is the little, mountainous city upon the shores of the "Back Bay" which has made itself to be found a great University. It has the most ancient and amply endowed and generous of all our colleges on the other side of the river, but it is not satisfied until it has a noble University embracing all arts and sciences, and so splendidly founded and wisely administered that no American shall need to go farther than New England for the most thorough education possible.

Now only that, but we see it has been introduced into the Legislature to incorporate a second Museum of Comparative Zoology. One of the trustees has already given fifty thousand dollars, and the State will appropriate certain wise contingent upon individual subscriptions. At the head of this museum will stand the most eminent man, in his department, in the world—Professor Agassiz, who proposes to teach any teacher of the public schools of the State who desires to do so, free self, in turn, to teach natural history. Boston is fortunate in many things—not least in having Agassiz for a citizen.

That little city does not call herself a metropolis, but unconsciously she is the true metropolitan air. Shall we not march with her, side by side, to these good works? The largest ships—the most splendid steamers—are owned by capital residences—the most expensive halls—the most inspiring and ennobling associations—the utmost civic corruption—are not, alone, enough to make a great metropolis. What renown the little Tuscan city of Florence has won! How the fame has secured the Medici were merchant princes. It was because the traders were not content that their city should be a shop, and so made it a museum, a library, a gallery—and collected in it, so far as they could, the choicest results of human genius in every department.

ABOUT HANGING.

WITHIN a few weeks there have been an unusual number of capital convictions, and in Boston more the execution of four men, who were clearly convicted of brutal murders. There are several cogently-conceived petitions for a pardon, also, besides a dozen or more awaiting trial for murder. The Governor has for all seven gentlemanly-lettered letter declaring to pardon Mrs. Hartung, and the rumor of an intended movement of the Legislature to commute the sentence.

Shall a woman be hung—is virtually the question which seems to be presented by these different cases—or capitally executed in any manner?

But so long as the punishment of death is justified by public sentiment, and by the opinion of certain crimes, and women are held to be legally responsible for them, so long will women suffer, except them from punishment can be found, of course, only in the feelings, the instincts, which eternally separate the sexes, and unite the sexes. You would not strike a woman, say the legislators, and the universal sentiment has proved your hanging her. But is that true? If a man were attacked by a stalwart virago and put in peril of his life, would he not instinctively strike at the risk of hers? An attack, and not an insult, is the point of consideration. The criminal of either sex attacks the peace of society. The lex talionis holds that that peace can be maintained not by holding the hand of the offender, but by the punishment, but by choking him, which is death.

The law is not a matter of color or external condition. Theft, for instance, is the intentional appropriation of the property of another. But the law does not say, rather look for the proved intent. A starving man steals a loaf from the rich baker. He has been a-starving of starvation or of plenty. Murder is malicious theft. The law will not say the killing malicious?—was the killer a respectable gentleman?

If, however, there be a certain class of responsible moral agents who ought to be exempted from the punishment of death, there is no doubt that exemption, based upon a fact which is common to every one of them, was clearly and distinctly proposed in the law; and if the objection be merely against the form of punishment, and not the punishment itself, the objection can very very easily be met.

In the present case, when the Governor is fully convinced of the guilt of the criminal, ought he to interfere with the operation of the law because the criminal is a woman, any more than he ought to commute the sentence of every other respectable culprit because he may be opposed to the death penalty? Is the weight of this reflection to be agreed not to interfere with the course of law unless there be some extenuating circumstances which would undoubtedly justify such interference to the lawmakers, and upon whose possible existence in case which can not exist the prerogative of executive pardon is based. Can sex fairly be considered one of those circumstances? Clearly not, for it is in itself evidently a part of the crime itself.

It is terrible that a woman should be hung—no woman should be hung—but there is a law in human being. And the fact that so few capital executions take place—that whenever a capital verdict is rendered there is almost an instinctive impression that a hanging will not inevitably follow—is evidence of universal suspicion in the public mind of the policy of the penalty. During the last year a poor intruted negro, and a boy who was drunk when he killed his master, were executed in the city of New York. Other cases of murder have been tried and received capital trials or the pross has deprecated the fatal verdict.

If there were fewer technical loop-holes of escape for the guilty, and the law were administered which should be hopelessly certain, would not society be the gainer?

TO THE LADIES.

As another demand for a little more humane and Christian view which society is taking of the condition of women, we may mention not only the request of the Faculty of Lehigh University, Bethlehem, Pa., that the Board of Trustees of Female Medical Colleges and Hospitals in our large cities, but the recent action of Oberlin College, there was an admirable biographical sketch of Miss Blackwell, who, with Miss Zakrzewska, has managed a woman's hospital with success in New York. Miss Zakrzewska now goes to Boston to take charge of the college there, which is well endowed; and Miss Ann Preston, of the Philadelphia Female College, is now in New York, giving a course of lectures upon the same branch, and also at Clinton Hall, in Philadelphia, Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz, Miss Lippincott speak of these lectures in these terms:

"..... forcible and perspicuous reasoning, richly inbued with true Christian faith, clothed in language chaste and pure, and bestowed with a manner delicacy not to be surpassed."

The Lounger fairly believes that the ladies of New York will be no more injured, this week, by hearing Miss Preston speak than by hearing Signora Grazzanga sing.

"LOOK HERE, UPON THIS PICTURE, AND ON THIS."

THERE is a natural interest in all that relates to the personality of famous men. Who was Shakspeare, or the Strafford, or the "Auld Ieiy o' Dooy," or to Haworth rectory? And it is well understood that autobiographies and newspaper and personal detail of every kind—within those limits of common decency and propriety which newspapers so strictly acknowledge always accomplish. Yet sometimes the same person is very differently sketched, and by the same hand. We have lately seen it done by this upon finding two descriptions of Bulwer, the novelist, published almost at the same time. The readers of "What will he do with it?"—story no long familiar to the eye in these columns —will hardly fail to read them both with interest.

The first depicts Bulwer, in his town residence in Park Lane, as "the Lord of Knebworth Castle, surrounded by all the most expensive luxuries; as a member of the British Cabinet and a leader of Parliament, *, and, at the age of fifty-three, has achieved a fame, a future, and a position unparalleled in the history of men of genius." "As a novelist, a poet, a playwright, and a statesman, he has won for all in all—where shall we find his peer?" For the last dilettante years the novelist has fed upon his thoughts, and an entire generation has been stimulated and educated by his glowing poetry and fine philosophy."

This author then proceeds to describe his personal appearance:

"In person he is a little above the medium height, with a figure slight almost to frailty. His fine head at once suggests a remarkable proof of the supremacy of phrenology. It is a splendid dome of intellect, widening into the region of "reality," and rising with equal force all the superior faculties. There is nothing of the animal in the manner of the Englishman's head—no bull, on the contrary, he is entirely cosmopolitan, in look, in dress, and in manner. His hair is dark, like his mustachios and moustache, is of a lightish-brown color. He wears it close behind and filled up in front, giving his head a look of unusual fullness."

In No. 24 of the Weekly the reader will find an engraving of Bulwer.

The other picture is a less elaborate portrait than the one we have quoted. It is a view of him simply as "a member of the British Cabinet and a leader of Parliament."

.....Lord Stanley and Sir Bulwer Lytton both labored hard to defeat the bill in its various stages. The speech of the latter was, in delivery, unusually effective, although marred by his cynic vein of satire for once, and the practical politicians, talking good plain English in an earnest and vigorous way, rather took the lead in the argument. The author of 'Pelham' has generally been in the habit of addressing the House in a manner assumed at best, and his utterance affected and pedantic. But, when in error, and in inability to maketake the ears of others, in consequence of deafness, with which he has been afflicted for years, and in his apparent desire to eschew the appearance of dictatorless or hauger he has always indulged in a volunteer of gratuitous advice to the Ministry, by all the oratorical art Parliamentary eloquence, is absent as bad of its kind as can well be imagined. It was not the first time from Lord Palmerston, the cutting sarcasm, 'that members who had not seen the last session's speech would have hardly carefully understand how difficult it was to deal with it serious way.' On the present instance, however, the author of 'Ernest' seems really to have caught a glimpse of the truth, and, with a good deal of eloquence to his wild, dressed up of conservative equines and nobles in cap Polish."

After all, how very important it is for a famous man to consider who is likely to write his biography. The weight of this reflection is to be appreciated by some living authors—but as say, for instance, Mr. Macaulay is of tremendous value to all his allusions to other writers are regulated by this harrowing uncertainty as to which of them will write his life after he is dead.

EATING YOUR CAKE, ETC.

IT is a little singular to read in a newspaper that on Monday evening, the thirty-second of March, a body of men and women surprised a worthy parson, who had been settled over them, that he might not be out, ranging themselves in his parlor, and there, instead of an ordinary infliction from Barabbas Lungs, Esquire, who concluded by presenting the reverend gentleman with thirty-nine cents and a half.

It is a pleasant thing to give money and to receive it. The parson was pleased about it, and paid them, and the amount of the money, in the newspaper? Probably this "surprise" business arises from a sense of the utter impossibility of a hundredth fact that no class of men are expected to work so hard for so little pay as clergymen. The very reason would lead to a general increase of salary it would be a good result. And certainly it is better than nothing that an occasional gift should be presented where the permanent increase can not be effected.

But why not do it in a quiet, decent way? Why arrange it so that the public, which cares nothing for the matter, except as having an interest for the pastor—shall be obliged not only to hear all the details, but, moreover, and the precise amount given, but also to hear it in the way which redounds most to the credit of the givers and not of the recipient? Barabbas Lungs, Esquire, is clearly the hero of the occasion. He is supported in his eloquence by all these generous parishioners. The poor pastor, uncomfortably holding his little bag of money, is in the pitiable position to every spectator. For Heaven's sake, let us have done with publicity, and say, "I don't ring the church-bells about it. Suppose that Mr. Lungs, Esquire, should put a turkey by sends his pastor into print, and found out of butter, and every barrel of flour. It ceases that moment to be kindness, or friendship, or decency. It becomes a gross glorification of his own generosity. The "surprise party" is the same thing, only they give twenty or fifty turkeys together.

Why will not the next society which comes to give its pastor fifty or five hundred dollars write him the following note:

"DEAREND AND DEAR SIR,—There is not a man of us who is not better paid for less work than you. You hold your place and your salary upon the tenure of our good opinion and your preaching what we want to hear, and not what you may think you ought to preach. You have a family, and as you grow older your resources will not increase. Your society consists of a few hundred proprietors, half of whom have subscribed fifty cents each; and we are very glad to send you $150, which we hope will supply with wood and coal for a month, but which we so sincerely hope may make things easier for a little while. As a personal favor to us, please not to mention it, but believe us your affectionate and obliged parishioners,

"ELIAS CUTHBER,

"And two hundred and forty-nine others"

Send that letter by some faithful hand, and then try to get each man to subscribe a dollar next time.

"THE CULPRIT FAY."

It is only fair, after what the Lounger said last week about the new edition of Drake's "Culprit Fay," and the objections of Fitz-Greene to its publication, to state that the difficulty has been arranged, and that the representative of the family who made the complaint has now authorized the sale.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

C. M. P., Mount Sidney, Virginia, wishes to know if the spelling of a is right as given in such words as fair, care, etc., saying that Webster and Worcester spell as that sound as the letter a is. He will find, however, that Worcester is explicit upon this point. He gives seven sounds to the vowel a—the broad Italian third in long father, as in fare, and adds that the diphthong ai followed by r has the same sound. Those distinctions, however, are very delicate.

J. G. Y. AND OTHERS, Kankakee, Illinois, ask whence the phrases "scot-free" and "high as Gilderoy's bail" are derived. The latter is a corrupt part, the Icelandic skot, the Danish skot, and Swedish skot give us the English scot, or shot, the French écot, the Italian scotto, the Spanish escote, meaning tax or price, and hence reckoning. To pay the scot was to pay the tax, and then therefore the same meaning, viz., to settle the bill. To go "scot-free" is to get off without paying.

Gilderoy was a famous Highland robber, celebrated in Scotch ballads, of which J. G. Y. will find a good specimen in Percy's Reliques. He was hanged, one day:

"Of Gilderoy sae 'fraid they were,
They bound him fast with iron bands,
Till Edenburrow they led him their,
And set a gibbet hing
They hung him high aboon the rest,
He was sae trim a boy
Thair dyed the youth whom I lued best—
My handsome Gilderoy."

In the north of England kite signifies belly. The proverb is, therefore, equivalent to high as Gilderoy upon the gallows.

RUDIE BOWER, Cazenovia, New York, will find the quotation he seeks in Charles Lott, line 300, and following, of the first book:

".....He stood and call'd
His Legion, Angel Forms, who lay intranst
Thick as Autumnal Leaves that strew the Brooks
In Vallombrosa, where Of Etrurias shades
High overarch'd imbowr....."

Right Bower throws in this conundrum:

"Why is a man in the moon like a man in a coundrum already in his grave?—Because he can't quit ale coughin' quite."

W. F., Lecompton, Kansas, would have the Lounger tell what Shakespeare alludes to in his Seven Ages (Jaques, in As You Like It), when he says of the young soldier,

"Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard."

The word pard signifies spotted; and is applied, therefore, to any thing spotted indiscriminately. Leopard, who is whitened like a cat, with long, protruding, distant teeth. Pard, a female panther. Pard, a forlorn whiskered as some captains of dragoons; but enough for Shakespeare's purpose, who uses nobody knows what to be done geographically generally rather than accuracy. Thus, in the Winter's Tale, he makes a ship bound from the shores of Bohemia; which is much like having it wrecked upon the green mountains of Vermont.

W. H. F., Philadelphia, who is an apothecary, and whose father and grandfather were apothecaries, and who declares that he has a soul "above the penny backstring of pyrotechnics," writes an indignant letter about Jefferson, and declares, in the character of a lady:

"Oh! I will brest!
Yet why for such a trifle can false one should I grieve?
Mr. Macready is gone!
I'll wait and accept the first offer I receive"?

H. A. M., and others, Pennsylvania, complain that advertisements are printed in the Weekly, and cannot understand it. If they will refer to the number of the paper they will find more than two pages of advertisements. The Weekly has always allowed a certain limited space to them, and has introduced no new habit of that kind.

CINCINNATI writes pathetically:

"But here I must never do nothin' but work;
For you can't live on a dollar a week."

The whole ditty is in some sixty lines, which are clever, but not clever enough for so much space.

CARDINAL ANTONELLI AND ROME IN 1859.

So many Americans are spending the winter in Rome that many at home will be glad to see the accompanying pictures.

The street scene represents the Corso during the Carnival. Every one has heard of the wild bacchanalia in which the good people of Rome indulge during the Carnival. The Corso (the Broadway of Rome) is thronged from end to end with gay carriages filled with maskers, lively ladies, and dashing cavaliers. The sidewalks are crowded with pedestrians in like disguises, but all of the male gender. The balconies, which abound in every house, are crammed in like manner with ladies and their male friends—some masked and concealed in domino, others in plain dress. The sport of all these people is to throw bouquets, bonbons, and flour pills at each other, accompanying each projectile with some witty or sarcastic remark. The favorite missile of the ladies is what we have called a "flour pill," a sort of explosive shell filled with common wheaten flour: this explodes, or rather bursts, when it strikes, and sprinkles its victim with flour. Coarse-minded people—who, though not so common at Rome as in some other places, are not altogether unknown in the papal city—sometimes diversify the pastime by playfully throwing carrots, rotten eggs, or stones, at well-dressed persons. But they form an exception to the rule. Generally speaking, the Carnival at Rome is a scene of healthy, good-humored amusement, which the most refined lady can enjoy as well as the country bumpkin. Our engraving was made from a sketch by an enthusiastic Englishman, who was melted to tears at the sight of the Prince of Wales actually condescending to throw bouquets and bonbons from a balcony. His Royal Highness will be noticed at the most prominent figure in the picture. We trust our subscribers will be able to control their emotion at the spectacle.

The accompanying portrait is that of Cardinal Antonelli, the Secretary of State in the Pope's Government—from a drawing by Lehmann.

Cardinal Giacomo Antonelli is one of the most eminent Italians living. The son of an architect and contractor, originally from Sonnino—but for the best part of his life a resident of Terracino—the present Roman Secretary enjoyed good advantages in respect of education and society. His father was well known to and liked by the late Pope Gregory. It is said that a timely present of an ancient statue of Sophocles, made by him to his Holiness, was the first cause of his son's favor at the papal court. Let us pronounce this a vulgar calumny, and take for granted that good old Gregory—little as he knew, as a rule—detected in his young friend Giacomo the germs of the remarkable qualities the present Secretary has subsequently displayed.

Whatever the secret of his advancement was, certain it is that, while quite a young man and freshly invested with priestly honors, he received the appointment of Judge of one of the criminal courts of Rome. From this station troubles which occurred in the diocese of Macerata caused his transfer to the legateship of that important place. Here he staid some time, and gave evidence of much vigor and energy. When tranquillity was restored to Macerata the Pope recalled Antonelli to Rome, and made him successively Secretary General of the Home Department and Treasurer General. He occupied the latter post when Gregory died.

CARDINAL ANTONELLI, SECRETARY OF STATE IN THE PAPAL GOVERNMENT.

During the contest for the Papacy which succeeded, Antonelli took an active part in canvassing for the present tenant of the Papal Chair. The success which attended his efforts was duly rewarded by his own promotion to a Cardinalate. Pius is said to have accompanied the preferment with a warm eulogy on the new Cardinal.

Dark days were at hand. Pius, with the ardor of inexperience, lit the torch which set Europe in a blaze. His friend and protégé, Antonelli, believed to have joined heart and soul in the liberal measures undertaken by his master. They were, as the world knows, premature. The Papacy was the first throne which was shaken; the first sufferers by the storm they had aroused were Pius and Antonelli. Both fled to Gaeta. During the darkest hours of that gloomy period Antonelli remained faithful, and by his courage and genial temper kept up the drooping spirits of the Pontiff.

Then followed the French occupation, under cover of which Pius returned to Rome. His faithful friend accompanied him, and undertook a heavy share in the difficult administration of the new Government. Ever since then Antonelli has been the leading man at the Papal court. He has not always filled his present office—which corresponds to that of Prime Minister in constitutional monarchies—but he has the credit of having always been the power behind the throne. That he is a man of remarkable ability none can question. Opinions differ widely about his principles. Some say that he is as liberal as Pius was before him. Others assert that he is really as conservative as the Pope is said to have become. None deny, however, that he has administered the affairs of Rome, at a most difficult and trying period, with remarkable skill and success.

In the drama which the next year or two will naturally unfold a leading part will necessarily be played by Cardinal Giacomo Antonelli; and should Rome again take the prominent position which she occupied in the Revolution of 1848, he will become an object of general interest to the civilized world.

Lest any should suppose, however, that the Papal Government, even under Antonelli, is likely to be betrayed into any thing like excessive liberality, we subjoin the following anecdote, which is given in a letter from Rome: "An anecdote which was recently related to me shows, in another form, how averse the Papal Government is from letting too much light into the public mind. The gas-pipes in the Piazza del Popolo were being examined not many mornings since, when a stranger observed, 'So you are letting in light upon the Popolo.' It might have been meant as a double entendre, or it might have had simply a reference to the site on which they were standing. However that may be, the stranger was followed to his hotel by a respectably-dressed man, who made particular inquiry of the proprietor as to who the stranger was, at the same time answering on the ominous words that had been uttered. The hotel was that in which the Prince of Wales resided, and it so happened that the stranger was the courier who formed part of his Royal Highness's suite."

THE CARNIVAL AT ROME, 1859.

GENERAL GEFFRARD, PRESIDENT OF HAYTI.

THE accompanying engraving represents the new President of Hayti, General Geffrard.

Very little is known of him, except that he is a colored man, of about fifty-five years of age; and that some years ago he embarked in a revolutionary attempt against the throne of the Emperor Soulouque, was defeated, and narrowly escaped with his life. Through the intercession of friends he was not executed, but spent several years in a prison, from which he has only lately escaped. He is a man of fine presence and undoubted courage. His friends give him credit for intelligence also.

Mr. James Redpath, who arrived in Hayti just after the revolution, thus describes, in a letter to the Tribune, the pilot's announcement of the revolution:

"Well, Pilot, what news?"

"You hear of le Revolution?" we asked.

"What Revolution?" we asked.

"Oh! we no Longer now—Soulouque has gone Emperor—we have Republique—much plaisir on shore! Rich men throw money 'way—not much—not much Coupe—keep copper—all much plaisir."

"The devil!" was the satanic exclamation of the pilot's American auditors.

"Who's king now, then?" asked the captain.

"Oh! no more king—we Presidui"—

"Who is he?"

"Faben Geffrard. He lives at Aux Cayes" (in southern Hayti).

"Is he a black or mulatto?" I inquired.

"Mulatto."

I feared that this revolution was another outward symptom of the old and deadly feud between the blacks and the Congo Mulat—the pure negroes and the mulattoes—which was the origin of many massacres and incited many a bloody battle in the days of Jean François, Dessalines, Toussaint, Ogé, and the terrible Dessalines. But I am now inclined to believe that this impression is erroneous. All classes seem to sympathize with the revolutionists. The mulattoes, it is true, are especially rejoiced at the success of Geffrard, because his failure, they say, would have led to the massacre of the mulattoes in every part of the Island; but the negroes also—the blackest of the blacks—exhibit every where equal enthusiasm and hilarity at the fall of Faustin, who is no longer (such is life!) spoken of as Sa Majesté, but only as Monsieur Soulouque, or "the old man," or, much more frequently, that "bloody old villain," or, as a mulatto said, that "monster of a tyrant."

"When the arcoma falls," says a Haytien proverb, "every body says it is rotten wood." Soulouque, in his banishment, may find consolation in this sarcastic truth.

GENERAL GEFFRARD, PRESIDENT OF HAYTI.

NEW YORK CITY.

ON pages 254 and 265 will be found a view of New York city, taken from the spire of Dr. Spring's New Brick Church, which is worth preserving. The picture will be found, on examination, to be as mathematically accurate as a plan; its artistic merit will speak for itself. We are again, in this matter, indebted to Mr. Brady, the photographer, for valuable aid; without the assistance of the views he took for us, it would have been difficult to insure perfect accuracy. We subjoin below a key to the picture, with the proper references to the principal buildings.

BACHELOR'S HALL.

THIS is my castle, gentlemen,
I make you free as air;
A welcome rest for weary guest
From climbing yonder stair.
Here sit I like a knight of old,
Or warrior chieftain stout and bold,
Within his dining-hall;
With beer in lieu of wassail wine;
Instead of pike, and cutlass fine,
My pipes hang on the wall.

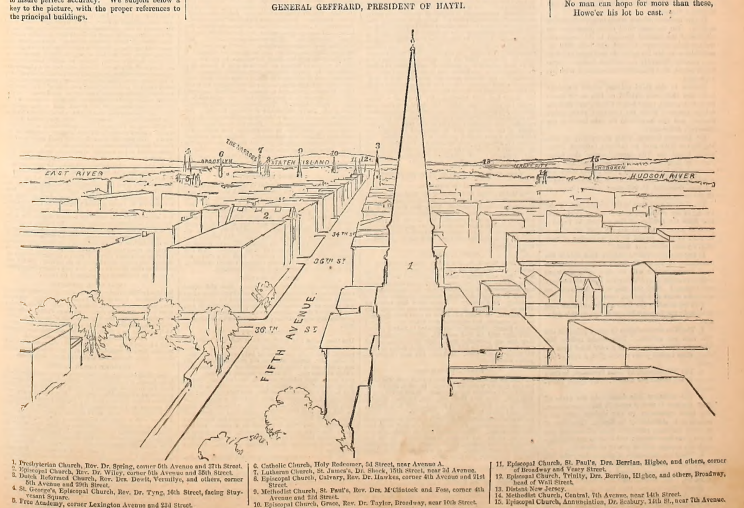
Make no excuses, gentlemen,
But sit wherever you please;
If tables suit your style of boot,
Why, put them at their ease.
Life is at best a rugged road,
Why walk with petty cares a load,
When we can ride as well?
Had I the wealth of India's kings,
My riches should not make them wings
For bahl and brocatel.

I think I've cut my wisdom teeth
This many and many a day;
Had I the cash to cut a dash
Twould let another way.
I'd have of bread and cheese a pile,
I'd have some pipes of every style,
And nuggs of foaming beer;
And then I'd hunt through all the earth
For men of true Bohemian birth,
And feast them gayly here.

For what are bahl and brocatel,
Or broadcloth rich and fine,
Or dinners where the viands rare
Are drowned in costly wine?
I count them but a sinful waste,
If every longing wish and taste
My habits should betray.
Thus, gentlemen, it is with me,
The fare and furniture you see,
Suit me in every way.

My room is on the attic floor,
Five stories from the street;
The doctors say it is the way
To find the air more sweet.
Five scores of stairs—a wondrous thing
To make the blood move lustily sing
Through every beating vein!
No doubt a glorious thing is wealth,
But of the two my choice is health,
A body free from pain.

What is there wealth can bring to man
I have not at command?
While all the time for every dime
A score of thousands stand;
And on my steps obsequious wait,
As on the man of high estate,
As long as it may last.
Than what he eats, and wears, and sees,
No man can hope for more than these,
How'er his lot be cast.



1. Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. Spring, corner 6th Avenue and 37th Street.
2. Episcopal Church, Rev. Dr. Wiley, corner 6th Avenue and 35th Street.
3. Dutch Reformed Church, Rev. Drs. Brett, Vermilye, and others, corner 5th Avenue and 29th Street.
4. St. George's, Episcopal Church, Rev. Dr. Tyng, 16th Street, facing Stuyvesant Square.
5. Free Academy, corner Lexington Avenue and 23d Street.
6. Catholic Church, Holy Redeemer, 3d Street, near Avenue A.
7. Lutheran Church, St. James's, Dr. Shock, 19th street, near 3d Avenue.
8. Episcopal Church, Calvary, Rev. Dr. Hawkes, corner 4th Avenue and 21st Street.
9. Methodist Church, St. Paul's, Rev. Drs. M'Clintock and Foss, corner 4th Avenue and 23d Street.
10. Episcopal Church, Grace, Rev. Dr. Taylor, Broadway, near 10th Street.
11. Episcopal Church, St. Paul's, Drs. Berrian, Higbee, and others, corner of Broadway and Vesey Street.
12. Episcopal Church, Trinity, Drs. Berrian, Higbee, and others, Broadway, head of Wall Street.
13. Distant New Jersey.
14. Methodist Church, Central, 7th Avenue, near 14th Street.
15. Episcopal Church, Annunciation, Dr. Seabury, 14th St., near 7th Avenue.

KEY TO THE VIEW OF NEW YORK, PAGES 264, 265.

My carriage plies before the door,
All eager for a fare,
For half a dime, at any time,
"I will take me any where."
While I have steamers, yachts, and boats,
As swift as any thing that floats,
And as a palace gay;
Or silks and gold go fluttering by,
To charm my heart or please my eye,
While rolling on Broadway.

And one thing farther, gentlemen,
E'en while the foam is there;
We'll drink the one beneath the sun
That eats most drink most fare.
My thought is such a darling girl,
A worthy love for belted earl,
Or any nobleman.
Her eyes are dark as midnight skies,
Upon her cheeks rich sunset lies,
And auburn lists her hair.

She wears no baubles proud with gems,
No robes with silken sheen;
And yet my fair is fit to wear
The crown of a queen.
She makes no claim to gentle blood,
Nor dates her lineage from the flood;
Such Nature's noble born,
And proud to say, where'er she stands,
Has earned her living with her hands
From a day ago.

And now I pray you, gentlemen,
Smile not at what I tell:
Some future day I'll bear away
This one I love so well.
Some day, when publishers grow kind,
And see the sparkles of my mind,
I'll make this girl my wife.
'Til wed the fairest of the fair,
And when she comes my room to share,
'Twill glow with new-born life.

LITERARY.

THE third volume of Bunsen's great work on Ancient Egypt has been published in England, with a preface, written expressly for the English edition, by Dr. Bunsen. A paragraph has been going the rounds of the American papers briefly stating that Bunsen adds to this preface given his reasons for believing that Egypt was inhabited by men who made use of pottery about eleven thousand years before Christ was born. This is the point, indeed, of the English preface; and the author runs ahead of making this extraordinary statement the prominent point before his English and American readers. We can not let the opportunity pass of saying, very briefly, how little Bunsen is to be relied on in Egyptology, or any other person who sets the monuments to his purpose the Bible and correct its errors, instead of relying on the standards of the Bible to explain Egyptian monuments.

In this instance science seems to have descended to folly. For the same mind must pronounce the relisses of the learned German in this argument weaker than any rope of sand, and look with astonishment at his inexplicable readiness to grasp as a general discovery an isolated instance, capable of easier explanations inconsistent with his argument.

Bunsen, in this third volume, avows distinctly his belief that man existed on this earth about twenty thousand years before Christ, and that the Egyptians were among the first nations before Christ; and the foundation for this belief in the discovery following:

Mr. Leonard Horner, while excavating or boring in the Nile near at Sakkara (ancient Memphis), found this deposit, and ascertained that the statue of Rameses is the thirty feet deep, and estimates that it had increased at the rate of three and a half inches per century, which makes the Nilotic port deposited 11,646 years before Christ, or 13,500 years before.

Mr. Horner says that in the lowest part of the boring of the sediment, at a depth of thirty-nine feet from the surface of the ground, he found a piece of pottery, and he argues that this "must be held to be the work of the existence of man 13,571 years before A.D. 1854."

In any one proposed to believe that this is the foundation of the Bunsen hypothesis of twenty-one lated theory, which will be cited by a thousand voices as going to overthrow the Bible chronology and history? And yet this is the authority on which he bases his perfect confidence.

Now let us add a few facts which will show how absolutely the German Doctor is lost in this delusion.

1. The Nile accumulation in many places is one full inch per annum. This would reduce Mr. Horner's deposit to less than three feet in a hundred, since twelve years would give a foot of deposit.

2. The Nile deposit, in some instances, is from three to six inches per annum. We speak knowingly.

3. The ordinary Nile deposit on the plain of Beni Hassan is nearly one-half inch per annum. We have specimens on our shelves, and have measured it abundantly in Egypt. The flow of the Nile the next year will wash off some of this if the river flow strong; but if it do not rise very high the deposit will be gently increased.

4. There are thousands of places along the Nile banks where ancient canals, lakes dug for temples, or walls for the water-wheel, or mines, have been filled up. Mr. Horner may have dug in just such a place. He supposes that the fact of his being under the statue at Sakkara is proof that he found an accumulation of earth which had not gathered within, say, two thousand years. This is so; but when the statue was thrown down by the Persians it may have been thrown on the soil which had just been heaped in a sacred lake, or pool, or well.

5. The Nile bed itself, the very floor of the river, may have been over the spot where Mr. Horner bored, and that within three thousand years.

6. The Arabs in Mr. Horner's employ may have dropped the piece of pottery into the hole he was boring.

In brief, then, let us say that no man who has examined the Nile valley and the Egyptian deposits have any doubt that Mr. Horner's fragment of pottery could have arrived where he found it by any one of numerous processes of ordinary kind within a few centuries, without the necessity of supposing that it is the military effect of a period of twelve thousand years ago. But it is to be lamented that such men as Bunsen are so apt to seize on single discoveries as confirmations of theory, and to generalize from such special instances, to the overthrow of a faith in their capacity as reasoning men and sound guides.

The simple answer to the whole theory is that the Nile deposit varies according to circumstances and places, eddies, beds of the river, etc., etc. Not unfrequently the river deposits in the bed or banks a new channel one, two, or three miles distant; in which case the old channel fills up rapidly with a few years' depth from a few inches daily and hourly, before the eyes of the traveler, the river's current changes its bank on one side and rapidly filling up and raising a bank on the other; so that in ten years' time the very spot which was thirty feet below the level of the river in the old channel will be found thirty feet below the solid earth of the bank. If Mr. Horner had taken a volume Jacotin's charts, and compared the modern Nile with the Nile of forty years ago, he would not have been so ready to suppose that the old northeastern thirty feet under the Nile deposit must have had as many as many hundred years.

We might go on to argue from a variety of facts against this startling theory. The very spot where the statue lies in the present plain of Sakkara, if facts to be relied on, because in erecting this immense statue, caused as it is, Bunsen tells us, that less caused a vast excavation to be made, in which to lay a foundation, and the fallen statues lies but a little distance from this foundation; and Mr. Horner may have bored in the excavation without touching the foundation.

But we pause. It seems proper that the absurdity should have the light of these few facts before the American public. Such pretended theories and discoverers are illustrative of the Bible, and contributory of faith in its truth. Let the new Bunsen Collection in New York will abundantly show. They are never otherwise in the minds of judicious and cool reasoners.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE TRIAL OF DANIEL E. SICKLES.

THE CONCLUDING DAY OF THE TRIAL.

IN our last number we gave the evidence for the prosecution, which was from the opening speech of the district attorney Cook. On Saturday, April 9, Mr. Graham, for the defense, commenced his opening speech, which was concluded till late on Monday. Long as the speech was, it is only of the most general character. It was understood, at first, that the attorney was to claim with impunity by the unwritten law—and, that also the time of the homicide Sickles was in such a state of mind that he was not accountable for his acts. In the course of his remarks, however, Mr. Graham read all the adultery cases from the time of Henry VIII. down to the present time, and the opinion of the judges of adultery as being acquitted. In dwelling on the second point Mr. Graham took a most able view of the position in which the husband of Teresa had been exposed in view of the provocation under which the slayer had been labored. He dwelt at great length the proceedings of Key, and stated that they were attended with arrangements which would shock mankind. He alluded to Key's official position, which ought to have been the most especially merited of all, as the "sacred rights of his friends; and he described at length the circumstances which existed between Key and Teresa. He closed his argument with an appeal to the jury to place themselves in the position of Sickles, and to render their belief; declaring that if Sickles were convicted, no man's life or daughter's honor was afterward safe.

THE EVIDENCE FOR THE DEFENSE.

WILLIAM BADGER.

On Monday, 11th, at the close of Mr. Graham's speech, William Badger was called for the defense, and testified that he knew all the parties. Knew Key's character, and his were very intimate. Dined at Sickles's house on 10th February, 1859, with Key, Mrs. Sickles, and Mr. Sickles. Key arose from dinner before the others, and did not seem present at last dinner. Objected to, and objection sustained.

JOHN B. BASSIN,

M. C. from New York, knew Mr. Sickles for fifteen or twenty, and Mrs. Sickles for twelve years. Knew Key for ten years. Knew the character of the latter, general, and deemed intimacy. Had heard Sickles, after the homicide, say that he had killed Key, and that Attorney-General Key as a friend. Thanked Sickles for the service. In February or March, 1859, was present at dinner at Washington with Key, Mrs. Sickles, Mr. Sickles, and Sickles. Witness was about to state what Key said at the dinner-table, but objection was made and sustained by the Court. Witness communicated to Sickles part of what Key said at the dinner-table. Witness thought that Key was an honorable man; that they were mutual friends; that Sickles had an objection to Key's visiting at his house when invited. Had seen Key and Sickles in company.

DANIEL DOUGHERTY.

Has known Sickles for six or seven years, and Mrs. Sickles and Key for a shorter period. Dined at Sickles's on the Thursday before the shooting. Key sat next to Mrs. Willard's. Saw Key there with Mrs. Sickles; believes that his was about the last dinner party at which Mrs. Key, and others at the Cable Celebration in New York. On the Saturday before Key's death witness called upon him up the Avenue. Key left witness abruptly to go into the Club-house on finding Sickles there. Witness left abruptly, as he was leaving Washington. As he was going down the Avenue, on his return, met Key walking toward Sickles's house. Was at a reception at Sickles's on 23d February; saw Key there.

THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN KEY AND SICKLES.

Mr. Brady, for the defense, next endeavored to have the correspondence between Key and Sickles read before intervening witness. These letters were: 1. Key to Sickles, requesting the discontinuance of visits. Sickles had stated that Key and Mrs. Sickles met at a house on the Bladensburg Road, and carried on there an improper intimacy. 2. Weddridge to Key, giving up Marshal J. Bacon and S. B. Beekman as his authority; 3. Key to Bacon, demanding his authority for the statements; 4. Bacon to Key, giving up Beekman as his author; 5. Key to Beekman, demanding if the statements of Bacon and Weddridge be correct, and if he (Beekman) be responsible for them; 6. Beekman to Key, denying the truth of Bacon's statements, and disavowing their authority. 7. Key to Sickles, inclosing the correspondence.

The prosecution objected to the introduction of those letters, as not material in this case. They are dated March, 1859. Objection sustained by the Court.

JOHN M'LEOD.

On Tuesday, 12th April, the evidence for the defense was continued. John M'Dinee knew the parties, and was aware that they were intimate. Was at Mrs. Sickles's reception on the 23d February. Knew Key's character, and his was good. Was present at the ball given by Willard's on the Thursday before the decease of Key.

JOSEPH H. HOOVER

Had been the most intimate and cherished friend of Key for ten years. Has known Mr. and Mrs. Sickles for four years. Intimacy Key's brother. They were friends. Sickles urged Key's reappointment by Buchanan. Was present at the dinner-party mentioned by Mr. Dougherty. Left it to Sickles. Key afterward told witness that Sickles had left him to pay the bill, and witness accordingly paid it. Had not kept a diary of Key's movements on that occasion.

On 23d Feb. Key brought Lucas, Sickles's daughter, to witness's house to see Mrs. Hoover, and returned for her three hours afterward to inquire for her. Saw Key at dinner on the day before his death. Was not summoned. Went frequently to Sickles's house; often saw Key there. Key never said a word to witness about Sickles complaining in any way his visits to see Key at his (Sickles's) house. Believes that Key's visits were not unwelcome to Sickles. Correspondence as before. Does not recollect Key visiting Mrs. Sickles's house on set of terms. Key's last interview had no child; Sickles told witness that he had always been kind to Key's children. Key was present at the Club-house ball. Intending to the subject of the correspondence of Key and Sickles, witness said that he then knew that Key's object in keeping up Teresa's acquaintance he was willing to meet him as formerly.

JOHN H. GODDARD,

Chief of Police, produced a copy of the pistol, handed to witness by Sickles on his commitment. It is in the same state as when handed to him by Sickles.

Mr. Stanton drew the Court's attention to the fact that the glass filled round Key's head at Mr. Key's post-office.

REV. SMITH PYNE

Was passing Lafayette Square at 5 P.M. on the day before Key's death. Saw Key in Mr. Sickles's house. Key was alive, and drew his cuticura to such attention to it. There was a bullet-hole through the window-glass, and a bullet in the wall. Key said: "There must be a band of brigands about him—a devilish set." Cross-examined: Key was in excellent spirits. Mr. Sickles was not there. Did not speak to witness; perhaps did not see him, though he looked toward him. Knew Mrs. Sickles by Key's request about the beginning of last month.

ROBERT WALKER

Has known Sickles for several years. Had not seen him for a considerable time prior to Key's decease. On the day went to Sickles's house at 2 P.M. As he came to let Key in, Sickles said: "Key is dead." Saw Mrs. Sickles; witness for calling. "He had scarcely repeated these words when a loud report clung the wall of neighboring at about her witness's house. Sickles said: "Key is dead." Sickles's house. Sickles said: "Key is dead." Sickles's house. Sickles said: "Key is dead." Sickles him then. He was exalted, but not crying. He went up stairs into the room where Mrs. Sickles was lying on the floor. There were police officers on the stairs. He came down in four or five minutes. He was altogether about five minutes in the house after he returned. Heard no noise or cries while he was in the study.—Recalled: When Key waved his handkerchief he looked up at the house.

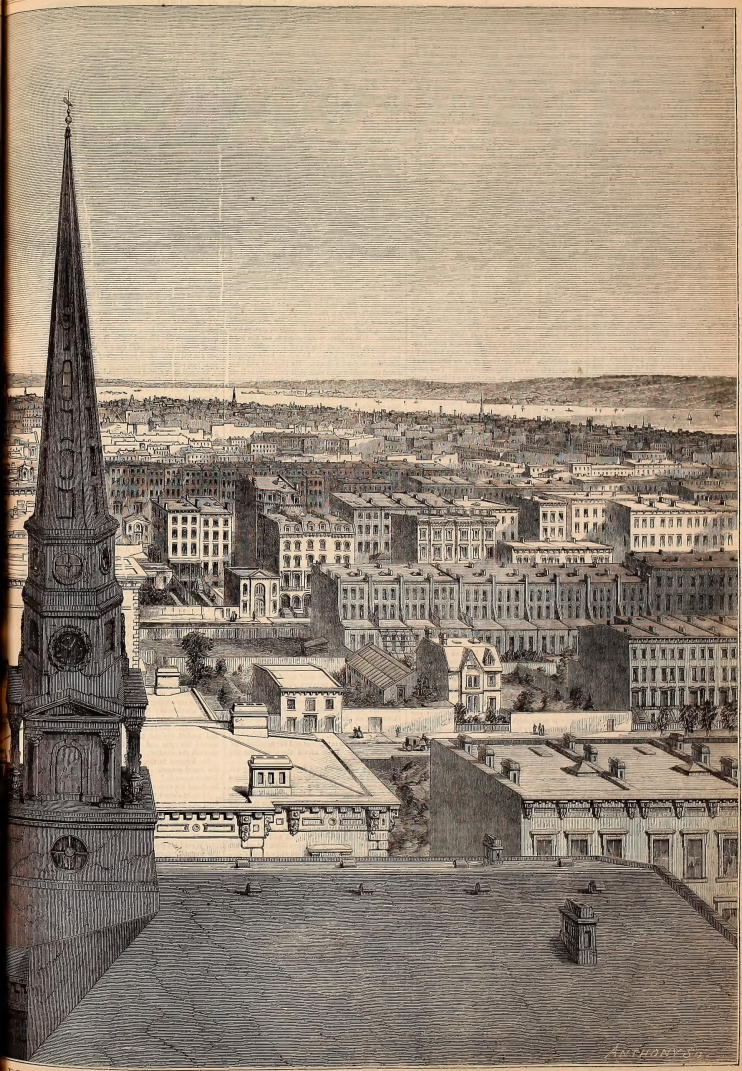
WILLIAM W. MANN

Saw Key at D'R. on 15th February, in Lafayette Square. He waved his handkerchief, retiring it round. Witness was within a few feet of him. Could not tell which drew who was within a few feet of him. Could not tell which drew who was within a few feet of him. Could not tell which drew who

NEW YORK CITY AND ENVIRONS, FROM THE S



DR. SPRING'S NEW BRICK CHURCH, FIFTH AVENUE.

HANGED BY THE NECK.

I.

I AM about to lift the veil of mystery which for ten years has shrouded the murder of Mary Ware, and though I lay bare my own weakness, or folly, or what you will, I do not shrink from the unveiling. No hand but mine can perform the task. There was, indeed, a man who might have done this better than I; but he wrapped himself in silence, and went his way.

I like a man who can hold his tongue.

On the corner of Crandall and Clarke streets stands a dingy-brown frame-house, which, judging from its absolute air of antiquity, must have been built a century ago. It has a very cracked and stained wooden antique, and though a very charming bonâ fide lodged on the second floor front of "over the way," and sang like a canary-bird every morning, I assert, that her name was Mary Ware; third, that she had two lovers—short allowance for a dozen; fourth, that poverty and pathos took human shape it was christened Mary Ware. She was one of Beauty's best thoughts. I can not tell if her eyes were black or hazel. Her hair was bronze-brown, silken and wavy, and her mouth the perfection of tenderness. Her figure was rich in those perfect curves which delight the old Greek masters. I write this with no impure thought. She was the ley of Lindsay's room, stark and lifeless and horrible, the glory faded from her face, her eyes staring and wide kissed her, but not till then. How ghastly she looked! Eyes with no light in them, lips with no breath on them—death, dull death!

Mary Ware was a dear study to me than her lovers. One of them was commonplace—a prosperous, well-dressed, well-made, handsome, shallow. Nature manufactures such men by the gross. He was a lieutenant in the army; I think, proud not to have been on the sea, or in it, instead of working rain-sheds for Jones, or cotton-gins for Smith's mould. His character, like his person, had rough lines to it. Only for the drooping of his eyelids, and a certain coarseness about the mouth, he would have been handsome, in spite of those dark, deep-sunken eyes. But those would have set an unsentimental wife—tall, dog-chested, knitted with muscles of steel. "Some day," said I, as I saw him stalk up the house-steps one evening, "I will paint the little lieutenant out of that second-story window." I should have been a wise arrangement.

From the time I left off short jackets women have perplexed me. I have found out what one man is not, but I have never found out what he is. I can not tell to this day which of those two men Mary Ware loved; if she loved him at all for flirtation, however, was scandal enough for the entire neighborhood; but little did the gossip dream of the tragedy which was lying in wait under their noses.

This affair had continued for several months, when it was reported that Mary and Julius Kenneth were affianced. The Lieutenant was less frequently seen in Clarke Street; and Julius waited upon Mary's footsteps with a humility and tenderness strangely out of keeping with his manly nature. Mrs. Grundy was somewhat appeased. Yet, though Mary went to the Sunday concerts with Julius Kenneth, she still wore the fresh flowers rosa in her bosom!

If I could only meet with an unoriginal woman!

II.

I was awakened one morning by several quick, nervous raps on my room door. The noise startled me from a most delightful dream.

"Oh, Sir!" cried a voice on the landing, "there's been a dreadful murder done across the street! They've murdered Mary Ware!"

"I will get up." That was all I said. I looked at my watch. It was nine o'clock. I had overslept myself; but then I sat up late the night before.

I dressed myself hastily, and, without waiting for breakfast, pushed my way through the crowd that had collected in the street, and ascended a good up stairs unquestioned to the scene of the tragedy. What I observed in those three years of my presence—a tall, slim gentleman, with a professional air, evidently a physician; two policemen; Adelaide Woods, a neighbor; Mrs. Macrum, the landlady; and Julius Kenneth. In the centre of the chamber, on the bed, lay the body of Mary Ware. The face of the corpse bounded me for years afterward with its bloodless lips, the dark streaks under the eyes, and the long wet hair streaming over the pillow. I stooped over her for a moment, and turned down the counterpane, which was drawn up closely to her chin.

"There was that across her throat

Which you might hardly count as sin!"

At the head of the bed sat Julius Kenneth, bending over the icy hard which he held in his own. He seemed to be talking to it. The gentleman in black was conversing in undertones with Mrs. Macrum, who swung her hands every other moment and glanced toward the body. The two policemen were examining the doors, closets, and windows of the premises. There was no fire in the air-tight stove, but the room was suffocating close. I opened a window and leaned against the casement to catch the fresh air. The physician approached me. I instructed something to him.

"Yes," he began; "the affair looks very mysterious, as you remark. Never saw so little evidence of any thing. Thought at first 'twas a case of suicide: door locked, key on the inside, room in perfect order; but then we find no instrument with which the subject could have inflicted that wound on the neck. They must have stopped up the window. But how? The windows are at least thirty feet from the ground. It would be impossible for a person to jump that distance without fracturing a limb, even if he could clear the iron railing below. Unpleasant things to jump on, these railings—I've—I've—I've—I've broken a sharp knife. The party meant to make sure work of it. The carotid divided, windpipe severed in two, and dread seconds."

The medical man went on in this hideous style for ten minutes, during which time Kenneth did not raise his lips from Mary's hand. I spoke to him; but he only shook his head in reply. I understood his grief; and on returning to my room I wrote him a note, the purport of which will be hereafter revealed.

The Evening Mirror of that day contained the following article:

"MURDER IN CLARKE STREET.—This morning, at eight o'clock, Mary Ware, the well-known dressmaker, was found murdered in her last residence on the corner of Clarke and Crandall streets. The throat was cut several times, and the body was found lying pale and yet below the left ear. The deceased was dressed in a ballet-costume, and the door was locked on the inside. From which circumstance, together with the murderer was hidden in the chamber. That the room gave no evidence of struggle is also an important fact. I do not think, or even one strong man, grappling suddenly with the deceased, could have overpowered her, and could have prevented any great struggle. No weapon whatever was discovered on the premises. We have before all the facts which have elicited by the coroner's inquest. It explains nothing.

"Harriet Morston deposes: I keep a boarding-house at 125 Clarke street. The deceased was a boarder with me for the past two years. Has always been a good customer. I do not think she had many visitors; certainly no male visitors except a lieutenant King, and Mr. Kenneth, to whom she was engaged. I do not think that Lieutenant King was last at the house; not within five days. I am confident. I am certain of it that he had gone away forever. I did not see her last night when she returned from the theatre. She had called at my room, but as I was dressing for bed, I did not see her. The last time I saw the deceased was at the theatre, about half-past seven, when she requested me to call out with 'Jules,' meaning Mr. Kenneth, and request him to meet her eight or ten times, and received no answer. I then grew fatigued, and called one of the ushers, Mr. Adelaide Woods, who helped me to force the door. The key fell out on the inside as we pressed against the door. I left the door in charge of Mr. Woods, and should have heard any unusual noise. Two weeks ago deceased told me she was to be married to Mr. Kenneth in a few days. Mr. Kenneth's wealth were in the habit of taking walks before breakfast. The latter was in the habit of visiting deceased every morning. I assisted Mrs. Morston in breaking open the door. [Describes position of the body, etc.]

"Here the call-boy was summoned, and testified to circumstances relative to the position of the night of the murder. He came as far as the steps with her. The door was opened by a woman. Could not swear that it was Mary Ware. Did not know her by sight. The night was very dark, and there was a slight mist. Could not swear.

"Julius Kenneth deposes: I am a machinist, reside at No. — Forsyth Street. I have been acquainted with Mary Ware about eighteen months. We were engaged to be married. [Here the witness's voice failed him.] The last time I saw her was yesterday morning. I left her residence, and walked out together. I did not leave my room last evening. I was confined to the house by a cold all day. A lieutenant King used to visit the deceased frequently. It created considerable talk in the neighborhood. I do not like it, and intended to put a break off the acquaintance. Deceased told me yesterday morning that Lieutenant King had been ordered to some foreign station, and would trouble me no more. Deceased had engaged to walk with me this morning at eight o'clock. When I reached Clarke Street I first learned that she had been murdered. [Here the witness, overcome by his emotion, was permitted to retire.]

"Dr. Underhill deposes: [This witness was very voluble and learned, and had to be suppressed several times by the coroner. We give his testimony in brief.] I was called to view the body of the deceased. A deep wound on the throat, two inches below the left ear, severing the left common carotid and the internal jugular vein, had been inflicted by some sharp instrument. Such a wound would produce death almost immediately. The body bore no other marks of violence. The deceased must have been dead several hours, the rigor mortis having already supervened. On a second examination, with Dr. Rose, the deceased was found to be enceinte.

"Dr. Rose corroborated the above testimony.

The night-watchman and several other people were examined, but their statements threw no light upon the case. The situation of Julius Kenneth, the lover of the unfortunate girl, excites the deepest commiseration. The deceased was nineteen years of age. We have evidence, in what could have led to the perpetration of the cruel act, are mysterious which, at present, threaten to baffle the sagacity of the police."

I could not smile on reading all this solemn nonsense. After several days the wave seemed to smile my toilet with extreme care, and presented myself at the sheriff's office. Two gentlemen who were sitting with me at a desk started to their feet as I announced myself. I bowed to the sheriff very coldly, and said,

"I am the man who murdered Mary Ware!"

Of course I was instantly arrested. The Mirror of that evening favored me with the following complimentary notice:

"THE CLARKE STREET HOMICIDE: FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS.—A man named Lindsay Kenneth, who murdered the ballet-girl in Clarke Street on the night of the 5d inst. surrendered himself to the sheriff this morning. He gives his name as Paul Pyne, and resides opposite the scene of the tragedy. He is of unsound height, and well built; has dark, restless eyes, and chestnut hair; his face is unusually pale, and by no means improved by the Mephistophelian smile which overspread it upon his lips. Notwithstanding his gentlemanly address, there is about him the air of a desperate villain. His voluntary surrender is not the least mysterious feature of this mysterious affair: for, had he pursued a different course, all chance of detection beyond a doubt. He planned and executed the crime with such skill that the slightest error or no evidence against him save his own confession, which is inexplicable enough. He acknowledges the crime with stubborn refusal to enter into details. He expresses a desire to be hanged immediately! He says that he has reasons, and by what means he left it after committing the heinous deed, and why he brutally murdered a woman with whom, as it is said, he had had an intimate acquaintance, are enigmas which still perplex the police minds, and will not be certainly clear. These facts, however, will probably be brought to light during the trial. In the mean time the greatest excitement exists throughout the city."

At four o'clock that afternoon the door of my cell turned on its hinges, and Julius Kenneth stood face to face with me. I ought to have covered in the presence of that injured man, but I did not. I was cool, master of myself in and about me.

"You got my note?" I said.

"Yes; and I have come here as you requested."

"You know, of course, that I have refused to reveal the circumstances connected with the murder? I will reveal all to the confessor and no other."

He turned his eyes on mine for a moment, and said, softly,

"But even to you I will assign no reason for having committed this crime. It was necessary that Mary Ware should die. I alone could do it. I should die in her chamber; and to that end I purchased her night-key."

Julius Kenneth held his eyes on me.

"On Wednesday night, after Mary Ware had gone to the theatre, I entered her room by the means of the key, and stole unobserved into her chamber, and secreted myself under the bed, or in that small recess which runs near the window. I which. Some time between eleven and twelve o'clock she returned, and I watched the gas-jet be caught her by the waist, pressed a handkerchief saturated with chloroform over her mouth, and drew her on the bed. When she had ceased to struggle, and I could use my hand, I made a step incision in the throat. Then I unbuttoned the bedclothes, and threw my gloves and the handkerchief into the stove. I am afraid there was not fire enough to burn them."

Kenneth walked up and down the cell in great agitation; then he suddenly stopped and sat down on the bed.

"Are you listening? I then extinguished the light, and proceeded to make my escape from the room, which I did in so simple a manner that the police, though their very desks in daily contact with fearful things, will never find it out, unless indeed you betray me. The night, you will remember, was remarkably dark. It was about half-past eight; it was impossible to see a person at four yards' distance. My object was to get into a crowd, and to let myself out, holding on by the sill until my feet touched on the left-hand third of the window beneath, which is the only space of the whole front that was made stationary by the catch. By standing on this projection for about as long a moment as I was able to reach the tin water-spout of the adjacent building, and by that I descended to the sidewalk."

Kenneth glared at me like some ferocious animal.

"Organizing the scheme," I returned, coolly, that I had thoughtlessly brought the knife with me—a long, thin-bladed knife. I should have left it in the room, but as I was going to do the thing the appearance of suicide. I threw the knife—"

"Into the river!" exclaimed Kenneth, involuntarily.

And then I smiled.

"How did you know it was I?" he shrieked.

"It was as plain as day," I returned, coolly. "Hush, they will hear you on the corridor. I know it the moment I saw you sitting by the bed. Then, because my physical revulsion at the dead corpse though you seemed to caress it. Your fatal throughout was criminally cool. Never was too melodramatic. Secondly, when I looked into the stove I saw a handkerchief partly consumed, and then I instantly remembered the faint, peculiar smell which I had observed in the room before the windows were opened. Thirdly, when I went to the window, I noticed that the sheriff had scraped off the iron brackets which held the spout to the adjoining house. The spout had been painted three days previously. The paint on the brackets was thicker than any where else, and had not dried. On looking at your feet, which I did while I spoke to you, I remarked that the leather on the inner side of both your boots was slightly chafed."

"If you intend to betray me," said Kenneth, thrust his hand in his bosom. He had a pistol there.

"That I am here proves that I intend nothing of the kind. If you will listen patiently, you shall learn why I acknowledge the crime, why I would bear the penalty. I believe there are vast, intense sensations from which we are shut out by the fear of a certain kind of death. This pleasure, this ecstasy, this something which I have striven for all my life, is known only to the privileged few—innocent men, who, through some oversight of the law, are known as the murderers. Some men seem to be hanged, some have hanging thrust upon them, and some (as I hope to do) achieve hanging. For years and years I have watched for such a chance as this. Worlds could not tempt me to privilege your guilt any more than worlds could have tempted to commit your crime. A man's mind and heart should be at ease to enjoy, to the full, such a luxury as this. Do you understand?"

And I turned my back on him. Kenneth came to my side and placed his heavy hand upon my shoulder—that red right hand which all the tears of the angels could not wash white. It made me shudder.

"I shall go," I said, at last, quietly. "Generally I can not, I will not, die now. They dishonored me. Mary was to have been my wife. How would have hidden her shame! She is dead. When I meet him then I shall have done with life. I shall have died like a man. And you—you will not hang you, you are a maniac!"

The cell door closed on Julius Kenneth.

I bite the blood into my lips with vexation when I think what a miserable failure I made of it. I there stood fairies and played cards with me as my room on the night of the murder proved, and while I was literally under the rope, Fame, for I insisted on being executed. Then it was maddening to have all the papers call me "a monomaniac." I was nothing of the kind. What was Pythagoras, and Newton, and Fulton, and Stephen Girard?

But I kept my peace; and impenetrable mystery shrouded the murder of Mary Ware.

III

Three years ago, in a broad daylight, a man was shot dead on Broadway. A hundred eyes saw the deed. I went to the inquest. They buried him with military honors. So much for Lieutenant King!

The first grey light of dawn straggled through the narrow window of the cell, and drove the shadows into the farthest corner. I awoke with Kenneth lay sleeping. A summer morning was breaking on the city.

A cool green woods millions of birds stirred in their nests, waiting for the miracle of morning; the bright clouds were flushed with rose. New England towns; innumerable shop-keys took down innumerable shutters; the milkmen shrieked; the bakers' doors were opened; and then the gigmount of sleep was broken, and all the vast machinery of life was in motion.

But to the man in jail it was as if these things were not.

At he lay there, slumbering in the increasing light, the carpenters in the prison-yard were raising a wooden platform, with two fearful black uprights supporting a horizontal beam, in the centre of which was a small iron pulley. The quick sound of the hammer echoed in the corridors, if he had any. He turned restlessly once or twice, and pushed the hair from his forehead. Then he opened his eyes and saw the splendid blue sky through the window.

He listened to the hammers. He knew what the sound meant. It was his last day on earth. "I've a hundred," he said, "I would have more sleep; so he closed his eyes again.

At eight o'clock the jailer brought him his breakfast, and he ate it with a relish. At half-past, an hour afterward new attendants dressed him in a melancholy suit of black, and pinioned his right hand. At ten the chaplain of the prison entered the cell.

"I would his poor friend," he said, approaching the wretch, "turn, in this last, sad hour, to Him who never spurns, but like the tempest, 'saved all things.' Would he listen for a while to the teachings of One whose life and death were two pure prayers for mankind?" He would be here, and at once. Present, such consolation as he, a humble worker in God's vineyard, could offer to him.

"No: but he would have some brandy."

The unctuitic beast! I could pity him—not that he was to be hanged, but because he was not in the state of mind to enjoy the ecstatic sensations which I am convinced result from strangulation. The chaplain remained with the man, and the man passed.

The ponderous bell of the City Hall sounded a boisterous alarm of fire, and St. Paul's modestly chimed response. At the jail the sheriff, with a drawn sword in his hand, paused at the foot of the scaffold, while the prisoner, followed by the indefatigable chaplain, complacently mounted the rough-hewn deal steps which led to—can any body tell me where? To the top of the scaffold. Quite right.

I shall not forget that insensible, stony face, as I saw it for a moment before the black cap screwed it into—nothingness! What did I see there? I should like to have studied the convulsive workings of those features.

In the stillness of that June night they took the body away in a pine coffin and buried it somewhere. I don't know where. I have not the slightest idea where they bury that sort of man.

THE HALF-BROTHERS.

My mother was twice married. She never spoke of her first husband, and it is only from other people that I have learned what little I know about him. I believe she was extremely romantic when she was married to him: and he was barely one-and-twenty. He rented a small farm up in Connecticut, somewhere around the twin-coast; but he was perhaps too young and inexperienced to have the charge of land and cattle; and he failed. He died not a pauper, and he fell into ill-health, and died of consumption before they had been three years one and wife, leaving my mother a widow at twenty, with a little child only just able to walk, and the farm on her hands for four years more before she knew, with half the stock on it dead, or sold for one to pay the more pressing debts, and with no money to stock it again, or to buy even the provisions needed for the small consumption of every day. There was another child coming, boy; and said sorry, I believe, she was to think of it. A dreary winter she must have had in her lonesome dwelling, with never another voice in it for company; her sister came to bear her company, and they two planned and plotted how to make every penny they could raise go as far as possible. I can't tell you how it happened that my little sister, whom I never saw, was born dead in the end of it, and my poor mother's cup was not full enough, only a fortnight before Grégory came into the world. She had all of scarlet fever, and in a week she lay dead. My mother was, I believe, just stunned with this last blow. My aunt says that for days she did not cry: Aunt Fanny would have been thankful if she had, I am sure, instead of as it was, as I knew it and, kneeling in her pretty, pale, sad face, without so much as shedding a tear. But after Grégory was born she cried as though she seemed to loosen the tears, and she cried day and night, day and night, till my aunt was half-blind, or watcher looked at each other in dismay, and would fain have stopped her if they had not known how. But she has told me, in her silence, and with her ever-anxious, for every drop she shed eased her brain, which had been in a terrible state before that want of the power to cry. She seemed after that to think of nothing but her baby. Aunt Fanny was older than my mother by a few years, and loved her like a child; but, for all that, she was a kind, warm-hearted creature, who thought much more of another's welfare than of her own; and when it was on her bit of money that they principally lived, and on what the farm could be made to yield for the great Glasgow sewing-merchants. But by-and-by my mother's eyesight began to fail. It was not that she wept so blind, for she could be well enough to guide herself about the house, and to do a good deal of sewing, and she was in no need no longer do fine sewing and earn money. My Aunt Fanny would fain have persuaded her that she had enough to do with Grégory to occupy her age and minding Grégory; but my mother knew that they were poor, and that Aunt Fanny's own stuff had not as much to eat, even of the commonest kind of food, as she could have done with; and so for Grégory, in a very strong light, and Grégory, not more food—for he always had enough, whoever went short—but rather coarser food and much coarser bed. One day—it was Aunt Fanny who told me all this about my poor mother, long after her death —as the sisters were sitting at their work, Aunt Fanny sewing, and my mother hushing Grégory to sleep, William Fergus, who was afterward my father, came in. He was reckoned an old bachelor; I suppose he was long past forty, and he was one of the wealthiest farmers in the district, and he knew my grandfather well, and my mother, and my aunt in their more prosperous days, and he came in and began to twirl his hat by way of being agreeable; my Aunt Fanny talked, and he listened and looked at my mother, who sat with her head bent over on that visit or on many another that he paid before he spoke out what he had come to say, because of his calling so often all along, and from the very first time he came to their house. One Sunday, however, my Aunt Fanny went to church alone, and took care of the child, and my mother went alone. She was one who had a great dislike to visits, without going into the kitchen to look at Grégory or speak any word to her sister, and Aunt Fanny heard her cry at the door-step as she went up and scolded her right well through the latched door, till she got her to stop and hush it. And then she threw herself on my aunt's neck, and told her that William Preston had asked her to marry him, and implored to take counsel with regard to her boy, and to let him want for nothing, neither in the way of love nor of anything else that she had conveyed. Aunt Fanny was a good deal shocked at this; for, as I have said, she had often thought that my mother, in her blindness, was but burdened very quickly, and now here was proof positive of it, if she could so have think of marrying again. Besides, as Aunt Fanny used to say, she herself would have been a far more suitable match for a man of William Preston's age and riches, who, though she was a widow, had not been her first sweetheart by many years. But my mother, as Aunt Fanny said, they had not asked her advice; and there was much to be said on the other side of the question. By-and-by Aunt Fanny saw with a brighter view of the marriage than did my mother herself, who looked on it as a matter of duty, and smiled after the day when she promised William Preston to be his wife. But much as she had loved Grégory before, she seemed to love him more now.

At last William Preston and she were wed; and she went to be mistress of a well-stocked house, not above half an hour's walk from where Aunt Fanny lived. I believe she did all that she could to please my father; and a more dutiful wife, I have heard him himself say, could never have been. But she did not love him, and he soon found it out. She loved Grégory, and she did not love him. Perhaps, love would have come in time, if he had been patient enough to wait; but it just turned him sour to see how her eye brightened and her color came at the sight of that little child, while for him who had given her so much she had only gentle words as cold as ice. He got to taunt her with the difference in her manner, as I have heard being love; and he took a positive dislike to Grégory, and would not have had a penny of his always-gushes had she a spring of fresh water who he came near. He wanted her to love him more, and perhaps that was all well and good; but he wanted her to love her child less, and that was an evil wish. Once he gave way to these feelings and cursed and swore at Grégory, who had got into some mischief, as children will; my mother made no answer, but left the room by the door, with just enough to have to keep another man's child, without having it provided for by up to his majesty-ses by his wife, who ought to be always in the same mind that he was; and so from little they got to more; and the end of it was, that my mother took to her bed before her time, and I was born that night. My father was not cruel, but proud, and sorry, all in a breath; glad and proud that a son was born to him; and sorry for his poor wife, who had tried hard to love him and failed to brought it on. But he was a man who liked better to be happy than right, and he was pleased that it was all Grégory's fault, and owed him an additional grudge for having hastened my birth. He had always been fond of children, and liked me. My mother began to sink the day after I was born. All the love she had left for Grégory, and more, would have coined his heart's blood into gold to save her that could have been; but it could not. And Aunt Fanny was sent for, and came, and Grégory Helen did not wish to live, and so just let herself go away without an effort to take hold of life when I questioned her, she owned that my mother did all the doctors bade her do, with the same not an attempt to help herself. And so she let herself be carried through life. One of her last requests was to have Grégory with her, and to kiss him, and then she made him take hold of my little hand. Her husband came in while she was looking at us all, and when he saw us so, he left the room as he saw she felt now, and seemed to gaze on us two as his half-brothers, and to ponder on the difference. He looked up in his face and smiled, almost by first smile at him; and such a sweet smile! as she was dying! Aunt Fanny came to live with us. It was the best thing that could be done. My father would have been glad to return to his old mode of bachelor life, but what could he do with my little children? He had to get a woman to take care of him, and who so fitting as his wife's elder sister? After a time he overcame my strong weakliness of constitution, and was just a merry, strong-looking lad whom every passer-by noticed, when my father was married to my mother's sister.

At home I was the darling of my aunt, the tenderly-beloved of my father, the pet and plaything of the old domestic, the "young master" of the neighborhood, and Grégory was my slave. Not my aunt, assuming a sort of authority which sat oddly enough, I doubt not, on such a baby as I was then.

Grégory was three years older than I. Aunt Fanny was always fond of telling me that I was one son, but she did not often think about him. She had fallen so completely into the habit of being engrossed by me that she had not the heart even into her charge as a delicate baby. My father seemed to regard him as a very little boy indeed, who had to unscrupulously and called out once more, a loud, despairing, wailing cry, to which I took up the cry of spilling, wailing cry, to which I took up the cry of Grégory, and ran from the others around, dulled as the sound might be by the thickened air of my surprise. "Oh, I am so sorry!" she cried, in a still as mine—so wild that it seemed unearthly, and I almost thought of the Fells, about whom I had heard so many tales. My heart suddenly beat with the strange kind of vivid thought, in which I was conscious of my face to my lavish years passed before me like visions. In a pang of agony, caused by such remembrances, I went to a door, flung it open, my strength and called out once more, a loud, despairing

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER VI.

YOUR GOOD HEALTH, SIR!

WHEN there was a report that Mr. Savory Gray was coming to Delafield to establish a school for boys, Christopher Burt, Esquire, the richest resident in that village—a venerable man, who had not only come down from a former generation, but had brought with him a great deal of treasure which his father, a gentleman of that generation, had left him—Burt, Senior, having been originally a small grocer, was developed by the Revolutionary war and its necessities into a great contractor of provisions, as April's tadpole becomes, under propitious circumstances, the plethoric bullfrog of June evenings, whose boominess is an instrument of melody, and not of war—Christopher Burt, Esquire, was naturally interested. For he was not only the richest proprietor, but he had a grand-daughter of tender years, to whom the gentle reader has been already introduced.

It was Dr. Peewee who went to communicate the news when he heard it—for there was no barber in the village, and, as will happen in small communities, men must take turns at each other's business.

"H'm, ha!" said the Doctor; "how are you to-day, Sir? H'm, ha! Pretty well? Yes; pretty well. You've barely heard the news, Mr. Burt—eh? No; I suppose not—I suppose not—not heard the news—no."

For surely you will allow that when a man has been preaching for more than a score of years without any stock of ideas, he may express himself, as it were, with words and water in his daily walk.

HOSEA WUMLEY AND HIS MAMM.

"I have not heard any news, Dr. Peewee."

"No, Sir; I suppose not—I suppose not. H'm, ha! not heard the news? No; not heard the news."

"What the deuce is the news?" asked Mr. Burt, rather suddenly; for, although very pompous, he was also very impatient, and fretted fearfully under Doctor Peewee's manner.

"Well, Mr. Burt, a retired merchant from town—h'm, ha!—retired—unfortunate merchant—means to open a school here. Yes; means to open a school—unfortunate merchant! Yes, unfortunate—h'm, ha!—and establishes a school in Delafield."

"What's his name, Sir?"

"Gray, Sir, Gray. Pretty good name, Sir? Yes; pretty good name."

"A high-y respectable name, Dr. Peewee. And a school for boys, or girls?" inquired Mr. Burt.

"H'm! boys, Mr. Burt—a school for boys? Yes—yes—yes."

Old Christopher Burt felt instantly like all old dragons that guarded the Hesperidean fruit rolled into one. He forsook pueblo without end; and as he was a faithful parishioner of Dr. Peewee's, and wanted to get down Trouble under his feet, as that worthy divine practiced in his preaching and his life, he absolutely felt a sudden twinge of the gout as he thought of his being unable to peruse the offenders who were about to try to rob his orchard. He rang the bell violently.

"Send Miss Hope to me!"

The servant disappeared, and in a few moments his grand-daughter entered the room. She had been in the garden reading, and drawing, perhaps, as she lifted her eyes and they slid along the receding landscape. If you would like to know the book, you can easily see that it is Byron. It is lying out there upon the lawn, where she threw it when she was called. She is simply dressed; for, to Dr. Peewee's eyes, she seems only wrapped in a cloud of delicate muslin, made close around the throat, but in a manner, and worn with a grace, that show the girl's character. She stands in an aura of youth and bloom, with a natural loftiness of carriage, a soft superiority—as it be the exquisite spring blossom of a quality which gradually hardens into stiff, sharp thorn. Who knows in the late autumn?

Dr. Peewee's red nose glistens. It is the only way in which he betrays emotion. He smiles that watery, selfish smile.

"How do you, my dear? Yes—h'm, ha!—pretty well? Yes; pretty well."

"I am very well, Sir, thank you."

"Yes—yes; pretty well? Yes; pretty well."

"Did you want me, grandpa?"

"Yes, my dear. Mr. Gray, a respectable person, is coming here to set up a school. There will be a great many young men and boys. I have lived with them to the bones. I hate boys. My dear, I expect you to hate them too."

"Yes—yes, my dear," said Dr. Peewee; "hate the boys? Yes; we must hate the boys."

Hope Wayne looked at the two old gentlemen, and laughed a little as she answered,

"I don't think you need have warned me, grandpa; I'm not at all apt to fall in love with boys."

"No, no, Hope; I know. Ever since you have lived with me—how long is it, my dear, since your mother died?"

"I don't know, grandpa; I never saw her," replied Hope, gravely.

"Yes, yes; well, ever since then you have been a good, quiet little girl with grandpapa. Here, Cossy, come and give grandpa a kiss. And mind the boys! I speaking to grandpa, we never to know them. You understand? Now go, dear."

She bowed to Dr. Peewee and vanished. She was almost a woman in years: she was both a girl and a woman in feeling. But to her grandfather she was his daughter, the veriest child among children. She vanished, and in a few minutes Hope Wayne was on the lawn, learning, perhaps, from that cynic's portraits of Moslem and Giaour, how to hate the boys.

The object of the Doctor's visit being accomplished, he took his go.

"Doctor," said Mr. Burt, as the other pushed back his chair, "it is a very warm day. Let me advise you to prevent yourself any undue debility or effect of the heat by a little cordial." As he spoke he led the way into the dining-room, and published slowly over a bunch of keys which he drew from his pocket. Finding the proper key, he put it into the door of the sideboard. "In this sideboard, Doctor, I keep a bottle of old Jamaica. Permit me to sent one by a former correspondent in the West Indies." As Dr. Peewee had heard the same remark at least fifty times before, he was by no means the kindly glistening of his nose to some other cause than excitement at his intelligence.

GRANDFATHER AND GRAND-DAUGHTER.

"I like to preserve myself in relations with my old commercial friends," continued Mr. Burt, speaking very pompously, and slowly pouring from a half-dozen bottles into a tumbler. "I rarely drink any thing myself—"

"H'm, ha!" grunted the Doctor.

"—except a glass of wine at dinner. Yet, not to be impolite, Doctor, not to be impolite, I could not refuse to drink to your excellent health and safe return to the bosom of your family."

And Mr. Burt drained the glass, quite unobservant of the fact that the Reverend Dr. Peewee was standing with his glass full of cordial Jamaica. In truth Mr. Burt had previously been alarmed about the effect of the bottle of port—which he playfully and facetiously called a glass—that he had drank at dinner, and to guard against evil results he had already, as he was accustomed to say with an excellent humor, been to the West Indies for his health.

"Bless my soul, Doctor, you haven't filled your glass! Permit me—"

And the old gentleman poured into the one glass and then into the other.

"And now, Sir," he added, "now, Sir, let us drink to the health of Mr. Gray, but not of the boys, ha! ha!"

"No, no, not of the boys? No, not of the boys. Thank you, Sir, thank you. That is a pleasant liquor, Mr. Burt. H'm, ha! a very pleasant liquor. Good afternoon, Mr. Burt; a very good day, Sir. Ha! ha!"

And the Doctor marched out behind his nose, which glowed before him like an ordinance.

CHAPTER VII.

NO DUE.

"I WOULDN'T give a cent for a boy who hadn't been in love with a petticoat ever since he was out of one," said old Marm Wumley, who sold Mr. Gray's boys cakes and candy.

"Nor I neither," chimed in her old husband, as he punched the tobacco in his pipe with his thumb. "Nor a nutter, granny. Only 'tain't no use."

"I see Hope Wayne to church last Sunday, and, oh me! I dunno whether all Mr. Gray's boys ain't in love with her. What a real pooty face it is! There's suth'n so sort of interesting about it. I guess lots' them boys in love."

"Thinks likely," replied her gossip, as he sat at the window puffing a cloud into the peaceful summer air. "Likely's not, granny; only 'tain't no use!"

This last expression constituted Hosea Wumley's "platform." He brought every event in life to that. It was a cheerful despondency, a good-humored skepticism, or a hey fatalism. It was the end of all discussion with him. Politics, religion, education, domestic affairs, whatever was in debate, all received the same quietus. The old Federal merchants in the sea of good feeling, or earlier—for Hosea Wumley had been the editor of Bunker Hill, and heard the Declaration of Independence read to the village by Dr. Peewee's predecessor from Dr. Peewee's pulpit, and had seen General Washington review the army under the elm at Cambridge—when they came driving out for an afternoon's airing through Delafield, would sometimes have a word with Hosea, who was as staunch a Federalist as the best of them. But the old man was calm during their most tremendous prognostics of merriment. "The stiff merchants heating themselves, would begin gradually to rise and sputter; until they quivered all over with rage as they denounced the degeneracy of the times, and sighed for the good old days, and the good old men, and the golden age in general, which people on the wrong side of sixty are very apt to locate (as Yankee Doodle says) on the right side of thirty.

The old Federal gentlemen lamented the departure of "the fathers," as if those fathers had never been seen as if they had always been writing Declarations of Independence, and Constitutions, and Federalists, and had had no blithe sowing of wild oats; as if those prosperous and big-toiled gentlemen, all whose faces seem to have been smeared with a mixture of flour and claret wine to preserve them for our admiration, had always stood in Roman togas, leaning on fasces, and holding a gilt-lettered scroll!

There is our patriarchal old Franklin, for instance, with his benevolent breadth of countenance, the very type of a benign ancestor; our shrewd and thrifty Poor Richard; our sagacious Benjamin par eminence, et cetera. The sound of that Latin word is suggestive. Was Turgot a common wag with his epigrams? Good old Dr. Franklin stands on a very high pedestal indeed. Mellifluous orators exhort the youth of the land to take him as example. Will any orator who makes the request edit a complete edition of the old gentleman's letters? Letters, for instance, in which he gives particular advice to a youth of his day intending to reside for a season in Paris, for the purpose of metaphorically eating frogs in that metropolis? Probably not. Probably the interest of youthful morals requires that Clio should burn those letters. The good Doctor must be presented to our admiration in full court-suit of morality, with the cocked hat of frugality in one hand, and the venerable staff of temperance in the other.

Well, there are children who believe that the king always wears a crown upon his head, and carries a sceptre in one hand and a ball in the other.

There are children who do not know that Justice has removed the bandages from her eyes in our great metropolis.

There may be children who suppose that Dr. Franklin and the other fathers enjoyed no cakes and ale. Per Giove!

So as the old gentlemen drew up in their summer afternoon airing, and aroused the echoes of quiet Delafield with the fury of forgotten wrath—

"Jes so," replied Hosea, as they took breath and paused, and slowly drew the chain, while he placidly puffed and his hound, deeply buried, jingled the change in his trowsers' pockets, "jes so. I say, jes what I tell the old women. But you may fire away at them darned old gun-boats and the rest on't till yo git a stomach-ache; only 'tain't no use."

So with the minister. Dr. Peewee came once a year to make his parochial visit. He always happened in during the day, when Marm Wumley's little shop was open, and seated himself near a box of almond-comfits, from which he could conveniently help himself as the conversation went on.

"Here a little, and there a little, Mrs. Wumley," he was wont to say, as he gathered up some of the candy crumbs and slipped them into his mouth; "line upon line and precept upon precept—that is the way great works and little works are accomplished in this world. Yes, Mrs. Wumley, and Mr. Burt, obey the same great law. He was a huge merchant—you are a small one —and—and—and—we see the results."

Hosea smoked during these pastoral revels. But when Dr. Peewee turned toward him, and with a thin smile, said:

"I hope you liked my sermon on lying last Sunday morning, Mr. Wumley." Hosea answered from the cloud:

"You may preach against lying's much as ever you choose, Dr. Peewee, only 'tain't no use."

Marm Wumley fared no better. Whenever there was disorder in the household—the milk was sour, or the bread was heavy, or the meat was burned—in vain she complained to her husband—in vain she poured out a volley of loud, rattling talk, or threw out sharp adjectives, like hand-grenades: the philosopher only replied,

"That's it, granny. Reckon's much 'yes' about if it makes yer feel better. Likely's not an old woman's better for scolding, only 'tain't no use."

And now when his attention was called to the springing and sprouting of tender affections in young hearts, the sturdy old spectator of events' autumns made the same cheerful, the same doleful, response.

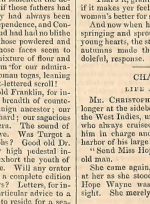
CHAPTER VIII.

LIFE AT FINEWOOD.

MR. CHRISTOPHER BURT carried somewhat longer at the sideboard, and made little trips to the West Indies, until his faithful man Hosea, who always cruised in the neighborhood, took him in charge and brought him into the safe harbor of his large easy-chair.

"Send Miss Hope to me, Hi'am!" said the old man.

She came again, and her grandfather leered at her as she stood a little distance from him. Hope Wayne was not unaccustomed to the sight. She merely asked, gravely,



MRS. SIMCOE, MA'AM.

"Did you want me, Sir?"

"Come here, Hopey! Cosey, come to grandpa!"

She approached, but not so near that he could reach her.

"What is it, grandpa?

"Here! here!"

"No, grandfather, I am near enough," she said, quietly, and with intense, unconscious sadness.

"What! you disobedient chit! Come here this instant."

The old man spoke furiously, but thickly, and his eyes gleamed with sullen red light. He moved forward, but did not attempt to rise. He was too wise for that. "Come here, I say!"

"No, grandfather, I am very well here. What did you wish to say?"

The old man looked at her a moment, as she stood firmly before him. The expression of his anger gradually changed into one of maudlin helplessness.

"Come and love the old grandpa, Cosy! Won't Hopey love her old grandpa?"

"I think I had better go now, grandfather," said Hope, with a sigh. And she turned toward the door.

"Oh! no, no. Don't leave me!" cried the maudlin old man, and he burst into tears, and hid out his hands imploringly.

The young girl stopped. This was her only parent. This was the father of her mother. She turned again with compassion at a little distance from the old man.

"That's a good story," said he, in a way that sounded like "amendatory." It seemed as if he had something to say. He cleared his throat and articulated a few words, but to what end or by what Hope could not understand them. Sleep was evidently overpowering him. He let his head heavily fall. He struggled feebly to keep his eyes open. In vain. There was a foolish staring and muttering, then the white head dropped.

This was the father of her mother! This was her protector and friend! Dreams in the parlor, Byron on the lawn——?

Of course there was a woman in the house—a kind of nurse, or upper-servant, or governess —one of the melancholy dismmies in the game of life. Mrs. Simcoe was her name. Where Mrs. or what Simcoe, it never entered the mind of Hope to inquire. Mrs. Simcoe was a fat, and term-house, sitting in an old high-backed chair, and knitting by the fire, is made so, probably. There is scarcely a boy in the world who is not set in the kitchen who suspects for a moment he was ever any thing else than an old woman, sitting in a high-backed chair.

Mrs. Simcoe looked as if she had always been Mrs. Simcoe—as if she was, or was to be, everybody's white to accost her with a view to biographical details of herself, would be like a visit to an oracle on which you write was part of a tree once. Heavens! how merrily it swung in the great March winds, in the old Massachusetts days! How it bloomed in May and reddened in October, and was as unconscious of existence as the touch of light and breeze as a girl's cheek to her lover's look and whisper! Would you believe it? Steady old maids, to whom I appeal from my books, your coffin—but it tells no tales.

Mrs. Simcoe's face was unchangeable—it was almost blank; not blank, indeed, like paper, but only like the cover of a book. That cover says nothing—covers, rather, whatever you will—is only smooth leather. But ah! what quick pages may it not cover! Passionate songs—a romance—a history—a scandalous chronicle—a Bible!

Mrs. Simcoe was Mr. Burt's house-keeper. So far as any body could say, Mrs. Burt died at a period of which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. She was always a matron of three hours-keepers. But since the death of Hope's mother Mrs. Simcoe was the only housekeeper. She had been Mrs. Wayne's nurse in her last moments. She had rocked the little Hope to sleep the night after her mother died abroad. Mr. Burt always treated her with a kind of dusty condescension, as if she remembered his first love long in Zealand without knowing that there was some sort of secret about Pinewood, as old Burt's place was called, and that Mrs. Simcoe knew that Mrs. Simcoe knew all about it.

"About it! about what? about what is or is?" mooned all the village gossips.

There is many an old piece of family furniture—a table, a chest of drawers—which has tumbering in the garrets of prosperous people, perfectly familiar to every member of the family, every member of each generation in the family. It is passed on from father to son, from mother to daughter. The original owner has gone, but he chasses to see it. "Quaint, that!" says Curious Visitor. "Yes—old thing!" says Host. "Good enough. But it fits out the servants' rooms," replies the Family. Yes; very old, very quaint, very homely; but it has a drawer which has never been by living mortal, and when the spring is touched it flies open as nimbly as your eye, and there lies a little paper which, had it only been known and read by those who are gone now, and who fought battles of life with it, would have been loved, and not hated: they would have understood, and not misunderstood, each other—and the rivers of lives that straggled separately through barren sands to the sea, would have flowed together harmonious between their banks of green.

It was Mrs. Simcoe's duty to oversee the Burt household in general, and particularly to attend to Miss Hope Wayne. She was responsible for her manners, and morals, and dress. She had presumed that at some period Mrs. Simcoe, whom Mr. Burt always addressed as "Simcoe, ma'am," or "Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am," had received a general system of instruction to the effect that "My grand-daughter, Miss Wayne—Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am—will marry a gentleman of wealth and position; and I expect her to be fitted to preside over his household. Yes, Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am."

The chances are that the lady bowed her head and said nothing; for people of her kind seem to have early made the discovery that words may be put into Hosea Wemley's category, and "say no use." She was always quiet, erect, respectable. She pervaded the house; and her step was upon a hill-side path, and upon the carpet, almost as soon as the spot which arrested it. House-keeper ancient nor fit. She was so silent and so shadowy that the whole house sympathized with her, until it became extremely uncomfortable to have servants, whom one could not away; and a story that the house was haunted became immensely popular and credible the moment Mrs. Simcoe left.

There had been no visiting at Pinecrood for a long time, except to and from the church, and of the unsocial habits of Mr. Burt. But the neighboring ladies were just beginning to call upon Miss Wayne. The servant opened to Mrs. Miss. Simcoe accompanied her in the carriage, and as she alighted the lilacs by the door planted the perfumery overhead. Then they drove home. Mr. Burt dined at two, and Miss Hope sat opposite her grandfather, while Hosea waited. Mrs. Simcoe dined alone in her room. There, too, she sat alone in the long summer afternoons; when the odors of the house were over for the day. She held a book by the open window, or gazed out upon the garden, or upon the landscape. There were pine-trees near her window; but beyond she could see green meadows and blue hills, and a glittering river, and rounded reaches of wood. She watched the clouds; she let loose her fancy to fly with the birds in spring days; and the dry hot locusts on sultry afternoons. And she looked with the same unchanging eye upon the worms that sawed themselves on filaments and ate the leaves and stripped the trees, and upon the magical hectic that Death painted upon the leaves that escaped the worms.

Sometimes in the room still, warm afternoons her lips parted, and she seemed to be musing rather than reading. Then she was engaged in performance. There was none of the gush and warmth of song, although the words she uttered were always those of the pathetic Watts, the lazy, those passionate, religious songs of the New Jerusalem. Dull, dull, monotonous, and sad. Indeed, with Methodist hymns she had sung Hope to sleep in the days when she was a baby; so that Hope in after years, when she entered the church with a heart full of vague feelings and dim, inexplicable aspirations, found that every one she was hearing, though with different words, the strain that her nurse had whispered over her cradle in the hymns of Watts.

On a certain afternoon Mrs. Simcoe was sitting at her window, which looked upon the garden on which Hope usually lay. It was already toward sunset, and the golden light streamed upon the landscape as it may have been behind the west wall of the heavenly city.

Mrs. Simcoe's face was turned toward the sunset with the usual calm, impassive look. But she seemed to be even leaning a little out of the window as she sang, softly:

"O that I now the rest might know
Paradise of joy and peace,
Now, Saviour, now the power bestow,
And all my soul increase!

"Remove this hardness from my heart,
This unbelief remove;
To me the quickening Spirit impart—
The sabbath of thy love."

The words were yet murmuring on her lips when she heard a low knock at the door.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Politics and the Weather—Concert at Madame Dachâtel—American Artists present—Great number of Americans in Paris—Mr. and Mrs. American Ladies, who dress abroad, lease their Blankets at Home —Jim Goossens at his Italians—Concert at the Tuileries—Meyerbeer's Opera, Prophet of Paris, Thursday—The Author of the Anonymous Letter—Les Rêves d'Amour—Parisian Theatre-goers, etc., etc.

PARIS, March 31, 1859.

THE change in the weather, which I predicted last week, has lost no time in coming upon us. Since the 1st it has been bitterly cold and stormy; the carriages are again closed, and the ladies have taken the place of parasols, and "we shall have no festivals" is again heard from the mouth of Fame, the delicate blossom of that fruit being the first to be cut off by the unwelcome frost. To compensate for this grievous loss of the natural world the political horizon seems clearing a little, and the hopes of peace are again entertained by many people, and there is certainly reason to believe that there is a pause in the intentions and preparations for war on the part of Europe that is favorable for the sake of humanity-we must dread the lightning up of such a thunder-cloud.

I have done nothing for a week—and I should think few persons in Paris could have done any thing—than go to concerts and listen to music. In whatever social gathering one finds one's self, however small, there is a piano prepared, and up starts a performer, who must be heard and applauded; not to mention the incessant public concerts and exhibitions and the concerts in private houses. Fool as I am of music, I acknowledge to a surfeit of it in the last month. On Friday there was a concert of "Ancient Music," by the artists of the Conservatoire, in the grand salons of Madame Dachâtel.

The rooms where it could be heard were soon filled, and, as the company was numerous, so were the other salons; and there, people having nothing else to do, talked away to their utmost, which vexed the performers and disturbed the listeners—but it was a charming party for all that; the ladies in grandissima toilet, because they knew the rooms were large and well lighted, and would show them off; and then it is the fashion to be particularly well dressed for Madame D——l. There is a pleasing variety of society to be met with in her salons; as from the official position of Minister Duchâtel under Louis Philippe, when he was Minister of the Interior, and is being now consolidated that he represents the party of "the Fusion," it is called—which is that of a union of the interests of the two branches of the House of Bourbon, there are many Legitimists to be seen here; and indeed all the parties of France, except the Imperialists, Impurialists, pure.

There were several American ladies present, always distinguished, I think, by good taste in dress; and if not by positive beauty, at least by a grace, and delicacy, and refinement of demeanor and appearance which almost equals it in attraction. Indeed, from the great number of American ladies we have here, constantly coming and going, and lost, by foreigners, one can not enter a drawing-room in Paris without finding one's self with countrywomen or their descendants.

I found but well in a French family, which had not of itself any connection with America, but where, of the eighteen persons at table, three were natives born and bred, and four others were of the second generation. In the course of the dinner, I was seated next to a very pretty lady, with a very pretty accent, between whom and a French gentleman, a lively American lady, and a Frenchman who had taken her into dinner, and who, having been in England three years in emigration," spoke English with remarkable facility, and who had boarded in Boston, U. S., for a year, the ability naturally to detect, from his long intercourse with the world, the nationality of any individual whom he met. I was sure that I did not know what turn the conversation took, until my attention was attracted by Mrs. C——t saying to me:

"Come to the support of my veracity, Mr.——! Here is the Count who will not believe me, and I say there are two American ladies at table, and that they present the same 'type,' and which is the marked and distinctive thing in the world to know it world, in coming in here, point out those two ladies at once as Americans."

I confirmed this assertion, at which the Count seemed not a little astonished; and after looking around the table, he said, in French:

"I acknowledge I do not see any one here sufficiently odd to be extraordinary to come up to my idea of an American."

Mrs. C—— replied, in the same language:

"Not if you please, sir, as I suppose from your remark, to see them of the color and dressed like Miss Burns and Miss Sims in the caricatures. But the ladies in question left their blankets when they came to France, and have been long enough in it to have learned to dress at least."

And she might well say this, being one of the two herself, and could be proud of the more than usual elegant than her own toilet; but the Count was quite mystified, and though I saw him utter distress, was evidently trying to enlighten himself as to which were 'les Americaines,' yet the French custom at dinner-parties of separating the sexes preserved gave him so little time for his investigations that I believe he went away in his ignorance.

But it is true what the remark of Mrs. C—— suggests, that a French lady can not by possibility have derived their ideas of American manners and civilization from the novels of Cooper, which are extremely popular in Paris, and among them. As for those who do not read, they have no idea at all about us but what we have occasionally seen in purses, are willing to be imposed upon, and are accomplished in languages, as we speak both Zulu and Choctaw.

I went on Saturday to the Italian Opera, as I often do, just to hear the music. But what a falling off there is there in artistic talent! Of the old favorites Mario alone retains some power, and that feels that it is on the decline, the Lablaches, the later glories of Bulwer, and the brightest days of Mario, Grisi, Persiani, Rubini, Tamburini—what the change is and; but even with all these drawbacks, Italian music is always the greatest enjoyment of its kind, and what most fills me with all the hard realities of life—and Mozart's music particularly admirable in this ideal world, and next after Verdi's, it is like reading Shelley's poetry after Scott and Moore.

There was a popular concert on Sunday at the Crystal Palace, of the Orpheonists—six thousand children from the parts of France—from the Emperor, and Empress, and the Princes to hear them.

I was not there, as I was listening to an admirable sermon preached at the Eglise Evangelique by Bishop Delaney of New York. Years have passed since I saw or heard a Protestant preacher, perhaps, since I received the rite of confirmation; and though I did not know this to be one, yet the first sermon of the sort I had heard since that time persuaded me of it. I do not mean that there was any national manner, but the impression was produced by some of those unexplained links of association which are so strange and so powerful.

The fearful penalty of guilt and sin which you have had at Washington has excited much attention in this country and also in England. That is true, as it is said, that the unhappy heroine of it is an Italian, that circumstance is a striking illustration of the evils of those marriages between individuals of different countries, and of consequently different sentiments, ideas, habits, which I have so often deprecated in these letters. "Marry not with the stranger," it seems to me I could speak with an injunction more to the purpose than those mysterious warnings against marriage in the Levitical Book of Leviticus, [Privacy] which used to be put in the Bible at the end of the Old Testament, and where a man is particularly requested "not to marry his grandmother"—a prohibition which seems to me to be idle. But to return to this sad history. The prompt punishment of the redresser seems here to be considered a proceeding of awful lawlessness! I say it was the writer of the anonymous letter who is the real murderer, and who has incurred the guilt thereof. I think, too, an Englishman thus wronged and stunned, would have been likely, in the first instance, to have killed his wretched wife. That Mr. Sickles did not do so, is a proof of the sacred, tender feeling which it is in America customary to throw around the helplessness of women even when most erring.

But that denouement! What must be his or her feelings now, when contemplating "the ruin he has brought!" And I think I have seen a description of sin and wrong on any other mortal; but if I had taken upon myself to betray all the poor sinners who have fallen into my power, I should have almost turned the world upside down. Some have lived to repent, and the others are best left to the mercy of God. This daring to arouse human passions, of which no one can foresee the consequences, under the shelter of the anonymous, is on a tremendous responsibility to be incurred by any human being.

To relieve myself from music, I went last night to the "Français" and saw a new piece, "Les Rêves d'Amour," which is another proof of the remarkably acted that one excuses any little extravagance or improbability in the plot in the delivery of the comédie. Part of the pleasure at a French theatre is to observe the extreme enjoyment, the liveliness of delight at the sentiments in which this amusement considered to happiness that is powerfully, in the marriage-contract of a French bourgeois, it was stipulated how many times in the year he should indulge his wife in going to the play-house. To see a piece at the "Opera," for when one remembers the number of places of amusement there are in Paris, and that they are night after night crowded to the roof with spectators, one is indeed astonished at this indication of the national character.

What matters it to them what form of government prevails in the land, or whether the minister reigns over them, if they are left the liberty of going to the theatre, and for a time forgetting their daily toil and misery in the delights of the harmless excited by fictitious distress—for the particular sympathetic tearful—or the laugh for due to their inimitable comic actors? I find pleasure in the thought that they can thus be solaced under circumstances sometimes so involved from that pressure of care which sends the English men too often to the drunkard's grave or the desperate excitements of bad company. Better than this—though our Puritan ancestors deemed otherwise—I think, is the play-house enjoyed with wife and family. Au revoir, I trust, with sunshine next week.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

THE PROSPECTS OF THE WHEAT CROP.

NEW YORK.—The wheat fields are said to be looking well throughout the interior of the State.

ILLINOIS.—The Bloomington Journal says that the crop throughout the country presents a fine and promising appearance. The Harrisburg Telegraph says: "So far as we have heard, the wheat in this section looks remarkably well."

MARYLAND.—The Leonardtown Beacon informs us that the crop in St. Mary's County, in that State, looked and looks well, with the exception of that on low lands. The accounts from Prince George County are also good. The growth in some cases is said by the farmers to be too luxuriant. The Saint Mary's Gazette says of that county:

VIRGINIA.—The accounts from this State are both encouraging and discouraging. The Richmond Dispatch says the news from Washington County. The rest is likely to injure the crop much, and especially as it has appeared in the month earlier this year than usual. The Petersburg Intelligencer says: "The Petersburg Express and Spirit of Jefferson say that in the harnessing the crop has never looked better, and generally the fields are arrayed in "living green."

NORTH CAROLINA.—The Wadesboro Argus of the latter last, says that the wheat in that region is recovering rapidly from the effects of the severe weather, and which it has so frequently been subjected since the winter set in. The fly has done but little injury to the wheat this season. The Argus says that the crop will be very much below the average, and that the farmers feel greatly encouraged at the prospect. The Wilmington Journal says that the crop in the eastern part of the State (near the capital) that the crop will be little if any below the average, and that among the trouble of wheat sown last fall was much less than usual. The Chicago merchants are charmed with the tidings that every day sends them."

MICHIGAN.—A gentleman who has been traveling through Cass, Berrien, Van Buren, Kalamazoo, and Calhoun Counties, writes to the New York Herald that he has never seen the wheat in a more flourishing condition at this season of the year than in these different localities, and he is informed by gentlemen who visited other portions of southern Michigan, that its appearance is equally flattering. It is thought that a large number of acres were even last fall under wheat to Michigan than usual. The Lapeer Republican says: "Wheat in this county shows a vigorous and unprecedented growth. Although many have gone forth that it is generally winter-killed, yet such is not the case in Lapeer. On the contrary, many meadows in expectation of such a result has already made, and hopes are entertained of a growth never before witnessed. Good farmers predict a yield of bountiful harvest in certain, should the weather prove complaisant." The Janesville (Illinois) Gazette is equally prudent adds: "The wheat crop every where bears a good appearance. It looks far better than it did a year ago this time."

MISSISSIPPI.—Many farmers, from different parts of the county, visited the Greenborough Chronicle Courier office last week. The wheat crop looks almost too well.

KENTUCKY.—There are good accounts of the wheat crop.

MISSOURI and KANSAS.—A letter to the New York Herald from Bill County, Missouri, gives a history of the crop in that section and the "eastern borders of Kansas." In Wakeling, Dun, St. Francis, Washington, Wayne Counties, Missouri, the wheat is in its hollow high, difficulty set in the ground, or in dark strong spots and in every respect looks as well as it ordinarily does at the close of April. Without some extreme and unexpected blast, the crop in southeast Missouri will turn out one-third larger than in ordinary years. In Stoddard, Scott, Butler, and some other counties heard from, the prospect is described as much better than the corresponding time.

TENNESSEE.—From many parts of this State there is good news. The editor of the Cookeville (Putnam County) Times says: "Never in our visit to Rhea county have we before lost, and also the present week to Overton, on the head waters of the Obey and Port Rock, we saw all the wheat crop looks promising, the fields being quite green. Similar report is understood to be received from all parts of Tennessee."

LOUISIANA.—The Cape Girardeau Eagle says that in almost every locality the promise is usually fair. Should no unseen disaster happen, the next crop will be one of the heaviest on record; at least in the Mississippi Valley. The Calhoun Crescent says that the wheat crop and all that patch promises a bountiful harvest. The stalk is now nearly waist high, looks fine, and in some places the heads are fully grown.

WISCONSIN.—There are more acres this year in this State under wheat than usual, and the crop thus far is reported to be very good.

IOWA AND NEBRASKA.—The reports are equally good as that from Wisconsin.

TEXAS.—The crop is said to be "uncommonly promising."

GEORGIA.—The crop looks well, but wet weather has interfered with the progress of farm work.

It is very likely that from far the prospects of the wheat crop are so good.

ESTIMATED PRODUCT OF THE DIFFERENT STATES.

States.	Estimated Product, 1858.		Harvest Increase.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
New York.....	2,000,000	20,000,000	18,000,000
Pennsylvania..	15,000,000	30,000,000	15,000,000
Virginia	20,000,000	18,000,000	20,000,000
Kentucky	5,000,000	10,000,000	5,000,000
Ohio	25,000,000	27,000,000	17,000,000
Indiana	15,000,000	25,000,000	20,000,000
Illinois	18,000,000	30,000,000	18,000,000
Other States..	47,000,000	47,000,000	4,000,000
Total.....	168,000,000	185,000,000	92,000,000

We sincerely hope the Herald estimate may be realized. Our prospects, indeed, however, seem to be too sanguine, lest any of the numerous diseases and insects to which the wheat plant is subject should yet blast the hopes of the husbandman.

In parts of England, a month ago, the crops were looking almost too luxuriant. There were complaints when, in the month of February, many English farmers had to sow their wheats to check its growth. We heard of one who, for a whole month of February in the year 1837, pastured twenty head of horned cattle on a twenty-acre grass field of wheat, which was so high as to be lopping. They fed on the blade, without injuring the stem at sheep would on blade and stem. The roots and the stem instead of from the roots. This season there seems to have been no necessity for pasturing or mowing wheat, but all accounts agree as to the favorable prospects of the crop.

There was in England, a month ago, a flatness in the wheat trade, because of a heavy home stock on hand—and the harvest had been generally well known. Prices had fallen during the month from one shilling to two shillings per quarter. It is generally supposed that the prices are too low for power, inasmuch as the idea prevails that the whole of the crop of the American continent will be barely sufficient for home consumption. Owing to fluctuations in the market and speculation thereon, a few shipments were made to the United States and Canada, the principal objection to which was the high rate of freight. Shipments to Portland occasioned by heavy shipments of manufactured goods. Although the last wheat crop of England and Wales, the average produce of grain was larger than that of any year except 1847, France, indeed, is wanting supplies, and is importing freely; and this fact, with other causes named, so lowered prices in the English market that they were less than any period since the opening the century, except 1835 and 1851. It is supposed that payment in England have no longer than 3 months' consumption beyond that required till harvest-time.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE Circuit Court was in session at Springfield, Illinois. Mrs. Anderson was on trial on as many women as indictments for husband, and her nephew, Thomas Anderson, was also charged with being an accessory to the murder. The counsel for Mrs. Anderson sat on the right of his client, and Mr. Thomas Anderson sat on that side, and on the left. The trial commenced yesterday, and evidence and counsel were employed on both sides. Prominent among the lawyers engaged for the defense was General Shields, who is to-day in the midst of it. He opened his argument by reading the divine law against murder, and by quoting the law of nature and of man law on the same subject. As he proceeded he waxed eloquent, and the counsel for the State manifested signs of uneasiness. His arguments were good, and the summing up of the testimony was done in an admirable manner. But the strongest points in his argument were yet to come.

"I wish, gentlemen of the jury," said he, "to convince you of the guilt of this young man, by his personal appearance to-day. Look at him," and he, pointing all the time to the young lawyer from Ohio: "look at him, and you will see the countenance of a murderer depicted in his the bang-dog look about him which no one can mistake. Every feature in his face betrays the villain and murderer."

All eyes were turned to B——, who was chained to his seat in mute astonishment. As soon as he could compose himself, however, he jumped to his feet, exclaiming,

"General, I'll not stand it any more! I am not the prisoner. I am employed on the prosecution."

The scene then followed out, and the counsel, judge, jury, and spectators burst—and, we may add, General Shield's argument. Bank for the time. The trial proceeded—and the jury, after being out a short time, returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

B—— is frequently joked for his "bang-dog look."

"Why is a letter the most elegant of the world?" —Because no fair face on one side, then he lies on the table, and he is the weaker of the letters.

If all the fools and knaves were black, what a very sombre-looking world this would be!

The Preacher to the Crown—A lady's bonnet.

Why is the letter D like a sailor?—Because it follows the C.

A tall fellow perished in standing during the performance of a short piece of business, which was considered the cadence, and was repeatedly called upon to sit down, but would not. "Let him stand," said a fellow who was in the pit; "he's a tailor, and resting himself." He immediately retired.

SLEEPY WITNESS.—Doctor Bolus, who was very angry when any joke was passed upon his profession, once asked a very sleepy person whom he had called as a case no of lingering illness or neglect. "That you may do me the favor to say," said he, "send for Doctor Bolus in time."

Corvisart, a physician of celebrity, during the early years of the present century, was called in to attend on the death of Dr. Rostan. "It was not, at all events, for want of medical advice," said the wit, "that he died. For days of his illness we—Holle, Portal, and myself—did not visit him for a single instant." "Ah!" exclaimed the wife Abbé, "what could he do against three of you?"

SLEEPY WITNESS.—Doctor Bolus, who was very angry when any joke was passed upon his profession, once asked a very sleepy person whom he had called as a case no of lingering illness or neglect. "That you may do me the favor to say," said he, "send for Doctor Bolus in time."

Corvisart, a physician of celebrity, during the early years of the present century, was called in to attend on the death of Dr. Rostan. "It was not, at all events, for want of medical advice," said the wit, "that he died. For days of his illness we—Holle, Portal, and myself—did not visit him for a single instant." "Ah!" exclaimed the wife Abbé, "what could he do against three of you?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

From the Witness and Church Advocate, Boston.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.—From a satisfactory trial of several years, we take pleasure in commending them as containing in the medicine all we esteem as of temporary or chronic affections of the throat. We cordially second the statements which are given by others.

Sold by all Druggists.

WHITE'S EMPORIUM OF FASHION,
216 Broadway,
Under Barnum's Museum,

Mr. W. having gone to great expense in fitting up this magnificent Establishment, offers to the public a splendid assortment of Ready-made Clothing unsurpassed for its size sets, and at prices which will defy competition. In the Soft Hat Department will be found the styles of French and American manufacture; among them White's Opera Hat, which for lightness and ease is the top Department are one hundred styles of all the new shapes—Children's Hats, Caps, Furs, Gloves, &c. Also, a full line of Gentlemen's Furnishing Goods. Military styles, for young gentlemen made to order. Mr. W. produces the best Hat made in the City. Military gents will find at this Establishment Caps made to order. Constantly on hand, Umbrellas, Carpet Bags, Leather Bags, Valises, &c.

THE ECONOMIST
COOKING STOVE, FOR WOOD OR COAL,
WITH A SAND OVEN.

This is the most valuable Cooking Apparatus that has been made in Cooking Stoves during the past twenty years.

THE SAND OVEN
Equalizes the heat on the most perfect principle as the Bake Oven of ancient towns.

THE SAND OVEN
Retains the heat long after the fire has gone out.

THE ECONOMIST
Warms the Sand Oven in a shorter time than all other Stoves; and is out of reach of them.

THE ECONOMIST
Is the most economical and durable Stove in the world.

THE ECONOMIST
Has a most perfect arrangement for broiling.

THE ECONOMIST
Heats water for the Bathing Room, &c., as quickly as any Range, and as hot the coat for fuel.

Do not fail to examine it! It is manufactured by W. & J. THEADWELL, PERRY & NORTON, ALBANY, N. Y.
And for sale everywhere.

Who Invented the Sewing Machine?
Keep this fact in view when you purchase, that
A GOOD SEWING MACHINE
is an article much to be desired.
An inferior one is a part, and is to be avoided.
THE HOWE MACHINES—THE ORIGINAL
Established in 1845—are for sale at No. 491 Broadway.
Prices—$50, $75, $95, $105, $125, $150, $175, $200.

SELPHO'S PATENT LEG & HAND.
These unrivaled substitutes for lost limbs are supplied only by WM. SELPHO, 241 Broadway, New York, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

In Press and Nearly Ready.

THE GOOD NEWS FROM GOD. By William Graham, Author of "Locke Amadon," "Vassa," "Hypatia," "Alton Locke," etc. This work will be issued simultaneously with the London Edition, from the sheets now announced by J. S. REDFIELD, 1 vol. 12mo. Price $1.00.

MY EARLY DAYS. By Elihu W. Farnham, giving a very interesting account of the early life of this well-known and remarkable woman. 1 vol. 12mo. Price $1.00.

A DISCOURSE ON THE EVILS OF GAMING. By Rev. E. H. Chapin, D.D. Now ready. Price 10 cents.

A DISCOURSE ON SHAMEFUL LIFE. By Henry Ward Beecher, D.D. Price 10 cents.
The above two pamphlets are among the best of the productions of these eminent men, and are a great gem for being scattered broadcast through the land.

WHAT IS THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION? AND WHAT CONSTITUTES A REVIVAL OF IT? By Rev. Lyman Beecher. An examination before whom this sermon was delivered have urged by publication, and subscribed for 1,000 copies. Now ready. Price 13 cents.

T. S. H. have also the pleasure of announcing, as in preparation,

SELECT SERMONS. By Rev. E. H. Chapin, D.D.

The above, or any other books in the market, sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the retail price.

BOOKS AND STATIONERY
Of every description and of the best quality, at WHOLESALE or RETAIL, at moderate prices.
THATCHER & HUTCHINSON
283 Broadway (St. Nicholas Hotel), N. Y.

TEACHERS WANTED.—PRINCIPALS and Assistants, for Schools supplied with Governesses, Teachers, Tutors, or Governesses without delay, for any part of the Union. Address RICE & ANDREWS, Educational Agents, 130 Broadway, N. Y.; Branch at Washington, D. C.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
THE GREAT AMERICAN REMEDY
For Purifying the Blood.
At this season nothing can be more efficacious. For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 William Street, N. Y.

Premature Loss of the Hair, which is an common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of

Burnett's Cocoaine.

It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth.

Burnett's Cocoaine

is, at the same time, unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

It costs fifty cents for a half-pint bottle.

SPRING FANCY GOODS,
L. J. LEVY & CO.,
Nos. 809 and 811 Chestnut Street,
Adjoining Bailey & Co.'s,
PHILADELPHIA,

Are now opening a large and very choice assortment of

NEW GOODS FOR SPRING,

Selected for the most part in Paris and Lyons for their RETAIL SALES from the choicest productions of the looms of FRANCE.

They invite the inspection of Wholesale as well as Retail customers to one of the most beautiful assortments for its extent of new fabrics for

LADIES' DRESSES,

which can be found in this country.

In all the richer articles of DRY GOODS, such as

INDIA CASHMERE SHAWLS,
CHOICE STRIPE SILKS FOR SUMMER SILKS,
PLAIN PRINTED FOULARDS,
SUPERB ORGANDIE AND BAREGE ROBES,
NEW SPRING AND SUMMER SHAWLS,

their assortments are constantly being increased by the arrivals of the Steamers from Europe.

PHILADELPHIA, February, 1859.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,
822 Chestnut Street,
Opposite Girard House,
Philadelphia.

Fine Watches,
Rich Jewelry,
Silver Ware, Sterling,
Clocks and Bronzes,

Chiefly of our own importation and manufacture.

Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

THE NEW BOOKS.
THE CULPRIT FAY. By Drake. 50 cents.
BUCKLAND'S CURIOSITIES. 1 vol.
MILES STANDISH. Illustrated. $0.50.
AFTERNOON OF AN AMERICAN LIFE. 1 vol. $1 00.
TWO WAYS TO WEDLOCK. A Novel. $1 00.
ERIC. A new School Tale. $1 00.
SCOTTISH CHIEFS. 2 vols. $2.00.
BABIE BELL, and other Poems, by Aldrich. 75 cents
ETHEL'S LOVE LIFE. A Novel. $1 00.

* Sold everywhere, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
159 Grand Street (near Broadway), N. Y.

"MASSER'S"
Patent 5 Minute Freezers.
OPERATION SIMPLE. RESULT CERTAIN.
The increasing demand and the unrivaled popularity of "Masser's" Patent Freezers prove them to be the best Ice-Cream Freezer in use.
Numerous testimonials received and again confirm Freezers that are offered in place of the above. Get "D. H. MASSER'S" Freezers; that have been thoroughly tested for the last five years.
Sole Agents,
E. KETCHAM & CO.,
Manufacturers of Japanned and Tinplated Tin Ware,
189 Pearl Street, New York.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $850,000.
This Company continues to do an extensive merchandise business, and has returns to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—for one hundred dollars paid in. Outstanding certificates of the issue of 1856.
ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
ELLIOT LEGGETT, Secretary, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. ORDRONEAUX, Secretary.

THOMAS HOOPER, No. 109 Fulton Street, Importer and Dealer in Looking-glasses, Picture Frames, Oil Paintings, Engravings, &c. A word to the wise, &c.

PICTURES FOR GRECIAN AND ANTIQUE PAINTING.
A very extensive collection of
J. L. TILTON & CO.,
No. 365 Canal Street, New York.
Who forward these, post paid (with full and special directions how to add address), to any address. Send for a list and other information gratis.
Dealers and Teachers supplied.

Select Family School for Boys
AT
SOUTH WILLIAMSTOWN, BERKSHIRE COUNTY, MASS.
(ESTABLISHED IN 1851.)
Summer term of twenty-one weeks will commence Wednesday, May 4th.
The location is healthful and pleasant.
Circulars can be obtained at the Office.
For Circulars address the Principal,
BENJ. F. MILLS.
March, 1859.

APRIL.

Again as Spring, with radiant wing,
To greet the greening earth advances,
Our April sky, like Laura's eye,
In sunglad tears and laughter glances.
One sunny hour, and then a shower,
A glow of heat, and next a silver;
Yonder the rose half open and blows,
To-morrow ten in all the river.

Through branching roots the spring life shoots,
The sap is rousing from its hibernum;
In warmer flood the mantling blood
Now leaps through every human vein.
Hope springs to-day, though still and shy,
Yet glitters with a tenderer meaning,
And through the no or yes to-day
We see her heart is toward us leaning.

O Month of Changes! for all the range
Of seasons gayest and best subtile!
We give adieu to boyish price,
A worthy Captain Cuttle!
Let all wild's hear thy shrieked air,
In sudden colds, the heat that smothers,
Just see and by, and choose and buy
The new spring clothing of SMITH BROTHERS.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, 2d.,
ROBERT L. SMITH, } NEW YORK.
J. SMITH BROS.,

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR GOVERNESS, FEATHERS, COIFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, at 561 Broadway, 3 doors from Franklin Street,

FRED. S. COZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of its own importation.

RARE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISA-BELLA WINES,
from
Dun N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
73 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions for and procure Patents and Foreign Patents. Our Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

New York Purchasing Agency.

W. M. LAFSLEY, No. 25 Nassau Street.
Purchases every variety of articles in New York by any articles, large or small, of one or luxury, from a Book to a Steam Engine, a Shawl to a Carpet, can have their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, with great care, economization charges. Refers to C. L. Seagren, Esq., Custom House Island Bank, Messrs. John Jewett & Sons, Hastings, Plimpton & Co., New York; J. D. Cameron & Co., New Orleans.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.
BY THE

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A.M.; 3.30, 6.30, 9.30 P.M.
Freights forwarded on Fast Lines, and delivered as fast as by over or stop at any point.
The regular time by the Fast Lines is

To Chicago	in 40 hours	To Dayton	in 50 hours
" Cincinnati	" 40 "	" Columbus	" 51 days
" Cleveland	" 24 "	" Louisville	" 3 "
" Gallipolis	" 36 "	" Indianapolis	" 36 hours

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in like good time.
Goods for Boston, via Stonington and Arkansas Rivers, Keokuk, &c., will save time by our responsible Company.
Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.
WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

Luzerne Remedy
FOR Rheumatism, Gout, and Neuralgia,
WARRANTED.
For sale by A. B. & D. SANDS & CO., 141 William Street. Manufactured by N. WEST & CO., 67 Ann street, New York.

$32 50 ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Catskill PER QUARTER. } On reasonable terms. For circulars, &c., address the Rev. HENRY J. FOX, A.M., Principal, Catskill, Green Co., N. Y.

DEAD SHOT

A DEAD SHOT for Bed Bugs.
SLEEP IN PEACE.
The most successful, as well as the surest of any thing ever known, curing 95 out of 100 cases without destroying a day's rest. Sold by all first-class Druggists everywhere. McKESSON & ROBBINS, Wholesale Agents, 72 Fulton Street.

PIANO FORTES, MELODEONS, AND HARMONIUMS of first-class makers at the Lowest terms.
J. M. HEILTON,
941 and 943 Broadway, N. Y.

$15 Worth of Music for 25 Cents.

The success of the "Gentle Annie Melodist" is unprecedented. More than forty thousand copies have already been sold, and, from present indications, the sale will reach 100,000 copies this year. Encouraged by the success, the publishers have issued the containing, on 64 pages, a choice of fifty of the very best Songs, among which will be found the following favorites, Aprils, Lucy Long, Sweet Kitty Clover, Beautiful Venice, Bonny Dundee, Ellen Bayne, I'm not myself at all, Charley I am the Boy for a Frolic, Annie Morrow, Maum'a in de cold ground, Old Playground, &c., &c.

Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 2,

Gentle Annie Melodist, No 1, 25 Cents,
Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 2, 25 Cents,

Send by mail, postage paid, to any address. Sheet Music, Music Books, Musical Violins and other Strings sent by mail, postage prepaid, at the above price is sent with the order.
FIRTH, PONDS & CO.,
No. 547 Broadway, New York.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal 8vo., containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations. This work will be sold exclusively by Agents, to each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should state the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELOT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Douglas & Sherwood's
PATENT
Tournure Corset.

This article combines in one garment a CORSET of SUPERIOR SHAPE and FITTING, and a SKIRT of PERFECT MODEL, insuring free and healthful action of the muscles and graceful outline of the form. It has been pronounced by the most eminent physicians of whom are several eminent members of the Medical Faculty to be the only Corset which combines comfort, either artistic or physiological. No lady can well do without it. D. & S. still manufacture their

Expansion Skirt,

so well known for its durability.
Also, their celebrated

Matinee Skirt,

together with over Seventy other different Styles, the latest of which is the

The Palmetto
AND THE
New Skeleton Skirt,

Containing 13, 17, 20 and 30 hoops, made of the SUPERIOR QUALITY OF STEEL which has always characterized their Skirts.
All of their manufacture are for sale at the principal stores in the United States and Canada.
SEE THAT THE STAMP OF DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD IS UPON THEM.

Grover & Baker's
Celebrated
FAMILY SEWING MACHINES

New Styles, Prices from $50 to $125.00.
Hemmers, $5 extra.
Offices of Exhibition and sale:—
405 Broadway, New York.
18 Summer Street, Boston.
730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore.
And 18 Main Street, Cincinnati.
Agencies in all the principal Cities and Towns in the United States.

Send for a Circular.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!!
LYON'S KATHAIRON FOR THE HAIR
IS USED BY LADIES EVERYWHERE
ONLY 25 CENTS, PER BOTTLE.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The new FAMILY SEWING MACHINES at $50 and $75 are already surpassing in popularity, in all essential good qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

STATEN ISLAND
Fancy Dyeing Establishment.
Barrett Nephews & Co.,
Office, 5 and 7 John Street,
(5 doors from Broadway),
New York.

EXHIBITION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES and Fine Arts Warehouse, No. 259 Pearl Street, Harper's Buildings. Brushes of every description on hand, or made to order at lowest prices. A Silver Medal was received from the American Institute, in 1847, for superior Brushes.
JOHN E. HOPPEL.

AMERICAN GUANO.—To Farmers and Dealers in Guano.—This Guano, from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, containing 60 per cent. of Phosphates and Ammoniacal Salts, and the only natural manure known, is offered for sale, in large or small quantities, as ballast, on terms to suit the times.
For full information, apply to agricultural societies.
J. E. MARSHALL,
President of the Jarvis Island Guano Company,
95 WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Cure Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Indigestion.
Cure Heart Burn, Heart Burn, Acidity, Acidity.
Cure Water Brash, Water Brash, Jaundice, Jaundice.
Cure Liver Complaint, Liver Complaint, Debility, Debility.
Cure Fevers and Ague, Fever and Ague, Bilious Complaint.
Cure Headache, Costiveness, Piles, Nervousness.
Cure Flatulency, Sourness, Female Complaints.

This remedy is so well known, as the most remarkable and efficient remedy for the complaints above named and rapid cure of the above diseases, that it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon its merits.

Prepared by HOWLE & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold every where.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy SEWING MACHINES which will not perform the work that purchasers expected them to do, are informed that SINGER'S MACHINES never fail to do any kind of work. No one is ever disappointed in these machines.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

Have just Published:

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. A Novel. By CHARLES READE Author of "Christie Johnstone," "Peg Wolffington," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Paper, 50 cents. (Just Ready.)

THE LIFE OF NORTH AMERICAN INSECTS. By B. JAMES, late Professor of Zoology and Botany in the Agricultural College of Illinois. Assisted by C. G. PARsons, M.D. With numerous Illustrations from Specimens in the Cabinet of the Author. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

THE ROMANCE AND ITS HERO. By the Author of "Magdalen Stafford." 18mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN. Being Principles and Rules for the Culture of Vegetables, Fruits, Flowers, and Shrubbery. To which are added brief Notes on Fruits, with a Table of their Analysis and Product and Chemical Constituents. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM WOODWARD Member of various Horticultural Societies. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ADAM BEDE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ELLIS'S MADAGASCAR. Three Visits to Madagascar, during the years 1853—1854—1856; Including a Journey to the Capital, with Notices of the Natural History, the Country and the Inhabitants, and Character of the People. By the Rev. WILLIAM ELLIS, F.H.S. Author of "Polynesian Researches," Illustrated by a Map and Wood-cuts from Photographs, &c. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Muslin and Gilt, $3 50 (Immediately.)

THE OLD PLANTATION, and What I Gathered There in an Autumn Month. By CHARLES MANNERSTONE, of Maryland. 18mo, Muslin, $1 00.

FANKWEI; or, The San Jacinto in the Seas of India, China, and Japan. By WILLIAM HAYWARD WOOD, M.D., U.S.N., late Surgeon of the Fleet to the Asiatic Station. With Notices of Recent Events, and Graphic Sketches in South America, Polynesia," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE LAIRD OF NORLAW. A Scottish Story. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Days of My Life," &c. 18mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LA PLATA: The Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay. Being a Narrative of the Exploration of the River La Plata, and Adjacent Countries, during the Years 1853, 54, and '55, under the orders of the United States Government. By THOMAS J. PAGE, U.S.N., Commander of the Expedition. With Map and numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

SYLVAN HOLT'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By HENRY LEE, Author of "Edith Dalton." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

EPISODES OF FRENCH HISTORY during the Consulate and the First Empire. By MISS FRANCES, Author of "Louis XIV. and the Court of France in the Seventeenth Century." 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT? By PISISTRATUS LYRON, Esq. Vol. I. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. (Shortly.) Author of "My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c., &c. Vol. II. 12mo, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

BARTH'S AFRICA—COMPLETE. Travels and Discoveries in North and Central Africa. Being a Journal of an Expedition undertaken under the auspices of H.B.M.'s Government, in the Years 1849—1855. By HENRY BARTH, Ph.D., D.C.L. With a Map and numerous elegant Illustrations. Complete in 3 vols. 8vo, with about 1200 pp. Muslin, $10 50.

COPLAND'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY—COMPLETE. A Dictionary of Practical Medicine: comprising General Pathology, General Therapeutics, Hygiene, Morbid Structures, and the Disorders especially Incidental to Climate, to the Sexes, and to Infancy. Also Especial Explanations of the Terms, Theories, and Principles of Homœopathy, and a Full Exposition of its Materia Medica and Therapeutics; and an Appendix of approved Remedies, by which Homœopathy is opposed. By JAMES COPLAND, M.D., F.R.S., Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians; Honorary Member of the Royal Academy of Surgery of the American Philosophical Society; and of the Medical Societies of Belgium; Hon. Member and President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; Consulting Physician to Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital, and Senior Physician to the Consumption Hospital, &c. Complete in 3 large Octavo Volumes, containing Royal Embossed Muslin. Edition, with Notes and large Additions, by CHARLES A. LEE, A.M., M.D., Professor of Materia Medica and General Pathology in Geneva College, &c. &c. Completed in 3 large Octavo Volumes. Muslin, $6 00 per Volume; Sheep extra, $6 50 per Volume; Parts 37 and 38 and Vol. III., completing the Work.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED IS A First-Class Family Newspaper of Entertainment, Improvement, and Progress, designed to encourage a spirit of Home, Manufacturing, Mechanical, Inventive, and Advertising enterprise; to illustrate life in all its phases. A high-toned Family Paper, fit to be read by every Family in the land.
Its ample columns contain Original Essays by the best writers—Historical, Biographical and Descriptive; Sketches of Travel and Adventure; Tales of Fashion, Romance, Humor, Horticulture, Physiology, Education, General News, and every topic which is of importance or interest! all combining to render it worthy a place in every Family Circle.
Published weekly at $2 a year; $1 for six months, or $1 for three months, or $3—but to clubs of 20 cents each!
FOWLER AND WELLS,
No. 308 Broadway, New York.

"THAT STANDARD MEDICINAL ARTICLE, the Expellant Pulmonary Balsam, prepared by the well-known druggists, Messrs. Bent, Cutler & Co., of this city, is, we have good authority for stating, one of the best remedies for Coughs, Colds, and all Pulmonary Complaints, ever offered to the public. It has made the fact of 50 lots, during the last twelvemonth in reputation for more than THIRTY YEARS."
Physicians of the highest respectability prescribe it, and thousands of families keep it on hand as a standard family medicine. Sold by druggists generally.
Prepared only by BENT, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Boston. Price, large, $1; small, 50 cents.
HANNAY & KIRK, Agents, New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines—it has trebled within four months—indicates the reviving prosperity of the country. The prices of our Machines have been greatly reduced.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

F. S. CLEAVER'S
PRIZE MEDAL HONEY SOAP.

The only genuine, possessing a free and creamy lather, a healing quality, delicate perfume, and does not rot in fabrics the skin.
Beware of COUNTERFEITS.
F. S. Cleaver's celebrated Musk, and Brown Windsor, and Oyster Bay Soaps, also Sagacious Cocoa Nut Oil for the teeth and gums, to be had of all the respectable Drug and Fancy Stores in the United States.
Manufactory in London.
Wholesale Depot, 21 and 23 Dey Street, New York.
J. C. ROYSTON, Agt.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, in the city of HARPER'S WEEKLY, BOX No. 2,610, New York. Class Catalogues and Circulars, Normal and Text-Book Academy of Science, Educational Reports, &c., are solicited.
MARCIUS WILLSON.

GREAT SECRET
FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.

Send your address to Dr. J. B. ORDRONAUX, Box No. 2,610, Boston, Mass., and one 3 cent stamp to pay return postage.

EVERY Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 90 to 99 pages—and from one third to one half more reading matter than any other Magazine.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of valuable and attractive reading than is to be found in any other periodical of the day.
As to the character of the forthcoming of the Magazine they have its History and existing reputation to refer to. The Publishers, therefore, will only refer to the contents of the Periodical for the past six months as a guarantee for the future volume upon the patronage of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $6 00.
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS PER COPY.

In the number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 9 was commenced a New Serial Story entitled THUMPS, by Mrs. Wm. Kingsland, Author of "Mabel's Mistake," "The Fulpher Papers," &c., &c. Illustrated by ANDREW HOPPER.
The Publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the day. Its circulation is already so large as to give to COUNTRY NEWS, or to fully illustrated a history of the week's events, that will be found in no other paper. It has a LARGER and MORE VARIED corps of writers and publications than for illustrating any other paper in the United States. It has to be CHEAPEST and most FAMILY illustrated newspaper in the country. To advertisers we need only point to the circulation of the Publications, as fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because better seen—than any line of space contained in the country, from North to South—than advertisements in any other publication.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Six Months 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.
Advertisements will be inserted on the terms relating to Advertise for three Months or more.
The Publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY do not PAY PUBLISHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

THE SOLEMNITY OF AN OATH.

COMMISSIONER. "You solemnly swear tastrotinimum-um-um-um-um—(very distinctly) a shilling!"

A GOOD PRECAUTION.

GEORGE. "Why, Fred, what on earth have you got in your mouth?"
FREDERICK AUGUSTUS. "Cigar-case, my dear Fl, nothing more. So very inconvenient you see, to be always burning one's mustache with one's cigar."

Fifth Year of the Enterprise!

NEW LIST OF GIFTS, FOR 1859.

CATALOGUES FREE TO ALL.

G. G. EVANS,

AT HIS ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK STORE,
No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Commences the New Year, with an enlarged Catalogue, a greater wealth of Gifts, increased facilities for buying Goods and sinking business, and is now prepared to offer greater inducements to Book buyers than ever before. How has proved that the Gift System is permanent. EVANS is determined to prove that his Establishment is conducted under that system in a more liberal and important manner than any other. Having lived down almost all opposition, and having the legitimacy of his plan of operation acknowledged from Maine to California, he can afford to be generous. Try him, and judge for yourself.

SCHEDULE OF GIFTS.

Patent English Lever Gold Watches,	$100 00
Patent Anchor Lever Gold Watches,	50 00
Ladies' 18k. Case Gold Lever Watches,	30 00
Ladies' 18k. Case Gold Lever Watches, open dial,	35 00
Gents' Silver Lever watches,	25 00
Gents' Silver Lever Watches,	15 00
Gents' Silver Lepine Watches,	12 00
Parlor Time Pieces, new pattern,	10 00
Ladies' Elegant Rich Silk Dress Patterns,	10 00
Ladies' do. Plaid do. do.	15 00
Ladies' do. Merino (Tin and Drops) extra fine	5 00
Ladies' Gold Bracelets,	10 00
Ladies' Gold Bracelets, Stone Settings,	20 00
Ladies' Gold Brooches, plain or engraved Band,	7 50
Gents' Solid Gold Vest Chains, new pattern,	15 00
Gents' best English plated Vest Chains	10 00
Ladies' Guards, or Chatelaine Chains, choice,	15 00
Large Gold Spring Lockets, with double case,	10 00
Large Gold Spring Lockets, do. do.	8 00
Medium size, No. 3, Lockets, do. do.	5 00
Heavy Gold Pencil Cases, with Gold Pens,	7 50
Superior Gold Pens, with Holders and Box,	5 00
Ladies' Gold Pencils,	2 00
Gents' Gold Pencils,	3 00
Gents' Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Pencils,	7 00
Gents' Gold Pens, or Silver with Ivory Holders,	2 50
Ladies' Mosaic Gold Stone Sets,	12 00
Ladies' Florentine Sets, Pin and Drops,	10 00
Ladies' Jet Sets, do. do.	5 00
Ladies' Lava, do. do.	10 00
Ladies' Cameo Pins, large size,	6 00
Ladies' do. do. medium,	3 50
Ladies' do. do. small,	2 50
Ladies' Gold Stone Pins, small,	2 50
Ladies' Bar and Cluster Miniature,	2 50
Ladies' Plain Gold Pins, new pattern,	2 50
Ladies' do. Stone Pins,	2 50
Miners' do. Gold Pens,	2 00
Gents' Cluster Pins, coral centre,	2 00
Gents' Bright Stone Pins,	2 00
Gents' Cameo or Mosaic Bosom Studs,	4 50
Gents' Engraved Gold do. do.	3 00
Gents' Plain do. do. do.	2 00
Gents' Stone Buttons,	2 00
Ladies' do. do.	2 00
Ladies' Pearl Card Cases,	10 00
Ladies' Cameo, Mosaic, or Gold Stone Ribbon Pins,	7 50
Gents' Pearl Pocket Knives, 3 blades, best quality,	3 50
Misses' Lava Pins,	1 50
Gents' Gold Watch Keys and Pencils combined,	3 00
Gents' Gold Toothpicks, with Slides,	1 50
Gents' Gold Sleeve Buttons, with Stone Setting,	3 00
Ladies' do. do. do.	3 00
Sets Silver-Plated Tea Spoons,	9 00
Silver-Plated Butter Knives,	1 00
Ladies' or Gents' Forte-monnaies,	1 00
Gents' Gold Watch Keys or Vest Hooks,	1 00
Ladies' Florentine Breast Pins,	3 50
Ladies' Jet do.	3 50
Ladies' Mosaic do. do.	6 00
Ladies' Coral Ear Drops,	6 00
Misses' do. do.	3 00
Gents' Jet Drops, with Stone Setting,	3 00
Ladies' Jet Bracelet, Half Round Band,	6 00
Ladies' do. do. do.	4 00
Gents' Seal Rings,	3 00
Gents' Jet Studs,	2 00
Gents' Jet Sleeve Buttons,	3 00

Miscellaneous Gifts, not enumerated in the above List, varying in value from 75 cents to $25 00

☞ $500 worth of the above Gifts will be impartially distributed among Purchasers with every $1000 worth of Books sold. All Books sold at Publishers' prices, and all Books that Evans does not publish himself are bought direct from the Publishers, and in large quantities. Books to suit every taste are to be found on his Catalogue, at prices which would be an inducement even without the Gift System, which offers so many additional advantages.

Works by the most popular authors, living and dead, in all styles, from the most costly to the plain and substantial at astonishing low prices.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

Bayard Taylor's Travels,	Works of Dean Swift,
Works of Miss Bremer,	" Judge Hall's Law,
" Dickens,	" Dr. Livingstone,
" De Foe,	" Lawrence Sterne,
" Addison,	Waverley Novels,
" Thackeray,	Works of Benj. Franklin,
" Dr. Johnson,	" Thos. Jefferson,
" J. F. Cooper,	" Charles Dickens,
" J. T. Headley,	" Mrs. Southworth,
" Frank Forrester,	" Mrs. Hentz,
" Hugh Miller,	" Miss Sedgwick,
" Capt. Mayne Reid,	" Virginia Townsend,
" Charlotte Bronte,	" S. R. Somerby,
" Washington Irving,	" T. S. Arthur,
" Mrs. Gaskell,	" Mrs. Ellet,
" Rev. C. H. Spurgeon,	" D. P. Thompson,
" Capt. Marryat,	" Sam Slick,
" Peter Parley,	" Jno. Austin,
" Mrs. Moodie,	" Marion Harland,
" Sandell,	" Mary Howitt,
" Fielding,	" Charles Lamb,
" Percy,	" Edward Everett,
" Wilkes,	" Lorenzo Dow,
" Burns,	" Lord Bacon.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY OF THE MOST CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

Alison,	Bancroft,
Hume,	Goodrich,
Macaulay,	Bancroft,
Prescott,	Ferguson,
Gibbon,	Rollin,
Robertson,	Lock,
Headley,	Sparks,

And a host of others, too numerous to mention.

THE ANCIENT AND MODERN POETS.

Butler,	Milton,
Y. B. Bold,	Spenser,
Mrs. Jamieson,	Chaucer,
Pope,	Mrs. Hemans,
Scott,	Mrs. Norton,
Moore,	Keats,
Dryden,	Longfellow,
Byron,	Tennyson,
Burns,	Cowper,
Leigh Hunt,	Whittier,
Mrs. Sigourney,	Dante,
Rogers,	P. W. Ellsworth,
Southey,	Hood,
H. Rirk White,	Tupper,
Tasso,	Goldsmith,
Mrs. Jamieson,	Wordsworth,
Alice Carey,	Shelley,
Keats,	Montgomery,
Edgar A. Poe,	Dryden.

He has the above in all styles of binding, from plain cloth to the finest calf and antiques, to suit all classes of purchasers. He sells them as cheap as any other house in the country, besides the additional advantage of a Gift with each Book sold.

ALBUMS FOR THE LADIES.

Albums of all sizes and all styles of binding, to suit all tastes, profusely illustrated with magnificent Steel Engravings.

BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, AND HYMN BOOKS.

Illustrated Family Bibles, Episcopal Prayer Books,
Baptist Hymn Books, Catholic Prayer Books,
Lutheran Hymn Books, Episcopal Hymn Books,
Of all sizes, and bound in all styles, Arabesque, Turkey morocco, Antique, Velvet, &c., with rich Silver clasps.

FAMILY BIBLES.

A large assortment of Family Bibles, of all descriptions and all prices, from $1 to $50, illustrated with fine engravings, printed with large type, on paper and in various styles of binding, from the simplest to the most ornamental. All Family Bibles, in various styles, at low prices.

☞ A complete Classified Catalogue of Books, in every department of literature, containing a complete List of Gifts, with full instructions to Agents and persons getting up Clubs, will be sent free to any part of the Union. Persons wishing to form Libraries, should have it as a book of reference. Persons wishing a List of Books and for it, and you will be convinced of the cheapness and variety of the Books, besides being pleased with the liberality of the system.

Orders from the country promptly and satisfactorily filled, and goods sent by mail or express to any part of the country. Any Book published in the United States, the retail price of which is One Dollar or upwards, will be promptly sent by mail on receipt of publisher's price, with postage as per catalogue.

Liberal commissions allowed to all persons forming Clubs. Persons acting as Agents for us can reap all the advantages of the Gift system without any cost to themselves, thus getting a library of good books in a very short time; besides which, the Gifts received with the commission books, will aid far more than enough to supply pay them for their trouble.

Agents united in every town in the Union. Persons wishing to act as such, will be duly enrolled. A Catalogue, will confer a favor by sending their address to

G. G. EVANS,
Gift Book-Store and Publishing House,
439 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia, Pa.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Parlor and Garden.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is established. It is perfectly safe, and will not injure the most delicate flower. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the ferns of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from these insects. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to resist the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and the United States. The following are a few of the many testimonials from scientific societies and scientific men:

Letter from the President of the U. S.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1854.

"MR. E. LYON.—Dear Sir: I have much pleasure in informing you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

"MILLARD FILLMORE, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

"NEW YORK, October 1st, 1858.

"MR. E. LYON.—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.

"JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

"LAFAYETTE RICH, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital."

Mr. Andrew L. Stone, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, cockroaches, &c., with your Powders, from a ward of 50 insurance cases."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in an article of this kind. Reference may be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Hall, President of the American Institute; to James Gordon Bennett, Geo. Wurdeier Secry. Crown W. Pyne, R. V. Pyne, of the Pyne Patent Manufactory, &c., &c. Judge Mason says, "The discovery of Prof. Lyon is of immense importance. We perfectly believe he has tested it thoroughly. It will destroy locusts, grasshoppers, ants, moths, bugs, and in fact, every insect that plants can be preserved, and houses made pure."

Sold by Druggists and Seedsmen. Wholesale by BARNES & PARK, of New York, who supply the trade throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!

"NEW YORK, November 8th, 1858.

"In retiring from business, I have sold all my Insect Powders and Pills, Letters-Patent, and the secrets pertaining thereto, to Messrs. Barnes & Park, of this city. Their order is a discovery made by myself, and brought from the interior of Africa, and it is known to any other persons. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name, E. LYON."

Rats and mice can not be reached by a poison, but are killed by a Magnetic Paste. Order them through any merchant.

The Lyon's Powder kills insects in a minute.

But Lyon's Pills are mixed for rats and mice.

Sample Canister, by mail, prepaid, 25 cents, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions. Use freely and thoroughly.

BARNES & PARK,
13 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.

GET NO OTHER.—If you are suffering from cuts, wounds, sores, burns, chapped hands, erysipelas, corns, chilblains, etc., procure a box of Holloway's Ointment, the greatest healing remedy ever discovered. Sold by all druggists, 25 cents a box.

F.Y.S.

BALLOU'S FRENCH TOILE SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway.
Premium Shirt Manufacturers.

Shirts made to order from Scientific Measure, of the best materials, sewed by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the usual prices.

BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

'OLD DOMINION.'

If you want DELICIOUS COFFEE always, and a variety of flavor, from forty to fifty per cent., get an "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT. Ever forty different other Coffee Pots are imitations of the "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT sales nearly half the usual quantity of Tea. You will save the cost of the pot in two months, and secure daily a table beverage of the choicest flavor.

☞ Sold by Dealers in Housekeeping articles, and Storekeepers generally.

ARTHUR, BURNHAM, & GILROY,
117 and 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia,
Manufacturers under the Patent for the United States.
Also, Manufacturers under the Patent of ARTHUR'S SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS AND JARS.

Removed, May, 1859.
From 5 Nassau Street to 115 Broadway.

Purchasing and Commission Agency.

J. AUG. DIX.

Any Article bought or sold upon Commission.

Through this Agency any article wanted, be it large or small, rough or by the quantity, for family use or to sell again, can be obtained. Also a Market found for Produce or Manufactured Goods. Commission charges never over 5 per cent.

Refers by permission to Wm. B. Meeker, Cashier Bank of New York; George Ellis, Cashier Bank of the Commonwealth, N. Y.

"Our personal acquaintance with Mr. Dix has induced us to allow him to use our name as a reference."

Life Illustrated.

J. AUG. DIX, No. 115 Broadway, New York.

PHALON & SON'S
COCOINE

FOR DRESSING AND PRESERVING THE HAIR.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Price 25 and 50 Cents per Bottle.

Not a Grey Hair in all New York, or would not be if all our elderly people used Hagan's Magnolia Balsam.

Price 50 cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.

W. F. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, TROY, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 122.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A NEW TALE by DICKENS.

In addition to Mr. CURTIS's beautiful Story, now in course of publication in this paper, we have great pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with Mr. CHARLES DICKENS for the early sheets of his new Serial, entitled which will be commenced in the next Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and continued from week to week until completed.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES,

A perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the day.

No other publication gives so MUCH and so CHOICE MATTER, or so fully illustrated a history of the times in which we live.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because THEY MEET THE EYE OF MANY PEOPLE throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West—than advertisements in any other publication.

We refer families to our printed list of terms on the fifteenth page of each paper. By forming clubs, people in the country can obtain the paper on very advantageous terms.

THE LATE CHANCELLOR BIBB.

By the recent death of Chancellor Bibb, at Georgetown, District of Columbia, the national Capitol has both deprived of its last representative of the "gentleman of the Old School." As the names of these patrician fathers have been stricken from the record of the living, their courtly manners and habiliments have also disappeared; nor can we now find a queue wagging over the back of a curule chair in the Capitol, or see a legislator arrayed in that gentlemanlike garb which Colonel Trumbull so delighted to portray. Chancellor Bibb alone remained faithful to the end, refusing to incase his lower limbs in pantaloons; and he was thus one of the features of Washington—"the last of the small-clothes" in that metropolis where there are so many small statesmen. Yet, as was well said of his predecessor, Chief-Justice Marshall, what could have been ludicrous in another became in him more than respectable: it absolutely attracted your reverence. Unsightly as were those rusty and snuffbegrimed "lights," they yet became, when worn by the Chancellor, a kind of ornament, and made the metropolitan prize him the more, as we do antique coins and pictures for the rust and smoke that adhere them, or a bottle of generous old wine for the dust and cobwebs that cover it. Alas, that he "is dead! That good old man; we ne'er shall see him more!"

Chancellor Bibb was born—and very proud was he of his birth-place—in that Old Dominion which is the mother of presidents, and of statesmen, and of orators; and which was, when he first saw the light, some eighty-seven years ago, a colony of Great Britain. He grew up with American independence. His earliest recollections were of the revolutionary struggle—of statesmen standing high on the roll of fame, soldiers immortalized by the fire of battle, and matrons who encouraged their husbands and their sons to defend these glorious principles for the support of which the delegates of the colonies had pledged "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor." Prepared for college in the midst of the stirring scenes which attended the launching of our ship of State, he entered at NASSAU HALL, Princeton, in 1789. The President of that venerable seat of learning at that time was the Rev. Dr. Witherspoon (a lineal descendant of John Knox), and a bold champion of Independence. Young Bibb enjoyed his especial favor, and stood well in the class, which, when it graduated in 1793, was thirty-seven strong.

Following the example of many Virginians who had gone Westward after the war, Mr. Bibb emigrated to Kentucky, where the "dark and bloody ground," stained with the marks of savage cruelty, was occupied by a daring, untrammeled race of hunter-pioneers, "fit to stand by Nimrod and give direction." Commencing the practice of law, he soon acquired a professional reputation; and in January, 1808, was appointed a Judge of the Court of Appeals—a tribunal which has borne since its establishment a high reputation, its reports having been quoted by the leading jurists of the country as recognized authority time and again. This court then consisted of a Chief-Justice and two Judges; and in May, 1809, Judge Bibb was promoted to the Chief-Justiceship.

Elected a Senator from Kentucky, he took his seat in the United States Senate on the 4th of March, 1811, and was identified with the advocates of the war which broke the spell of Britannia's naval supremacy. He voted for the imposition of direct taxes; advocated the annexation of East Florida, and the enlargement of our territory toward the Southwest; opposed the bounties granted to fisheries (now a subject of Congressional discussion); and was a decided antagonist of the New England Federalists. After the adjournment in April, 1814 (followed, not long afterward, by the destruction of the Capitol by the British), he resigned, and again devoted himself to the practice of law.

In 1820, the people of Kentucky having become deeply involved in debt, Governor Adair recommended and succeeded in chartering the "Bank of the Commonwealth," which was not forced to redeem its notes in specie, although they were made legal tender. A bitter political contest ensued; and when the High Appellate Court decided against this "relief" measure a new court was instituted, of which Francis Blair (afterward editor of the Washington Globe) was clerk. The rallying cries then were "New Court" and "Old Court;" and after an animated legal and legislative struggle, the "Old Court" was reinstated in authority. The victors, however, were soon deprived of their triumph by the appointment of Judge Bibb—who had been a "relief" man—as Chief-Justice, which position he retained until the fall of 1828.

On the 4th of March, 1829, Judge Bibb, having been elected again a Senator from Kentucky, took his seat in the Senate of the United States, then in its palmy days. Around him (during this his second Senatorial career, which ended in 1835) were Clay, and Webster, and Calhoun—that glorious triumvirate—with Benton, Clayton, Hayne, Livingston, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury, and others, most of whom have preceded him to the far-off region. Alas! that, in looking back to these days, we are forced to admit that "Astræa has gone to the Hesperides, and there's nothing left to uphold the sky; Ulysses has gone upon his weary wanderings, and there's no one left who can bend his mighty bow!"

In 1830 the Senate went into solemn session as a "High Court of Impeachment," and Mr. James Buchanan, with another Representative, appeared before it as "Managers" appointed by the House to prefer an indictment against Judge Peck. Judge Bibb voted with the majority for his acquittal: indeed he was a faithful Democrat, sustaining General Jackson in all of his measures, and occasionally advocating or defending them, especially when any lawyer-point was involved. In 1832 he warmly supported a resolution for the celebration of the centennial anniversary of Washington's birthday by Congress, and expressed a patriotic desire to have the mortal remains of the Pater Patriæ brought from neglected Mount Vernon to repose beneath the rotunda of the Capitol, where a crypt had been prepared for their reception. Virginia, however, refused to yield the ashes of her noblest son, which, Dust thou art, are soon to be placed in the custody of the women of America.

It was near the close of his Senatorial career that Judge Bibb openly avowed himself a disciple of Izaak Walton; indeed his reputation as the most patient and unsuccessful angler in the District was already well established. A bill was before the Senate regulating Executive patronage, and it had been misconstrued by the opponents of the Administration that some of the Senators whose terms of office were about to expire would be recipients of Presidential favors. "I deny this," said the Judge, at the conclusion of his speech, "so far as I am concerned. I have no personal object in view. I have no ambition. For myself, I prefer to sit with my rod and line on the banks of a pellucid stream, enjoying the pleasures of calmness and contemplation, to any objects that my ambition could achieve." What a glowing pictorial sentiment! Let each reader of Harper's Weekly who owns Major's edition of Izaak Walton, with Irving's quaint preface, add to it or a foot-note this Senatorial testimony to the poetry of angling!

Returning again to Kentucky, Judge Bibb was called upon to fill several then-worthy public stations; and at last became Chancellor of the State. Worthy and well qualified was he to fill the position; but he was recalled to the Federal metropolis, in 1844, by his old Senatorial colleague, John Tyler, who had become President, and who appointed him Secretary of the Treasury. The Ex-President has already paid eloquent tribute to the memories of his deceased Cabinet officers, and it is to be hoped that he will also sustain the virtues and the learning of Chancellor Bibb.

THE LATE CHANCELLOR BIBB.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

Vacating the Treasury Department on the incoming of President Polk, Chancellor Bibb commenced the practice of law in the courts of the District of Columbia. He was well read, especially in the old Common Law and in Equity Jurisprudence, having the Acts of Congress at his fingers' ends, yet he was not a "successful lawyer" in the ungainly acceptation of the term—not only able to surpass his opponents in the art of reasoning right from right principles, but equally an adept in reasoning right from wrong principles, and wrong from right. As an evidence of his Chancellor rise, in his courteous manner, to demonstrate with all imaginable gravity that nonsense is replete with meaning, and that the strongest meaning is manifestly nonsense by construction. Respecting "the Court," he once went so far as to entangle "his Honor" in a net of sophistry; and if his arguments were at times slightly gravy, he never endeavored to drive them with double-entendres, or sought to intimidate opposing counsel by lungs unbecoming an gentleman.

When, in 1850, Mr. Crittenden became Attorney-General in the Administration of President Fillmore, he appointed his old Kentucky friend, Chancellor, chief clerk in his Department—the office of Assistant Attorney-General of the Administration. General Cushing, who was appointed to succeed Mr. Crittenden by President Pierce, and who established (for the term may be used) the Attorney-General's Department on a proper basis, retained the Chancellor in that office. The old gentleman was tempted to resign, having received a large fee as one of the counsel in Fremont's Mariposa case. But in this he was further tempted but it "took wings," and he was forced to resume the practice of law. Of late his office has been at Georgetown, his family residing on a farm near Rockville, Maryland.

Whatever were his fortunes or his wants, the Chancellor always found delight in "casting a line;" and in his practice fully illustrated the definition of Sir Henry Wotton, that angling was "a rest to his mind, a cheerer of his spirits, a diverter of sadness, a procurer of seasonable slumbers." Many are the good stories told of his piscatorial exploits, and he could be counted upon for one himself, albeit he would sometimes indorse them rather emphatically than piously. It was a way he had of expressing himself, not a vice. It was one of these tales:

On one warm afternoon the officer in command at the Washington Arsenal observed the Chancellor sitting on a broken-down wharf, hour after hour, patiently watching his float, and he strolled down from the quarters to inquire "What luck?"

"None!" replied the Chancellor. "I thought I had some bites two or three hours ago, but there is not a fish between now and eternity!" etc., etc.

"What is your bait?" asked the son of Mars.

"A plump worm," hooked through the fleshly part of his leg," etc., etc.

Scarcely had he finished this reply when the gentlemen raised a hearty laughter, and rolling on the grass, and unable to disclose the cause of his merriment, At last he pointed to a leg which was partly out of water, and there the Chancellor saw his bait—Forgave having got tired of swimming about, had jumped up on the lap to see what was hitpd at the other end of the line and pole was doing! (For further particulars, inquire at the Arsenal.)

The personal appearance of Chancellor Bibb, aside from his eccentricities, was remarkable. His great physical vigor of constitution was shown in his erect carriage and in his full chest and somewhat an octogenarian. He was rather above the middle size; and his frame, like his mind, was compact and well knit together. His dress demeanor and appearance proclaimed that he was a gentleman, high-bred and courteous alike, yet affable, kind, friend, a kind husband (he was married thrice), and an affectionate parent. The friendship and the friendship with young men was especially remarkable and pleasing.

The Chancellor never gave up his broad-brimmed hat, his fine linen, his long waistcoat, his small-clothes, his black silk hose, his silver shoe-buckles, or his small-coat. Like Henry Clay, he was a lover of the fragrant titillating nose-powder, and right graciously did he dispense it on every side, to the boys would often step him in the streets with, "Give us a pinch of snuff, please?" and the Chancellor, with all his kind heart, would hand out from at the court of Louis Quatorze, would at once tender the snuff-box. The fingers had not performed that same snuff-box have done this country good service with the pen and with the sword. Many a time has it been passed around the table after a hot Supreme Court, nor was it ever refused by President or foreign diplomatic, or by those who made metropolitan reputations—" Our own Correspondents." To this latter class the well-stored mind of the Chancellor was a reservoir of facts, and he was, never dry, ever ready to supply them.

When the Chancellor was Secretary of the Treasury he was one day importuned by the landlord of a poor clerk, who wished to secure his monthly salary until all arrearages of rent were paid.

"Why has he not paid you?" inquired the Chancellor.

"His family have been sick, Mr. Secretary; and he only has a thousand dollars a year, my how."

"Sir!" exclaimed the Chancellor, "do you take me, the Secretary of the Treasury, for a miserable constable? No, Sir! I never descend to the collection of debts, which is an outrageous custom, although legal! Good-day, Sir!"

The landlord withdrew, and the clerk was next day promoted to a more lucrative place.

But a few days since the Chancellor was attacked with pneumonia, and his attenuated thread of life was suddenly snapped. He was buried in Oak Hill Cemetery, a picturesque spot on the bank of Rock Creek, in which he had so often fished. Resolutions were passed in the courts in honor of his memory, and a large concourse of mourners, including President Buchanan and many of the officials, followed his remains from his late residence to his grave—the first stage of "the innumerable caravan, that moves

To that mysterious realm where each
Must take his chamber in the silent halls of death."

COMMERCIAL MEMORANDA.

THE imports of foreign merchandise and dry goods at this port since January 1 amount to over $70,000,000; against which we have exported less than $18,000,000 of foreign and domestic produce and merchandise, and nearly $12,000,000 of specie. Now here is known, receives two-thirds of the total foreign importations of the United States, and exports one-third of our exports. To bring the accounts of the port to the usual average, therefore, our exports to date should have been $36,000,000 specie, $54,000,000 produce.

The deficiency is due to the failure of the Western crops last year. At this season of the year usually shipments of flour, corn, and a barrel of flour nor a bushel of wheat is now being sent from New York to Europe. Nor is it likely that a bushel will be shipped until the fall unless the foreign crops should fail. At present prices every shipment of breadstuffs involves a loss of from 10 to 15 per cent.

On the other hand, while the failure of our Western grain crop and the low price of breadstuffs abroad prevent shipments, the low price of great staples, our other staple—cotton—is doing better for the country than ever known before. We shall ship three millions of bales of the crop of 1858, which, at the present high rates, will yield a return of more than a pound higher than any previous crop. But for this fortunate circumstance the country would have been ruined to go to the bad. Remember the panic of 1857, and the attendant suspension of specie payments in 1858 and 1859. The whole country will thrill with life, energy, industry, and prosperity.

A very important element in the future is the movement and production of the precious metals. For twenty years the yield of gold from California and Australia has not varied. There is reason to believe that the combination of science and practical experience which has led to California, largely increase the product of gold hereafter. Such is the opinion of the best-informed men in San Francisco. The gold fields, too, are being opened. Gloomy as has been the experience of miners at Fraser's River, there is no doubt that gold will still come from thence this season. A small product may also be expected from Peter's Peak and Arizona.

The most eminent publicists in the world look to show that the demand for the precious metals is going to decline. This is the natural effect of commerce. Commerce being nothing by a system of exchanges, the more general the commerce with the human race, the more demand there will be for the precious metals as representatives of values. People will take the value, not themselves. Instead of gold and silver they will take manufactures and merchandise. For some years the great consumers of gold will be the Levant and India. Their fixed institutions consumed little foreign merchandise, and exported largely their own produce; the consumption of Europe was small. It is to be believed, both India and China are going to increase their consumption of foreign wares very greatly. Their wants are many. The British and American manufactures may be placed to advantage in many of the large interior cities of India, and, to which, the Ganges flows, the late war will prove to have been a godsend, finds itself under a better government than that of the Company, with improved roads, better tenures, and more encouragement for enterprise. She will buy all the more cottons and hardwares, and wean all the less gold.

These considerations are very important; for if the drain of specie for the East were checked, a surprising impetus would be given to speculation in those countries where bank expansions are regulated by the amount of specie the banks contain.

For the present, however, the most important topic for the merchant to consider is the danger of over-importations this fall. We do not think the spring import too large, considering the wealth of the South, and the insignificant amount of foreign goods taken last year. Nor do we regard the bank expansion as excessive, though it is the largest ever reached. But if the fall importations are as large as those of the spring the merchants will run a great risk. Every fall, when the country banks require their balances, there is some difficulty in the money market here. Should the importations be very considerable this fall that activity might come upon the community very suddenly as to create a panic, and sound houses might, in a sudden bank contraction, be compelled to suspend. It will not do to make merchants to trust to the banks. The banks do not always know enough to take care of themselves. Much less can they be trusted with the charge of the mercantile community.

OUGHT A WOMAN TO BE HANGED?

On the day on which this paper will be published, Mary Hartung, the murderess, is to be executed, if the sentence of the law is carried into effect. The question whether that sentence shall, or shall not, be executed has given rise to much controversy.

A number of highly respectable gentlemen, aided by some influential presses, have urged the Governor to grant a full pardon or reprieve. Both branches of the State Legislature recommend the same thing. Some of these persons appear to object to capital punishment altogether; their arguments would apply with equal force to any male assassin. But Mary Hartung's case peculiarly deserves most attentive scrutiny. Much has been said about her sex, and the fact that a woman should not be hanged, not because they object to hanging, but because she is a woman. They assume that women enjoy an immunity from capital punishment in virtue of their sex. If, by virtue of their womanhood, and cowardly to strike a woman, it would be savage and brutal to hang one.

But the editor of the Mercury Morgan has set forth, with great clearness and decision, in a letter which we have published, his opinion that, as the law makes no distinction on account of women, he can make none, and that he can not righteously commute Mary Hartung's sentence. The law says a woman shall not shed her blood, and therefore the presses which concur with the Governor have said less on the subject than the law itself. It is true that the several influential journals have very distinctly expressed the view that, if hanging is to continue in this State, no one should suffer death more than a wretched adulteress woman, who deliberately and fiendishly poisoned her trusting husband.

We confess that we can see grave dangers to be apprehended from the adoption of any other course. We have no desire to diminish the enormity of her guilt, and of the atrocious character and circumstances of her crime, Mary Hartung is not hanged, then, of course, no female will ever again be hanged in this State. Yet, so long as women can commit murder, they should be liable to the penalty which the law affixes to that crime: if that penalty be repugnant to the public feeling in the case of a woman, it is not repugnant to it on a man. Indeed, the cold dead man's corpse cries aloud for vengeance, it is no time to talk of gallantry or respect to sex. Murderers are of no sex.

If the doctrine be established that a woman can not be executed, it is clear that all the cold-blooded, cowardly murders will be committed by women. Every ruffian can command the services of some woman; he will not be hanged when he can always find a victim of no greater risk than a few years' imprisonment for her. The fearful case of the negro girl who hired to kill her master, and who, after the hanging of her lover, will become a standard precedent.

It is a very painful fact—but it is an undoubted fact—that there are as many bad women in the world as bad men, and probably as many. As many females are lodged in State prisons and penitentiaries as males. Sometimes there are more murderesses than men; but, on the whole, the average is about the same of both sexes. Fewer women fall to wickedness than men; but many women become hardly conscious of the difference between the sexes is maintained. And though there are crimes which are exclusively masculine, it is a matter of common notoriety, fact that two of the heaviest crimes in the calendar—murder and arson—are as often committed by women as by men. Lucretia Borgia and Clytemnestra and Jezebel to those of Mrs. Manning and Mary Hartung, women have fairly contended with men for supremacy in the darkness of heart, the steeled nerves, and the wicked soul which lead to murder. Equals in guilt, shall they not suffer the like penalty?

There is a dreadful story—a terrible tale of blood unavenged—which yet rings in the ears of every citizen of New York; a tale of a savage, brutal, fiendish murder, committed on a full-grown, wide-awake man, by—who doubts it?—a woman. But she has been cleared, would that have wrong to have hanged her?

EXPENSIVE NEGOTIATIONS

THE United States have been at peace for the past ten or eleven years; but so far as money is concerned, for the past year or two they might just as well have been at war. For the money spent on the two expeditions which have been the chief exploits of Mr. Buchanan's administration—we mean of course the Utah and the Paraguay expeditions—a very respectable foreign war might have been carried on.

It is very difficult to estimate to dollars the cost of those two great military movements. They must have cost a great many millions; and this at a time when the Government's revenue is insufficient to defray its ordinary expenses.

If indeed they had achieved great ends for the public advantage the outlay might be excused. But what were we come to examine recent results, how little the country has gained by either!

At the best advices Utah the Mormons were unsubdued and impenitent. There is no symptom of yielding either among the leaders or among the people. On the contrary the Mormons seem more warmly attached than ever to their peculiar institutions; and as to submission, they have appealed from the Administration to Congress in a tone which almost amounts to a menace. The administration of justice by the Federal judge is at a stand-still, and there is no means to entertain the fairness hope that polygamy can be punished or repressed. The prospect is, that the moment the Federal troops leave the Territory of Descret will relapse into its former condition, and be more than ever a hierarchal profligacy. Our great expedition, which cost such enormous sums of money, has not even brought Brigham Young to submission. It has not even tried to strike terror into the rebels. It is paraded to discover any one substantial benefit which the Utah expedition has conferred on the country.

As to the Paraguay expedition, that has been still more signally a failure. There is no official information that a treaty has been concluded which protects Lopez from our fleets. Our commissioner, Mr. Hopkins, has not yet come to have known better, has taken Lopez's word for indemnities to the family of the man who was killed at the time of the attack, and in no trading company, and has further been satisfied with Lopez's promise that Captain Page shall be tried by a court-martial. The Paraguay commissioner Bowlin was justified in making peace on these conditions, it was preposterous to fit out such an expedition for such an object. And if the expedition was called for—as we believe it was—it was absurd of Bowlin to be satisfied with so much less than the terms of the promise of Lopez before, and we know how he kept them. Why should he be more scrupulous hereafter?

These two expeditions will shed any thing but lustre on Mr. Buchanan's administration.

WAR OR PEACE IN EUROPE?

IT seems generally understood by the press and people of the United States that there is no war in Europe for the settlement of the Italian question.

A few weeks ago, when it was first announced that Napoleon and Victor and Francis had resolved upon a Congress of Nations, it was at once perceived that Austria would be compelled to consent, as it was impossible that a third party could be preserved. Now, on the strength of reports of renewed military preparations in Austria, we are told that the Congress is dead, the war is inevitable, and that the month of May will not elapse before cannon are fired on the Tecino.

No one seems to reflect that the least flag or gun preparations on the part of the first Power of Austria or on that of France would place the nation which flagged in a very weak position at the Congress. Austria, therefore, cannot proceed to disband troops, or even suspend the gathering of levies or the forwarding of ordnance stores, without incurring the risk of every of war in the Milanese, she would expose herself to be sold by the French envoy at the Congress, as the Pope was by the French at the Peace. Ultimatum, in twenty-four hours the Piedmontese would cross the Ticino, and in forty-eight a French would cross naturally to assist at the Congress: "These are my terms; if you don't accept them by noon to-morrow, before night we shall cross the Ticino." Such is the way diplomacy would occupy Novara." These threat could easily be accomplished in three days by telegraphs and railways. But, France and Austria are bound, until the Congress adjourns, to play the game of bluff with each other, to keep on appearing to disbelieve in peace, and to be really prepared for any event.

We do not believe in war. We think that the interests in Europe, which would be jeopardied or destroyed by a war, are too enormous to be risked for the sake either of Italian independence or of Austrian dominion. Rather than have a war, we believe that Austria would give up the Milanese, or, on the other hand, that France would sacrifice Piedmont. The most likely result will be a compromise, which will secure a part of Napoleon's aim, without too thoroughly humiliating Austria—some such arrangement as the establishment of a constitutional government in Northern Italy under a limited Austrian protectorate. It is dangerous to predict the maintenance of peace in presence of large armies eager for fighting; but a European war at the present moment is not for the interest and so little good—except to our Western grain-growers—that we can not conceive that the European statesmen could commit such a blunder.

THE DECLINE IN IMMIGRATION.

It is well known that within the past year or two the foreign immigration to this country has fallen off to one-third its former figure. There has been no corresponding good deal of speculation on the causes and effects of the phenomenon.

It was the fashion, in the days when Know Nothingism flourished, to charge it with having blocked immigration. There was no solid ground for the charge. Emigration from Germany and Ireland declined simply because it had been excessive: when those countries were depleted a healthy flow of labor would come up, which afforded a fair livelihood to the people who had staid at home. Native Americanism had nothing to do with the matter.

We see some papers arguing that the United States are ruined because emigration from Europe has stopped, and that the country is coming to till the West. This is all wrong. The decline of emigration insures its revival by-and-by, just as its excessive flow in the decade—England, France, Germany, Ireland, and Scotland, are all overpopulated; and even if the United States held out to the poor man no advantages over those countries, there would still be a steady stream of emigrants to our shores, because in Europe population presses harder than employment. Taking Ireland as an example, it is abundantly proven that, so long as the potato yields an average crop, the population will increase far beyond the capacity of the island to support it. It is the same with Germany. The people are prolific, and must seek elbow-room at home.

Even independently of this law, it is clear that European emigration to the United States must continue so long as we have fertile unoccupied lands to offer the immigrant. A country in Europe offers such a future to a young man as our Western States. Common industry, even without economy, will soon establish a competency for any steady man in the West. We say nothing of political advantages, though, with the best class of emigrants, they are considered and palpable that it is unreasonable to expect the Europeans to cease coming here.

THE LOUNGER.

TO PHILOSOPHERS, MORALISTS, NOVELISTS, AND POETS.

The Lounger would respectfully say to all authors who kindly send their favors to the Weekly—and his word has the editorial sanction—that it is not always possible to read them, even when the author requests it, and especially in the case of brief pieces of verse. The Lounger mention to the world to do every thing that every correspondent desires, the MSS. will lose themselves often, will remain unduly stray in the editorial pantomery, and faithful search only fails to find them.

The Editor can not hold himself responsible for every little MS. that may be reclaimed by the author.

AT THE ACADEMY.

The National Academy has hung up its pictures, and invited the public to come and admire them. To be sure, are not very spacious or convenient. The halls are a part of the large factory, tenanting in an unexpected dark passage—a la Mrs. Radcliffe—the visitor finds the haunted visitor emerges into the grand hall of the pictures, and begins de rigueur.

But who has the heart to quarrel with the kind intention and bountiful repast? The moment a visitor looks at the top of that final staircase and finds himself in the midst of the brilliant scene, surely his first emotion is one of wonder and delight at the ensemble of the whole picture.

Only a few months ago and these very walls were bricks with the same colors, and the same combinations. Here was a great Swiss landscape scene—there an exquisite Newport sunset—yonder the Cordilleras.

These things are changed. Pictures pass away, but picture receives them. Here and there are visitors whose heads are not yet snowy, who recall the old Clinton Hall, in Beekman Street, opposite the old Brick Church. There was a hotel there, too. Perchance the wearied student of art may have refreshed his courage at the hotel? Hall, hotel, and old Brick Church are gone now. It must be two years ago that the last vestige disappeared! Two years!—in our civic history it is a century.

Pardon a desiring Lounger these reminiscences of antiquity, and look with him at these pretty pictures.

There are more than ever before. The rooms, indeed, seem no taller than last year, but the figures are too strong for us. There are more than eight hundred pictures! Think, for a moment, how much more there is in every one of them than appears! Think of the eager hope, ambition, secret lubrication of conceit—of the patient toil, industry—of the cheerfulness, kindness, sympathy—of the dark winter hours, of the long summer days—and the love girt, the happiness and doubt—which are worked into these silent pieces of canvas! Is it a work of God's grace? Not unless it deals! Yes; but the painter put into it despair. He will lash himself sharply in left with the umbrella in the hands of Mrs. Croker's assistant at the door? She has enough, doubtless, for her pains in a her own work. Mrs. Croker's assistant that brings color to the trees brings it also to these walls. The Academy of Assembly-art bestows to see the pictures and say his god thought, to go to be admonished by that familiar face at the door. He will not be admonished. He will go to see his friends, and that he is to look for a friend, to think as a friend, and to speak as a friend. Only when he becomes an editor may he put away friendly things.

There was a time—oh me! the Lounger smarts with the reminiscence—when he too was a critic! A time when he carried catalogues, when he was severe upon reds, detested yellows, spent upon blues, lurched upon aerial perspectives, middle-distances, half-tints, and various technicalities. At a time when he considered that the knife, in the guise of a stout pen, had been providentially committed to his hands to lay bare the absurdities of Brown, N. A., and to dissect finely the deformity of Dash A. for the benefit of a progressive public, which looks to a slashing practice in critical surgery! A time when he considered himself called to inflict him as the messenger to inform Dob N. A. that his public papers that he was not Titian, and Slob A. that he was not Claude.

Gone are those days! Carefully washed away like resulting gore of that savage system! The Lounger looking back upon that time can only say he Lounger is glad to see what pictures are. Knowing that at the last moment the committee, with its adjudged the largest, he does not therefore frown upon the pies derived from pumpkins of a lesser kind. The Lounger is glad that Mr. Cole became to remembers Titian at Venice—one Titian in his life. The Lounger is glad he lives in a country to recalls Claude shedding eternal summer upon the Doria walls in Rome! Have not all of us who have been abroad, in the Italian galleries, classic rooms, at Potsam? Shall we the less fondly pluck those in our own gardens that can now only wait ing for June?

The critic's is a more dreadful trade, now than the unsparing days. There are people who go to the opera to hear false notes—actually to find fault with the singer. The Lounger has got to one of these softest spring days to see if he could not possibly feet a touch of the cast wind. Have we been to the Park? Have we been to Jones, the then not? and fifth? and tough chickens?" says the critic. "What on earth should a man go to Italy for?"

Let us understand, then, that we have not come to the Academy for the fifth or the then. Let us wander about and look at these pleasant pictures and, really, they are not gaudy, and, and vastly our precious hours in impotent impatience with imbecility? Is it worth while to go through and read all the dull books that are published? In the name of Justice, is not a man sufficiently punished by having written himself one book, as are two or more volumes, but you must stop and point out wherein the book is dull, and why it was decided all over with the chill consciousness of his own shortcomings? Grant that Smudge's portraits are not flattering likenesses, that his compositions in the history of spelled cavaus, is not the wretched Smudge by a thousand feels that he can do no more two months? Is not the whole town coming to witness his shame? Are not he and all his family, filled by the agony of the hour? Mrs. Smudge's, and the frocious fan of all the visitors, for eight or nine weeks to come?

St. Sebastian was nothing to Smudge. The worst case of that martyr in any picture in Europe does not equal the misery of that one picture. Poor St. Smudge will be utterly riddled before the end of May. Is it not a pity that he will be left to quite holy enough to be called Saint by the time "June's roses blow."

One thing we have become evident—that we can not mention a single picture to-day. We have walked, climbed, and wandered over it; it is not been that dark corridor at the Academy, and we may as well say ex-recoir next week—so straight on, down the stairs, and through the midst of Mrs. Croker's assistants, and depart into the spring sunshine to study the living pictures on Broadway.

MAY-DAYS.

THE time of the opening of months has come, and the voice of the Siberian cuckoo is not heard in the hall. Perhaps Spurgeon himself may come, after all. A having been stated to him carefully that he shall not make a spectacular performance he will come to see if he can speculate himself

Mr. Barnum is not here, and, for the present, we mean, only to raise money to build his new church. That is what he has been doing in England; and, in Scotland too, but with less success.

View them how we will, we can not fail to see what an immense homage to human nature is paid by the fact of these multitudinous anniversaries. The societies may be designed to shed light into dark places and darker minds; but it is still men, still human sympathy, that inspires them. They may be managed in a new man and be directed or incompetent men—they may be the most nonsgift fecently garnished nuntles of meanness, cant, and hypocrisy—but, for all that, they are not less, in their fundamental idea, honest human plans to help humanity. Mistaken, often enough, in details of conception and arrangement, they are always noble and sweet in the benignity of their objects. Malignant, too often, in the crime of seems which dooms them. How many of us probably remember when we thought wars were over, when we looked at plow-shares, and hoped also at pruning-hooks, if we knew what they were, to discover the re-decreed swords and spears! Haydn's Peace Jubilee was a little ludicrous simplicity that was surprised when it first learned that it was sometimes quarreled! Children quarreled, of course, over their playthings, but, made, and were forgiven.

How many of us have learned that men sometimes do quarrel, and that poetry and tradition put the golden age far behind us, and absolutely inaccessible, while they declare that Astrea has long since returned to the sky, and that we live in an iron age. What a comment upon human progress and Christianity that the most densely populated of the continents is on the eve of a general war; that it is known, discussed, and will probably be permitted!

NEW BOOKS.

WHILE we hold Dr Quincey's last volume, and the pretty gold and blue "Motherwell," and the startling new novel of Charles Reade's "Love me Little, Love me Long," and the graver sentences of Bulwer's "What will he do with it?" and the "Lamplighter" by C. H. Lester, "Ben Bolter" by our bands, there come books and rumors of books important to see and to say.

Tennyson's "King Arthur" is already singing through the press. Charles Mackay's volume of American travels, enlarged and elaborated, will be good summer reading. Charles Kingsley has published a new volume of sermons. Mr. Ruskin, too, whom the world so gladly knew "as he sailed, as he sailed," has been sailing again to Cuba and writing about it. C. D. Lanier has published in London a new life of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Tichborne & Co. will give us a complete Dickens, one of the greatest gods in the American pantheon of thirty years ago. Esthen Kingslake, the Manchester Lounger says, is writing a history of the Crimean war. Mr. Home, the medium, is to do a work on spiritual sight for a Parisian publisher while Michelet's "L'Amour" is still the book of the moment in Paris, and will be until Alexander Dumas's "Black" has just completed his Moresian travel and now dramas like Schmoyl, shall have finished his "Mysteries of Montreal." Longfellow, we are sorry, and his traveling-novel or romantic travels, "Cucuracs." With the rest drifts upon the lonely gee's table a little "Homœopathic Domestic Physician," issued by F. C. Eastman, Concord, N. H. A work we have perused, N. P. Willis's statement that Goethe's "Correspondence with Bettina von Arnim" was published in Lowell, Mass.? So much for Lowell and the Concord Lowell. As the little book is simple and convenient, and would be useful, doubtless, to those who believe the myth similia similibus.

P. O.

WHILE the Transitionarians refuse to have any thing to do with a beautiful new Post-office which is going up in the St. Cyprus Hotel block for them —while they hurry to Washington that they may not be obliged to go two to Sarasota—and raise money to keep away the dreadful locu—poor, patient, long-suffering, modest, meritorious New York city! it ought to be shivered—all Dutch Church, squeezes in ridiculous lobbies, slops about in the park pokes in the dark, mumbles at dirty drawers, and calls itself a metropolis!

Go to! with this frightful waggery. There is not a bucket—a bank-shop or a green-grocer's shelf in the land which is such an utterly mean Post-office that the moment it leaves the Millerses old church is for New York. No wonder the Post-office Department leaves it to the Transitionarians! It ought to be broken up. No wonder the Transcontinuous wite laugh at our pretensions. A metropolis! A metropolis!

Why, there is not one of those wits who has not traveled in other countries enough to know it. Among those sights are metropolises, and in each metropolis there is a Post-office—not a building merely, but a system which justifies the Government in undertaking the business of transporting letters. Such a system is represented in perfection in those through the Post-office, in its numberless branches all through the city; but in New York what man so lost to his self-love even to the vaunt-proposant as to drop his letter into a chance box at an uptown grocery? Why do they persist in saying that there is a Dead-Letter Office in Washington? Dead-Letter Office abound in the metropolis?

Outside of the ruling dirt there is the humbugbacked monster that equals in the very bosom of the metropolis the dreadful uncleanliness and dignity of the metropolis, there is a range of apple-women. They sell sound fruit at a fair price. Now suppose the United States should have to buy all our apples in that old Castle Rat-trap, and should sell us only rotten ones at a high price!

Why should the United States undertake to do a business which it either does not or will not understand? Above all, why should it force us to buy poor fruit at a price which would secure us the best imaginable?

Upon the whole, the metropolitan character of New York is best studied at the corner of Nassau and Spruce streets.

—Or, if you insist that New York has nothing to do with it, the capacity of the Post-office Department may be considered at the same point of view.

LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—J. G. G., Palestine, Texas, asks if Mr. Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, is not preparing a volume of his paragraphs for the press. It is very likely, but the Lounger had not heard of it.

A BALLOON RAILWAY.

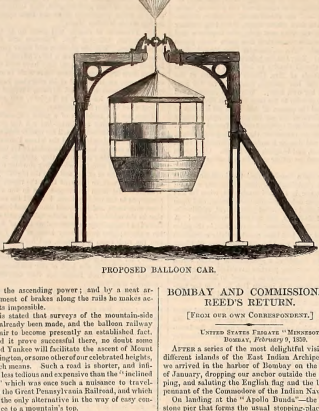
EVERY body who has traveled through Switzerland has been "up the Rhigi." It is not necessary to describe the scenery which makes the ascent (if the day was clear) an event to be remembered among the pleasantest in a lifetime of travel: the illimitable rich expanse of lowland, bordered with crops and jeweled with lakes; the tumbled sea of granite peaks, glistening with snow or dark with forest; the light clouds floating here and there, which only help the mountains to look higher; the toy-like little towns nestling down in the valleys; the turquoise color of the Zugersee and Wallensee; the quiet little chapel on the route; and the reward for the troubles of the ascent in a good dinner at a most comfortable hotel at the summit. All these things he who has been there will have in his mind's eye at mention of the name; and to those who have yet to make the ascent it is probably better to mention only that the Rhigi Culm is a mountain of Switzerland 5905 feet above the sea, commanding magnificent views, and a common resort for all kinds of travelers: to accommodate whom an ingenious German engineer and architect, M. Frederic Albrecht, proposes to run what may be called a balloon-train from the railway terminus at the foot to the hotel door at the summit.

Last year 30,000 people visited the summit of Mount Rhigi, and more than half of these either ride up the tollsome way on horseback or ascend in sedan-chairs borne by men. Invalids and ladies often find the ascent too wearying for them. Besides the horses and bearers needed for the accommodation of travelers a large force is required to transport to the summit the provisions, etc., consumed in the hotels there. To economize much of this expense M. Albrecht proposes to construct along the side of the mountain a line of trestle-work, of wood and iron, it to support two bars of iron, within whose grooves is to slide a bolt, to which is to be suspended a light but comfortable car, capable of accommodating from six to twelve persons. Above, the bolt is coupled to a balloon, of such dimensions as to be capable of raising the car and its contents. The result is plain: the upward tendency of the balloon is modified by the restraining power of the rails, and the consequence is that, instead of shooting directly into the air, the car is dragged up along the rails—and this at a rate neither too fast nor too slow for comfort.

M. Albrecht asserts that he has experimented so far as to convince him that such a conveyance is perfectly feasible, and entirely safe in any weather except during a heavy storm. He explains that the guidance of the railway so far balances the balloon as to make the ascent easy even in a moderate gale. He expects to get his balloon down again by so loading the return cars as to weigh down the ascending power; and by a neat arrangement of brakes along the rails he makes accidents impossible.

It is stated that surveys of the mountain-side have already been made, and the balloon railway bids fair to become presently an established fact. Should it prove successful there, no doubt some shrewd Yankee will facilitate the ascent of Mount Washington, or some other of our celebrated heights, by such means. Such a road is shorter, and infinitely less tedious and expensive than the "inclined plane" which was once such a nuisance to travelers on the Great Pennsylvania Railroad, and which forms the only alternative in the way of easy conveyance to a mountain's top.

During the last seventy-five years a number of ingenious mechanicians, European and American, have turned their attention to the solution of the problem of aerial navigation. Mr. Wise of Pennsylvania proposes to cross the Atlantic next year in a mammoth balloon. It is not unlikely that the balloon railway we have described may be an important step toward the final perfection of an air-ship.



PROPOSED BALLOON CAR.

BOMBAY AND COMMISSIONER REED'S RETURN.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

UNITED STATES FRIGATE "MINNESOTA,"
BOMBAY, February 9, 1859.

AFTER a series of the most delightful visits to different islands of the East Indian Archipelago, we arrived in the harbor of Bombay on the 19th of January, dropping our anchor outside the shipping, and saluting the English flag and the broad pennant of the Commodore of the Indian Navy.

On landing at the "Apollo Bunds"—the long stone pier that forms the usual stopping-place for boats of every description—one is overwhelmed with the importunities of drivers of broken-down horses in the most-impracticable-to-mount looking gigs; dirty carriers of still dirtier palanquins, which are used for travelers by day and beds for the carriers at night; and by a class of persons called "dobashes," who persist in holding an umbrella over your head as they walk by your side, answer all questions put to your friend on the other side, volunteer advice, and, by a series of questions and cross-questions, imperceptibly worm out of you where you are from, where you are to go, and, above all, the condition of your finances; their attentions depending entirely upon the report they receive as to the latter. After a sea voyage one is prompted, on reaching the shore, to walk and stretch his legs; but the persistency of the crowd on the wharf compels you to take a vehicle of some description, in which you start off, congratulating yourself on your escape; but the dobash is not easily thrown off. If he is a clever fellow, he is at once friends with the driver of your vehicle, and alongside him on the box. If you are in a palkee, he is by your side, and ready at any moment to answer any questions or to render any service. Altogether the dobash is the most important person in the East.

An as-good road of an eighth of a mile, entirely free from shade of every description, leads through the double gate of the fortress and into the town. The streets are wide, clean, and well watered. Pedestrians must suffer somewhat from the want of side-walks, by which they are compelled to dodge the varied vehicles drawn by horses, bullocks, and men, as well as thread their way through the crowds of native Parsees, Hindoos, Jews, which throng the streets.

Among the variety of carriages one sees in the streets of Bombay the little ox-teams bear a most conspicuous part. They are boxes mounted on two wheels, without springs, and in many instances hung with flowing silk curtains, highly embroidered, and filled with parties of men, women, or children, packed in the closest possible manner. The animals drawing them are scarcely larger than Newfoundland dogs; but their small smooth limbs make them very active, and in the races which frequently occur in the streets between oxen and horses, the former more often get the advantage.

The houses are unlike those of most Eastern cities, those within the fort being of five or six stories high; but the gaudy colors they are painted, the projecting cornices over each story, extending five or six feet into the street, and the carved wooden ornaments about the doors and windows render them totally unlike those seen in American cities.

The Government buildings are good, and the hotels bad. The principal hotel is situated at the end of a narrow lane filled with stables, among the horses of which, while undergoing a cleaning process outside the door, one has to go in order to reach it. We managed to get through, however, and were quite disappointed at the good "tiffin" set out for us at two o'clock. Like too many others, we had formed an opinion by the exterior.

Amusements in Bombay are few and far between; occasionally a concert-giver comes along, but the chief recreation consists in going upon the PROPOSED BALLOON RAILWAY UP MOUNT RHIGI, SWITZERLAND.

Esplanade at sundown, and listen to the band, and gossip. There are several bands now here, belonging to the different regiments; and all is indeed a relief, after the heat of the day, to go out upon this open space, fully exposed to the sea-breezes, and listen to fine music.

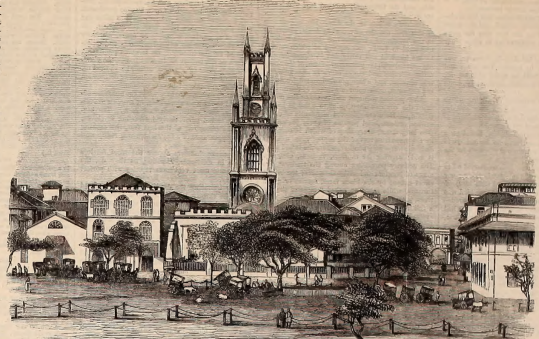
We had long anticipated a trip to Elephanta, the island of the caves; so the evening of the 19th we made our arrangements, and by daylight the next morning were stowing away an impromptu breakfast, and otherwise preparing for the fatigues of the day. A covered "bunda" boat was along side, into which, with our guns and lunch, our little party were soon seated. A sail of a couple of hours brought us to the western side of the island. This island is some five or six miles in length, by from half a mile to a mile in width. A high hill at either extremity of it forms a notch in the centre, through which we passed to the caves on the opposite side.

The principal cave is nearly upon the summit of one of these high hills, its entrance being in the side, and commanding one of the prettiest of views, combining land and water, that I ever saw. A cut of fifty feet in height, and nearly as wide, forms a face in the hill, where, surrounded by shrubbery and trees, is an opening of twenty-five or thirty feet in width, by fourteen high, in which appear the fluted Egyptian columns which sustain the ceiling. Thirty feet within are halls branching, at right angles with the main entrance, to the right and left. The hall upon the left leads into an open space, and this again up a flight of steps, with ilon on either side, to a chamber, the walls of which are covered with bas-reliefs. Within this is a stone apartment of six or eight feet square, containing the ruins of a carved stone intended to represent certain portions of the body. It was to these stones these women whose families were not to great as they desired, or those who had no families at all, used to come and worship—a mode of worship similar to that of Priapus by the ancient Greeks. It is stated that even at this day a good deal of virtue is ascribed to sitting a certain length of time upon these stones.

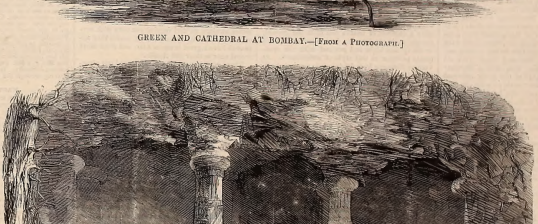
The hall on the right leads to apartments similar in construction to those on the left. Explorations in them have not been thoroughly finished, however. The wonder of these caves is in the sculpturings, which are in relief over all the walls. At every salient point are figures in the boldest alto-relief, twelve feet high, and magnificent columns which sustain the ceiling. In many places are panels, or niches, upon which are cut numerous figures. In one of these niches, facing the entrance, is the triple-headed deity, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva—the creator, the destroyer, and the preserver. All are connected with the ancient traditions of a people existing long, long ago, and about whom very little seems to be at present known. One is lost in astonishment, as he wanders through these halls among the huge columns and gigantic figures, at the amount of labor and money expended in hewing all out of the solid rock. Not a column, or an image, or a step but is in the position where it was placed by the Creator.

A quarter of a mile from this are two smaller caves but partially exhumed, and, as far as the researches have gone, much less interesting than the main one that is so fully cleared.

Amidst all the astonishment and admiration which the light of such a work can not fail to inspire in the breast of every one who visits the caves, as well as one of intense interest and curiosity to know more of a people who had such a respect for art, and knew so well how to introduce it into their places of public resort, one can not repress the sensation of disgust and horror at the vandalism of a people who, in their zeal for their religion, strove to destroy every remnant of idolatry, or any thing which might serve to remind one of it. When the Portuguese had possession of these islands they brought their artillery into the caves, and by every means in their power strove to obliterate



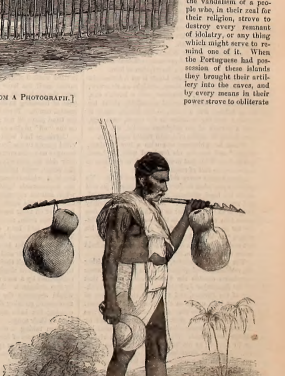
GREEN AND CATHEDRAL AT BOMBAY.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]



GRAND ENTRANCE TO THE CAVES OF ELEPHANTA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

DR. BHAWRO DAGEE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

DOBASH LINGO.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]



ZODDY CARRIER.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

every vestige of art then remaining—which, it is fair to suppose, were then nearly perfect.

All the lower part of the columns and the sculptures are defaced or entirely ruined, and the upper part was only saved from the fact that the eyes could not be properly elevated so as to allow their shot to reach them.

What their artillery failed to do, however, was attempted to be done by hand. The noses and hands, and all that could be easily chipped off, have been removed. The relicts, fortunately, could not be much injured.

No vestige of the painting or gilding which probably covered all these figures now remain, having been removed by the moisture and dirt to which it has been exposed for centuries.

We met a party of English officers, bound on a pleasure-tour like ourselves, who invited us to lunch with them, and a table was prepared for the purpose within the cave.

After fully refreshing ourselves we started off to explore the remainder of the island, taking our guns with us. The trees are filled with birds of rich plumage, and an occasional singing bird was heard. One of our party—an Irishman Nigored—persisted in popping away at every thing that had wings; I believe a large bustle, had he seen one, would have fallen a victim to his gun. He soon had every available pocket filled with "game," as he delighted in calling it, which, on our return, he showed as proofs of his skill. On the eastern end of the island are the ruins of what was once a huge stone elephant, from which the island derives its name. Little is left of the original. The body still remains upright in legs, but the general clumsy character to the black mass of stone lie at its feet another exhibition of the results of Portuguese artillery.

The origin of these caves, as well as analogous ones on the island of Salsette and others in the same vicinity, who built them, or for what purpose they were constructed, remains a mystery. Arguments have been brought forward to prove that they were built by a tribe from Egypt who inhabited the country previous to the present race; others, however, that the ancestors of the present race originated all. But, strange to say, there is not even a legend to enable those now living to form an idea as to who first inhabited them. In an old herald history-book, we, with a large company of eight men, his charge of the place, informed me that the gods themselves threw it up one day. When I went on to ascertain, by questioning, his ideas as to how it was done, who the gods were, and for what purpose they did it, I found that he had not the clearest views as to the matter still, as far as actual information goes, he knew as much as we did.

It was nearly sundown when we belonged ourselves of wending our boat. In order to do so we were obliged to ride upon the shoulders of decrepit old men, who tottered at every step, threatening to overthrow us. Fortunately, however, such was not the result.

Our passage home was enlivened by the monotonous though not unusual songs of our boatmen, led on by our dusky Lingo, who, I am sorry to say, though belonging to a race which prohibits the use of ardent spirits, had got hold of our bottle, and by an indiscriminate use of it—a "mixing of liquors"—had got somewhat elevated, as was shown in his polite attentions to me and his exercise of authority over the boatmen. As he was the medium through which the pay came, and without whose interpretation they would fare badly, he was treated with the utmost respect by them, and his requests for certain songs were instantly carried out.

By-the-way, as our default is somewhat of a character, and rendered me many effective services afterward, I must give a description of him.

In personal appearance Lingo is an Adonis—six feet two inches without shoes, straight as an arrow, with a forehead of a Webster, and a hawk's eye, his dress of a most disposed appearance when the form, falling, like a tunic, to the knees, where it forms a striking contrast to his black, bare legs, and a turban of brightest scarlet with gold lace presenting an aspect of a man rarely met with.

When he addresses one with a view to obtain, Sahib," and touches his forehead with his hand, one feels as if his hat must come off in response to a greeting so full of respect.

Lingo knows every thing and every body. No matter upon what subject he is questioned, he at once shuts his head profoundly, roll his eyes upward, and reply as if inspired. With all his plausibility Lingo is at bottom a rascal as all the rest. He has given him to transfer to the boatmen as a gratuity for singing he carefully stowed away in his pocket "to hand them ashore;" but the others—not understanding a word of English—I am afraid never received them.

The next day, ashore, was occupied in visiting the residence and grounds of the wealthy native merchants outside the fort—among others, that of Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy. He is the wealthiest of the Parsees, and his charities are princely. At his sect look up to as their brightest ornament. He early left this that of Dhomestic, and has since commenced in the most obscure manner, but by industry and honesty he acquired his present immense possessions. He is as wonderful in giving as in pocket, as his immediate homeless testify. Not long since he built a magnificent hospital, which he presented to the English Government. For this crowning act of charity he was knighted by the Queen.

His residence is palatial, and the grounds surrounding abound with trees and shrubs of the choicest kinds. Within every thing is of the most princely order, with the best of European taste. Long suits of rooms, the walls of which were covered with painting and pieces of rare sculpture.

The most attractive part of Bombay to the eye of a stranger is the native town. A drive of a mile over a good road running through the midst of an immense parade, which appears larger than it really is from the entire absence of trees, with the exception of a few stunted ones on the road side, and the thoroughly parched turf which covers it.

The only relicts to the desert-like appearance of this spot are the silver-white tents, glistening in the hot sun, of a regiment, or the stone tanks so universal in India, the sides of which, though a hundred and thirty feet in circumference, are covered with the picturesque forms of the many different races and castes of races abounding in this country, and which are designated by different costumes, or the color or winding of the turban.

After passing this spot and reaching the native town the contrast from quiet to noise is indeed striking. Here the different languages of every calibre, artisan, and persons of every profession. One long street, every step a study, every object of the domestic purposes of the copper vases used for the purpose of water; another, where the inhabit work, and the sounds of hammers, chisels, etc. The activity prevailing among the traders; the songs of jugglers and snake-charmers; the bright effect produced by the black faces, scarlet or green turbans, white robes or naked figures of the native, with an occasional yellow-bedaubed face, with a tall hat, like a fool's cap, of the Persian, or the sporty "wide-awake" hat of the European, all in the midst of the din arising from the thronds of so many, form a scene which, to one unaccustomed to it, is extremely attractive. The only drawback is, that with such a moving mass before one, like the colored lens in a pyrotechnic display, one is apt to get subtly bewildered, and entirely at a loss which way to turn.

In this crowded town may be seen the fire temples and other places of worship of these different sects. They are many of them quite large, and, from the richness of their domes and adjacent buildings, as well as their pretty architecture. Upon looking down upon them from the summit of the whited sepulchres, so great is the dirt.

One that I visited we entered by a court-yard through a gateway in a high wall. Immediately in front of the entrance was a building of not much pretension, except for size, about forty feet high and after a distance of twelve feet from the ground, running up in the form of a dome some ten feet in height, also high, and covered with the ornaments peculiar to this style of architecture. Various dilapidated outbuildings were somewhat after the form of man, but vastly different, and painted in the most grotesque manner. An open shed in the centre of the court-yard, but the fourth being the front wall. The floors of these sheds were covered with the sacred cattle, some of them sleeping, rolled up in a bundle of rags. Families were living in this manner, separated from each other only by a curtain of rags.

With the exception of a few groups engaged in conversation, the court-yard was entirely deserted, and no notice was taken of our examination of their premises until I attempted to ascend the low flight of stone steps leading to the entrance of the dirty smoke house.

This I was prompted upon the sanctity of this place by the entrance of unclean beings like ourselves—the mere touch of whom is pollution, or which a certain number of days is required after all the obeying energies of this scandalized community, would be indignantly said to be polluting themselves before me in the most chivalric manner, and signifying, by their expressions and gesticulations, the indignity such a pollution of the part would thrust upon them.

Straight we had been invited to the residence of a wealthy Parsee gentleman—an American in feelings although under the English flag—to witness the use of the "institution of the Dokhma or Nasuch." No wedding, no feast of any kind takes place among the Parsees without visiting this, the prime feature of the event. We had not been invited until 9 P. M.; and to pass the hours from sundown until the hour of ceremony, we were put upon the Esplanade, or "Gossip point," for the purpose of listening to the music of the band of the regimental bands. It makes little difference whether the band plays or not; just as many are collected to hear it as if it were the best.

Carriages had been provided to convey all invited guests to the Nasuch, to which we were soon brought us to the entrance of the grounds. On either side the gateway, and bordering the drive to the house, were ranged the troops of the native foot high, while through the trees shone, like stars, the monuments of the dead, on the high conical funeral read.' Mr. Brady then asked the witness what Sickles had said just before he left Lafayette Square, which fact was objected to, but was allowed, as tending to shed light upon the subsequent interview. The witness accordingly said that Sickles had said, "That fellow who has just passed me has made signals to my wife." Witness then described his endeavors to find out the truth with regard to this, Sickles's refusal to the house in Fifteenth Street; and how he discovered all that previous witnesses had sworn to. At first he understood that it was on Thursday the parties had met; but no further investigation he discovered they had not met on Wednesday. Sickles was then relieved from the charge of having met on Thursday, as he knew his wife could not have been there that day. When he heard Sickles's statement, he believed him.—Cross-examined: Sickles had been with him when he went to the house. He entered the house with him, but not with Sickles, and had written to him about his mental anxiety. Witness and Sickles drove past the house, since it was the most direct route to the more crowded thoroughfares.—Sickles was pointing out the coincidences himself.—Cross-examined: Witness had not looked at the house when he first passed it. He had not observed Sickles's countenance at this point the Court adjourned.

On Wednesday, Feb. 23, cross-examination was resumed. Did not see Sickles after he returned to the house till he was shot in it.—Sickles: Witness's manner was great noise and confusion in the house after Mr. Butterworth's arrival.—Cross-examined: Sickles had reproofs Mrs. Sickles by his inquiries.—Re-cross-examined: Sickles had not told witness that he had seen his wife's signals. Witness could not have heard him if he had. Testimony took place on Wednesday he was quite prostrated.

ALBERT J. MEGAFFEY

Was called to say what Mrs. Key, in reply to a motion, had not said that he was prepared, touching his breast-pocket. The question was withdrawn, and his objection sustained.

THOMAS J. BROWN.

From the library window to the back window of the back-room is 60 feet. The shot fired at Mrs. Key broke back window.—Cross-examined: Measured the distance yesterday. Doesn't know that she was the day of the killing.

FELIX M'CLOSKY.

By the state he saw Sickles in just after the killing, whose manner he thought he would have recognized if he could in the house. He watched him but he should kill his wife. He did not think Sickles's manner that of a man. At the Attorney-general's he looked frightened to death.—Cross-examined: Sickles was grateful confusion in the house. Sickles appeared to be crying.

JOSEPH BOTTS

Has been Sickles's footman since 10th Feb. Has seen Key since 8th. Knows Sickles. The shot in the back-room is about where it was on the day of the homicide.

Mr. Brady here announced that the case for the defense was closed.

THE PROSECUTION PROCEEDS TO ADMIT THE CONFESSION.

The District Attorney now rested and that, in consequence of the absence of witnesses delivering their testimony, the prosecution would not now make objection to the admission of the written confession. This offer, next day, was declined by the defense.

REBUTTING EVIDENCE.

JAMES F. BUTTERWORTH

Visited the house in 15th Street the second Monday after Key was killed. The room being shaded, the light which was not for, who opened one of them. Witness gave no orders for the removal of the body. Witness's object in longing to deceased were transmitted to witness. Some papers were handed and identified by witness as those found on the person of deceased. [Among these was a letter in paper produced in evidence.]

CHARLES L. JONES

Corroborated Mr. Butterworth's testimony. Had taken the deepest interest in the case, and looked up some authorities for Mr. Carlisle.

LETTERS TO COUNSEL AND A JUROR.

On Thursday, 24th, a letter was laid on the Judge's desk addressed to a juror. It was read by the juror, Judge, and counsel, who pronounced it an improper interference with the jury. A letter of similar import, but addressed to be in the same handwriting as the anonymous letter.

FRANCIS H. SMITH

Was the person who requested Dr. Miller to take charge of the papers found in the pocket of the murderer that Miller was quite self-possessed. Witness thought the Miller was quite self-possessed. Witness thought the shot was in the house.—Cross-examined: Has never seen or spoken to an insane person in his service. If he was insane he was insane enough in an action could not pick out the man from the same.

ALBERT GREENLEAF

Saw Key's papers handed to Dr. Miller.

JACOB P. KING

Confirmed the evidence of the preceding witness. Thought Key was exceedingly cool at the time of the homicide. Saw no indications of excitement.—Cross-examined: Had seen Sickles fifty times before; never saw him excited.

EDWARD M. TIDBALL.

Thought Sickles's manner at the killing rather cool and deliberate.—Cross-examined: Does not recollect ever having a similar opinion. It was not founded on the impression of Sickles's eyes was unusual on that occasion.

CHARLES SCHAUM

Produces the letter in cipher handed him by Mr. Pendleton and from a key which he had constructed. Translation of it. After discussion, the letter and translation were admitted in evidence.

WILLIAM DAW

Was one of the policemen who arrested Sickles. To the best of his recollection, who arrested Sickles. To the other the homicide. He found Sickles in the parlor and library with his face upon. Heard no groans or sobs. Sickles said his whole party was broken up. Witness's manner and behavior both seem. This evidence was confirmed by the other policemen, Lynch, Hall, and Smith.

J. H. M'BLAIR

Went to Sickles's house after the shooting. Heard no unusual noises. Butterworth asked for brandy, and took a glass. Was not sure if Sickles took any. Sickles's face was much excited.—Cross-examined: Sickles was very calm. Witness knew Sickles's character for self-possession. Sickles has great powers of endurance. Has known Sickles eighteen years.

MAYOR BERRY

Went to Sickles's house soon after the killing. Sickles was not much feeling, spoke of his dishonored home, and their hostility for four or five months. On his way to prison he was restless, and seemed to wish to shake the crowd, from which witness dissuaded him. He evidently made efforts to be tranquil.

MRS. BRADY

Did not think Mr. Sickles was more excited than any other man would be in the circumstances. Detailed some of the conversation. He thought Sickles's manner was that of a man of honor.

Charles H. G. Lewis here produced the proceedings of Congress for 30th and 31th February.

FRANCIS H. SMITH

Is one of the official reporters of Congress; produces the MS. report of speeches made by Sickles on 25th and 28th February. The report was corrected by Mr. Sickles.—Cross-examined: Does not know at what hour Sickles spoke on Saturday. Supposes it was about 4 P.M. Does not know at what time the corrections were made.—Re-examined: Mr. Sickles voted on the 28th at the time of adjournment at 6 P.M. on Friday.

NEW EVIDENCE ADMITTED.

Some new evidence was now tendered by the prosecution. Its admissibility was argued at considerable length by the counsel and the Court, and it was finally rejected. It is understood that it was to prove the antecedents of Mr. Sickles.

THE CLOSING OF THE CASE.

Some conversation next ensued on the closing arguments of counsel, which, according to the rule of the District of Columbia. The prosecution offered to commence, and the defense to follow. The Court declined to listen witnesses for the defense. This the defense declined to do, and the case was then closed accordingly. It was two days more would be taken on Saturday morning. Counsel consented to this, and closed the points of their respective instructions.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE PROSECUTION.

If the jury believe, from the evidence in this whole case, that the prisoner, on the day named in the indictment, and in the county of Washington aforesaid, killed and slew Philip Barton Key, as charged in the indictment, and into the body of him, the said Philip Barton Key, a pair of pistols, loaded and charged with gunpowder and leaden ball, which he then and there discharged and fired out of the hands of the prisoner, and that the said deceased had entered into the prisoner's house and family, and had seduced into the prisoner's wife and had criminal connection with her, and that the prisoner, on the day of such killing, had abstinence intercourse with his wife, and that the prisoner had no reasonable cause for killing by any assault or offer of violence then used and offered by the deceased, or otherwise, and that the prisoner, in such willful and intentional killing, if found by the jury, did so in the exercise of his deliberate will, and with malice aforethought, then the jury are instructed that such killing is murder. But such killing can not be found to have been with malice aforethought, if the prisoner at the time of such killing shall have been proven to the satisfaction of the jury, by the evidence in the cause, to have been in the heat of blood upon sudden provocation.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE PROSECUTION.

First—There is no presumption of malice in this case in proof of which the prisoner has introduced evidence without the evidence that the homicide was justifiable or excusable, and the jury believe that Mr. Sickles, when the homicide occurred, believed that the life of his wife was in peril of great bodily harm.

Fifth—It is for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances of the case, whether the belief of the prisoner, Mr. Sickles is murder or justifiable homicide. (Bynum's and Marshall's, page 60.)

Sixth—If the jury find that Mr. Sickles killed Mr. Key, with the belief that the intercourse between Mr. Key and wife of the former, Mr. Sickles can not be convicted of either murder or manslaughter.

Seventh—If, from the whole evidence, the jury believe that Mr. Sickles killed Mr. Key, and that in the act of doing so was under the influence of a diseased mind, and was not conscious that what he was doing was wrong, he is not guilty of any grade of murder. (Day's case, pamphlet, page 8.)

Eighth—If the jury believe, from the evidence touching this case, the prisoner's mind was impaired, and at the time of the killing he was not conscious that what he was doing was wrong, he is not guilty of any offense whatever. (Day's case, pamphlet, page 8.)

Ninth—It is for the jury to say what was the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the killing, and the responsibility of the particular act in question—the benefit of any reasonable doubt as to the prisoner's mental condition is to the prisoner respectively as to being armed or not armed at the time.

These are the instructions which we are only other questions that may arise upon the consideration of the evidence, the whole of which is to the case in hand, as the jury. (Judge's case, pamphlet, page 30.)

Tenth—The jury are to inquire that the insanity which absolves from crime should exist for any definite period before the killing, or if it is of momentary duration, it not occurred with which the accused stands charged.

Eleventh—The jury are instructed that in the case either in reference to the homicide or the question of sanity, Mr. Sickles should be acquitted.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

The English Cabinet has decided to dissolve Parliament, and appeal to the country rather than resign. The Ministerial crisis is over. Lord John Russell and Mr. Gladstone had in his resources actively attacked Lord Derby's Government, and the latter, finding that he could not command a majority in the House of Commons, accepted Mr. Disraeli's resignation, and then asked the Queen to dissolve Parliament. The Queen has been sent to Toulon that sixty-eight vessels, which have been fitting out with great haste, will be ready to sail upon key's notice, if required. Eight vessels have also been ordered out to the coast of China.

THE IMPERIAL PRINCE.

The Paris correspondent of the Lady's Newspaper says: "The Emperor and Empress of the French, with the Imperial Prince, left Paris on the 19th in the uniform of a Grenadier so is Lieutenant of the Grenadiers, and on the first time in his three-cocked great schakot, and when raised in the arms of his august mother, the lively boy laughed with childish glee at his assumed military look. The enthusiasm and admiration of the crowd knew no bounds; and as there was a perfect sight to see the beauteous child in his military uniform—a coat of dark blue, with white facings, gold epaulettes, and hussar cap, seemingly almost too heavy for his little head."

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Express correspondent writes: "Paul Meeghy is about to leave us sooner than he had intended, family affairs calling him immediately to the United States. He has just finished playing before the Prince of Wales and Lord Derby's Government, and the Prince of Wales has sent him a present of a diamond ring, and yesterday called at his lodgings to say he may spend a few days in England, postponing his departure for a few days. Meeghy's last has been with friends and admirers may certainly look for his arrival in New York by the end of April. He is a fine, manly, and handsome young gentleman."

THE JAPANESE DOCTOR PLAYED OUT.

Dr. Velpeau, the celebrated surgeon, has announced the doors of the chastity hospital to the experiments of Yvies, the Japanese doctor, who yesterday came to Velpeau at the Academy of Medicine, in which he declares that Yvies has not kept his word, and that he has said that he is the author of the most deceptive, against whom it is the duty of all honest men to protest. Velpeau says that Yvies has not kept his word, has been against Yvies, and his race is run. The police will probably terminate all further practice of the Japanese doctor.

MR. BEED IN PARIS.

"Hon. M. B. Reed, late Minister of the United States to the Court of Syria on his return to Europe, after a visit has had an interview with General Ward, his official successor, at Beyrout. Mr. Reed will visit Paris. Mr. Reed will leave for about short a fortnight hence.

THE CONFERENCE.

A strange affair is related in the Gazette des Tribunaux. A number of Swedish and Norwegian sailors, Portuguese, was, four days ago, with his two daughters, taking a ride on horseback on the road to Berja, followed by three servants, a young man fashionably dressed, but with a long beard, with a basket of provisions. He, without saying a word, fired from a double-barreled pistol at the young man who was riding by his side, and who he continued his route and disappeared. The young man fell from his horse, and the servants, who had not the slightest suspicion, dismounted to assist him. He had been struck by two balls, one of which had penetrated his heart. He was dead when they reached him. It is not doubted that the assassin was a rejected suitor of the young girl. A letter of refusal written by him was applied to her hand, it is not known which it was."

AUSTRIA.

ATTITUDE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

An analysis is given in the Austrian journals of the Russian proposal for the Congress. He declares the Austrian Government to be found in the proposal, and regards the Congress as the means of putting an end to the Italian question by the will of Europe. He adds, should other questions be mooted, they ought to be first submitted to the Congress, and not to be settled by not strongly significations. Prussian will diplomacy. Austria will not be the first to draw the sword, but will be ready to meet any attack. The Austrian army is in a state of perfect organization—her troops will continue to march towards the frontiers. Orders to that effect have been issued, and the day has been posted in the barracks in that town:

Vienna, April 20.—The Austrian Government has hitherto let down for the field times the price of Prefect. Now it has raised the price of Prefect down for the field on the tranquility of Europe. Advance against the enemy. Prefect down seven before you. Remember the victories of 1848 and 1849—remember Novara, where a year from now, and not sooner, you will be free. Forward to Venice is Temperance, our rights forever!

ITALY.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times telegraphs as follows: "The Austrian reported order to the amount of 50,000 men gone from this city to Italy to-morrow, and in the following week a further reinforcement of 50,000 to be assembled here. A reserve corps of 70,000 men will be formed in Bohemia, and another in Hungary, and the army in Italy, and of the corps about to leave this city has been called to.

ITALY

THE POLICY OF SARDINIA.

Count Cavour has written a despatch to the Sardinian Minister at London, from which the following are extracts:

As her Britannic Majesty's Government has acknowledged the justice of many of the complaints which the Sardinian Government would endeavor to find a remedy for the evils which afflict Italy, and which threaten the peace of Europe. Count Cavour has the honor to call the attention of action in case Austria should obstain for the future from committing fresh violations of the treaties which give her assurance that it is not her intention to attack Austria. After this assurance on that subject, it is unnecessary to state that the declaration of the Sardinian Government, that the liberty of Piedmont is a danger and a menace for Austria. According to Austria, there are only two things to do—destroy the liberal institutions of Italy, or keep up her dominion over it by force. Austria has exchanged from one system to the other states of the peninsula which have not enough power to resist her encroachments, and menace the rest of people. It is the second alternative which Austria has adopted, and which she has pursued with a perseverance incalculated to excite the indignation of Europe.

"Austria, up to the present moment, has succeeded, by secret treaties with Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, and by the indefensible occupation of the Romagna which it now threatens to cause, according to the declarations of Vienna and Rome, and by the considerable forces of Central Italy, and thus binding Piedmont with a circle of iron.

"It is against such a state of things, which is not justified by the treaties of Vienna, which Europe has not ceased to protest for many years, calling for the immediate and support of the great Powers who signed the treaties of 1815.

"In such acts of things has for a long time constituted a threatening danger to Piedmont, aggravated of late by the concentration of troops and other aggressive acts on the part of Austria, which have forced the Government of the King to adopt corresponding measures of defense and precaution.

"It is proposed that this state of things should cease; that each Austrian Government in the peninsula and the Italians formally stipulated by treaties: that Austria should not attack Piedmont; that Piedmont should not carry out acts of the population on the other side of the Ticino should remain at peace with Austria, and that each attempt her to do, toward a pacific progressals calculated to bring about more completely public opinion in Europe as the Italian question and to prepare the occasion for a peaceful solution.

"But as long as one neighbors greedy round them and agitated on all the States of Europe, and both nations are armed, they can never have any real confidence in one another. The 20s and up to the Apennines, and the Austrians on the Mincio, and the Austrians on the Po, and the Austrians on the Adriatic, continually threatening our frontier, it will be impossible for us to disarm and remain in the face of the provoking and armed attitude of Austria."

THE SARDINIAN ARMY.

A Milan letter says: "A challenge and a murder was made in this city a few days ago. The challenger, near a military post, the victim being a commissary, who had insulted Russ. The challenger was provided with a knife, but not dead. Politics, however, appear to have had nothing to do with the affair. The two officers had been drinking, and were getting bombarded. The military commandant of the town was shocked at the affair, and immediately issued severe orders for sending a shower of shell and shot from the fortress on the first officer who should fight a duel. Not, struck by the will looks of the commandant, went home to bed, and did not what was going on until the next day unequal. On his return he felt convinced that the Sardinian army would not be allowed to be in a state of duelling and regimental orders. Soon after, the commanding officer was relieved."

SWITZERLAND.

ANOTHER MORTARA CASE.

A Swiss journal says: "The Appeals Court of Thurgau has just given a decision in a case resembling the Mortara case. Some years ago a Protestant child, belonging a widow, a Protestant, a Protestant child aged eleven, and a child who had been baptized by a priest in the Catholic rites. As the two children were attached to each other, and as the Catholic child was dangerously ill, the Protestant child begged that his mother thought proper to send the younger there likewise, and the mother consented. The Catholic child died, and the mother then instituted against the decision of the mother, and demanded that the child should be given up to the Protestant mother. The mother refused to do this on account of the canonical prescription which she would thereby incur the child, supporting her own view of the case on her mature. The Court, however, decided that the child must be delivered to her care; that she alone bore the responsibility of the child's salvation, and that the child had a knowledge of her duties, as she could certainly be proven. The mandate of the Court was accordingly issued, and the child was delivered to the mother, declaring that she filled the place of her husband, of whom she was the widow, and to whom she had given the rights. The mother declares, on the contrary, that with respect to confession she had no rights, and that the child was not to be brought up in the Catholic church there to receive instructions in the Catholic faith. She will appeal to the Federal Court, and in causing her child to be taught as she thought proper. The Canton Thurgau is entirely Protestant, and the Catholics incompetent to act in the matter, referred its the Assembly of the Canton of Appenzell, which is entirely Catholic and pronounced in favor of the rights of the mother. A petition is now being signed in the Canton of Thurgau to the Federal Council to appeal to the Court of Conservative advocate, and that of the Catholic managers of a Saint Gallen advocate.

PARAGUAY.

RETURN OF THE SQUADRON.

The United States steamer Water Lane, Captain Frazer, from Montevideo on the 15th of March, arrived at Quarantine yesterday.

The United States frigate St. Lawrence sailed from Montevideo on the 14th ult. for Rio Janeiro. She will sail from Montevideo for the United States as soon as she has completed her stores. The United States steamer Water is expected would be on their way home by the 1st of April. The United States sloop-of-war Preble, Commander Brinkerhoff, and the sloop-of-war Decatur, Lieutenant Commanding F. B. Renshaw, late commanded by Commodore Breese, left Montevideo for the United States. Lieutenant Renshaw reports home on account of ill health. The United States sloop-of-war Marion, Commander The Herald states has left New York for Rio Janeiro, where she steamed 14,662 miles and sailed 257 miles. Had 17,000 miles.

HOW PEACE WAS MADE.

The Post says that a private letter from a gentleman attached to the Austrian Foreign Legation received by the Harrold Lane, and dated Montevideo, March 5, 1859, contains the following interesting statement:

"Our Minister, Mr. Bowlin, has succeeded, very luckily for Corrientes, which was to be our residence; but before we could leave Montevideo we had to remain here and the rest of his party coming down, the fate having ended the revolution. We are all very glad of it, and therefore grateful that he was approached civilly and treated with consideration. The affair was managed by no such expressions as the Spanish language alone is expressive of, but by the simple and manly letter of Judge Bowlin. The last was a mere worth saying: Lopez, who is a man of sense, and who has always been kind to the Ministers of the Conscientious, who is conscientious himself in having amicably terminated, by his diplomacy, the unfortunate affair of the Water Lane, and of the war. Without our nine and eleven inch guns, however, he would not have yielded. Our Minister arrived as an attempt to bring Lopez to terms. It is understood that, by the treaty, Lopez is to pay the sum demanded, and not to interfere with the Paraguay trade, allowed to pay the sum demanded, and not to interfere with the Paraguay trade, allowed to pay the sum demanded, and not to interfere with the Paraguay trade, allowed to pay the sum demanded, and not to interfere with the Paraguay trade, allowed to pay the sum demanded, and not to interfere with the Paraguay trade, allowed to pay the money on the spot; but as the sum falls short of what was asked, the matter is referred to an arbitration, which is to be held in Washington; he appointed one arbitrator, and the United States will have the choosing a third.

There was a jollification in the squadron at Corrientes on the news of peace. Lopez sent down a fine bullock, and the officers gave a ball in honor of the occasion. Lopez is very popular, and has done much for Paraguay. He has made it respected in point for many years, calling for the burial and conquest of the great Powers who signed the treaties of 1815.

Such acts of things has for a long time constituted a threatening danger to Piedmont, aggravated of late by the concentration of troops and other aggressive acts on the part of Austria, which have forced the Government of the King to adopt corresponding measures of defense and precaution.

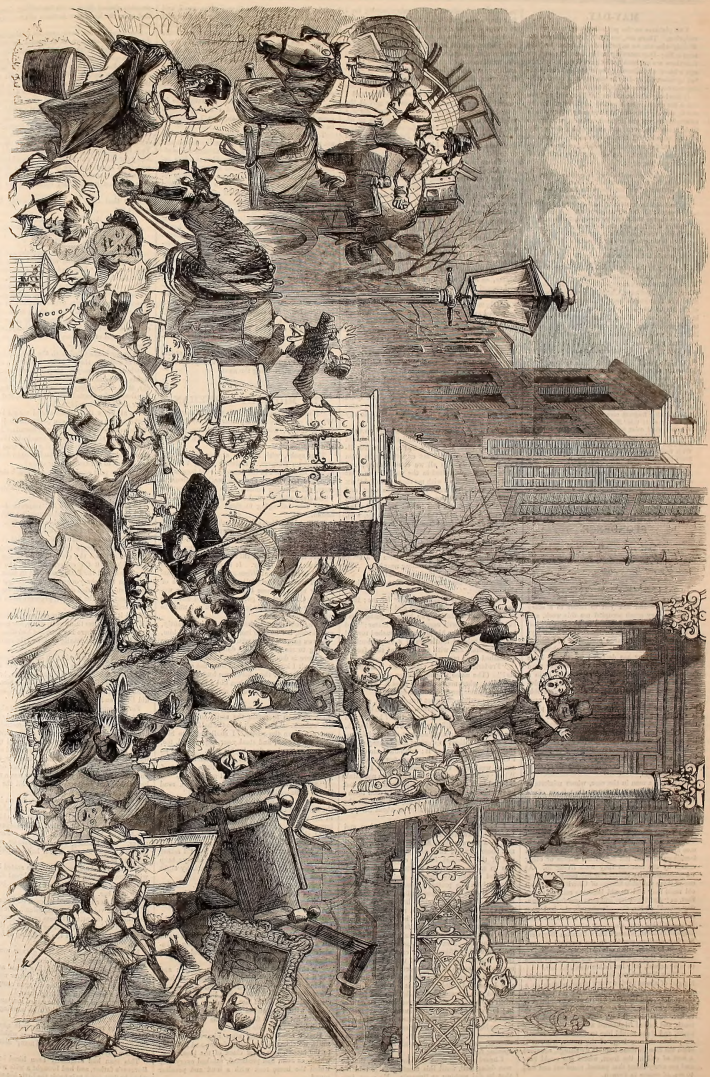
"It is proposed that this state of things should cease; that each Austrian Government in the peninsula and the Italians formally stipulated by treaties: that Austria should not attack Piedmont; that Piedmont should not carry out acts of the population on the other side of the Ticino should remain at peace with Austria, and that each attempt her to do, toward a pacific progressals calculated to bring about more completely public opinion in Europe as the Italian question and to prepare the occasion for a peaceful solution.

"But as long as one neighbors greedy round them and agitated on all the States of Europe, and both nations are armed, they can never have any real confidence in one another. The 20s and up to the Apennines, and the Austrians on the Mincio, and the Austrians on the Po, and the Austrians on the Adriatic, continually threatening our frontier, it will be impossible for us to disarm and remain in the face of the provoking and armed attitude of Austria."

THE SAD COMMANDANT.

A Milan letter says: "A challenge and a murder was made in this city a few days ago. The challenger, near a military post, the victim being a commissary, who had insulted Russ. The challenger was provided with a knife, but not dead. Politics, however, appear to have had nothing to do with the affair. The two officers had been drinking, and were getting bombarded. The military commandant of the town was shocked at the affair, and immediately issued severe orders for sending a shower of shell and shot from the fortress on the first officer who should fight a duel. Not, struck by the will looks of the commandant, went home to bed, and did not what was going on until the next day unequal. On his return he felt convinced that the Sardinian army would not be allowed to be in a state of duelling and regimental orders. Soon after, the commanding officer was relieved."

MAY-DAY IN THE COUNTRY.



MAY-DAY IN THE CITY.

MAY-DAY

THE pictures on the preceding page need no description. There are, we trust, few readers of the Weekly who are so unfortunate as never to have seen a May-Day morning in the country; and we fear there are not many who have lived to mature age without experiencing the acute and unphilosophical agonies of May-Day in the city. A more striking contrast it were difficult to imagine.

It has long been an axiom that food and rest are out of the question on May-Day in the city. Every one is moving; no one has a house; every one is miserable except the licensed cartmen, who are in their seventh heaven, and make 25*s* a day amidst the moans of the boys, who are blissful at the prospect of excitement, noise, breakages, miscellany, and confusion. An old poet has written of May-Day in the city:

> "There is a sport well-known in country-towns,
> Yclept the toilet, by which I've often joined
> At milkmaids' parties, where the honour lies
> In having risen enough for all but me.
> Who takes the middle of the happy ring,
> Unseated; till the queen, all on a chair,
> Must change their plumes: why elevation so neat
> Insure a fretful, and the centre taken,
> To give the signal for another change.
> Such is the game our city represents
> The Fleet of Joy; for such must change his place
> Uneasily if he get a seat or no."

May-Day in the country has always been a scene of joy, mirth, and pleasant feeling. In England May-Day has been a more popular festival than any either, except, perhaps, Christmas. Every one remembers Tennyson's beautiful lines to the Queen of the May. May-Day has been suppressed in parts of New England. From the time of the Puritans to the present day, the custom of "going a May-Ing," i. e. walking in the country on the first of May-Day and gathering May greens and flowers, has been kept up in the country hearts. And who's feel nay,

> "The sight in which pale April yields to May,
> How few enjoy repose! The country lass,
> Intent upon the morning walk, while yet
> Who holds her gentle heart, on various plans
> In hopeful agitation, spends the night;
> What hat or ribband will become her best—
> What most will suit the taste of her admirer—
> The blushing fragrant sweets they rise to bail.
> O, by my soul—Raptur'd love delights
> Which I shall ne'er forget, while memory holds
> Her seat within my breast. In youth's first years,
> I fervent look'd to this delightful hour
> With feelings—feelings too sacred to be paint; for then,
> Bona gratia, artless, unaffected nymph
> Was sure to be the partner of my walk;
> Among my sweetest—sweetened by that breath),
> And, without chiding, let me steal a kiss
> From lips more fragrant than the flower she held."

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Romance in Real Life—Touching Case of Distress—Slapdash Journalism—The Dying Artist—Procession of pretty Martha, etc.

Paris, March 31, 1859.

TO-DAY I feel inclined to leave high politics—the Duc de C——'s concert and Madame de G——'s ball—and ask you to listen to a story which has actually occupied me lately, and which is not without its moral and its interest—at least, for those who care for the realities of life and the sorrows of that large portion of our fellow-mortals who may be called poor, and whom our Lord and Saviour has declared we should not "always with us." That truth is stronger than fiction is frequently said, and as it may be in a great centre like Paris, where events and revelving circumstances bring about almost incredible romances and juxtapositions. A tale may read like a romance, but every word of time and place is strictly true, including but the name in fictious.

A lady friend of mine, who employs much charitable which Heaven has blessed with the best affluence in seeking out and administering to the unhappy and unfortunate, asked me, the other day, to accompany her in one of these errands of charity; for she said,

"There is a man in the case, whom misfortune has made so violent and morose that I am afraid to go by myself."

I consented; and one bright spring morning last week we left our way together toward the quartier of the Batignolles, which, from its fine air, live, for economy, many of the poorer English —a class very numerous here, composed of the non-and servants out of place, who have married foreigners or been left here from illness or other causes by the families they were with. At last we proceeded Rue K—— (for my companion was one of those noble souls who will not have her good deed maid my and should become) related to me that, as "distribution and purveyor of the Sunday-school" of Mr. G——'s church, she had been one day to the Batignolles—but I will let Miss K—— tell her own story—"which is inhabited by English children, whom I knew because they were Sunday scholars, staying in the quarter. I stopped to speak to them, when one of them said,

"'Miss, there's a gal there would like to come to your school, but her father says she is a liar.'

"They directed my attention to a pretty-looking girl of about twelve years of age, sitting on a door-step opposite, engaged with a piece of coarse embroidery, and two other little girls with her, evidently younger sisters. I crossed over to speak to her. She seemed very shy, and blushed very much, and looked frightened when I asked her her name, and if she would like to come to the school, etc., when the concierge of the house, who, as is often the case in these humble localities, occupied a sort of cell in the front, where she could hear and see every thing that passed, came out and said to me, of course in French,

"'Oh! ma'am, if you could contrive in any way to assist that family of your country people; for I fear they are in great want, and they are too proud to accept assistance from any of us. The mother died about a year ago, and the father is very ill now; often can not leave his bed, and will never get about again. They have lodged here, in two small rooms, au rez-de-chaussée, for the last two years, and there are four girls of them, the eldest of whom is fourteen, and takes care of the rest.'

"All this was poured out to me with true French volubility, and evident kindness of heart; and I turned again to question Alice, as the girl at the door had told me was named. I asked her if I might go up and see her father; who was so ill, and that I would send him a doctor.

"'Oh! no, ma'am,' she said. 'Papa would not see any one; and it made him very angry to ask him to do so.'

"I then heard another girl's voice, calling, 'Alice! Alice!' from above stairs. 'You have papa down there, and you're talking with strangers.'

"I looked up at this, and there, in a window in the roof, at the very top, over a balcony, was another girl rolling, to it, I described the outline of the figure of a man, propped in a bolster, on a large easy-chair, the speaker, and who, as the concierge informed me, was the eldest, and named 'Miss Martha.'

"Alice and the two younger girls then took their toilsome way up to their 'aërie,' and there, after some further talk with the concierge, I determined to follow them. When I knocked at the door I could hear a man's voice, loud and angry, though weak, speaking with difficulty. Alice, the young girl opened the door, and said at once, in a whisper,

"'Oh, marm, do not come here; I know you are very good and kind, but my father is too ill to be annoyed, indeed.'

"She was interrupted by the man's saying, 'Shut the door, Alice, and don't keep out all those prying pretenders to charity!'

"The poor girl obeyed, and I took my way down stairs disappointed, but more than ever desirous of being able to do them some good.

"Now this was early last month, and I heard on Sunday from some of my scholars and their neighbors that Mr. Jones was much worse, and quite confined to his bed. I have since been to see him with no-day to see if it is possible to do any thing for him.

It was agreed between us that I should go up to the door with the concierge, and that she should take in my card, and say I was sent by one of the sons, etc., etc. We did not expect success from this plan, but it was all we could devise; and while Miss K—— waited in the porter's den, the good woman talked up with me those dreadful "stairs" of about a hundred and forty feet, and heard through its ill-closed boards the man's hoarse and feeble voice, and was indeed surprised when I was asked to go in by the smiling concierge, who with an exclamation of satisfaction, went down stairs.

I entered the room, which was clean in its great poverty, to a small bed, on which lay the invalid, and from me is the wall, was the figure of a man, and a very beautiful girl standing near him. The latter, without turning its head, said,

"'Martha, go into the next room and keep those children quiet.'

She obeyed, first placing a chair for me; then the man turned suddenly round and said,

"'Are you, indeed, come to forgotten me,' but perhaps you will remember this better,' and he pulled from his pillow a pocket-book and took me a well-painted miniature of a very beautiful young woman, and with the sight of that face I knew all his story.

"'Frederick Jones!' I said, 'can it be possible!' Jones, with a sudden change of color, at first half failed, when mentioned by Miss K——, to recall any former acquaintance so much.

"'Yes,' he replied, 'I remember.' he said, stretching his hand out to meet mine. 'But she is dead,' he added, looking toward the miniature. 'And all I killed her, not willingly, but willfully though. She could not bear it on account of the children, and I was also ordered to visit you all as long as life. But God took her out of it; and now I am dying, and I am glad to see you before I go, and I am glad I am so weak now that I know it must be that. When your card was brought to me, I do not think if it had been any of my own countrymen who had known me in better days I could have seen them. But I have accustomed you to see me ill, and you liked you, and I can consult you about her poor children."

I must now pause to relate here when and where I had known this poor fellow. Many years ago, in a journey to Switzerland, I had, by my last theo Jonenes, then newly married, and who one of the loveliest faces I ever beheld. He was a young portrait-painter, then unknown to fame, and I often saw them in their small apartment, which he, poor fellow, had taken for his wife, woman always kept in good order. If he had had industry and order he might have got on, but he was careless and foolish, and, as I fear, that the money would spend it so unwisely, though there was always out of it enough to pay the rent and the prices, or an almost equally costly bouquet of hothouse flowers. Mrs. Jones was one of those angelic beings—a beauty with the disposition of all those "saints and martyrs" of which the world is not worthy, and which lets any possessor of them be asked me sometimes to expostulate with and admonish her, and I did so; but it was not of much use, and things went on from bad to worse. I left, when one autumn, about four years ago, on returning to Paris from my usual summer's absence, I found a letter from Jones, written in cheerful spirits, saying he was going to Brussels with his wife and—even then—four children, where living was cheaper, and where he thought he had a good opening for his arts.

I heard nothing more of them but once, that he was doing well in Brussels. He told me that he did nothing at Brussels. He was not the world and tried to make acquaintances who might prove patrons, but it was of no avail, and only led to frightful expense; and at last they sold off every thing, which only sufficed to pay their debts, and they came back to Paris; but their poverty and his pride made them shy of former acquaintances; and poor 'Bella' was taken away, and sorrow and despair so wore upon the husband that he fell ill, and his weak nature, that now he was dying too. When this had all been told he asked me to call him Jones for the other name, which, indeed much surprised when I said,

"I am happy to find an old acquaintance in your father, Miss Martha, and I have prevailed upon him to see a medical man, who, I trust, will be of use to him."

To finish my long story, Jones has consented to see not only the doctor, but also our excellent friend Mr. Bowman, and who has so completely pressed on him that the pride which would make him refuse assistance for his children is very jealous in the sight of God; and that he can not hope to recover his health and peace with God in a better world join his beloved and gone wife in a better world unless he forgives us and all other wrong feelings in this. The two younger children have been placed with Mrs. Bowman, who is very fond of them, and Alice remains to assist in waiting upon her father. But they are all in good hands now, and poor Jones has even consented to admit Miss K——, and delights in her gentle ministrations.

Again I say this may read like romance, but I repeat it is truth; and I have purposely entered into details which have heightened the coloring of my story, such as a description of Martha's extreme beauty. "Like her, is she not?" the poor father said to me yesterday, as he saw my eye resting upon her. We shall not leave Sally Jones long in neglect, for, as I am now in attendance upon her father is ever, put her to school in England, and in due time find her a better situation than Martha's.

But my paper is exhausted, and to my readers who are not satisfied with me this week, I promise to be more entertaining the next.

THE MIDNIGHT HORSEMAN.

"Hexter, woman, what ails you this morning? Why do you look so pale and scared?" asked Hugh Bruce, to-day, when you have seen me go and come home safe a dozen times since we were married?"

Thus spoke, with a little, a very little impatience, Hugh Burgess, a well-to-do tenant young farmer, as he stood in the door of his old homestead equipped for riding, and apparently anxious to get off, having himself to be detained by the white arms which wound about his neck, while the pretty face belonging to them hid itself in his bosom.

"What is it, Hetty dear?" asked he again, in softer tone, as a sob burst from the upon his breast.

"I don't know, John," murmured the young woman, "but I feel as if you should go. Do give it up—put it off till to-morrow, at least."

"But I can't, Hetty. It is to-day that Jones agreed to meet me at Bruce and pay for the cattle. Three hundred dollars is worth a ride of twenty miles on this hard road, surely, my woman? Come, let me go, and you shall have the best fifty out of it to do just what you're a mind to with."

"Oh, John!" exclaimed the wife, indignantly, and raising her head in her sudden sensitiveness, "do you suppose money would make me any more willing to see you run into danger, if I was sure that it then you would be safe? Besides, John dearly, "don't know that I could have not only fifty, but a hundred and five dollars, and nothing will be if I should ask for it? When did I ever want for any thing you could give me since we were married?"

"Yes, yes, and see what I got by it," replied the husband, with a smile, as he kissed his young wife's cheek. "You won't take the half loaf unless you can have the whole. I shall begin to hide my money soon, and then you will have to go up to Deacon Grodon door by his wife. Let me go and get the cattle, my darling, and you will see then if it all goes into that ugly little pocket of yours. Here's Lightfoot—now I must go."

"Stay, John. Why don't you send Tower to Bruce instead of going yourself?"

"Come now, Hetty, don't be alarming to the woods, and besides—" Here Burgess whispered in his wife's ear that the little boy who held the horse was Tower's grandson.

"I shouldn't just like to trust Tower with so much money; there is a difference, you see. Well, I don't want to say any harm of him, but I'd rather go myself than send him. Good-by, Hetty; keep up your spirits, and you'll be sure to see me back o'clock at the farthest."

"Good-by, John," said the wife, sadly. "Lightfoot's off fore-shoe is so loose I guess he'll cast it before he gets home," remarked Jimmy Tower, as he held the horse's head.

"So 'tis!" exclaimed Burgess, examining the horse's foot. "Well, I shan't go a mile before I call for the smith up there don't know any more about his trade than I do about manty-making. Tower, you're a lucky fellow this day, Clark, Jimmy, and have it at."

"I would rather have to ride by, Hetty; and you'll know whether it's no come home, without looking out, for the piggy thing will clatter enough to wake the old devil himself, like farmer Simon's rattles we heard last year down to Beston."

And with a somewhat forced laugh the farmer touched his horse's flank with the birchen wand which he held and rode away.

Hester stood looking after him with a faint smile, watching his retreating figure, and listening to the receding sounds of his clear voice, which, as John had predicted, marked every step which the horse took with a loud and peculiar sound.

Soon the smile faded quite away, and an expression almost stern, in its foreboding gloom, settled upon the handsome features of the young woman.

She strained her dark eyes to distinguish the figure of the horseman as he passed between its scattered trees, which marked the outskirts of the forest surrounding her on three sides. But the progress farm had been cleared of its primeval oaks and chestnuts by John's father, and was still one of the outposts of civilization. Bruce, the nearest town, being ten miles away, through a dense forest, unbroken by any settlement of man's habitation, saving where, in its very darkest depths, a few charred and half-consumed logs, a yawning cellar, and a few fruit trees, marked the memorials of a little cabin which had once been the pleasant home of a young Canadian family named Jones. To it he had brought a fair young wife; but in its first year of their marriage, the husband being absent, leaving the young wife quite alone in a forest, and while yet unable to stir hand or foot the house took fire, and mother and child perished in the flames.

Since that time the place had borne an evil name; for "Over all there hung a cloud of fear.

A sense of mystery the spirit daunted,
And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
'The place is haunted!'"

Lonely travelers told tales of groans and shrieks heard on the forest-trending midnight air, and some told of seeing a white figure flitting on clothed in a winding-sheet among the dank trees.

Rumors are called superstitions. Perhaps they are so. Perhaps they are but the distorted and ill-reported lives, with the grand mystery of nature ever pressing on their senses, and the solemnities of the unknown in their hearts, they grew to perceive and understand more of the hidden phenomena and secrets of life than the more practical of their associates.

Their souls are filled with the thought-tremendous of solitude, their minds are ever in a state of watchful expectancy. They are surrounded by sights and sounds unheeded by the rest of man-kind, they, if thus they see and hear and feel what dwellers in the town know nothing of, and do but marvel at what is told to them.

We all know that supernatural means beyond mere nature, but who can tell the limits of nature's power—who can draw the boundary?

And who should hope to penetrate the ings around us more than those who live in the deeds among her lonely haunts, who lies upon her heart and listen to her mysterious voice?

But if he tells again the secrets which she whispers him, mean shake their heads and say,

"Nay, that's impossible—that's what he's superstarved."

So no one came forward to "improve the clearing" commenced by David Murdock; and as the years went by the forest slowly, surely regained possession of its ancient freehold.

Only with the timid shrinking of wild creatures from whom man has taken their home, a belt was the trees avoided the close vicinity of the ruined hut. They let the cellar, the well, the broken chimney-stack, and the fruit trees be as they were, had been the poor young wife's flower-garden, to be huddled and matted with weeds in the early days of autumn, and the pensive, graceful forest flowers of a Northern summer.

Hester, a tall and dreary spot, and as such did Hester Burgess think of it, while, her eyes fixed upon the path where her husband had disappeared in the forest, she mentally reviewed the road which he must travel.

"He might hide in that old cellar and shoot him down without his ever knowing who did it," murmured she. "I could perhaps overtake and overtake the house and busied herself with her domestic business; for though young, Hester was a notable housewife, and had been accustomed to the wifely labors of a farmer's ménage.

Still, hour succeeded hour, and she might, not an hour of that long summer afternoon passed in which she did not glance more than once at the old black clock in the kitchen, or listen for the distant tread of the low-browed kitchen, ticked out its "Forever, never," with a dreary, monotonous, ringing through Hester's brain like a half-comprehended warning of evil.

Her active labors concluded, she seated herself with some sewing, and then, for almost the first time in her life, a sensation of loneliness began to creep over her.

She held her breath and listened for some sound of life, some footfall to break the solemn note of time, and through the utter stillness came a heavy moaning sound, which, with a feeling of fright, the lonely woman recognized as the throbbing of her own heart.

Said Mariana in her mossted grange was mees alone, more heart-sick in her loneliness.

The hours passed slowly, the sun rested and yellow upon the kitchen floor, and Hester went and sat down in its midst, feeling a vague compassion for the poor lonely wife left behind.

Then going to the door she gazed long and earnestly down the road on which no moving thing was visible.

Her eyes returning from their vain quest, fell upon the cabin, a few rods distant, in which dwelt Job Tower, her husband's "hired man," alone with his little boy.

This man had originally been hired by John Burgess's father, and had brought a wife with him from whom he was separated by the little house which his employer had helped him to build; but she had died several years before Hester had been brought home a bride, and the desolate condition of the mother and son was a frequent subject of compassion to the kind-hearted young wife, although the gloomy misanthropic character of the man, and his sullen sidelong manner, were more calculated to excite aversion than sympathy.

Now, however, Hester felt that she should have been glad to see even Turner, for she was fast yielding to that panic of nameless terror, in which one flies headlong, with curdling blood and stiffening hair, to seek in human companionship solace and protection from he knows not what horror of solitude.

But the little cabin was as silent and deserted as if no one had entered it for weeks. Even Jimmy had gone on some secret expedition to the woods.

Hester with a sigh returned, and seating herself in the patch of sunlight that streamed through the open door, began to sing the sacred hymns to which her musical education had been restricted, but after a few notes her voice quavered and died away. She cast a timid glance about her, her work slid from her fingers, and, rising precipitately, she shut the door on house and life exclusively as if she feared to arouse a sleeping enemy.

Nor did she draw breath till she stood at some distance from the house, upon the soft green turf, with nature at least for a companion.

Here she remained, while, as the sun was setting, Jimmy entered the clearing by the Bruce road, driving the oxen before him, and a few moments later Tower appeared, coming from the opposite direction.

Hester walked forward to meet the boy.

"Did you see any thing of Mr. Burgess, Jimmy?" asked she.

"No'm, I only come a little piece along the road; the pesky critters strayed inter the timber, and I had to hunt after 'em. Hallo, there's Tower!" continued the boy, as Tower, approaching from the opposite direction, came up with a quick footstep.

"I say, dad," called Jimmy at the top of his voice, "hain't you shot nothin'?"

"No, blast ye," replied Tower, showing his teeth like an angry wolf, and muttering curses and blasphemies as he strode into his own hut and slammed the door.

"Wo-al, ye needn't be so mad, old man. Guess 'twan't my fault if you hain't!" quietly added the boy, after a surprised stare at the closed door. "I heerd the gun go off," continued he, addressing Hester, "an' heerd it twice—guess he missed his shot, and that's what's ridd him so. Don't you?"

"I can't tell, Jimmy," replied his companion, who, though surprised and somewhat alarmed at the violence which had replaced Tower's usual sullen gloom, did not think it proper to discuss his conduct with the boy.

Mentally resolving to beg her husband not to leave her again alone with such a surly companion, she dismissed the subject from her thoughts and, with cheerfully,

"I will help you milk to-night, Jimmy. It is late, and I don't think you can get through your work before dark."

"I can call dad," said the boy with a mischievous grin.

"No, no," replied Hester, quickly, and glancing apprehensively at the closed door, "let him be quiet, tired, I suppose, and you'd better not disturb him. I like to milk."

The boy made no further reply, and the task was completed in silence.

Jimmy carried the foaming pails into the kitchen, and then ran over to his father's house.

Hester felt inclined to ask him to stay with her, but a disinclination to even her vague terror kept her silent.

Glancing at the clock, she saw by the feeling light that the hands were on the stroke of eight.

He said he would be here by eight at the farthest," muttered she, going to the door and looking anxiously toward the forest, where the black shadows of night were already gathering.

No one was in sight except Jimmy, who returned slowly toward the house.

"Dad won't let me in," said he, rather sheepishly. "He says he's gone to bed sick, and won't get up for no one."

"Never mind, Jimmy, you can stay with me," said his mistress, very cordially. You can sleep on the settle in the kitchen, and I will make a nice bowl of the new milk for your supper."

Jimmy's face brightened as he entered the house, where he soon sat down to the promised repast. Various rustic dainties were also set out to refresh the traveler, who he should have said in the half past eight every preparation was concluded, and the boy unanimously obliged to light the candles, which she had deferred doing till the last moment, as the very act seemed at once to convert lingering day into fearful night.

Another half hour, and Jimmy was sound asleep in his extempore bed upon the settle.

Slowly and tearfully the young wife put away the untasted supper, and restored the kitchen to its usual nightly order.

Then, with the chilliness of sorrow and loneliness, she seated herself and gazed alternately on the bright depths, while unnoticed tears as bright, and well-nigh as scorching, fell silently upon her folded hands.

Sitting thus, she dreamed over the two short years of her married life. She recalled the loving words and tender caresses which were ever on her husband's lips and in his heart. She thought of the manly strength and beauty of which she was so proud. She thought of the protecting care ever enveloping her, and shielding her from every hardship and fatigue, even such as she had been accustomed to in her girlhood.

She murmured over the endearing phrases with which he had welcomed her to her new home, and blushed as she repeated them.

The clock struck ten.

Hester started.

"Oh, he will not come to-night!" whispered she, in a despairing tone, and the tears fell so thick and fast that she could hardly see the verse in her little Bible, which she read as she had done every night since she was a child.

Generally she read it aloud, but to-night there was no one to listen, and the only sound which broke the stillness of the night was the deep warning-note of the old clock.

Hastily covering the fire, Hester went into her bedroom, and after one hasty unkneeling gaze out into the night, now lighted by a moon nearly full, she sought her lonely couch and tried to sleep.

But in vain. Her eyes would unclose and steps aloof, and Hester Burgess, whether leaving restlessness to ride to side, or lying motionless, sometimes could not for one instant lose her consciousness of that lonely forest road, that desolate ruin, and the unarmed traveler who must traverse the one and thread the other.

She recalled all the stories she had heard of mysterious sights and sounds haunting that deserted clearing, and though she had been wont, in the gay incredulity of youth, to laugh them to scorn, she could not do so now.

The night was cold.

Eleven o'clock, and twelve, tolled solemnly from the old clock, and Hester, exhausted by emotion and sleeplessness, started half into life with an uneasy sleep, when suddenly her eyes flew open, and she started upright in bed.

She had heard the sharp tret of a horse, mingled with the click clack of the loose shoe, by which her husband had ever been known to ride.

She jumped up and ran to the window.

Nothing. No one. Only the dusty road sleeping in the white moonlight. Only the dark forest rustling softly in the midnight air.

It was a dreamy fancy, surely! Hester, with a sigh, and sadly lay down again.

But the light had been once broken, would not return. She lay wide awake, her eyes fixed upon the patch of moonlight silvering the uncarpeted floor.

Hark! Yes surely, now it is no dream. It is a horse, and no horse but his.

Click, click, click.

Rising upon her elbow, Hester listened breathlessly for several minutes. The sound approached—was close at the door.

Springing from her bed, the young wife pushed back the bolt of her husband.

She stood upon the threshold. What! No one in sight!

Nay, but this time she was certain. She was certainly awake—as certainly heard him.

Click, click, click. Close at the door, and gazed with eager inquiry along the road which lay before her, quietly reposing in the moonlight.

She traced every foot of it; even to the spot where it was absorbed in the dark rustling forest.

Nothing, nothing.

With pale compressed lips, with dark dilated eyes, with disordered hair, and form which the night had been mid-winter, Hester turned and gazed about her.

Was there perhaps he had been dismounted; but no, the door was closed and fastened on the outside.

Perhaps he was hiding somewhere.

"It is a cruel jest," thought Hester, and yet the pale face grew whiter, and the lips quivered again.

Unmindful of her naked feet and scanty dress, she ran to look behind the house, behind the bench, behind Tower's cabin; she even raised her hand to knock upon his door and ask his aid, but a feeling of shame withheld her.

Had any lonely traveler have seen her thus gliding about with her wild eyes drapery, her dark floating hair, her wild eager eyes, her bloodless cheeks and lips, he might indeed have gone away convinced that he had seen a midnight spirit.

The search was fruitless. All lay quiet in the recess of the dwelling, in the shadow, and in the moon, which had seen the whole, yet could return no answer to the piteous, questioning glances which Hester cast upon her face, behind the bench.

Opening a window which commanded both the road and the dwelling, and which she had purposely left at it, determined to watch till morning or her husband should arrive.

She leaned on the chill of her dank night-dress soaked with the heavy dew; she heeded not the wound which she had inflicted on her naked foot and ankle. She felt, she thought, nothing. She looked, and listened.

Hark again! After in the forest, what is that faint sound, scarce louder than the rustling of the midnight air among the dark leaves, yet coming nearer and nearer?

She held on the chill of her dank night-dress soaked with the heavy dew; she heeded not the wound which she had inflicted on her naked foot and ankle. She felt, she thought, nothing. She looked, and listened.

Hark again! After in the forest, what is that faint sound, scarce louder than the rustling of the midnight air among the dark leaves, yet coming nearer and nearer?

Surely this is no delusion. It is the well-known sound of her husband's horse. She could swear by it that peculiar sound which was to be to her a token that it was none but he.

It has left the forest. It sounds hollow from the little bridge across the brook—it approaches—by Heaven it is he!

She dashes the hair back from her brow with both hands, and gazes fixedly out into the night.

There upon the dusty road in the weird moonlight—there rustles the dark forest: only this, and nothing more.

Nearer and nearer, louder and louder. He has left the road, and is approaching the little knoll upon which the house stands. The steps are faster now upon the grass—indeed could scarce be heard were not her life dependent upon them.

Hester rises stiffly and mechanically from her chair, and goes forth to the open door.

She stands upon the grass waiting for the message which that unseen horseman is bringing her.

The faint footfalls are here—they pause an instant at her side, and Hester feels herself enveloped as it were in a mantle of icy air.

Then the steps pass slowly on, and finally cease at the door of Joe Tower's cabin.

A confused noise, as of rousing as the levin-bolt darts through Hester's brain.

Without hesitation, yet still with that half-paralyzed movement, she glided across the grass and pushed open the door of the cabin.

In the centre of the floor stood Joe Tower, completely dressed as if for flight. At his feet lay a bundle, and his trembling hands grasped a gun with terror deprived him of the power to raise. His eyes were fixed upon the door with the wild glare of a tiger at bay.

They gazed intensely at each other for a moment —each read the other's mind.

Then, close beside her, Hester heard the sound of the horse's feet as he began to retrace the road by which he had come.

Without a word, or sound, she extended it toward the cowering wretch before her, while her stiff, white lips hurriedly whispered

"Come!"

Reluctantly, as if impelled by an irresistible force, the man rose, and, still followed her down the moonlit road toward the rustling forest.

Close together they passed to the ear, invisible to the eye, went the measured steps with their monotonous accompaniment.

On, on, across the bridge, beneath the scattered trees, in under the black shadow of the forest where moonlight scarcely pierces through, and the only guide is the tread, is that fearful round.

Mile after mile is passed, the trees grow thinner, again the moonlight flows down upon the path. It is Murdock's Clearing.

They have reached its centre; the steps pause not, but, turning from the road, approach more slowly, more markedly, the ghostly ruin.

Hester's eyes dilate, her lips quiver, some behind her the terror-stricken man, still compelled by that unseen, invisible power.

They have reached the lonely well. At its brink the footsteps suddenly cease. They have done their work, they have reached their goal.

Hester bends over the black depth before her. At first she sees only the dark unmeaning waters beam, which has been stealing down the slimy side, reaches the bottom, and flickers uncertainly upon the pebbles.

It shows the green coating of the stagnant pool broken and disturbed. It shows a cold white hand, crisped in death's agony, gleaming above the black water, as if raised to heaven in a demand for vengeance.

The woman does not shriek or start.

Slowly she raises her head, fixes her stern haggard eyes upon the murderer's face, and silently points to the depths below.

He stood, paralyzed by those accusing eyes, the sun approaches and gazes downward.

His sex, he utters a hoarse cry of horror, and wildly tossing his arms, he bounds and plunges into the gloomy depth, whose black waters sullenly close above him.

Hester remains a few moments, her arm outstretched, her eyes fixed upon the spot where horror had stood, then, turning away, she seated herself upon the broken door-stone, fixed her eyes upon the well, and there, motionless, silently waited patiently while the ghastly moonlight faded, while the dusky shadows of the morning twilight poured out of the forest to greet Night's pale foe, the coming sun rose and shone upon her desolation.

There she was found by those whom the boy brought to seek for her.

As they approached she rose quickly, and pointing to the well, said calmly:

"They are there—John and Tower. I don't know what they have done with the gun, but they're here somewhere, too—in the cellar I think. But he has a hoe keen: you will hear it as he walks the dark, dark floor."

They carried her to her father's house, and her weeping mother received her as one who had been torn from childhood, and tenderly nursed her there.

They never looked to see her rise again; but youth and health are sometimes cruelly strong to linger, and so one who herself had suffered once said, bitterly,

"It takes a great deal to kill a woman."

Hester Burgess arose from her bed, and lived several and sad sixteen years; but no smile ever warmed those cold lips, no light ever beamed in those colorless cheek, or stirred the depths of those dark abstracted eyes.

She lived, but it was in the past.

Silent, awe-stricken men drew from the depths of that lonely well the bodies of the victim and the murderer.

In the pocket of the latter was the miserable sum for which he had sold body and soul. A scrap from the breast of the murdered man was taken a bullet which fitted Tower's somewhat remarkable gun.

John Burgess was laid with his fathers in the village church-yard.

Joe Tower was buried in the ruined cellar, where, probably, he had laid in wait for his victim; and so short was the time between the murder and the burial, the spot that a new road was laid out through the forest, and Murdock's Clearing was abandoned to the gloomy and mysterious with whom the popular voice peoples such spots.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

THE FLOWER-GARDEN.

WHILE our extensive ornamental shrubs, if judiciously disposed, add greatly to the picturesque decoration of the flower-garden. Truly gardeneque effects are obtained by a skillful arrangement of the plants, filling out the beds avoid monotony, but do not fall into the error of incongruous combinations. Consider well agreeable combination and variety.

When rock-work finds a place in the flower-garden the earthen-filled with earth should be furnished with trailing plants, which are so numerous as to form endless diversity. Among these plants the ivy-leaved geranium, the ever-blooming verbena, cactus-fly, interspersed with violets, daisies, etc.

A walk arched over with wire, or other suitable material, and covered with climbing plants, affords a beautiful passage-way protected from the sun's heat.

The dwarf Dutch box makes the best and neatest edgings. It may be planted in spring. Grass edging is not desirable, because it is so difficult to keep it in order. Sea pink, stone crop, and many other plants, are used for this purpose, but none are so popular as the dwarf box edging.

Excellent gravel-walks and soft, velvety green turf add greatly to the elegance and beauty of the flower-garden. But we do not recommend them because of their wetness in dewy and rainy weather. Some very fine walks are made of cedar saw-dust sound on the sea-shore. A turf of coarse grass or a vile weed on a gravel-walk is as unsightly in the flower-garden as a wart on the cheek of beauty. An application of salt will kill weeds and moss.

The best plan of turf is that cut and layed as long out often; it ought to be mowed at least once in every two weeks, otherwise it will not be close and velvety.

Every lady who cultivates flowers should have a couple of rakes: one with iron teeth the other with coarse teeth; also a light spade and fork to take up bulbous roots, a hoe, watering-pot, and trowel for transplanting. A hand-glass is convenient. A small trowel will be necessary when removing delicate plants. A sharp pruning-knife is indispensable. A lady when working in the garden should wear an apron of stout material, having full-sized pockets in which she may carry pieces of string, pruning-knife, slips of cloth, and as occasion may require, other articles. A stout basket with a pair of shears in good order will be wanting to trim privet, box-edgings, etc.

Particular care is to be given to the plants when putting them in place, otherwise small flowers may be lost and shaded by large ones. The plants are to be viewed as a picture, the varying colors of which come and go with the kinds of plants cultivated. Thus the garden is a proper illustration throughout the grounds of the Flora of May, June, July, August, etc., these months are usually most showy, while the flowers may be in compartments; however well mixed colors may be, pleasing contrasts are lost when the flowers are not arranged so as to set off apart. Lists of flowers, specifying colors, altitude, time of flowering, etc., are given at seed stores, will be very useful in deciding what should be planted and the proper time for planting.

In the ornamental flower-garden plant, rigid to the native of Germany, although sometimes found in a wild state in Britain, is the best of all plants for its fragrance and beauty. It is not very easily cultivated. Layering is the usual mode of propagation. The most common and showy carnations are grown in pots, and the hardier ones simply in beds. Sweet scabious, which often finds a place in the boudoir, should not be forgotten; also the wild violet, which is most fragrant in spring. The primrose has many varieties, and is a favorite of the rich—while not wholly neglected in them of the poor—the latter, from the difficulty of the difficult successful culture. It delights in a moist soil and shady situations, and may be propagated from seed, by offsets, and sometimes forced by dividing the roots. The dahlias, one of the principal ornaments of autumn flower-gardens, and of which there are endless varieties, is said to be native of Mexico. The large tuberous roots are divided in the spring before planting-out-time. Each portion of tuber must have an eye. New varieties are raised from seed. The dahlia delights in rich loam, and a free circulation of pure air.

In the autumn the roots should be taken up, dried, and kept in a dry place free from frost. They are started in spring in leaf mould, on a hot bed, or wanted early. There are many species of the lily, charming flowers for the garden. Do not forget the iris and hyacinth. The beautiful lupin is a native of the Levant, and is very much cultivated in Holland during the last century. It is also best in light, rich, sandy soil.

Annual and biennial plants are easily cultivated. They may be sown where they are to bloom, kept free from weeds, and thinned out occasionally.

HARDY ANNUALS.—Some of the hardy annuals are as follows: The Chinese Aster, Candytuft, Mignonette's eye, China Aster, Lupine, Morning Glory, Cypress Vine, Balsam or Lady's Slipper, Nigella, Clarkia, Venus's Looking Glass, Bird Flower, Portulaca, Marigold, Petunia, Pansy, Verbena, Sweet Sultan, Sweet Pea, Larkspur, Lobelia, Nasturtium, Love in a Mist, and Fibox Drummondii, which is one of the finest.

HARDY BIENNIALS.—Hollyhock, Foxglove, Bees Campion, Scarlet Lychnis, Delphiniums.

HARDY PERENNIALS.—Columbine, Monkshood, Rose, Holyhock, Pansy, Pilox, Dilytra, Iris, etc.

Dr. A. Reid, whose gardens are in Fourteenth Street, writes us: "The D. Spectabilis is one of the most valuable plants in the whole collection of hardy herbaceous plants lately introduced, and no flower-garden should be without it."

Extensive Dahlia Growers.—Dahlia, of which there are numberless varieties, Iris, Everlasting Pea, Peony, Gladiolus Tuberose, etc.

For more extensive lists see Florists' Catalogues.

CLIMBING PLANTS.—Ivy, Honeysuckle, Wisteria, Trumpet Flower, Virginian Creeper, Climbing Rose, Honey-suckle, etc.

For bulbous effects we would ask attention to what are called bedding out plants, protected in green-houses or pits during winter, and then planted in the garden in spring. Among these we would mention Verbenas, Fuschias, Monthly Roses, Heliotropes, Feverfew, Salvia Splendens, et cetera.

CROP NEWS.

W. C. WHY, Athens, Tennessee, writes us: "The prospects of the wheat crop in Tennessee never were more flattering than at the present. An unusual quantity was sown last fall, and up to this time it has shown signs of an abundant crop."

We sincerely hope farmers throughout the country will send us news about the crops.

SUNDAY MORNING.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TEMPUS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER IX.

A LEE-SHORE.

THE door opened, and Hope Wayne entered. Mrs. Sincoe turned and looked at her without speaking. Hope's face was very grave. At length she said, as if with a repressed sob,

"Aunty"—she always called Mrs. Sincoe by that name—"I have just seen grandfather."

Mrs. Sincoe made no reply but her kind, sober eyes were fixed on Hope's face.

"He sent for me, Aunty."

She stopped and looked at Mrs. Sincoe. That lady did not ask "What for?" she said only, "Well."

Hope stood erect before her, looking at her with half weary eyes for a few moments and then burst into tears.

"Oh, Aunty! I shall die if I stay in this place. I see nobody but grandpa and Dr. Peewee and the ladies who come to make stately calls. I know nobody. I have nothing to do. I am sick and sad and dreary. What shall I do? what shall I do?"

"My dear," replied Mrs. Sincoe, calmly, "have you not every thing you want?"

"Of course not, Aunty; you know I haven't."

"What do you wish that you do not have, my dear?"

"Society," stoutly replied the student of the loves of Conrad and Medora.

After a short pause Mrs. Sincoe repeated the word "so-ci-e-ty" in a prolonged way, as if she were tasting it—analyzing it—trying to discover what on earth such a word meant. "So-ci-e-ty," she repeated in a musing, absent manner, as if she were saying by rote and curiously a word in some foreign tongue.

"Why, yes, Aunty: society, why not?"

Mrs. Sincoe looked at her young companion with the same unchanging expression, and asked, at length,

"What is society, my dear?"

"Why, Aunty, what a question! You know as well as I. I mean young people. I want to see people as other girls do, and not be shut up in this old house like a prisoner in a tower."

"Well, Hope, don't you see the Misses Larkin, and Mrs. Ringo, and Miss Brandbrai, and the Suthers, and Lawsons, and—"

"Yes, yes, I see 'em all when I go visiting or when they come here. But I don't mean that. I mean young girls and—and—I mean young people," said Madame Hope, half blushing, and quite angry with herself when she remarked that Mrs. Sincoe's eyes were ruthlessly fixed upon the exquisite carnation that came flooding her cheek, which at that instant had all the creamy richness of the most rosily tinted shell.

"Very well," said Mrs. Sincoe, unchangeably, "there is your cousin Alfred."

Why did Mrs. Sincoe so suddenly change the sex of the so-ci-e-ty of which she was speaking? Hope had not done so. Hope had said nothing of Alfreda, or Henry, or other names which do not belong to young people of her own sex.

"Cousin Alfred!" said she, with a short laugh. "Alfred Dinks! There's society! There's company for a solitary young woman! There's a fine hero who comes to Pinewood, and devotes all the time to the heroine that he doesn't give to the dogs! Why, the last time he was here he found me one morning in the library reading. 'What on earth do you find to read, Cousin Hope?' says Master Alfred Dinks!

"I never do. I never read any book in my life but Botts on Dogs; and away he went, as if he had said something good. Alfred Dinks is society for my dog Tib and for me. And the youth thinks he got his reward when he said that; and when he went to Europe, had been to Europe; had been presented in London; had known a young baldhead in Paris; had seen a steeple-chase in Rome, and brought home six inexpressibles from Vienna, each superbly colotted by his own smoking. The world was a squeezed orange to Cousin Alfred Dinks, who had read Botts on Dogs.

"My child, what can I do for you?"

Hope shook her head.

"It is right that we should want companionship," said Mrs. Sincoe, dear, but I know that it is natural for young women to dislike to be lonely. And yet, Hope, society may be worse than solitude."

The face with which she said these words was unspeakably grave. It columns were full of expression, if Hope could only have read it. But she looked at it as men look on Egyptian obelisks, hieroglyphed with hidden lore.

Hope's heart sank again.

"My dear, it seems very hard to you now, but you will not always—perhaps you will not long remain here. We can not foresee change, but we know not what is best. Be patient, Hope. You will have what you wish quite as soon, perhaps, as you will be ready for it. And be better go down now, dear."

Hope turned and left the room. She ran down stairs, and through the conservatory at the back of the house into the garden. Wayward as the evening breeze, she flew to a pine-tree that skirted the lawn, she roamed aimlessly here and there, but with the same quiet dignity that made her, in the eyes of the dogs—as inaccessible as a nun to the boys who went to church to worship with Mrs. Sincoe's father—no mother. She lived alone in a great country-house with her grandfather, and a nurse who was also housekeeper, who had had teachers at home—recluse old scholars, decayed clergymen in English days—who had taught her Latin, and looked at her through round spectacles, and, as they looked, remembered they were once young; and dancing-masters, teachers of history, of grammar, of arithmetic —of all English studies. Every one of these tutors were week-eyed fathers of ten children, who spoke so softly that their voices must have had loud voices; others were young college graduates, with low collars and long hair, who read with Miss Wayne in English literature, and Mrs. Sincoe sat knitting in the next chair. Then there had been the Italian music-masters, and the French teachers, very devoted, very missing a lesson, but also never missing Mrs. Sincoe, who presided over the instruction which was imparted by any Mentor under sixty. Old Christopher Dunn had in his mind daily to one thing: that Miss Wayne should enjoy every advantage that his money could buy for her, in order that she might, at her majority, restore to Mrs. Sincoe, properly grace the head of her husband's table.

But of all her teachers the young student preferred Lord Byron, who occupied a permanent situation upon the library shelf, and whose lessons the docile pupil learned by heart. The world that it described was unreal, proud and sure, it will find in books, in imagination. And if it try to realize that world in life when experience has been added to the works, are at the celebrated manufactory of Sirves and no difficulty will be found in detail, in moulding the porcelain into the loveliest shapes, and in fashioning it to the most exquisite touchy. The artist will work with enthusiasm and care those delicate tints that ravish the eyes of the connoisseur, as they do not, and are enchanted by the hues of spring. Nothing is wanting. The porcelain itself seems to conspire with the art that it precious, with the skill of the artificers, with the pallet of the painters. The imperial manufactory is the whole with satisfaction. He sends the most beautiful services to his trusty and well-beloved cousins, who are kings, emperors, princes, hereditary grand dukes, and serene potentates of every degree, and who are called by the grace of God to rule other countries precisely as he is called to rule his.

Did you ever hear of a grandpapa who took the Sirves view of the world, of education, and of young women? Are human clay to be so exquisitely modeled, beautifully painted, to conspire with every art that develops and adorns —and then: "My dear imperial contemporary and correspondent, permit me to offer you the accompanying cup, perhaps the finest specimen of our workmanship on record, for your illustrious son, grandson, or heir to drink his tea from. It is so transparent that you can look through it. It is so delicate that the jar of a breaking sigh would cause your grandson's guitar will stir it. Such ware, I need not add, is not to be purchased—fortunately, like the rarer Rhine wines of our excellent cousin, the Duke of Nassau. And so, right trusty, farewell."

Hope Wayne, of all her teachers, preferred Lord Byron; and as she walked restlessly about the garden she almost unconsciously began repeating some of the lines that always lay in her mind, like invisible writing, waiting only for the fire of a strong emotion to bring them legibly out. As she repeated them she came in front of the house to her favorite seat upon the lawn, which sloped toward the west, in which the light was still golden, but dim—

> "Hope withers yet the spot where hope is shivered.
> And its fragments are sunk in the wave;
> Though fate shall my soul in delivered
> To pain, it shall not be its slave.
> There is many a gang to pursue
> Thy may crush, but they shall not enslave:
> They may torture, but shall not subdue me:
> 'Tis of thee that I think, not of them."

At the same moment Mrs. Sincoe was closing her window high over Hope's head; and as she looked at the darkening landscape she was singing, in her accustomed way,

> "I rest upon thy word;
> Thy promise is for me:
> My succor and salvation, Lord,
> Shall surely come from thee.
> But let me still abide,
> Nor from my hope remove,
> Till thou my patient spirit guide
> Into thy perfect love."

CHAPTER X.

TWO RICHMONDS.

GABRIEL BENNET had not been three times to hear Dr. Peewee before he entered church every Sunday with the appointment expression that the Burr carriage had already arrived, and that he had moved seeing Hope Wayne walk up the aisle. And every Sunday he was mistaken. Every Sunday the carriage was sure not to roll up until the bell had ceased tolling.

But although that was true of the last and all other Sundays, how could he be sure, when a new, bright Sunday came, that it would not be the very day of a change? The doubt, the uncertainty, the suspense, were all part of the delicious pain of his pleasure. For it had come to that. His young mind reveled in doubts. It had reached that joyous apprehension.

When a boy remembers the color of a ribbon on a girl's forehead as she sits in her pew at church, and has no recollection of the text, and only a contemptuous criticism of the sermon, profound admiration of human nature ventures a shrewd suspicion, and find themselves, by a curious infidelity, beginning to repeat Milton's Lycidas—

> "Yet once more—"

For the time and the singing of birds perpetually comes, and the voice of the turtle is heard ceaselessly in the land.

Hope Wayne was not unconscious of all the adoration she excited. If a swarm of schoolboys cries into a country church without turning all their eyes toward one pew, it is not possible that, when a girl comes in and seats herself in that pew, the rise of those eyes, turning glances, even Dr. Peewee may not entirely distract her minds, however he may rivet her eyes! Nay, is it not supposable that, as she takes her last glance at the Sunday toilet in her nursery dressing-room at home, and half turns to be sure that the collar is clasped, and that the golden curl needs precisely as it should under the brass rose-bud that flushes seductively by the side of a lovelier bloom—is it not just supposable that she thinks, for a wayward instant, of other eyes that will presently scan that face and form, and feels, with a half flush, that they will not be shocked nor disappointed?

There was not a boy in Mr. Gray's school who would have dared to dream that Hope Wayne ever had such a thought. When she appeared behind Grandfather Burt and the gold-headed cane she had no more antecedents in their imaginations than a rose or a rainbow. They no more thought of little human weaknesses and mundane influences in regard to her than they thought of cold vapor when they looked at sunset clouds.

During the service Hope sat stately in the pew, with her eyes fixed upon Dr. Peewee; nor did they close under his drowsiest exhortations. Grandpa Burt, at the head of the pew, nodded at intervals, sometimes in so desperate and undignified a manner that he recovered himself with a jerk, and then looked around indignantly and defiantly to see if any body was observing him, as people every where who go to sleep in church will do, if they are important personages in the parish. But it is always in vain; when you nod heavily the crown of dignity rolls off, tumbles on the ground, and is shattered.

Hope's eyes were fixed upon Dr. Peewee. Perhaps she did not hear what he said. Perhaps her heart did not look out of her eyes, but was busy with a hundred sweet fancies in which some one of those fascinated boys had a larger share than he knew. Perhaps when she covered her eyes in an attitude of devotion she did not thereby exclude all thoughts of the outer and lower world. Perhaps the good Being for whose worship they were assembled was no more displeased with the innocent reveries and fancies which flooded the heart than young Sunday-birds with the soft air and sweet song of birds that played through the open windows of the church on some warm June Sunday morning.

But when the shrill-voiced leader of the choir sounded the key-note of the hymn that brings his nose, and the growling bass viol joined in unison, while the congregation rose, and Dr. Peewee surveyed his people to mark who had staid away from service, then Hope Wayne looked at the choir as if her whole soul were singing; and Gabriel Bennet had a choking feeling in he gazed at her—an involuntary sense of unworthiness and shame before such purity and grace. He counted every line of the hymn grudgingly, and when the tune was half sung and repeated and prolonged—the tunes endless, by de rigueur—while the hymn that he heard a he looked at her he never forgot.

But there were other eyes than Gabriel's that watched Hope Wayne, and for many months had watched her. The clustering black hair that shook and floated along the very first lines of this story covered a brain that worked with endless schemes, as it thought of the majestic maidenhood which inspired every awe and admiration in Gabriel's heart.

Handsome, passionate, with great black eyes, brilliant color, and strong manly figure, the son of a New York merchant, who spent all his income—he spoke well sometimes to die in New York, thirty and forty years ago—Abel Newman sat in the leaders in Mr. Gray's school.

Like every handsome, bold boy in every school, he had plenty of allies—perhaps they could hardly be called friends. He was, in fact, as such boys are, a petty despot. His word made a certain kind of law. If he battled a boy from his favor, he was in a sort of disgrace. There was no formal accusation or trial, but a sentence in his elastic moral code, and that was executed.

Such reigns are like those of many kings. The subjects can easily fancy something better; but here this is, and what are you going to do? Here this is, and here, in a hundred thousand soldiers; here, a police system; here, innumerable spies; here, prisons, foreign lands, and scaffolds. On the whole, is it worth while to make a bother? Every man likes his ease. You are not permitted, indeed, to say that twice two are four. Yes; but looked at practically, is it of the last importance that you should? Is it not of more practical use to wife and family, for example, that you should quietly cobble shoes at four shillings a pair,—shillings convertible into superior rosst-beef and dyspepsia bread—into a fragrant pipeful of tobacco and a moderate glass of wine—than that you should be turned out of the country, or out of the world, for the mere pleasure of stating a proposition? If you think the statement to be true, in the name of peace—if that is what you want—think so, and hold your tongue!

Such was the rule of Abel Newt at Mr. Gray's. There was many a boy who thought with little Makeca, although, more prudently than he, he might not say it, "Abe gives me gingerbread; but I guess I don't like him!" If a boy interfered with Abe he was always punished. The boys was turned on him; there was ceaseless ridicule and taunting. Then if it was unbearable, and cause to fighting, Abel Newt was strong in muscle and furious in wrath, and the assailant was generally pomelled.

Reposing upon this easy, conscious superiority, Abel had been a favourite pupil. But they were nearly of the same age—then a few months the younger, and when the regulations of the school confined every boy, without especial permission of absence, to the school grounds, and as Abel had no acquaintance with Mr. Gray but no excuse for calling, his worship had been almost estranged. He was the more satisfied that it should be so, because it had never occurred to him that any of the other boys could be a serious rival for regard. He was also obliged to be the more satisfied with his silent dominion because newly it gained ground, for any saw consciousness of his particular observation, or afford him the least opportunity for saying or doing any thing that would favour it. If he hastened to the front door of the church he could only stand upon the steps and see his passed out she nodded to her few friends, and immediately followed her grandfather into the carriage.

There are girls enough, perhaps—or there were, a quarter of a century ago—who, from sympathy, or kindness, or some other humane and generous feeling, would at least have recognized the admiration of a rejected acquaintance for forty boys, of all ages from fourteen or fifteen to twenty-one. But Abel might have been an occasional one, at the period of which we treat, who would have indicated her preference among that host of the faithful, either by a look, a word, or an offered chance to pick up a glove or a handkerchief, or by some other of those sweet and sufficient devices which it becomes such a one to suppose unknown to every woman.

But Hope Wayne was of another kind. She knew the boys were there. From the time she was observed that none boys had arrived, their elder sons had. But how she discovered it, who shall say? For there was never one of Mr. Gray's boys who could honestly declare that he had seen Hope Wayne looking at either of the pews in which they sat. But so much is seen in this world without looking!—and so much looked at that is never seen!

THE ARMSTRONG GUN.—[AFTER AN AUTHENTIC SKETCH.]

CHAPTER XI.

HIS MAJESTY, ABEL NEWT.

ABEL had been a scholar of Mr. Gray's for several years. At a very early period of his pupilage he had comprehended his importance as a boy's instinct is as sure as that of a horse. The quadruped sly always knows when he is a safely jog on at his own pace or fling his rider, or whether he must fling his rider chooses. The biped is equally wise. He feels at once whether he can have his own head, or must yield to the bit of discipline, and acts out of character in the master. Abel careered at his own pleasure, but he had the good sense to allow nothing to be discovered to constitute that which would compel Mr. Gray to expel him. For he preferred to be Abel Newt unbalustaer rather than save his father.

"If there was ever an individual who knew Uncle Savory through and through, it is your humble—" thought Abel often, as he chuckled quietly to himself. At Christmas-time he was quite as shrewd as any body need be in this world. And shrewd he was—dangerously shrewd for a boy of eighteen. Perhaps he thought that skilful cunning was perception. Perhaps he thought that his own spectacles were only a near-sighted man to post his ledger, they also help him to study the stars. Perhaps he thought spectacles were good as tailstoppers.

When Gabriel Bonnet came to Mr. Gray's Abel did not like him. He laughed at him. He made his other boys laugh at him whenever he could. He bullied him on all occasions. He used to propose to introduce fagging at Mr. Gray's. He praised it as a specific for the spirit of the British schools, simply because he wanted Gabriel to his fag. He wanted to fling his boots at his head for Gabriel to pick them up. He wanted to send him down stairs in his shirt on winter nights. He wanted to have the honour of up in the cold mornings and bring him his breakfast in bed. He wanted to chain Gabriel to the car of his triumphal chariot through the school-life. He wanted to try to debase and degrade him altogether to the Oriental despotism of fagging.

"What is it," Abel exclaimed one day to the large boys assembled in solemn conclave in the school-room, "that takes all the boorishness and brutishness out of the English character? What is it that prevents the Britishers from being servile and obsequious—mute, I tell you, boys, unknown in England—but this splendid system of fagging? Did you ever hear of an insolent Englishman, a despotic Englishman, a surly Englishman, a selfish Englishman, an odious Englishman, a domineering Englishman, a dogmatic Englishman? Never, boys, never. These things are all taken out of them by fagging. It stands to reason they should be. If I lay my boots at a fellow's head, is he likely to domineer? If I kick a small boy who contradicts me, is he likely to be opinionated and dogmatic? If I eat up my fag's plum-cake just sent by his mamma, but, as it were, from the maternal heart, and moist with a mother's tears, is that fag likely to be selfish? Not at all. The boots, and the kicking, and the general walloping make him manly. It teaches him to govern his temper and hold his tongue. I swear I should like to have a fag!" persisted Abel, meaning that he should like to be the holy office, and to have Gabriel Bonnet delivered over to him for the purpose.

Once Gabriel overheard this kind of conversation in the schoolroom, as Abel and some of the other boys were resting after a game at ball. There were no personal allusions in what he heard said, and it was not his night to suppose that Gabriel suspected any. But he took him up a little rashly.

"Pooh! Abel, how would you like to have Gyles Blanding shy his boots at your head?"

Abel looked at him a moment incredulously. Then he replied—

"My young friend, I should like to see him try it. But fagging concerns small boys, not large ones."

"Yes?" retorted Gabriel, his eyes flashing, as he kept tossing the ball nervously, and catching it. "Yes? Well, the meanness of it: the little boy can't help himself."

"By golly, I'd kick!" put in Little Malacca.

"Then you'd be licked till you dropped, my little Sir," said Abel, sneeringly.

"Yes, Abel," replied Gabriel, "but it's precious mean for an American boy to want fagging."

Abel looked as if he should like to have the institution go into operation then and there.

"Not at all," he retorted; "there are some young American gentlemen I know who would be greatly benefited by being well fagged; yes, fagged, full of expectation of the fun, cut out of the room. The moment he closed the door Mr. Gray lifted his finger and said—

"Now, boys! every body remain perfectly quiet when I say three."

It was needless to explain why for every body saw the intended joke, and Gabriel returned instantly from the study saying that the handkerchief was not there.

"No matter," said Mr. Gray. "Are you all ready, boys. Now, then! one, two, three!"

At the word left Mr. Gray's lips, Gabriel, amidst, full of spirit, jumped up from his seat with the energy of the effort, and shouted out at the top of his voice:

"Hope Wayne!"

It was out. That name alone broke the silence, ringing out in enthusiastic music.

Gabriel's fun instantly changed. Still standing erect and dismayed, he looked rapidly around the room from boy to boy, and at Mr. Gray. There was just a moment of utter silence, and then a loud peal of laughter.

Gabriel's colour came and went. His heart winced, but not his eye. Young hearts are tender, and a joke like this cuts so deeply! He was humiliated, indignant, hurt. But most of all he was about to yield, and drop the tell-tale tear of a sensitive, young boy, when he caught the eye of Abel Newt. It was calmly studying him as a Roman surgeon may have watched the gladiator in the arena, and his old-school ethical code of Gabriel remembered Abel's words in the playground—"there's more than one kind of fagging."

When the laugh was over, Gabriel's had been loudest of all.

CHAPTER XII.

EXPERIMENTUM CRUCIS.

GABRIEL BONNET strolled away from Abel Newt's refuge of fagging to no serious affection for the orator, but with a confused feeling and stormy impression that if he was to be walked on he loosened his neck in his collar. He thought it was very sultry. "Twas only the fire in his blood, for, ah! as if he had seen a demon. So he had. He had seen the devil in Abel Newt's eye.

Before Gabriel Bonnet showed his face at Mr. Gray's Abel was rocked in the most blissful reminiscences of the morning. All ended happily. Yes; he had never spoken to her, but of course, in due season, Miss Hope Wayne shall become Mrs. Abel—

Bang! goes the sentinel's gun at midnight. The sleeping, silent camp of a thousand men suddenly bristles with life. There is not a soldier who does not spring to his feet. Bat-tery! The drums are beating. The bugles are blowing. The men have a coat in one hand and a musket in the other. To arms! To arms! The enemy are down upon us! No more sleeping! No more dreaming! Fall in! Fall in! Crack! Click! "Into the jaws of Death; into the mouth of hell!"

"Pooh, pooh!" said Abel Newt to himself, "this boy is a child! He is fifteen years old; he is three years younger than I am, or she is. He is perfectly ridiculous, of course. Besides, how do I know that the little fool cares for her in the least? Pooh! Suppose he does! What then? Pooh, I care!" said he, inwardly raging and longing to have somebody for a fag.

"The truth is, Gyles," said Abel to Blanding, "Gabriel Bonnet's mother ought to come and take him home for the summer to play with the other cock-a-doodles. People shouldn't leave their spoons about."

The two boys went in to tea.

In the course of the scholars were sitting in the dining-room, as usual, some chatting, some reading, their quiet ready to go to bed.

"Mr. Gray," said Abel to Uncle Savory, who was sitting talking with Mrs. Gray, whose hands, which were never idle, were now busily knitting—

"Well, Abel."

"Suppose we have some game."

"Certainly. Boys, what shall we do? Let us see. They've the Grand Moffi, and the Element, and My view, and Consider well—what—well, what shall it be?"

Mr. Grey, in a good while since we've tried all calling out together. We haven't done it since Gabriel Bonnet came."

"No, we haven't," answered Mr. Gray, as his small eyes twinkled at the prospect of a little fun. "No, we haven't. Now, boys, of course a good many of you have played the game before. But you, now Master Monitrie—attend! the thing is this. When I say three—one, two, three—every body is to shout out the name of his favourite book. The fun is that nobody hears any thing, because every body bawls so loud. You see?" asked he, apparently feeling for his handkerchief. "Gabriel, before we begin run and run into the study and get my handkerchief."

Gabriel, full of expectation of the fun, ran out of the room. The moment he closed the door Mr. Gray lifted his finger and said—

"Now, boys! every body remain perfectly quiet when I say three."

"No matter," said Mr. Gray. "Are you all ready, boys. Now, then! one, two, three!"

At the word left Mr. Gray's lips, Gabriel, amidst, full of spirit, jumped up from his seat with the energy of the effort, and shouted out at the top of his voice:

"Hope Wayne!"

It was out. That name alone broke the silence, ringing out in enthusiastic music.

Gabriel's fun instantly changed. Still standing erect and dismayed, he looked rapidly around the room from boy to boy, and at Mr. Gray. There was just a moment of utter silence, and then a loud peal of laughter.

Gabriel's colour came and went. His heart winced, but not his eye. Young hearts are tender, and a joke like this cuts so deeply! He was humiliated, indignant, hurt. But most of all he was about to yield, and drop the tell-tale tear of a sensitive, young boy, when he caught the eye of Abel Newt. It was calmly studying him as a Roman surgeon may have watched the gladiator in the arena. Then the old-school ethical code of Gabriel remembered Abel's words in the playground—"there's more than one kind of fagging."

When the laugh was over, Gabriel's had been loudest of all.

THE ARMSTRONG GUN.

We give herewith a section of the Armstrong gun which is just now making such a noise in England. It is very certain that of the enormous amounts of money have been spent by the European Governments in experiments for the improvement of artillery, hundreds of thousands of dollars have been thrown away in the construction of guns which have been found worthless on trial, but which in effect did nothing but burst on trial. Then the Lancaster gun, which for a time was thought to have succeeded in sending the projectiles straight; the Naumyth gun; the Palmerston mortar; the Whitworth, the Fairbairn, the Wade, and other guns were abandoned after very costly experiments. Now at last it is said that the British Government has got what was wanted.

The story of the gun and its inventor is then given by an English paper:

"Mr. W. G. Armstrong, a civil engineer of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, took out three patents in 1857-58. One was for a mode of forming guns with an inner tube of wrought iron or gun-metal, surrounded by rings of wrought iron or gun-metal shrunk on hot. The gun was also breech-loading; by turning a screw, an opening was exposed through which a shot or shell and charge could be introduced, and the screw brought all up tight again in a very ingenious way. In another patent Mr. Armstrong devised a remarkable mode of aiming a gun at night, or in utter darkness: certain observations are to be made during daylight to determine the azimuth and altitude of the object to be aimed at; and then, by means of a graduated arc, and another simple contrivance, the proper position of the gun may be ascertained at night. In the third patent two fuses are described, full of inflammable compounds in tissue paper, so that exact time that a shell shall explode after leaving the gun-barrel can be determined, and the gun-layer can become against any solid object. Now, two out of the three patents have been purchased by the British Government to the Great Seal, whereby the specifications become public property. The inference is, that the Government made an arrangement with Mr. Armstrong to provide them with superior purposes. There is also evidence that Mr. Armstrong has been commissioned to carry out and superintend in the shops and constitutes of a shell to be used with the gun; and also, a shot, to attain great range without any bursting effect. Various facts on this subject were brought before professional and engineering manufacturers; but the month of February in the present year told the public sensible that Mr. Armstrong's shot. The dignified Court Circular announced that, at the first levee of the season, Mr. G. G. Armstrong received the honor of knighthood, and was appointed one of her Majesty's engineers in a new service and of equal dignity, under the superintendence of a Rifled-ordnance Department. A day or two after, the Armstrong experiment was made that General Peel, Secretary of State for War, accompanied Sir W. G. Armstrong to Woolwich, and officially saw the gun fire his new sphere of duty. About the same time the Newcastle Armstrong Gun Co. had a large new factory in full swing built at Elswick near that town, by or for Sir W. G. Armstrong, and was prepared to turn out the manufacture of government guns, and steel and iron generally of semi-government character. Such are the facts we did not know more, or they would not tell. The whole plans has been a jubilation that a Newcastle civil engineer should be made a knight and a baronet. They enquette should have been broken through in order that the right man might be put in the right place.

Meanwhile the Government are trying hard to keep their secret. Its principles and the general dimensions are known only to the persons concerned. At Shoeburyness what they have done is kept very close, and what they know they are chary in telling. At Woolwich, the day when Sir W. G. Armstrong entered on his duties, one of his guns was ready, with all sorts of screens and contrivances for shielding it from the sight of men, and an unfortunate artist (an Illustrated contributor, possibly) was mildly captured, and, compelled to give up the sketch he was drawing. If this does not whet curiosity to the boiling point, we shall be surprised. Already the invisible powers have given some sections of what the editor believes to be the construction of the Armstrong gun."

With regard to the gun itself the Mechanic's Magazine says:

"Instead of being cast like ordinary cannon—if composed of several longitudinal pieces, like the Whitworth cannon—or of a number of circular bands, as proposed by Captain Blakely, Mr. Armstrong's gun is built up of coils of iron, each other, or, in other words, so as to 'break joint.' This system, as a matter, of course, expensive, but it gives great strength with a moderate quantity of metal. The internal steel tube is rifled in a very peculiar manner, and is screwed, like those of our breech-loading rifled guns—or being formed with an oval bore, and then twisted, like a corkscrew, or with a polygonal bore, as in the Whitworth system—so that a very close fit is secured between it and each other, no less than forty, we believe, in a gun of two and half inches bore. The object of this is, of course, usually makes of cast-iron, of about three diameters in length, and covered with shot and shell, so that it may readily conform itself to the rifled interior of the gun when forced into the latter by means of the powder. Provision for loading the gun at the breech is made by cutting a slot across the bottom of the bore, at upper side into the bore, of a sufficient length to admit the elongated projectile to be introduced, and a length of a breadth slightly greater than the diameter of the bore. The bore itself is also slightly enlarged at the point into the space formed by cutting out the slot, in order that the projectile may be readily introduced sideways, the slot, may be easily pressed forward by head or other means into the bore. In order to close the open slot, formed as after the gun is loaded, a movable breech-piece is formed to fit into it, and is furnished with two handles by which it may be moved to be lifted out and dropped into its place as required. This breech-piece has fitted to it a screw, which forms a portion of which projects slightly; so as to form a disk which, when breech-piece is fitted in its place forward, will enter the bore behind the charge, and by its expansion at the moment of explosion prevent escape of gas. The slight forcing forward of the breech-piece is effected by means of a screw fitting into a nut through the external breech end of the gun, and pressing against the rear end of the breech-piece. This screw is turned by a hand lever. The fore end of the breech-piece is bored out in the form of cones, the latter entering the copper disk, and into this bore is placed at the time of loading a disk of copper, surrounding the projecting breeding cap or plug is struck, the copper disk is forced into the cones, and the fire is instantaneously communicated to the main cartridge in the bore of the gun. Mr. Armstrong, in his first experiments, used a combustion fuse of his invention for causing the shell to burst on striking an object in front. Percussion fuses place before the time-fuse has operated. This precaution has been taken, we believe, because the Armstrong gun is fitted to ignite referred to bore. In a cylindrical case with a hollow cone, terminating from a weight or striker, by means of a pin passing through it and the sides of the case. This pin is cut or broken by the shock which the projectile receives in the gun at the instant of firing, and the striker, being thus liberated, recedes to the rear end of the case, and there remains until the velocity of the shell is checked by causing the cutlass to strike the ground. When this takes place the striker, not participating in the retardation of the shell, advances to the case, and causes a patch of detonating composition to be carried against a fixed point, which fires the composition and ignites the charge."

Chamber's Journal says:

"As to the missile actually obtained, they seem to be marvelous in range and accuracy, not in the size of the missile thrown, for that has not been aimed at. There is range of five miles having been reached—of an Armstrong shot penetrating six feet into solid oaken beams placed one behind another—of a gun so light that two men can carry it, and yet that its shot shall reach a couple of miles—and of an accuracy of flight almost equaling that of an Enfield rifle.

"The secretary of State for War has made an interesting communication to the House of Commons concerning the Armstrong guns. Compared with an ordinary gun, relatively to the weight of the shot used; that the shell is so constructed as to act as solid shot, when required, or charged shell, at pleasure; that with five pounds of powder one of these guns will throw a 12-pound shell more than five miles; that its accuracy is quite unprecedented among ordinary guns, striking at an object at eight times distance being almost an absolute certainty; and that the principle once admitted, it might be applied to guns of any heavy battering-power, as well as to those for producing great range and accuracy of flight. The new works at Newcastle are being constructed under an arrangement which gives the Government a virtual control over them.

As to the personal question, it appears that Sir W. G. Armstrong has entered into private business relations with the Government, but he has retired from the establishment at Newcastle; that he is to receive, spread over a series of years, a certain sum of money, partly as a purchase-price for the patents, partly as salary for filling the office of his new office—Chief-engineer of Rifled Ordnance."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, April 23, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been quite heavy for Breadstuffs during the week. Stocks have been moderate, yet receivers have manifested considerable hesitancy in buying, while holders generally seem not to purchase more than they immediately required. Heavy rains have prevailed in the Western States for the past week, and are reported to be general over the whole country unsettled, closing with a fair inquiry.——Coffee, Teas, Sugars, and Molasses have a better demand, as also have Hay, Naval Stores, and Tobacco ——Rice has attracted less attention, yet has been quiet, in private. The auction sale on Thursday was unattractive, spirited, and unsatisfactory to both sellers and buyers, the former having been disappointed by the same commission and low prices, while the latter were dissatisfied with the arbitrary action of the sellers in withdrawing so liberally the rice from sale, and refusing a shipping order to a large amount, mainly from Liverpool. Provisions have been very quiet. Dry Goods, while Foreign Fabrics are tolerably supplied, have been steadily unchanged. The value of the week's imports of Dry Goods has been $1,246,372 against $1,000,000 the same week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $20,511,017 against $14,000,000 the same time last year.

The movements in other commodities have not been productive of any remarkable changes.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were fluster for Beeves, the supply of which was in excess. The demand was good. Milch Cows and Veal Calves were in limited supply and demand, and prices were as follows, as near as could be ascertained for the week, Sheep were dull and heavy, though not in plenty.

The range of prices during the week, as near as we can get it, at the leading City Markets last Wednesday were as follows:

Ordinary to Premium Beeves, per pound	$ 3½	@ $ 13
Fair to good Milch Cows, per head	30	@ 55
Veal Calves, per pound	4½	@ 6½
Sheep, per head	$ 00	@ 7
" per pound	5	@ 8
Live Swine	7	@ 8½
Dressed "	7	@ 8½
Rotting Tigs, each	1 00	@ 1 50

The Country Produce Markets have been generally dull during the week.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WHOLESALE MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$3 00	@ $7 00
Dried Apples, per pound	03	@ 04
Dried Peaches, peeled	12	@ 16
Pineapples, per doz	1 00	@ 1 75
Potatoes, per barrel	1 12½	@ 1 25
Potatoes, new	2 00	@ 2 50
Potatoes, sweet	2 00	@ 2 50
Onions	1 75	@ 2 00
Turnips	1 00	@ 1 12½
Parsnips	1 00	@ 1 12½
Beets	1 00	@ 1 12½
Carrots	1 00	@ 1 12½
Cabbage, per 100	4 00	@ 7 00
Cranberries, Eastern, per barrel	11 00	@ 12 00
Pumpkins, new, per dozen	50	@ 1 00
Garlic, per 100 bunches	4 00	@ 5 00
Green Peas, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Eggs, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	13	@ 14
Chickens, per pounds	12	@ 14
Ducks	15	@ 18
Geese	15	@ 18
Turkeys	14	@ 16
Ducks	18	@ 18
" black, per pair	50	@ 75
" widgeon	50	@ 75
" brant, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
" gray	50	@ 75
" redheads	1 00	@ 1 00
Pigeons, per dozen	1 00	@ 2 00
Wild Pigeons	1 00	@ 1 75
Partridges, per pair	62	@ 75
English Snipe	50	@ 75

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

A NEW AND DESIRABLE PREPARATION FOR THE HAIR.

—We with pleasure refer our readers to the preparation of Messrs. Burnett & Co. of Boston.

The want of their Cocoaine has long been felt in order to dispense with the many inferior preparations now in use.

It contains a very large proportion of Cocoa Nut Oil, so celebrated for causing to the hair a rich glossy and smooth appearance, which, together with its other properties, strengthens the hair and gives it a healthy and vigorous growth. We speak after giving it a trial, and can conscientiously recommend it to the old and young as being a preparation of fountainable value for the purposes intended.—St. John (Canada) News.

New York Purchasing Agency.

W. M. HAFSLEY, No. 18 NASSAU STREET.

Persons desirous of making purchases in New York of any articles, large or small, of use or luxury, from a Book to a Blanket, a Pin to a Piano, a Shawl to a Steamer, by their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, at 5 per cent. commission, may refer to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, Esq., Gentlemen Leroy Island Bank, Messrs. John Jacob Astor, Sons, Huntington Brothers & Co., New York; J. D. Dauntree & Co., New Orleans.

Now Published,

From Wall Street to Cashmere.

A JOURNAL OF FIVE YEARS IN ASIA, AFRICA, AND EUROPE.

By CHARLES LANMAN.

Comprising

Visits during 1851, '2, '3, '4, '5, and '6, to the Dancenea from Minea, Plains of Troy, Thessaly, Mount Olympus, Parnyss, Arcadia, Corinth, Tyre, Mt. Sinai, Bombay, Seringapatam, and Surat.

With all the Scenes of the Author's Personal Mishaps.

CASHMERE,

Peshawur, and the Khyber Pass to Afghanistan, Java, China, and the Mauritius.

With many Illustrations.

By JOHN B. IRELAND, ESQ.

Price in Muslin binding, $4 00; Half Calf extra, $6 00.

This is a reliable book of travels, and a valuable contribution to Modern Literature. Written in a light, sparkling, polished stylist, who has looked at the country through both his eyes and his brain, and has given us, not a mere fragmentary description of the habits, manners, and customs of the people.

It will be refreshing to get hold of a book written in a light spirit by a truthful man. The social every-day life of those three hundred millions of people has not been understood. He tells us all about the self-sacrificing devotion of the American Missionaries to the Great Cause to which they are engaged. He also gives the most fascinating books of travel that has ever been published in this country.

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,

29 Park Row,

Opposite the Astor House.

THE LAST AND BEST.

Sheldon & Company,

No. 115 Nassau Street, New York,

HAVE NOW READY,

Spurgeon's Sermons.

FIFTH SERIES.

ILLUSTRATED WITH A FINE STEEL PORTRAIT OF THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON, PREACHING IN THE SURREY GARDENS.

One vol. 12mo. Price $1 00.

The popularity of Spurgeon's Sermons has increased with their every issue, while the demand for the first and the most for them throughout the whole country is greater than ever before.

A distinguished critic, who has read the proof-sheets of the fifth series, pronounces them far superior to the published, striking, and original, than any that have preceded them.

Sent by mail, pre-paid, for $1 00.

Strangers Visiting New York

SHOULD

VISIT GENT'S BAZAAR,

507 & 513 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel,

Comprising TWENTY DEPARTMENTS in every branch of business attended to, and a Ladies and children, and every article for the equipment of Gentlemen and Men of Fashion.

ONE OF THE LIONS OF NEW YORK.

Commencing with the Bazaar, and forming the forth Compartment, is

GENIN'S HAT STORE,

The largest Hat Store in America.

The GREATEST VARIETY OF ORIGINAL STYLES to be found on this Continent.

Strangers coming in the city as buyers, or mere Lookers on in Visions," should visit the bazaar as having no parallel or rival on either side of the Atlantic.

ONE OF THE CURIOSITIES OF TRADE,

BLAKEMAN & MASON,

No. 318 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Publishers and Booksellers,

Importers and Jobbers in SCHOOL & COLLEGE TEXT BOOKS

STANDARD MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS

BLANK AND NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Give special attention to selling the publications of BOULD & LINCOLN, TYPOGRAPHY OF PHILLIPS, SAMPSON & CO., E. H. BUTLER & CO., J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., and others.

BOSTON AND PHILADELPHIA PUBLISHERS.

BIRDSEY BLAKEMAN, } ALBERT MASON. of this late firm of }
SHELDON, BLAKEMAN & CO., }

FRED. S. COZZENS,

WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities of his own importation.

SAME OLD BRANDIES,

SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,

from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.

No. 172 CHERRY STREET,

(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

SOMETHING NEW.

AMERICAN HOP TREE.

The undersigned recommends the above Tree as destined to supercede the unsightly and troublesome Hop Vines. The Tree is perfectly hardy and highly ornamental, bearing the second year from seed. The hops produced are much stronger, and always preferred to the ordinary hops. Trees from 6 to 8 feet high, or seeds free by mail for nine 3c. stamps.

McILVAIN & YOUNG, Seedsmen and Florists,

No. 9 John Street.

Nature's True Restorative.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

THE GREAT

AMERICAN REMEDY

FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

THE BEST, SAFEST, AND PUREST

TONIC AND ALTERATIVE EVER PREPARED.

Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, cor. William, N. Y.

Cyrus W. Field & Co.,

Wholesale

PAPER DEALERS,

No. 57 Beekman Street, New York,

Have removed from No. 11 CLIFF STREET to the large new store, 57 BEEKMAN STREET, where they have made such extensive arrangements as to enable them to execute orders of PAPERS adapted to any branch of trade, with promptness, quality, and despatch, which they can not be surpassed; and their facilities are such that they are enabled to sell every description of PAPER at the lowest possible price, either for cash or approved credit. They recommend that they can offer strong inducements to purchasers throughout the United States and Canada to give them their orders.

Below are enumerated some of the principal styles of PAPER MADE BY CYRUS W. FIELD & CO., and MANUFACTURED, or will be found in lots to suit purchasers:

To Publishers of Books, Pamphlets, &c.

BOOK PAPER, of various sizes and qualities.
COLORED PAPER, plated and unplated.
DOUBLE CAP WRAPPERS, all colors.
FANCY PAPERS, all colors.
STRAW AND RINDERS' BOARDS, &c.
BOOK PAPER made to order, of any size and weight.

To Publishers of Newspapers.

NEWS PAPER constantly on hand, of the various sizes and weights usually called for, and any size made to order at short notice.
MANILLA PAPERS, superior quality for wrappers.
NEWS INK, &c.

To Job Printers.

NEWS and BOOK PAPER, various sizes.
COLORED PAPER, plated and unplated.
PLAIN CAP and LETTER PAPER.
FOLIO POST, FLAT CAPS, &c.

To Druggists.

HARDWARE PAPERS, of various sizes and qualities.
WHITE and COLORED WRAPPING, all kinds.
BLUE and WHITE FOLDING POST PAPER.
CAP and LETTER PAPERS, &c.

To Cloth and Paper Hanging Dealers.

MANILLA PAPER, 20 sheet, 30x40, and 40x60, and any size or weight made to order.
WRAPPING PAPER, various qualities.
SILK PAPERS.
PLAIN and LETTER PAPERS, &c.

To Hardware Manufacturers and Dealers.

HARDWARE PAPER, various sizes and weights.
HARDWARE PAPER, glazed.
STRAW WRAPPING PAPERS, various sizes.
COLORED PAPERS, various sizes.
COLORED PAPER, plated and unplated.
TISSUE PAPERS, white and colored, &c.
HARDWARE PAPER, all kinds made to order, of any particular size and thickness.

To Hatters.

WHITE PAPER, 24x36, 30x37, 38x42.
TIP PAPER.
FANCY COLORED PAPER.
MANILLA PAPER, &c.

To Trunk Manufacturers.

TRUNK BOARDS, all sizes and weights.
WHITE AND COLORED PAPER, for lining.

To House and Ship Builders.

SHEATHING PAPER, dry and tarred.
SAND SHEATHING.

To Bookbinders.

BINDERS' BOARDS, of every sort, assorted numbers.
BINDERS' BOARDS, medium, " "
STRAW BOARDS, " "
FANCY PAPERS, for fly-leaves.
COLORED CAP PAPERS, &c.

To Booksellers and Stationers.

LETTER PAPER, blue and white, plain and ruled.
CAP PAPER, " " " "
NOTE PAPER, " " " "
ENVELOPES, " " " "
COMMERCIAL LETTER, blue and white, plain and ruled.
FOLIO POST, blue and white.
FLAT CAP, of every variety.
LEDGER PAPER, all qualities.
TISSUE PAPER, white and colored.
WRAPPING PAPER, brown, buff and plain.
BLUE and WHITE and BROWN BONNET BOARDS, &c.
ENVELOPES, of all kinds and sizes.

To Grocers.

STRAW and RAG WRAPPING PAPER, all sizes.
TEA PAPERS, all sizes.
MANILLA PAPERS, &c.
LETTER and CAP PAPERS, &c.

To Card Manufacturers.

WHITE WOVE and LAID FLAT CAP.
CARD MIDDLES, made to order.

To Banks.

BANK NOTE PAPER, all qualities.
FOLIO POST, all qualities, for Checks Notes, &c.
SUPERFINE LETTER PAPERS, for Ledgers, Journals, &c.
SUPERFINE LETTER, CAP, and NOTE PAPERS, &c.

To Dealers in Fancy Goods.

WHITE AND COLORED PAPERS of every variety.
WRAPPING PAPERS, all kinds.
MANILLA PAPERS, " "
HARDWARE PAPERS, " "
TISSUES, white and colored.
BONNET BOARDS, brown and blue and white.
ENVELOPES, of various kinds.

To Paper Manufacturers.

RAGS, various qualities of foreign.
RAGS, various qualities of domestic.
Canvas, Bagging, Wrapping Paper, Stock, Grass Cloth, Rope, Bunting, &c.
BLEACHING POWDER, various brands.
SODA ASH, various brands.
ULTRAMARINE, of superior quality.
MARKING INK, &c.
CUTTING MACHINES.
FELTS, of every kind, best quality imported.
FRENCH and AMERICAN DRIER POWDER.
ALUM, ground and crude.
PATENT BLEACHING.
LIME.
GUM OF VITRIOL.
SIZING, assorted qualities.
FELTING, the best of English Machine Felting, a full assortment, various widths.
FOURDRINIER MACHINE FELTING, all sizes.
PRESS ROLL FELTS, all sizes.
DOUBLE and SINGLE LEDGER JACKETS.
COTTON CLOTH, all widths and qualities.
ENGLISH and AMERICAN FELTING made to order, of any description, and various sizes.
SCREEN PLATES, Nos. 1, 2, and 3.
WIRE CLOTH for Fourdrinier Wires, various widths, a very superior article, which they can strongly recommend to Manufacturers, believing them to be far superior to any in the market. Cylinder Marking Wire Cloth, cut in fit any cylinder, for both upper and under felts.
SEWING and WINDING WIRES.
TWINE, of all sizes.
MACHINERY.—Orders received for Fourdrinier and Cylinder Machines, Cutting Presses, Drill Bars, Dandies, Engine Knives, &c., &c.
INDIA RUBBER and LEATHER BELTING.
INDIA RUBBER DECKLE STRAPS, made to order.
SIZE, &c.
HORSE HAIR and WOOL FELTS, single and double backs.
COLORING MATERIALS.
PRUSSIAN BLUE.
PRUSSIAN BLUE.
BLUE PULP, A. and B.
BICHROMATE OF POTASH.
ROSE PINK, A. and B.
SUGAR OF LEAD.
Liberal advances made on consignments of any kind of Paper.

PAPER of every description made to order, on short notice.

Orders accompanied with a remittance, or a satisfactory city reference, will be executed with the same care and promptness as if in person.

Cash paid for all kinds of Paper Manufacturers' stock.

A Memoir of National Interest.

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston,

Publish this Week:

MEMOIR

OF

CHIEF JUSTICE PARSONS.

WITH NOTICES OF SOME OF HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

BY HIS SON,

THEOPHILUS PARSONS.

One handsome 12mo volume, with a Portrait after Stuart.

Price..... $1 50.

The Publishers offer this work as one of peculiar interest. "Chief Justice Parsons was," in the language of his successor, Chief Justice Parker, "for more than thirty years, acknowledged as the great man of his time." He was an able lawyer and industrial as a statesman and as a scholar than as a lawyer. Facts of much importance in the history of the country are here fully stated for the first time, and numerous anecdotes, and letters of distinguished men, not only paint him to the life, but give the reader a vivid picture of the time.

ALSO,

Owen Meredith's Poems.

Complete Poetical Works of Owen Meredith (Robert Bulwer Lytton), one volume, blue and gold, price 75 cents.

☞ Any Book published by Ticknor & Fields will be sent, free of postage, on receipt of price.

CHANDELIERS & GAS FIXTURES.

Our magnificent Stock of New Styles of Chandeliers and Gas Fixtures are now ready for the Spring Season

At a Small Advance on Cost.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,

Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

Phelan's Champion Hat.—Something Es-tirely new in the hat line, at WHITE'S, No. 704 Broadway, under Bowlby's. A sample can be seen at Mr. Phelan's billiard rooms, corner Broadway and 10th Street; also at Comer of Canal and Elm, 53 Ann Street, the champion billiard table makers, and at WHITE'S, the champion hatter, No. 216 Broadway, under the Museum.

☞ PRINCE IMPERIAL

CHAMPAGNE.

FROM

DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,

As sold at the

IMPERIAL TABLES OF THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE.

Can be had at all the leading hotels, and from all the principal wine dealers throughout the country.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Importer,

Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

"MASSER'S"

Patent 5 Minute Freezers.

OPERATION SIMPLE. RESULT CERTAIN.

The increasing demand and the unrivaled popularity of "Masser's Five Minute Freezers" prove them to be the best Ice-Cream Freezer in use.

Purchasers and dealers are cautioned against imitation Freezers that are offered in place of the above. Get "H. R. MASSER'S" Freezers, that have been thoroughly tested for the last five years.

Sole Agents,

E. KETCHAM & CO.,

Manufacturers of Japanned and Tinned Tin Ware,

189 Pearl Street, New York.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR PLANTS, FLOWERING SHRUBS, CONIFERÆ, and BEDDING STUFF,

CONIFERÆ, and BEDDING STUFF,

321 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

To Restore is Better than to Dye.—The Boston Evening Transcript has said that it has been discovered which restores the natural color of the hair by acting upon its roots, and gives it back its original gloss and beauty. This no hair dye will do. If you wish to have the real color instead of the dull, rough look which hair dye imparts, use Hetzerott's Restorative, which invigorates the roots of the hair and makes it young again, no matter how much it may be faded. There is no doubt that the old practice of dyeing the hair will rapidly give way before the merits of this preparation."

Sold everywhere. Price 50 cents a bottle.

W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

The Doting Parent to His Boy.

I cannot give you wealth, my son,
No mansions broad and green
From me can you inherit,
Nor coffered gold, I ween;
Your fortune is your own with arm,
Bold heart and ready brain;
And, wielding them with vigor,
All you wish you must attain.

But I can give—and proud I am
To give to thee, my boy!—
Some maxims which, the after life,
Will prove a source of joy:
Whatever hap betides you,
Take life easy as it goes,
And purchase of Burtis Brothers
All your Spring and Summer Clothes.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH BLCE. } NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.

BY THE

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave our Hudson River Depot at 6.45 and 11.15 A.M.; 3.15, 4.30, and 5.10 P.M.

English Mail trains, Express Passenger trains, and do not lie over or stop at any point.

The regular time by Post Line is

To Chicago . . in 40 hours | To Dayton . . . in 30 hours
" Cincinnati " 36 " | " St. Louis . . " 72 "
" Cleveland " 34 " | " Louisville . " 52 "
" Columbus " 32 " | " Indianapolis in 54 hours

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in the good time. Goods for sale on Richmond and Arkansas Rivers, Kansas, &c., will save time by shipping by our line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 311 BROADWAY.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $880,000.

This Company continues to do a lucrative merchantile business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—Nine per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has redeemed the Certificates of the issue of 1856.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LECONEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. COMSTOCK, Secretary.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED IS A First-Class Family Newspaper of Entertainment, Improvement, and Instruction. Every number contains a variety of Original Matter, Fresh, Racy, and Spicy, and well calculated to amuse the people; to illustrate life in all its phases, and to furnish that which ought to be read by every family in the land.

It aims to combine Original Essays by the best writers—Historical, Biographical, and Descriptive Sketches of Travel and Adventure; Articles on Science, Agriculture, Horticulture, Physiology, Education, General News, and every topic which is of importance or interest to the reading public. In order it one of the best Papers in the World.

Published every week; $2 a year; $1 for half a year, and Clubs of Twenty, three months, one year, for $5—that is so far, for 25 cents each!

FOWLER AND WELLS,
No. 308 Broadway, New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The immense increase in the demand for these admirable Machines—it has trebled in a few months—indicates the roving prosperity of the country. The prices of our Machines have been greatly reduced.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

DEAD SHOT

A DEAD SHOT for Bed Bugs.
SLEEP IN PEACE.

The most successful as well as the surest of any thing ever known, curing up and laying out these destroyers at once slightly rust. Sold by first-class Druggists everywhere. McKESSON & ROBBINS, Wholesale Agents, 91 Fulton Street.

$32 50 ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ASSEMBLY, Ashland Monadnock Bed-stone. Immense Improvements. For circulars, &c., address, Rev. HENRY J. FOX, A.M., Ashland, Greene Co., N. Y.

CHARLES READE'S NEW NOVEL.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York,

Publish this Day:

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG.

A NOVEL.

By Charles Reade,

AUTHOR OF

"CHRISTIE JOHNSTONE," "PEG WOFFINGTON," "NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," &c.

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 65 cents.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

BAILEY & CO.,
819 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia,
(Adjoining L. J. Levy & Co's)
The largest Manufacturers of
BRITISH STANDARD SILVER WARE
in the United States.

Guaranteed to be of the above quality. All Silver Ware sold by them is manufactured on their premises—Assayed by the U. S. Assay Office.

JEANS' NICKEL SILVERS, JEWELRY, PLATED WARES, BRONZES, &c.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

In the whole history of medical discoveries, no remedy has gained so unbounded a popularity, or performed so full, effectual cures of the Throat, Lungs, Chest, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Asthma, or CONSUMPTION itself, at this far-famed, long tried, and justly celebrated Balsam.

Consumption is not cured! The only genuine has the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outer wrapper. For sale every where.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1000 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations. The work will be sold exclusively by Agents, to each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should address the undersigned without delay. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

SEWING MACHINES.—All persons who have been induced to buy Sewing Machines which will not perform the work that purchasers expected them to do, are informed that Singer's Machines never fail to do any kind of work. No one is ever disappointed in purchasing one.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,
488, 490, and 492 BROAD WAY,
Corner of Broome Street,
Steam Fitters, Gas Fitters, and Plumbers,
Builders of Gas Works.

Hotels, Steamboats, Stores, Public Buildings, and Private Dwellings, fitted with Gas Apparatus complete, like manner, and on reasonable terms.

Steam Fitting and Gas Fitting Factory,
133 Mercer Street.

Gas Fitting Factory,
488 Broome Street.

ALSO, IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, AND DEALERS IN
CHANDELIERS & GAS FIXTURES,
China, Glass, Bronze, Ormolu, Cutlery, Silver and Plated Ware,
AND
GENERAL HOUSE FURNISHING GOODS.

Who Invented the Sewing Machine?

Keep this fact in view when you purchase, that is an article much in demand.

A GOOD SEWING MACHINE

An inferior one is a pest, and is to be avoided.

THE HOWE MACHINES—THE ORIGINAL,
Established in 1846, are made at No. 427 Broadway.
Price—$50, $60, $70, $80, $100, $135, $160.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, to the Office of HARPER'S WEEKLY, Franklin Square, New York City." School Catalogues and Circulars, Names and Post-Office Address of Schools, Educational Reports, &c., are solicited. MARCIUS WILLSON.

PATENT "ELECTRO-THERAPEUTIC BATTERY APPARATUS."—For Consumption, Rigidity, &c., suction stamp.
DR. WM. W. MARSHALL, Cincinnati, Ohio.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable Guano ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale, and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address C. S. MARSHALL, Pres. American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

GORGEOUS CARPETINGS
OILCLOTHS, &c., &c.,
MANUFACTURED
EXPRESSLY FOR THE RETAIL TRADE
BY
M. & S. ISAACS,
THE FOLLOWING PRICES:
ENGLISH VELVETS, $1 75, $1 62½, and $1 50.
ENGLISH BRUSSELS, 90c., $1 and $1 12.
IMPERIAL THREE-PLY, 80c., $1, and $1 12.
EXTRA SUPERFINE INGRAINS, 75c. per yard.
GOOD ALL-WOOL INGRAINS, 37½, 40c., and 50c.
OILCLOTHS,
FROM 2 TO 5-4 FEET WIDE, VERY STYLE.
25c., 30c., 42½, 50c., 75c. per yard.
ENGLISH DRUGGETS, MATTINGS, MATS, RUGS,
TABLE and PIANO COVERS, WINDOW
SHADES, &c., &c., &c.
AT EXTRAORDINARY LOW PRICES.
M. & S. ISAACS AND ANDERSON,
No. 99 BOWERY.
Sign of the Great American Eagle.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!
LYON'S KATHAIRON FOR THE HAIR
USED BY LADIES EVERYWHERE.
ONLY 25 CENTS, PER BOTTLE

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

The new Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are attracting universal attention. In all essential good qualities they are much the best Machines ever offered at a low price.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway.

STATEN ISLAND
Fancy Dyeing Establishment.
Barrett Nephews & Co,
Office, 6 and 8 John Street.
(3 doors from Broadway),
New York.

To Housekeepers!!—To prevent your house from being overrun with bugs, use the Patent Bugs' Lock, which is universally admitted to be the most convenient and effectual article ever invented.
VALENTINE & BUTLER, No. 537 Broadway.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which fester in the blood at this season of the year. By the timely exposition of them many rankling disorders are nipped in the bud. Multitudes can, by the aid of this remedy, spare themselves from the endurance of foul eruptions and ulcerous sores, through which the system will seek to rid itself of corruption, if not assisted to do this through the natural channels of the body by an alterative medicine. Cleanse out the vitiated blood whenever you find it, and its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find it obstructed and sluggish in the veins; cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your feelings will tell you when. Even where no particular disorder is felt, people enjoy better health, and live longer, by purifying the blood. Keep the blood healthy, and all is well; but with the poisons of life disordered, there can be no lasting health. Sooner or later something must go wrong, and the great machinery of life is destroyed or overthrown.

IT CURES

Scrofula and Scrofulous Complaints, Eruptions and Eruptive Diseases, Ulcers, Pimples, Blotches, Tumors, Boils, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, and Syphilitic Affections, Mercurial Disease, Dropsy, Neuralgia or Tic Doloureux, Debility, Dyspepsia and Indigestion, Liver Complaint, Dose or Blindness, Fits, and indeed the whole class of complaints arising from Impurities of the blood.

In order to secure their complete eradication from the system, the remedy should be judiciously taken according to directions on the bottle. Prepared by

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1 per Bottle; Six Bottles for $5.

Sold by all druggists everywhere.

One Hundred Songs of Ireland.

MUSIC and Words. Price 50 cents.
Published by DUFFY & DITSON & CO., Boston.

WORTHY OF NOTE for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption.—Rev. Dr. Judson Dickerson, New York, says: "Gentlemen—I have used your Expectorant Pulmonary Balsam myself, with benefit, in catarrhal and pulmonary affections, and I find it to be a very good officer in the early stages of Pulmonary affections in families around me."

Owing to an unprecedented sale and popularity of over thirty years' standing, there are many counterfeits and imitations palmed upon the public are cautioned.

Inquire for the article by its WHOLE NAME.
"WYETH'S EXPECTORANT PULMONAL BALSAM."
Prepared only by REED, CUTLER & CO., Druggists, Boston. Price, large, $1; small, 50 cents.
BARNES & PARK, Agents, New York.

A NEW WORK by VICTOR COUSIN.

DELISSER & PROCTER,
No. 508 Broadway,
HAVE JUST PUBLISHED,
The Secret History of the Court of France
UNDER RICHELIEU AND MAZARIN,
With a Steel Portrait of MADAME DE LONGUEVILLE.
12mo, cloth, 63 cents.

"This biography has the interest of Romance with the additional merit of Truth. It is the first of a series of Secret Histories of the Court of France, by Victor Cousin, which will be published for sale at 50 cents per volume. Madame de Longueville was a beautiful, fascinating, intriguing duchess, who "lived much and many, and who espoused the political ambitions of her brother, the Prince de Condé, making their schemes and making herself and influence ruled by Histories and Mazarin."—Westchester Herald.

☞ Copies sent per mail, prepaid, on receipt of prices.

MAGNETIC Organization and Motive Power of the Human System, and its Application to the Cure of Disease, Insanity, Idiocy, Delusions, especially of the Living and Loved, by M. H. Brandwood, M. D. This scientific work will be issued for sale of the undersigned, at 61 Chatham St.
M. H. BRANDWOOD, M. D.,
Rochester, N. Y., with postage stamp.

☞ Every Number of Harper's Magazine contains from 128 to 160 pages—and from one third to one half more reading matter than any other in the country.

Close of the Eighteenth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR MAY.

Contents.

THE LAMENTABLE COMPLAINT OF KATHARINA MARIA ROTHSTEIN.
Illustrated by Eight Engravings.
FLIES.
Illustrated by Seventeen Engravings.
LOUNGINGS IN THE FOOTPRINTS OF THE PIONEERS.
Illustrated by Twenty-two Engravings.
THE MERCHANT.
THE BURNING OF SALTONE VILLA.
MRS. MARGARET'S HOBBY.
QUARANTINE AND VENTILATION. By D. B. Reid, M.D.
IN THE OLD CHURCH TOWER.
THE ROTHSAYS.
LUCILE LEAD.
CRITICISM FORESTALLED; OR, RHYME Versus REASON.
SUCH A MISTAKE!
THE GOLDEN ELEPHANT.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. Thackeray.
Illustrated by Harrison Weir and Montague Stone. — Mr. Will is presented to his future in-Law.—Four Headers.
CHAPTER LXVIII. In which Harry goes Westward.
CHAPTER LXIX. A Little Family.
CHAPTER LXX. In which Lucia plays a considerable part.
CHAPTER LXXI. White Lavender.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
NOTICE TO MAY.
Illustrations. — Frontispiece Dress. — Plche. — Bonnets.

The Publishers believe that the Eighteen Volumes of Harper's Magazine form a new literature, a larger amount of valuable and attractive reading than will be found in any other periodical in the world.

At no period since the commencement of the Magazine have the literary and artistic resources been more ample and varied; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the Periodical for the evidence that every effort for the future claims upon the patronage of the American public.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

Harper's Weekly and Harper's Magazine, together, one year, $5.

The Postage upon "Harper's Magazine" must be paid at the Office where it is received. Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Every Number contains a Newspaper Plate.

In the number of Harper's Weekly for April 9 was commenced a New Serial Story entitled THUMPS, by Gen. Sir Edmund Head, Author of "The Forest Keeper," "The Pelthpar Papers," &c., &c. Illustrated by Augustus Hoppin.

The Serial of Harper's Weekly will keep persons living in the country thoroughly posted on the news of the day. The Illustrations published in it will give an entire Matter, or its fully illustrated a history at the time. Its Literary and Miscellaneous Matter will be found unsurpassed. Harper's Weekly has the largest circulation that for illustrating any other paper in the United States, and is the best and cheapest family illustrated newspaper in the country. Tv advertisers on most only publishing in Harper's Weekly, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because more widely circulated—than more journals throughout the country, from North to South—than advertisements in any other publications.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Fifty Weeks 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 10 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twenty or Twenty-five Subscribers.

Terms for Advertising.—Fifty Cents a Line.

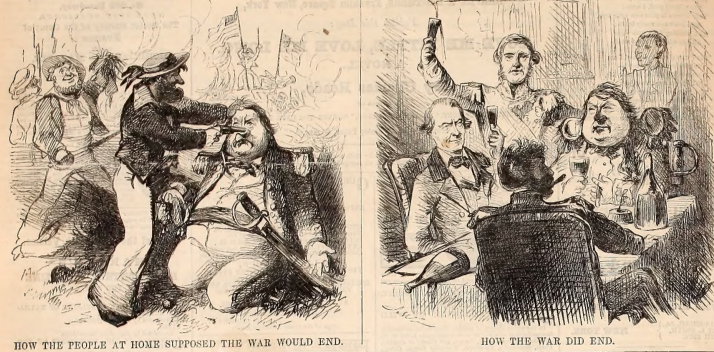
A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the State of New York wishing Harper's Weekly sent to their friends, will please send the names of their friends, with the Post-Office address, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE WAR WITH PARAGUAY.



HOW THE PEOPLE AT HOME SUPPOSED THE WAR WOULD END. HOW THE WAR DID END.

"THOUGH LOST TO SIGHT TO MEMORY DEAR!"

GENT. "Hollo, Charles! have you been fighting? That looks rather a black eye you've got."

WAITER. "Fight, Sir? Yessir. Black eye, Sir? Yessir—p'raps it is a little dark. But talking o' black eyes, Sir, lor! you should ha' been and seen the father party!"

SPREAD EAGLEISM,
SPELLS RADICALISM,
SPREAD EAGLEISM,
SPREAD EAGLEISM,

—BY—

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN,
GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN,
GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN,
GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN.

THE GENUINE YOUNG AMERICA.
THE GENUINE YOUNG AMERICA.
THE GENUINE YOUNG AMERICA.
THE GENUINE YOUNG AMERICA.

SPREAD EAGLEISM.
By Geo. Francis Train,
Author of "Young America in Wall Street," &c.
One volume, 12mo. Price 75 cents.
Copies sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price, by
DERBY & JACKSON,
Publishers, New York.

P. P. P.
PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated impurities and serosities from the system; they impart strength; they are divided in sections, and can be worn by the largest or the smallest person; they impart excellent health, and for the benefit of females, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster, and are cheaper at 25 cents than others at 10. Where these Plasters are, pain can not exist. Weak persons, public speakers, delicate females, or any afflicted with side, chest, or back pains, should try them. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp and our Signature.
JOHN D. PARK, 12 and 13 Park Row, N. Y.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

THOMAS, HOOPER & CO., 109 Fulton Street, Manufacturers and Dealers in Looking-glasses, Picture Frames, Oil Paintings, Engravings, &c. A word to the wise, &c.

COPLAND'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY — COMPLETE. A Dictionary of Practical Medicine, comprising General Pathology, the Nature and Treatment of Diseases, Morbid Structures, and the Disorders especially incident to Climates, to the Sea, and to the different Epochs of Life; with numerous Prescriptions for the Medicines recommended. A Classification of Diseases according to Pathological Principles, and a copious Bibliography, with Critical Remarks on the merits of approved Treatises. The whole forming a Library of Pathology and Practical Medicine, and a Digest of Medical Literature. By JAMES COPLAND, M.D., F.R.S. Edited, with Notes and large Additions, by CHARLES A. LEE, A.M., M.D. Complete in 3 large 8vo Volumes, of 1,628 pages, in 6 Volumes Price $7 and $9 and Vol. III., completing the Work.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, N. Y.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postpaid, for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

3 DOLLARS A DAY.

We want a few men in every State, and ten in Canada, to sell an article of actual worth. It can be sold in every family and store.

We have several Agents selling this who are making from 5 to 8 dollars a day profit. It is some of those rapid selling articles with which the country is flooded, but something of real utility, and all that is required to sell it is to show it. Any person sending us 75 cents in stamps or specie will receive a sample by mail, and the money paid, with full answers to all letters of inquiry, information.

☞ Those out of work will find this a nice, respectable, and money-making business. Address
VAN DEUSEN BROTHERS,
Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S ROSEMARY

is the best dressing for the hair known.
The Rosemary will restore hair on a bald head.
The Rosemary will remove dandruff.
The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.
The Rosemary is the best tonic and can not be surpassed, securing to all who use it a healthy scalp and beautiful hair.
The Proprietor can furnish proof to sustain the assertions above. Those who do not submit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.
Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. RUSSELL SPALDING, 21 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.
Sold by Dealers generally.

Cafe de Costa Rica
C&C
THIS SUPERIOR
Strong-bodied delicate flavored
Mountain
COFFEE
For sale by Grocers
Generally
throughout the United States.

Howe's Unrivaled Elliptic Spring Bed
Bottom, from $4.50 to $6, at retail at No. 376 Broadway. Examine or send for circular.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS
Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Vermin kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is indestimable. In warm weather all nature teems with these annoying foes. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the forms of Asia, observed that small insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a powerful insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powder, and perfectly harmless to the human race, as well as cleanly. Medals and Letter Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous medical and horticultural colleges and societies.

Letter from the President of the U. S.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1853.
"MR. EDWARD LYON,—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.
"MILLARD FILLMORE, Chairman."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

"DR. E. LYON,—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to animal and insectile animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.
"JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
"LAFAYETTE ELLIS, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital.
"Dr. JOHN A. BOAK, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powders, and finds it of immense value."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in an article of this kind. Reference can be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Hertell, President of the American Institute; to Professor Mapes, and to Horace Greeley, Esq., of the N.Y. Tribune. M. PAGE, of the St. Nicholas Hotel, &c., &c. Judge Mapes says, "This discovery of Prof. Lyon is of national importance. Dr. Fargo of Albany have tested it thoroughly. It will destroy insects, grass, fungus, moss, moths, bugs, and all vermin. Garden plants can be preserved, and houses made pure."

Arrangements are now made through MESSRS. ARNES & PARK, of New York, to have it sold throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!

"NEW YORK, November 8th, 1858.
"In reference to the foregoing testimonial, I have sold all my Insect Powder and Fly Paper to Messrs. Arnes & Park, and have no further interest in the business. Lyon's Powder is a discovery made by myself, and bought from the Interior of Asia, and is unknown in any other powder. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name.
"E. LYON."

Rats and mice can not be reached by a powder, and are killed by a MAGNETIC PILL. Order them through any merchant.

'Tis Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
Both Lyon's Pills are mixed for rats and mice.

Sample 15cts, 25 cents; regular size, 50 cents and $1.00. Follow directions. Use freely and often.

BARNES & PARK,
13 and 15 Park Row, N.Y.

GRADUALLY BURNING UP — Geographical and geological science instruct the bald-headed that they are gradually burning up—exposed to the influence of every ray of light against the sun or lamp. Let but if you should seek yourself, love seek, cure, frost, or Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, or Barnum's Zoological Salve and cure yourself. You can get it at

BARNES & PARK,
13 and 15 Park Row, N.Y.

GET 30 CENTS. — If you are suffering from colds, wounds, sores, burns, chapped hands, erysipelas, corns, chilblains, you have a lot of Bunker's Salve on hand, the greatest healing remedy ever discovered. Sold by all druggists, 25 cents a box.

THE NEW BOOKS.

THE CULPRIT FAY. By Drake. 50 cents.
BUCKLAND'S CURIOSITIES OF NATURAL HISTORY. $1 25.
MILLS STANDISH. Illustrated. $6 00.
AFTERNOON OF UNMARRIED LIFE. $1 00.
The Prairie Bird. 75 cts.

 Sold everywhere, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by
RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
159 Grand Street (near Broadway), N. Y.

"GET THE BEST."
WEBSTER UNABRIDGED
PICTORIAL EDITION!

1500 Pictorial Illustrations.
WEBSTER'S UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.
New Pictorial Edition.

WE HAVE IN PRESS, to be issued at an early day, a new and splendid edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, containing

1500 Pictorial Illustrations,

Beautifully executed.

9000 to 10,000 NEW WORDS in the Vocabulary,

Table of SYNONYMS, by Prof. GOODRICH, in which over two thousand words are carefully discriminated, forming a fuller work on English Synonyms of itself, than any other issued, besides Crabb, and delieved in advance of that.

Table giving Pronunciation of Names of 9000 distinguished persons of Modern Times,

Peculiar Use of Words and Terms in the Bible,

With other new Features together with ALL THE MATTER OF PREVIOUS EDITIONS.

Will be sold by all Booksellers.

☞ "GET THE BEST." GET WEBSTER. G. & C. MERRIAM.

Springfield, Mass., May, 1859.

HOARSENESS.

From the Freeman's Journal, New York:

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES will be found valuable by public speakers and singers to relieve hoarseness. They are an improvement on the Pastilla de Pasta de French lozenges, that we have found very useful.

Sold by all Druggists.

PHALON & SON'S
COCOÏNE
FOR DRESSING AND PRESERVING THE HAIR.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Price 25 and 50 Cents per Bottle.

$15 Worth of Music for 25 Cents.

The success of the "Gentle Annie Melodist" is unprecedented. More than forty thousand copies have already been sold, and, from present indications, the sale will reach 100,000 copies this year. Encouraged by this success, the publishers have issued the containing the Words and Music of fifty of the very best Songs, among which will be found every song from it Twelve Songs, Agatha, Ever by Thy Side, Meet me by Moonlight, Beautiful Venice, Sweet Dreams, Eileen Bawn, I'm not a Child at all, Charity, I can her still in my dreams, Willie Moore, Moore's in de cold ground, Old Playground, &c., &c.

Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 2,

Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 1, 25 Cents.

Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 2, 25 Cents.

Sent to mail, postage paid, to any address. Sheet Music, Music Books, and Musical Merchandise of every description by mail, and postage pre-paid, where the price is sent with the order.

FIRTH, POND & CO.,
No. 547 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 123.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

☞ Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK I.

RECALLED TO LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

THE PERIOD.

IT was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the season of Light, it was the season of Darkness, it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair, we had everything before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct to heaven, we were all going direct the other way—in short, the period was so far like the present period, that some of its noisiest authorities insisted on its being received, for good or for evil, in the superlative degree of comparison only.

There were a king with a large jaw and a queen with a plain face on the throne of England; there were a king with a large jaw and a queen with a fair face on the throne of France. In both countries it was clearer than crystal to the lords of the State preserves of loaves and fishes that things in general were settled forever.

It was the year of Our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five. Spiritual revelations were conceded to England at that favored period, as at this. Mrs. Southcott had recently attained her five-and-twentieth blessed birthday, of whom a prophetic private in the Life Guards had heralded the sublime appearance by announcing that arrangements were made for the swallowing up of London and Westminster. Even the Cock Lane ghost had been laid only a round dozen of years, after rapping out its messages, as the spirits of this very year last past (supernaturally deficient in originality) rapped out theirs. More messages in the earthly order of events had lately come to the English Crown and People, from a congress of British subjects in America; which, strange to relate, have proved more important to the human race than any communications yet received through any of the chickens of the Cock Lane brood.

France, less favored on the whole as to matters spiritual than her sister of the island and trident, rolled with exceeding smoothness down hill, making paper-money and spending it. Under the guidance of her Christian pastors, she entertained herself, besides, with such humane achievements as sentencing a youth to have his hands cut off, his tongue torn out with pincers, and his body burned alive, because he had not kneeled down in the rain to do honor to a dirty procession of monks which passed within his view, at a distance of some fifty or sixty yards. It is likely enough that, rooted in the woods of France and Norway, there were growing trees, when that edifice was put to death, already marked by the Woodman, Fate, to come down and be sawn into boards, to make a certain movable frame-work, with a sack and a knife in it, terrible in history. It is likely enough that in the rough out-house of some Jacques of the heavy lands adjacent to Paris there were sheltered from the weather, that very day, rude carts, bespattered with rustic mire, snuffed about by pigs, and roosted in by poultry, which the Farmer, Death, had already set apart to be his tumbrils of the Revolution. But that Woodman and that Farmer, though they work unconsingly, work steadily, and no one heard them as they went about with muffled tread: the rather, forasmuch as to entertain any suspicion that they were awake, was to be atheistical and traitorous.

In England there was scarcely an amount of order and protection to justify much national boasting. Daring burglaries by armed bands, and highway robberies, took place in the capital itself every night; families were publicly cautioned not to go out of town without removing their furniture to upholsterers' warehouses for security; the highwayman in the dark was a City tradesman in the light, and, being recognized and challenged by his fellow-tradesman whom he stopped in his character of "the Captain," gallantly shot him through the head and rode away; the mail was waylaid by seven robbers, and the guard shot three dead, and then got shot dead himself by the other four, "in consequence of the failure of his ammunition:" after which the mail was robbed in peace; that magnificent potentate, the Lord Mayor of London, was made to stand and deliver on Turnham Green, by one highwayman, who despoiled the illustrious creature in sight of all his retinue; prisoners in London jails fought battles with their turnkeys, and the majesty of the law fired blunderbusses in among them, loaded with rounds of shot and ball; thieves snipped off diamond crosses from the necks of noble lords at Court drawing-rooms; musketeers went into St. Giles's to search for contraband goods, and the mob fired on the musketeers, and the musketeers fired on the mob; and nobody thought any of these occurrences much out of the common way. In the midst of them, the hangman, ever busy and ever busier than busy, was in constant requisition; now stringing up long rows of miscellaneous criminals; now hanging a housebreaker on Saturday who had been taken on Tuesday; now burning people in the hand at Newgate by the dozen, and now burning pamphlets at the door of Westminster Hall; today taking the life of an atrocious murderer, and to-morrow of a wretched pilferer who had robbed a farmer's boy of sixpence.

All these things, and a thousand like them, came to pass in and close upon the dear old year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five. Environed by them, while the Woodman and the Farmer worked unheeded, those two of the large jaws, and those other two of the plain and the fair faces, trod with stir enough, and carried their divine rights with a high hand. Thus did the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five conduct their Greatnesses, and myriads of small creatures—the creatures of this chronicle among the rest—along the roads that lay before them.

CHAPTER II.

THE MAIL.

It was the Dover road that lay, on a Friday night late in November, before the first of the persons with whom this history has business. The Dover road lay, as to him, beyond the Dover mail, as it lumbered up Shooter's Hill. He walked up hill in the mire by the side of the mail, as the rest of the passengers did; not because they had the least relish for walking exercise, under the circumstances, but because the hill, and the harness, and the mud, and the mail, were all so heavy that the horses had three times already come to a stop, besides once drawing the coach across the road, with the intention instead of taking it back to Blackheath. Reins and whip and coachman and guard, however, in combination, had read that article of war which forbade a purpose otherwise strongly in favor of the argument, that some brute animals are endued with Reason; and the team had capitulated and returned to the inn.

With drooping heads and tremulous tails they mashed their way through the thick mud, floundering and stumbling between whiles as if they were falling to pieces at the larger joints. As often as the driver rested them and brought them to a stand, with a wary "Wo-ho! so-ho, then!" the near leader violently shook his head and every thing upon it—like an unusually emphatic horse, denying that the coach could be got up the hill. Whenever the leader made this rattle, the passenger started, as a nervous passenger might, and was disturbed in mind.

There was a steaming mist in all the hollows, and it rained in its fatherliness up the hill, like an evil spirit, seeking rest and finding none. A clammy and intensely cold mist, it made its slow way through the air in ripples that visibly followed and overspread one another, as the waves of an unwholesome sea might do. It was dense enough to shut out every thing from the light of the coach-lamps but these its own workings, and a few yards of road; and the reek of the laburing horses steamed into it as if they had made it all.

Two other passengers, besides the one, were plodding up the hill by the side of the mail. All three were wrapped to the cheek-bones and over the ears, and wore jack-boots. Not one of the three could have said, from and thing he saw, what either of the other two was like; and each was hidden under almost as many wrappers from the eyes of the mind, as from the eyes of the body, of his two companions. In those days travelers were very shy of being confidential on a short notice, for any body on the road might be a robber or in league with robbers. As to the latter, when every posting-house and ale-house could produce somebody in "the Captain's" pay, ranging from the landlord to the lowest stable nondescript, it was the likeliest thing upon the cards. So the guard of the Dover mail thought to himself that Friday night in November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, lumbering up Shooter's Hill, as he stood on his own particular perch behind the mail, beating his feet, and keeping an eye and a hand on the arm-chest before him, where a loaded blunderbuss lay at the top of six or eight loaded horse-pistols, deposited on a substratum of cutlass.

The Dover mail was in its usual genial position that the guard suspected the passengers, the passengers suspected one another and the guard, they all suspected every body else, and the coachman was sure of nothing but the horses; as to which cattle he could with a clear conscience have taken his oath on the two Testaments that they were not fit for the journey.

"Wo-ho!" said the coachman. "So, then! One more pull and you're at the top and be damned to you, for I have had trouble enough to get you to it!—Joe!"

"Halloa!" the guard replied.

"What o'clock do you make it, Joe?"

"Ten minutes good, past eleven."

"My blood!" ejaculated the vexed coachman, "and not stop of Shooter's yet! Tst! Yah! Get on with you!"

The emphatic horse, not shot by the whip in a most decided negative, made a scramble for it, and the three other horses followed suit. Once more the Dover mail struggled on, with the jackboots of its passengers squashing along by its side. They had stopped when the coach stopped, and they kept close company with it. If any one of the three had had the hardihood to propose to another to walk on a little ahead into the mist and darkness, he would have put himself in a fair way of getting shot instantly as a highwayman.

The last burst carried the mail to the summit of the hill. The horses stood still to breathe again, and the guard got down to skid the wheel for the descent, and open the coach door to let the passengers in.

"Tst! Joe!" cried the coachman, in a warning voice, looking down from his box.

"What do you say, Tom?"

They both listened.

"I say a horse at a canter coming up, Joe."

"I say a horse at a gallop, Tom," returned the guard, leaving his hold of the door, and mounting nimbly to his place. "Gentlemen! In the king's name, all of you!"

With this instantaneous change he cocked his blunderbuss and stood on the offensive.

The passenger booked by this history was on the coach step getting in; the two other passengers were close behind him, and about to follow. He remained a little while in that position, and took out of it; they remained in the road below him. They all looked from the coachman to the guard, and from the guard to the coachman, and listened. The coachman looked back, and the passenger looked back, and even the emphatic leader pricked up his ears and looked back, without contradicting.

The stillness consequent on the cessation of the rumbling and shaking of the coach, added to the stillness of the night, made it very quiet indeed. The panting of the horses communicated a tremulous motion to the coach, as if it were in a state of agitation. The leaders of the passengers beat loud enough perhaps to be heard; but at any rate, the quiet purse was audibly expressive of people out of breath, and holding the breath, and having the pulses quickened by expectation.

"THE FIGURES OF A HORSE AND RIDER CAME SLOWLY THROUGH THE EDDYING MIST."

The sound of a horse at a gallop came fast and furiously up the hill.

"So-ho!" the guard sang out, as loud as he could roar. "Yo there! Stand! I shall fire!"

The pace was suddenly checked, and, with much splashing and floundering, a man's voice called from the mist, "Is that the Dover mail?"

"Never you mind what it is!" the guard retorted. "What are you?"

"Is that the Dover mail?"

"Why do you want to know?"

"I want a passenger, if it is."

"What passenger?"

"Mr. Jerry Jerry?"

Our hooded passenger showed in a moment that it was his name. The guard, the coachman, and the two other passengers eyed him distrustfully.

"Keep where you are," the guard called to the voice in the mist, "because, if I should make a mistake, it could never be set right in your lifetime. Gentleman of the name of Lorry answer straight."

"What is the matter?" asked the passenger, then, with mildly quavering speech. "Who wants me? Is it Jerry?"

("I don't like Jerry's voice, if it is Jerry," growled the guard to himself. "He's honorer than suits me, is Jerry.")

"Yes, Mr. Jerry."

"What is the matter?"

"A despatch sent after you from over yonder. T. and Co."

"I know this messenger, guard," said Mr. Lorry, getting down into the road—assisted from behind more swiftly than politely by the other two passengers, who immediately scrambled into the coach, shut the door, and pulled up the window. "He may come close; there's nothing wrong."

"I hope there ain't, but I can't make no 'Nation sure of that," said the guard, in a gruff voice. "Hallo you!"

"Well, and hallo you!" said Jerry, more hoarsely than before.

"Come on at a footpace; d'ye mind me? And if your eyes and ears was as good as your'n, don't let me see your hand go nigh 'em. For I'm a devil at a quick mistake, and when I make one it takes the form of Lead. So now let's look at you."

The figure of a horse and rider came slowly through the edging mist, and came to the side of the mail, where the passenger stood. The rider stooped, and, casting up his eyes at the guard, handed the passenger a small folded paper. The rider's horse was blown, and both horse and rider were covered with mud, from the hoofs of the horse to the hat of the man.

"Guard!" said the passenger, in a tone of quiet business confidence.

The watchful guard, with his right hand at the stock of his raised blunderbuss, his left at the barrel, and his eye on the horseman, answered curtly, "Sir."

"There is nothing to apprehend. I belong to Tellson's Bank. You must know Tellson's Bank in London. I am going to Paris on business. A crown to drink. I may read this?"

"If so be as you're quick, Sir."

He opened it in the light of the coach-lamp on that side, and read—first to himself and then aloud: "'Wait at Dover for Mam'selle.' It's not long, you see, guard. Jerry, say that my answer was, RECALLED TO LIFE."

Jerry started in his saddle. "That's a Blazing strange answer, too," said he, at his heaviest.

"Take that message back, and they will know that I received this, as well as if I wrote. Make the best of your way. Good-night!"

With those words the passenger opened the coach door and got in; not at all assisted by his fellow-passengers, who had expeditiously secreted their watches and purses in their boots, and were now making a general pretense of being asleep. With no more definite purpose than to escape the hazard of originating any other kind of action.

The coach lumbered on again, with heavier wreaths of mist closing round it as it began the descent. The guard soon replaced his blunderbuss in its case, and, having looked to the rest of its contents, and having looked to the supplementary pistols that he wore in his belt, looked to a smaller chest beneath his seat, in which there were a few smith's tools, a couple of torches, and a tinder-box. For he was well acquainted with that completeness, that if the coachlamps had been blown and extinguished, that would occasionally happen, he had only to shut himself up inside, keep the flint and steel sparks well off the straw, and get a light with tolerable safety and ease (if he were lucky) in five minutes.

"Tom!" softly over the coach-roof.

"Hallo, Joe."

"Did you hear the message?"

"I did, Joe."

"What did you make of it, Tom?"

"Nothing at all, Joe."

"That's a coincidence, too," the guard mused, "for I made the same of it myself."

Jerry, left alone in the mist and darkness, dismounted immediately, not only to ease his tired horse, but to wipe the mud from his face, and shake the wet out of his hair-bush, which might be capable of holding about half a gallon. After standing with the bridle over his heavily-splashed arm, until the wheels of the mail were no longer within hearing and the night was quite still again, he turned to walk down the hill.

"After that there gallop from Temple-bar, old lady, I won't trust your fore-legs till I get you on the level," said this horse messenger, glancing at his mare. "Recalled to life. That's a Blazing strange message. Much that wouldn't do for you, Jerry! I say, Jerry! I say, Jerry! It was a Blazing bad way, if recalling to life was to come into fashion, Jerry!"

CHAPTER III.

THE NIGHT SHADOWS.

A WONDERFUL fact to reflect upon, that every human creature is constituted to be that profound secret and mystery to every other. A solemn consideration, when I enter a great city by night, that every one of those darkly clustered houses encloses its own secret; that every room in every one of them incloses its own secret; that every beating heart in the hundreds of thousands of breasts there, is, in some of its imaginings, a secret to the heart nearest it! Something of the awfulness, even of Death itself, is referable to this. No more can I turn the leaves of this dear book that I love, with absolute trust, than can the weakest or the strongest of the beings who pass their lives upon the other side of the printed leaves. No more can I look into the depths of this unfathomable water, wherein the shadowy lights glanced into it, I have had glimpses of buried treasure and other things submerged. It was appointed that the book should shut with a spring, forever and forever, when I had read but a page. It was appointed that the water should be locked in an eternal frost, when the light was playing on its surface, and I stood in ignorance on the shore. My friend is dead, my neighbor is dead, my love, the darling of my soul, is dead; it is the inexorable consolation and perpetuation of the secret that was always in that individual breast, and which I shall carry to my grave. Fast locks fast, in any of the burial-places of this city through which I pass, is strong and secure as anything underside than is busy inhabitance are, in their innermost personality, to me, or than I am to them.

As to this, his natural and not to be alienated inheritance, the messenger sitting on horseback in the mist, had slender possessions as the King, the first Minister of State, or the richest merchant in London. So with the three passengers shut up in the narrow compass of one lumbering old mail-coach; they were mysteries to one another, as completely as if each had been in his own coach and six, or his own coach and sixty, with the breadth of a county between him and the next.

The messenger rode back at an easy trot, stopping pretty often at ale-houses by the way to drink, but evincing a tendency to keep his own counsel, and to keep his hat cocked over his eyes. He had eyes that assorted very well with that expression, being set close enough to have no depth in the color or form, and much too near together—as if they were afraid of being found out in anything secret. He had a face of no use to part with. Smooth, square, and roughly sunburnt, all but the parts hidden by the horse-cloths and his hat and coat collar, which were of the tint of the dusty wayside mire.

The messenger rode back at an easy trot, stopping pretty often at ale-houses by the way to drink, but evincing a tendency to keep his own counsel, and to keep his hat cocked over his eyes. He had eyes that assorted very well with that expression, being set close enough to have no depth in the color or form, and much too near together—as if they were afraid of being found out in anything secret. He had a face of no use to part with. Smooth, square, and roughly sunburnt, all but the parts hidden by the horse-cloths and his hat and coat collar, which were of the tint of the dusty wayside mire.

Now whether all of the multitude of faces that showed themselves before him was the true face of each separate person, the shadows of the night did not indicate; but they were all the faces of a man of five-and-forty by years, and they differed principally in the passions they expressed, and in the ghastliness of their worn and wasted flesh. Avarice, contempt, defiance, stubbornness, submission, lamentation, succeeded one another; as did various actions of anxious, eager, strained face-ache, constant hurry, and perpetual fluctuation of purpose. Faces rarely change their expression without some sympathy with the general stream of feature, which would altogether express it; but this man's face was in the main one face, and yet was always changing. A humbled tiness in the doing passenger inquired of this spectre:

"Buried how long?"

The answer was always the same: "Almost eighteen years."

"You had abandoned all hope of being dug out?"

"Long ago."

"You know that you are recalled to life?"

"They tell me so."

"I hope you care to live?"

"I can't say."

"Shall I show her to you? Will you come and see her?"

The answers to this question were various and contradictory. Sometimes the broken reply was, "Wait! It would kill me if I saw her too soon." Sometimes it was given in a tender way, then it changed to fear, and then it was, "Take me to her." Sometimes it was staring and bewildered, and then it asked, "Is she living, I don't understand."

After such imaginary discourse, the passenger in his fancy would dismount, and dig, dig—with a spade, now with a great key, now with his hands—to dig this wretched creature out. Got out at last, with earth hanging about his face and hair, he would suddenly fall away to dust. The passenger would then turn to himself, and, lower the window, to get the reality of mist and rain on his cheek.

Yet even when his eyes were opened on the mist and rain, on the moving patch of light from the lamps, and on the hedge at the roadside repeating by jerks, the night shadows outside the coach would fall into the train of the night shadows within. The real Banking-house by Temple-bar, the real business of the past day, the real strong-room, the real express sent to him by letter, and the real message returned, would all be there. Out of the midst of them the ghostly face would rise, and he would accost it again.

"Buried how long?"

"Almost eighteen years."

"I hope you care to live?"

"I can't say."

Dig—dig—dig—until an impatient movement from one of the two passengers would admonish him to pull up the window, draw his cloak close, and shut out the live face and dig it alone. Time and the night shadows slipped away, and another night shadow fell across the window.

This shadow was recognizable as the same real one that had remained in the mind's eye all the night. Its place was at the Banking-house. Business was in progress, and the human life before it took the form of a great desire to have intelligence from Paris, and to be assured that the gentleman so long dug out of his grave was fit to travel and be consigned to his daughter's hands. This life of the present, unlike the life of the past, was remorseless in its demands, and would have no waiting. Push on, push on, push on, to the next stage, and to the next after that, and to the next after that, with unremitting speed. Such was the cry.

The night shadows outside the coach resolved themselves into the forms of the two passengers, and changed places with each other several times, but they both dozed and slept, for the most part. It was a hard suggestion of the night shadows that all the passengers in the world were dozing and sleeping, within and without their respective conveyances, in all sorts of attitudes, and all the horses in the world were capering along, with drowsy heads and swinging tails, in all sorts of pairs. Dig—dig—dig—until an impatient movement from one of the two passengers would admonish him to pull up the window, draw his cloak close, and shut out the live face and dig it alone. Time and night shadows slipped away, and another night shadow fell across the window.

This shadow was recognizable as the same real one that had remained in the mind's eye all night. Its place was at the Banking-house. Business was in progress, and the human life before it took the form of a great desire to have intelligence from Paris, and to be assured that the gentleman so long dug out of his grave was fit to travel and be consigned to his daughter's hands. This life of the present, unlike the life of the past, was remorseless in its demands, and would have no waiting. Push on, push on, push on, to the next stage, and to the next after that, and to the next after that, with unremitting speed. Such was the cry.

The night shadows outside the coach resolved themselves into the forms of the two passengers, and changed places with each other several times, but they both dozed and slept, for the most part. It was a hard suggestion of the night shadows that all the passengers in the world were dozing and sleeping, within and without their respective conveyances, in all sorts of attitudes, and all the horses in the world were capering along, with drowsy heads and swinging tails, in all sorts of pairs.

duty is granting it. Considering the temper of the Mormons, we think it quite likely that the present Chief-Justice, had he been undefended, would have shared the fate of some of his predecessors. As to the pretense that the presence of a company of United States troops at the Court-house was an insult to a set of people who were only a few months ago in armed rebellion against the United States, the idea is so absurd that it reminds one of the old story of the gallows who presented against the tickling of the cord round his neck.

It would seem that Governor Cumming — though no doubt an excellent person in his proper sphere — is not precisely the right man in the right place in Utah. If Mr. Buchanan has not already superseded him, the sooner he does so the better. The best arrangement of all would be to vest the Governorship in Brigham Johnston. This would obviate collisions which, under any other arrangement, would be almost unavoidable; it would, it is true, deprive the Executive of an opportunity of rewarding some friend.

GOOD NEWS FOR CALIFORNIA.

For years the Californians have groaned under the exactions of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, which owns the only line of steamers between Panama and San Francisco, and in the past few weeks a rival to the Company has arisen in the person of the redoubtable Commodore Vanderbilt, who is running a boat once a month from either end of the route. We now understand that, all attempts to effect a compromise between this rivals having failed, the Commodore is about to employ the bulk of his steam navy in prosecuting the competition with vigor. The Californians are in glee.

The Panama Railroad, too, which is not very popular with them, as a rule, in consequence of its high charges, is going to purchase a steam tow to our Pacific States. It is building up a great coasting trade all along the Pacific shores of America, Plazers in South and Central America which, before the road was built, were destitute of any trade whatever, have been roused to life, and are now getting ample employment to a small fleet of sailing craft and propellers. Every such trading point must be a feeder to the great city of the Pacific—San Francisco.

THE LOUNGER.

THE MORAL.

TWELVE intelligent American citizens, speaking, as is alleged, the universal sentiment of their countrymen, have fully proclaimed that American wives are property, but property of a more sacred character than sheep or horses; that there is an inherent, invincible tendency in that property to be spoiled or stolen; that its secret adulteration, unknown to the owner, is yet an "infamous disgrace" to him; and that if there be some property of this kind still unappropriated, and therefore to be injured without penalty, yet why may not a man "defend his goods lest other goods, less carefully guarded, should be stolen?"

Besides this, these twelve American citizens have announced that the adulteration of that property is a crime so black as to endanger the very life of society; but for its punishment the citizen is not to look to society and the law, but to his club, his dagger, or his pistol; an offense so fatal that civilization affords no penalty, but for which nirvana is to be found only in the sweet bosom of ethereals and the habits of a purely barbarous condition. They have pronounced that fatal offense against the rights which a man has in this kind of property shall not be covered with the disgrace that attaches to the invasion of lower rights, but shall have a kind of heroic aspect arising from the personal danger involved in its commitment. They have done all they can to restore society to the principle of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth — to destroy a practical respect for the Christian law in human hearts, and to elevate in the stead the "honor" of a barbarous and ever the paramount moral duty of a man.

Shall we hear in reply that it is idle to talk that we know as well as men that legal penalties can not satisfy wounded honor; that fines, and imprisonments, and the punishment by the state who has fatally slandered a mother or a wife could not atone to any decent man for the slander committed; that this indignant instinct of every man under such circumstances is to drown the offense in the blood of the slanderer?

Well, now, most Christian reader, most Christian clergymen, most Christian church-members and church-goers, is it not the very aim of the Christianity that we all profess, to show that although no legal penalty can right a real wrong, no possible indulgence of mad passion can do it either?

There was a great deal said about the Bible-shout sacred things; there was a most comely abhorring of the court over Sunday, and there was no objection to jurors reading their Bibles. Oh no! not on the least. It is Christian church-going. It was a Bible-quoting counsel. In one case, at least, it was a praying jury. What Bible did they read? What preaching did their hear? To what God did they pray?

What intolerable fuisseism we all are!

It is bad enough, of course, that we should all blame the moral law we profess in the little details of daily life; but that the flagrant violation of it in the bloody death of another sinner, should be habitually and learnedly defended by allusion to the very law itself, is one of those exquisitely rampant absurdities that recall Carlyle's "hypocrisy that is so astonished you should think it hypocritical."

At least, if we defy the Christian law which we profess, let us have the heroism of honesty in the defiance. Let us frankly say, "Christianity is an impossibility. It lays down principles which are entirely beautiful and practical. It says, indeed, that we ought to govern our passions, but all that is pure bosh. We say—and we dance in front of the Opera, like David before the Ark—that it is noble, and manly, and honorable, and gentlemanly, and salutary to fight duels, and that our rights in our wives as our most valuable property (see the Gospels, and the Maries at the tomb), we shall deliberately slaughter any thief that tries to steal them. The Christian law is something to be taught to children and servants, and practiced on Sundays only by our wives who go to church and evening lectures. It is something to be professed; and the fellow who can most nearly approach that not morality and the interests of Christianity is the best fellow. The men are the best converts, who practice the Christian law a little—in society ? ha, ha! —in Wall Street? ho, ho! — in Washington? no, no!"

We are on the eve of a great gush of oratory about Christianity at the missionary meetings and that. Will not some eloquent speaker take the trouble to say whether he believes that men really forgive what they consider to be injuries now more than they did two thousand years ago? Will he then answer two other questions—first, whether he thinks social progress in the direction indicated by faithful Christian preaching a good thing? and, secondly, whether he thinks the notion judicial justification of the law which Christianity is intended to supersede be a good progress?

"That's all talk, you know; 'tisn't the Millennium."

Well?

"Well, then you must take men as you find them."

Well?

"And men will always revenge certain insults in certain ways."

Well?

"Then what are you driving at?"

Simply that Christianity is a swindling sham—

Stop, you impious wretch, you—

I merely repeat your own words in another form.

Have you no respect for religion—for the feelings of your readers?"

Immense in wondering. But it is you who say that men are always going to obey the feelings which Christianity says they ought to. I only justify them—if it is a mere matter of course that it can't—it knows it beforehand, and then it is a quasi respect to the saint of its life and not that not in the heat of the first discovery, but after time has cooled, it will make a confession (whether he does make it or not), if the wife should be found to have a record of a previous lover before proceeding to the slaughter.

Do not say that in the Millennium, so no one will think to be married, he will be no injury to forgive, and therefore of course no criminal law—for the Millennium begins with individual heart and the restraint of individual passion.

THE OCEAN WAIF.

THE night was long, and dark, and drear:
The waves ran fierce and high:
The storm-fiend howled across the sky,
There was no beacon nigh.

She strove to breast the raging surge,
She watched the weary hours of day:
And still with brave heart strove to urge
Her frail bark on its way.

But when she found it might not be,
She knelt with calmly-lifted face,
Facing above, with steadfast gaze,
Through black and frowning space.

She said, "I fear not the mad strife
Of this wild night for me:
It can but wash me from this life—
I am not afraid to die!

"I'm weary of this ceaseless battle—
Oh! Father, take me home above:
I have no longer strength to struggle
Alone—unbefriended by love."

And the dark sea, with a rush and roar,
Bore her away on its breast,
And cast her, frail flower! on a heavenly shore,
To bloom and glow in eternal rest.

TULA.

CHURCH'S HEART OF THE ANDES.

IN all the really great pictures, the Transfiguration, the Sistine Madonna and the Seggiola, the Communion of St. Jerome, the Last Judgment and Prophets and Sybils—with Church's and Salvator's Rosa—there was a sublime simplicity, a lack of remoteness and superiority—a magnificent self-possession, which disdains to captivate the spectator meretriciously with some trick of effect, like a coquette with a coy ringlet or an arch bend of the neck. Tricks of effect, like coy ringlets and arch neck-bendings, have a very temporary power. It is the repose of beauty which is permanently impressive.

In painting this picture of scenery, for the painting of which he is already famous, Mr. Church might easily have tickled the eye, and have satisfied a superficial expectation, by flooding his canvas with a glare of sunshine and illuminated mist which is popularly supposed to be the permanent condition of the tropical atmosphere. He has, however, conceived his work more wisely and profoundly. He knows that the true tropical scenery is copied with the greatest truth of nature. Hence the simplicity of his style. Hence the Lounger frankly confesses that he recalls no work either of Claude or Salvator which is, upon the whole, so satisfactory; and he thinks that all true lovers of nature, at once, but may indicate the kind of impression, in comparison with other great works of the historic painters. One star differs from another. But it is well to have it understood that we are speaking of stars and not of black-and-blues. Claude will probably always be supreme in a peculiarly idyllic charm, to which the lyrical or the critic is not chiefly inclined to be turbed. But Church's work belongs to a larger style.

As your eye wanders over the teeming richness of the scene, clings to the tingling luxuriance of the foliage, rests at the sunshine upon the bank, follows the winding, solitary path, the abounding and sparkling river—listens upon the lake and hears the deep roar of the basin, whose reverberation reveals the volcanic ground, sees the birds flashing, the butterfly hovering, and the humming-bird ing into distance, marks the infinite play of color upon the infinitely various lines of the mountainous rising, the glorious contrast a blaze of light on one its side, and still climbing those vast reaches of richness and of beauty, the lower heights and remoter peaks still bued with the soft glory of the equatorial heaven, and, floating on through the silent splendor that haunts, pants at last upon the mighty dome of snow that crowns the continent—then you feel the changeless magnificence of American scenery; in its most luxuriant and satisfactory type, has found its poet, for it is not only a scene which you see, but which the mind is refreshed with a more satisfactory sense of the opulence and majesty of nature.

In the manipulation of this picture Mr. Church seems to have bridged the gulf between the creation of the Pre-Raphaelites and the school of the Post-Raphaelites. The foreground is elaborated with a patience, a thoughtful study of nature, a fidelity to nature which Millar's might envy; while the whole scene has a vastness, a calmness, and a quiet breadth, which Salvator never attained.

"The Heart of the Andes" will be carried to Europe, but assuredly hope it will be brought back again, and remain permanently in this country. It may be seen for a little while at the Studio Building, in Tenth Street, near the Sixth Avenue; and whoever would study it with a full appreciation of the character, should carefully read the little pamphlet, "A Companion to the Heart of the Andes"—a most sympathetic, eloquent, genial, and intelligent description both of the picture and the spirit of the work, by the artist's friend, Theodore Winthrop, himself a South American traveler.

THE FEAST OF FLOWERS.

SOME kind lady of this city has given land enough upon Long Island, about forty miles from New York, and there is a railroad to it, and establish a horticultural school for poor orphan girls, who are supposed to have a fit capacity for securing money enough to erect buildings sufficient for a school of twenty-five pupils, after a festival of six days. An Anti-vocation society, music, oratory, painting, and sculpture will inaugurate the work, and a list of subscriptions under the auspices of the Seventy-first Regiment.

At least we hope that these festivities may serve to the benefit of the orphan asylum. It is a new movement—a new charity—and so long as we are honest men and women shall endeavor to continually new plans and movements of greater charity.

In Charles Reade's new novel—" Love me little, Love me long"—he makes the heroine announce that a woman of genius can have scenery spread to it—marriage and water-colors! Let us pluck out the sting of this satire. It is too late to prevent women from having a larger opportunity. Let us begin our share of the work by giving our sympathy and assistance to all such movements as this.

A WORD WITH "HOMO."

HOMO—a man—alludes to the Lounger's remarks upon differences of accommodation for different classes of people in railroads ("Saturday"), as he puts it, "money can buy the privilege of not having to ride in the same carriage with the common clods. Why deny the fact so far, and give money the right, when it wishes to vote, to buy the privilege of not having a street car for its own accommodation?"

Homo probably thinks he is a Democrat. He probably thinks, further, that democracy consists in bringing every thing down to the level of the poorest thing. But as long as a man is better dressed, or talks better grammar, or is more intelligent and intellectual than his neighbor, that man pays more for a better article. Homo avers that of all dergetic ideas this is not only the meanest but the most absurd?

Is there any injustice in selling cake for more money than bread? or a good horse or cow for more than a poor animal? or ten pounds of coffee for more than one pound? or the best seats in a theatre for more than the worst ones? or a diamond for more than a crystal? or a ride to Albany for more than a mile to Brooklyn?

These things, for which more is paid, are more valuable than the others; and money is given for one of the most valuable commodities possible. If Homo's wife were dangerously ill and he had to make a journey in the cars with her, probably he would be willing to pay more for a quiet, separate, and convenient car than he would for two seats in the crowd of chatters and spitters who might chance (only chance, mark; but then chat and s—t are chances in American travel, Homo will allow) to be occupying the other cars. Or if Homo and a party were making a pleasure-trip from the Providence to the Mississippi, is there any reason why they should not enjoy as much comfort of every kind as they can buy? We think it quite proper to remark that if they are not to buy that comfort to some some extent, they have no business to ride. Foolishly, to call "the common class," can not buy it, then they have no right to buy the convenience of the journey, because there are plenty of other people who can not afford that.

That is the way, according to the doctrine of Homo himself, he has no right to live in a better house, to wear more expensive clothes, to eat and drink more luxurious food, to have more books, pictures, or music, to be more intelligent or cultivated or travelled than his neighbor. He has no right, because, as he says, it is only money that buys these things, and the idea of money's buying things might to restrict to the excess of purchasing a separate street, or "the privilege of not having to ride in the same carriage with the common clods."

Excellent Homo! Excellent, but not perceptive. Does he not know that at this very moment money does buy the privilege of not riding in an emigrant car? and if one of "the common class" has the money, may he purchase that privilege? Then has Homo never reflected that a separate road is practically purchased by every person who drives in his own carriage through any public highway?

Homo and the rest of society don't give money its rights. Its rights are founded in great laws, which Homo does not see, and are therefore consulted. Whatever value is really computable in money, money will always buy, and ought to be able to buy; and as long as it is not true that one man is have more money than another—that is, so long as the lazy and the incapable are to reduce industry and thrift to their level—so long it will be right for one man to buy what some other man has not the means to buy. When railroad companies are of opinion that the plan of various prices is a profitable one, they have a right to do it when we want them, then we shall have such cars, and we shall have as much choice in our comfort of travel as we now have in hotels or in any other merchantable commodity.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—WILLIS, New York, wishes to know why we can not have "a column for correspondents." In the World of Fashion, Mr. Willis will find rather more than two columns, and in that for the 16th more than one column, devoted to letters and answers.

—R. S. writes from Boston in reference to the "Apologue" of the Lounger three weeks since, and asks:

"Supposing the good people who are willing say one shall subscribe a million to found a million had said, when they established their Botanical school, 'All who come to our country to teach botany must be able to talk as well as most pay a good round sum to support our school, and, in return, their children shall receive from us such care, the privileges of instruction; adding, 'But though our system is not so complete that we will be able to enforce our mass's attributed belief, yet, having based the theories we establish upon principles of the highest importance, we hold Dabolt in infinite reverence, and would have our pupils imbued with the same; and therefore we will have the solution of at least one of his problems read to them before leaving the school, by saying, our coming friends, who believe two and two make a million, it will be our duty to prove to the fallacy of his delusion and the soundness of their own.' Supposing the good people had spoken thus, would not the scholar who rebelle against the reading of Dabolt to be spanked?"

This simply begs the whole question. If the good people, that is, have based their political existence upon Dabolt, and hold that their political existence precedes all other questions, then they will, if they are in earnest, assert that they are "good," insist that every citizen shall conform to Dabolt. If they are not in earnest, they will not, they ought they to be, that any body should believe that twice two make a million. If they profess that Dabolt is an irrefutable belief, and invite the "coming friends" to pay equally for a Botanical school, they are knowingly no right to call their new scholar for his arithmetical views. The "coming friends" who pay a million for the Dabolt Botanical school, have equal rights there, or they have not. If they have not, then there is no question. If they have, then they can not insist just as strongly that Dabolt shall not be read as the "good people" insist that he shall. Every one is one supporter to Dabolt's views, and which bears heavily upon the case. Suppose that "the absurdes of our political existence" continue to exist, and that the "coming friends," but given equal legal, political, and religious rights as the rest of the people, "whether Dabolt agrees or not" last century, then how about spanking the Botanical pupil for non-conformity in arithmetic?

—IVES has written a fair poem in the Lamont of Aileen Gerald. Let him stay study not only Crabbe's poem, but the chapter in Sydney Smith's article on Jeffrey on the Art of Versification.

—LOTOS-EATER, Buffalo, is informed that the work he asks about will probably be issued in the course of this completion. The Easy Chair, book-form upon its completion. The Easy Chair, about whom Lotos-Eater further inquires, is such an old and confidential friend of the Lounger that the latter respects his secret as if they were his own.

—A WOMAN, Brooklyn, writes to the Lounger forcibly upon a subject of which he has expressed his own opinion so emphatically that he does not care to return to it just now.

Ye PICTORIAL HISTORIE OF HONEST ABNER HOWE'S JOURNEY TO PIKE'S PEAK IN SEARCH OF A RAPID FORTUNE.

1. Honest Abner meditateth upon ye cares of ye farmer's life, and decideth to emigrate to Pike's Peak.

2. Not to dig gold, as neighbor Crumps supposed; but—shrewd Abner!—to vend groceries and liquors to ye fat-pursed gold diggers, at a profit which ye honest man leaveth for future consideration.

GROCERIES
GROCERIES
GROCERIES

COUNT CAVOUR.

No statesman in Europe occupies a more prominent position at the present time than the nobleman whose name heads this article; his portrait, which we give herewith, is part of the pictorial history of the day.

Count Cavour is another of the many examples of democratic success which continental Europe is now producing. His father was a merchant of Nice, who made a large fortune, and, mainly through the influence of his son, obtained, late in life, the distinction he had coveted from his youth, a patent of nobility. The son, Camillo, was born in 1809. He spent his youth in the acquirement of knowledge and the delights of pleasure. His means, his rank, and the favor in which he stood at Court enabled him to move in the best society throughout the Continent; and though he took no active part at this time in public affairs, those who knew him were fond of predicting that he would make a name for himself some day.

He was one of the many thoughtful men who, in 1847, felt the storm coming. He was then thirty-seven years of age. Abandoning his associates and his pleasures, he repaired to Turin, and there established a newspaper, to which he gave the significant title of Il Risorgimento—"The Uprising." This journal was the first organ of Italian nationality and the revolutionary movement of 1848. The Italian mind was ready for it, and it achieved a complete success.

But, like nearly all the early leaders of revolutionary movements, Count Cavour and his paper soon found themselves outstripped in revolutionary fervor by other candidates for public favor. The fire kindled by the Risorgimento spread throughout Italy and throughout Europe; when Cavour tried to check it, the task was beyond his strength; and war was finally declared between Austria and Piedmont, against the wish, and in spite of the protest of the man who, above all others, had roused the Piedmontese to fighting pitch.

COUNT CAVOUR.—[FROM A LATE PHOTOGRAPH.]

Cavour, unlike his hot-headed countrymen, foresaw the result of the struggle. His foresight exposed him to no little obloquy at the time. From being the most popular man in Piedmont he fell into decided disgrace. But after a few months fighting had exposed the weakness of the revolutionary party, and enabled Austria to tighten her iron grasp on the best provinces of Italy, people began to think better of the Editor who, throughout the contest, had contended that it was premature.

In 1849 Count Cavour was elected to the Chamber of Deputies of Piedmont, and was soon elected to preside over the Department of Commerce and Agriculture. In 1851 he became Secretary of Finance. This was the most onerous post in the Government, as the war bills of 1848 had to be paid out of an empty treasury. Count Cavour devoted himself to the task with such skill and energy that though enormous sums have been laid out since then on fortifications and other military works, the debt of 1848 has been put in convenient shape, the State credit now stands higher than that of Austria, and Sardinia is more prosperous than ever. A large part of this prosperity, we should add, has been the fruit of the free-trade policy of which Cavour was one of the earliest advocates.

In 1852 Count Cavour became President of the Council of Ministers, and has occupied the post—which is that of Prime Minister—ever since. The two leading measures of his administration have been his rebellion against Papal authority and his co-operation with the allied maritime Powers in the war against Russia. The former was a measure of great boldness, considering the power which the Church still wields in Piedmont. Nothing daunted, however, by the menaces of haughty priests, and even the bulls of the Pope himself, Cavour stripped the Piedmontese Church of its inalienable estates, and took education out of the hands of the clergy. No Protestant, and we trust, but few Catholics, can fail to applaud his policy. His co-operation with France and England against Russia was very dexterous. It secured the good-will of both the maritime States; while so small a Power as Sardinia could afford to risk the displeasure of a distant potentate like the Czar.

Count Cavour is the man, above all others, who has stirred up the present broil in Europe. If he succeeds, it is quite likely that he will be the first minister of Constitutional Italy. So high a rank may well stimulate his ambition, and provoke him to dare almost any thing.

MISS HOSMER'S STUDIO AT ROME.

We give herewith an engraving of a visit paid by the Prince of Wales to the studio of our gifted countrywoman, Miss Hosmer, at Rome.

Miss Hosmer's name is familiar to all lovers of art in this country. The daughter of a physician now residing at Watertown, Massachusetts, Miss Hosmer was born in that town some twenty-seven years ago, and was educated at Miss Sedgwick's school at Lenox. Her taste for art developed itself at an early age, and as soon as she reached womanhood she repaired to Rome, and entered Mr. Gibson's studio as a pupil. Under the guidance of that renowned master she fulfilled her youthful promise; her first work—a head of Medusa for Mr. Appleton of Boston—was deservedly lauded by the critics. Since then she has executed various statues of remarkable merit, among others a Beatrice Cenci, which attracted great attention last year.

She is now engaged on a statue of Zenobia—which will be seen in our engraving. Letters from Rome tell us that it will vindicate Miss Hosmer's claim to a very high rank among the sculptors of the day. Mr. Gibson is said by a correspondent to have taken great pleasure in pointing cost its merits to the Prince of Wales; and the Illustrated London News is reported as having admired it enthusiastically.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT MISS HOSMER'S STUDIO.

LITERARY.

MR. CHARLES LANMAN has done excellent service in his DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS, published by Lippincott. The design of the work is to furnish, briefly, the prominent facts in the life of each member of the American Congress, from the earliest dates to the present time. To this is added a succinct appendix, containing a manual of reference for the use of any one who wishes to know any thing relating to the various departments of the United States Government and their successive incumbents, the courts of the United States and their judges, the States and their governors, with other similar information well arranged and easy of reference.

In the biographical portion of his work, Mr. Lanman seems to have escaped the ordinary error of fulsome praise bestowed on special favorites. He gives facts, and leaves comments for the reader. Hence his book is peculiarly valuable. We feel that we can refer to it, and while we can ascertain for the opinions of men on the lives and acts of Congressmen, we shall always turn to this book to be informed simply who the man was and what he did to make his name known in his country. Mr. Lanman has long been engaged on one of the most graceful writers, and in this new department of literature makes his ability equally manifest. The book will take its place as a standard work. It is an octave, well printed on substantial paper.

One of the most superb books of the year is the first issue of the new publishing house of S. A. Rollo & Co., in this city. WALL STREET AND THE SOUTHWEST is the narrative of Mr. John B. Ireland's travels, profusely and elegantly illustrated, forming a small elegant octavo, with some of the finest illustrations on wood from sketches by the author. The style of type and wood-cut paper is hardly exceed this specimen, and we congratulate the publishers on the impression their first book will create. Mr. Ireland has been accustomed to the river. The narrative, or the extracts from his journal which have come to our hands, is of the same, take us from Decmarch to Russia, Turkey, Palestine, and Egypt, back through the Holy Land and thence to France and Spain, thence to Europe again to Constantinople, and then to the sites of the Seven Churches in Asia Minor, across the plateaus of Susa, up the Indian Ocean, through India, visiting probably more parts of it than were ever before seen by any one man, and returning to us there in the Australian seas. On the whole the book covers more ground than any one man ever travels we have read; and, as might be expected, Mr. Ireland's notes are brief, and even meagre, in some places where we could wish them more full. He gives us but the notes of a passing traveller in most of the countries which he visited, and thus only serve to whet the appetite for fuller accounts of his adventures. His drawings are the most valuable portion of the work, and in many instances serve to give us ideas we have often wanted in relation to Far East. The portions of the work relating to India are more full and elaborate than the rest parts, and furnish many new points of information to the reader.

Virtue, Emmins, & Co. send out the first number of a new serial publication, THE AMERICAN ARCHIVES BY SEA AND LAND, to be illustrated with steel plates and wood-cuts, and to be edited by Dr. Robert Tomes. The name of Dr. Tomes is sufficient to insure the literary character of the work, of which the first number is an excellent commencement. The engraving of the Battle of Bunker Hill is spirited and artistic, and the first page engraving of the Battle of Plattsburg equally perfect as a work of art. It is the intention of the publishers to make the volume a complete history and naval history of the country. We can certify to our readers that Dr. Tomes is eminently able to do this work in the most admirable manner. There is every reason to suppose it will be a very popular and valuable addition to the drawing-room as well as the library table.

Messrs. Bangs, Merwin, & Co. announce a sale of coins and medals for the 4th and 5th of May. These gentlemen have already taken the position in America which is occupied by Sotheby & Wilkinson in London as auctioneers. Their sales of articles of every kind are to be conducted, since, in such matters, it is of great importance to know the character of the sellers, and that their statements can be relied on. This sale will have fewer coins than their late catalogue of Mr. Bogert's collection, but it contains some very interesting articles, and will command attention.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"ASANTEE" (Lockport).—A Pawn can not be taken in passing scarcely on the first move of a game, under the circumstances under which such captures are the mode are allowed. Supposing that you have a Knight on the fifth square of any one file, and your adversary has an unmoved Pawn on an adjoining file, and plays the advances such Pawn two squares, it is at your option to capture him in the same manner as though he had moved but one square on the square over which he has leaped. We do not understand your second question, and therefore do not answer it. [Ed.] [Ed.] [Ed.]

FRANCE.

WAR PROSPECTS.

The news continues threatening. The negotiations for the Congress were progressing slowly. Austria positively refuses to take part therein without previous unanimous understanding.

The latest complication of affairs is warlike. Paris let the great peace so hopeless. The movements of the armies in Italy had assumed most threatening proportions. The preparations otherwise continued.

The papers nevertheless assert that France is not armed.

Austria's propositions in regard to the Congress are said to be unacceptable to France, which is not prepared to take the field for a month or six weeks. Negotiations consequently make delay.

A MILITARY'S JOKE.

One of the visitors who thronged the sale-chambers of Count Cavour, when he was here, was Baron Alexander. The Hebrew magnate was received with all the courtesy which success always commands, and was one of the first greetings the facetious Piedmontese Minister met with. "Well, M. de Rothschild, would you not be astonished to learn that I had tendered my resignation? You would see the funds rise at least five points on the day." The Baron responded, "Oh, my dear Count, you are pretty well aware that I should not wait your full with a rise of a per cent. in Rentes."

A NEW SECT OF CHRISTIANS.

A Paris correspondent writes: "A curious new sect of Christians, to whom we have before alluded, called Transmigrationists, have of late become very numerous in France. Quite different from the Spiritualists, their character is highly moral, and they creed Christian, only they believe all animals in their kind of existence receive piety. They profess to believe that being changed after death into some animal or inferior human subject. To this many their intense kindness to animals."

TERRIBLE ADVENTURE IN A CAVE.

The Droit has the following story: "At Tremaud, near Carcassonne (Aude), in the month of May last, there was a grotto of great beauty, and near it are several openings in the ground of fathomless depth. A few days ago a shepherd boy, in passing one of them, threw in a stone, and, to his astonishment, heard it fall on something like a bone mound. At first he was greatly frightened, popular superstition attributing to these caves the existence of monsters; but, encouraged by his curiosity, he threw another stone, which was also followed by a moan from below, thus causing himself to fall to the ground. He remained there for near the opening, and having cried out to the person below, heard inarticulate sounds responding. Convinced that some one was below, he summoned a number of villagers, and they, descending by a rope, found a man, who, let down a rope. When the rope had descended about sixty metres they could hear him unloosed, and they called to the person below, but could not understand his answers; and, having fastened another rope securely attached to the rope, they proceeded to draw it up slowly. It was a considerable time before the head of the unfortunate appeared, bringing to the light of day a man in a deplorable state that he could scarcely reply to the questions put to him, and was carried to the nearest house, where he had recovered sufficiently to state that, two days before, as he was going from Tremaud to Cabrespine, he accidentally pretired two blows on the head, which stunned him. What then took place he could not tell, but on his return to consciousness he found himself in darkness and in a deep cavern, and, after groping about, he found that he had partially dug himself into a hole, and had there remained for eight days without either giving in his adhesion or intimating his intentions. Thus reduced, instigated by this attitude of non-commitalism, the lady at last fell back to the silent interview with the enemy.

"I suppose you don't believe these stories, Captain?" said the lady, with a look which was intended for a smile to anguish that widely over the hospitable; but I took upon the marvelous much in the same light as did Saint Thomas."

"That is to say," returned the lady, 'in order to believe, you must first see.' I am of the same opinion as you re-nerve, and you shall see, you shall hear, you shall judge for yourself."

"Joy! I be permitted to take an active part in the affair?"

"Certainly."

"Then I will be most happy to be convinced."

"The next day the two visited the sorcerers in regard."

"I am about to be married," said the gentleman, without further preface, 'I should like you to tell me whether your sovereign eye can discern any parts, and whom my fr nuptiary man is satisfactory; if the deference of my love, if so how can compatible."

"The somnambulist, after closely scrutinizing her interrogator, replied, 'I see nothing in you, lie, to cause the slightest anxiety.'

"I am certain?"

"I have done so."

"Then I am to sound and unhurt?"

"Yes."

"No injections?"

"None whatever."

"You hear, madam!' said the gentleman, turning to the lady who had suggested the consultation, 'I am destined for no almost time to put an end to this nonsense.' Then addressing the somnambulist, he continued, 'Now tell me, if you can, Y. I have left a leg in Africa, and a hand in the Crimea. Look, I will show you my wounds.' And he began with his false foot, and rapped upon the table with a hollow, metallic sound.

"Physical hand, magical leg!"

Thereupon the somnambulist observed that she felt very much annoyed, begged her visitors to excuse her, and disappeared."

THE PRINCE OF QUDE BEHIND THE SCENES.

He adds: "The young Prince of Oude is just now the object of public attention and curiosity. He is the son of Soliman a lame of the tooled formerly occupied by the banker Aguado, and lives in a style of princely magnificence and splendor. Not long since he made his appearance in a box at the Grand Opera, dressed in a costume of white satin, and loaded with food. Soldiers have so many ingredients been invited at an entertainment, and have been accustomed to see him. But the Prince of Oude is a right royal looking personage, and, notwithstanding his dusky color, would be no disgrace to any family. So, then, if you and in his natural grace the additional lustre of a princely ancestry, you can imagine that the sensation produced by this extraordinary visitor must have created in a theatre. Opera house. Between the acts of 'Herman and Dorothea,' effusive eloquence introduced the Indian Prince behind the scenes; and his presence in the green room inside the damsels of the ballet produced even a more powerful effect than on the occupants of the boxes. Their glances of tender admiration were bestowed upon his diamonds! Their sighs of envy were breathed upon his exposure to so dangerous a vicinity of smiles and eloquent looks! Not willing to compromise the dignity of the royal personage of Oude, I must add that the Prince is very young, and do not say whether he came forth from behind the scenes on the surface or not."

THE AUSTRIAN ANSWER TO ENGLAND.

The following is a copy of a note from Count Buol to Lord Loftus, dated Vienna, March 31, setting forth the Austrian conditions for the preservation which Austria puts upon the basis of discussion:

"The undersigned, etc., hastens to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Lord A. Loftus has done him the honor to address to him under date of the 25th inst., and which conveys to him the conditions upon which the Government of her Britannic Majesty is ready to accept the proposal of a Congress. The undersigned would have taken into consideration the complications which have arisen between

"The British Government having, moreover, expressed the wish to learn the Imperial Government's opinion upon these propositions, he undersigned has taken, on this subject, the orders of his Majesty the Emperor, his master.

"He finds himself to-day authorized to inform Lord A. Loftus that the Imperial Government is convinced highly the motives which guide the British cabinet, and the sentiments of moderation which have led it to understand toward Austria, accepts in the measure stated in the above letter such portions of the basis of discussion proposed by the note of his lordship.

"A fifth point of deliberation which he has thought fit to add, that of an agreement on a simultaneous disarmament. The Cabinet of Vienna, will, on the other hand, regard the adoption of this measure as a new proof of the pacific intentions of Austria.

"I remain again, from the words of Lord A. Loftus, that if the Imperial Government accepts, on the conditions mentioned above, the proposal of a Congress, the British Government will invite that of France in a pressing manner to accept it in the same way. In this case Austria should discern at once, and to give it a collective guarantee for the fulfillment of the obligations which will result from it.

"In this step, which the British Cabinet proposes to take in concert with the Austrian Government, is the more conformable to the present interests of Europe, as it seems impossible, on the one hand, that Austria can already shown by its note addressed to M. de Bulow on the 9th of the 21st inst., to the Prussian Cabinet, the presence of the clang of arms. The undersigned must not leave eagerly doubt that these negotiations should have full and entire effect, as Austria could not present herself at the Congress with the hope that it would be completed her disarmament, and shall have proceeded to the mobilization of her forces. If, on the contrary, hostilities defined and executed, the Imperial Government declares that it will not attend the Congress, and that it will continue the Austrian Cabinet will not attack Sardinia pending the duration of the Congress, and for a period of time to expect the hostile territory and that of the Duchies.

"In requesting Lord A. Loftus to bring the contents of the note to the notice of his Government, the undersigned takes advantage of, etc."

THE BASES OF NEGOTIATION.

ENGLISH PROPOSITIONS AS TO THE CABINET OF VIENNA.

I.

Means of securing the maintenance of peace between Austria and Sardinia.

II.

Evacuation of the Roman States by the foreign corps of occupation, and a definite arrangement for the

III.

A combination to be submitted for the special treaty between Austria and the Italian States.

IV.

Territorial arrangements and the Congress of 1815 shall not be touched.

AUSTRIA.

THE AUSTRIAN ANSWER TO RUSSIA.

Count Buol-Schauenstein has addressed to M. de Balabine a note relative to the Russian circular of the 15th inst. of Italy. The Austrian answer, dated Vienna, March 31, 1859, is as follows:

"The undersigned, etc., has hastened to submit to the Imperial Government the circular addressed by M. Gortschakoff, etc., has made to him in the name of his Court, by communication of the circular addressed by M. Gortschakoff, under date of 2.st (5th), d. c. (31st of March), in which it is stated that the Russian Government considers it a supreme effort to insure the maintenance of peace, pre-ent the outbreak of a war which it is to be feared would which should embrace to adjust the Italian complications. The Russian Government has, moreover, declared its desire to see Great Britain associated with the efforts of Prussia.

"In execution of the orders of his Imperial Majesty, the undersigned has the honor to make known to M. de Balabine that Austria is ready to accept the proposal of to bring to the cognizance of his court.

"The undersigned has, at the same time to sentiments which have inspired to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and to the moderation which has guided his policy, desiring to lend his concurrence to a work which must sanction more and more the maintenance of peace, and the totality of rights deriving therefrom, the Emperor Alexander, and to the moderation which has guided his policy.

"In the opinion of the Imperial Cabinet, the whole question resolves itself into the following terms, which it follows in her foreign relations. To put an end to this state of things, which, by prolonging itself, would necessarily return, such appears to be the task reserved to the Powers called upon to the present moment of difficulty.

"If, however, besides this question, which the undersigned considers as the principal object of solicitude for the moral pacification of Italy, it should enter into the intentions of the Imperial Russian Government to discuss, in addition, it would be to see with pleasure that the Cabinet of Vienna should be associated, inasmuch as they should not be in contradiction with the preservative bases, the undersigned could not dispense with insisting above all things that the mode of proceeding in this case should be conformable to the rules formulated by the protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle, under date of Nov. 15, 1818.

"In conclusion, the undersigned must lay stress on a last consideration. It is that of the complications of situation in presence of the clang of arms and of the preparations which are being made on all sides. Austria, for her part, has morally impossible. It is therefore indispensable, according to her opinion, that the Powers should, by a declaration of their intentions, put an end to a state of things which, if it were to continue, would necessarily lead to a conflict.

"The undersigned remains, etc."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Saturday, April 30, 1859.

TRADE continues moderately active; the spring increasing every day, and Southern purchasers are becoming more free. The Southern and Western buyers than usual, as was expected; but should the present crop present be maintained, the trade will be large for the season.

Money continues as cheap as at any time during the past year. Call loans are made at 4 per cent. on Stocks and Government Stocks, and 44 on railway property; first-class short paper can be had at 5@6. Exchange on Europe is firm at 110 @ 110½ for sterling, and 5.10 @ 5.11½ for francs.

Stocks are lower again. In the absence of public support the bear bulkers of Wall Street move Stocks up and down as they please; the past month or six weeks have witnessed a steady and general depression.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, April 30, 1859.

THE Wholesale Dry Goods Markets have been quite brisk for Flour, which has advanced.....Grain has been very moderately dealt in.....Provisions have been fairly purchased. Pork has declined. Beef has increased in value .....Groceries have been in good demand at our revised quotations.....Cotton is dull and lower.....Hay has been in request at full rates.....Hemp, Hides, Leather, Petroleum, Seeds, Tobacco, Naval Stores, Oils, and Tallow have been less inquired after.....The demand for Fish has been fair, and prices have favored sellers.....Wool attracts active attention at somewhat easier rates.....Investments in Dry Goods have been quite limited. Prices of Metallic Goods, however, have been maintained.

The value of the week's imports of Dry Goods has been $1,614,848, and against $191,750 the same week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $6,012,894 against $4,021,894 same period last year. The movements in other commodities have not been sufficiently large to be of marketable changes.....We append a revised list of the shipping quotations for the leading articles:

Superfine State Flour, per barrel	$5 00	@ $5 00
Extra State, do.	5 10	@ 5 15
Superfine Western	5 05	@ 5 05
Extra Do. Extra Ohio	5 25	@ 5 30
Extra Missouri	6 00	@ 6 00
Superfine Southern	5 05	@ 5 05
Extra Southern	6 05	@ 6 15
Superfine Canadian	5 05	@ 5 05
Extra Do.	5 10	@ 5 15
White Michigan Wheat, per bushel	1 50	@ 1 55
Red Southern Wheat	1 40	@ 1 45
Red Western Wheat	1 45	@ 1 47½
Barley Malt	1 00	@ 1 05
Chicago Spring	1 00	@ 1 03
Rye, per bushel	84	@ 85
Rye	84	@ 85
Western Corn	65	@ 66
Western Oats	38	@ 38
Southern Corn	65	@ 66
Southern Oats	38	@ 38
Prime, nominal, per barrel	13 50	@ 14 00
New Mess Pork, per barrel	—	@ 16 12½
Prime Do.	12 75	@ 13 00
Country Mess Beef	11 00	@ 11 50
Prime, per pound	6½	7
Shoulders	6½	7
Hams	10	@ 11
Lard to Prime State Butter	10	@ 11
Prime to Choice	18	@ 20
Choice	20	@ 22
Cheese, per pound	8½	@ 9½
Tallow, per pound	9½	@ 10
New Orleans Sugar	6	@ 6½
Havana Sugar, per pound	6	@ 6½
Hyson Tea, per pound	35	@ 40
Young Do.	35	@ 40
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	—	@ 25
Rio Coffee, per pound	10	@ 11
Hay, Shipping lots, per 100 pounds	—	@ 75
Hay, retail, per ton	—	@ 100
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	$ 3 00	@ $3 50
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	37½	@ 38
Tar, per barrel	2 75	@ 2 87½
Rosin, common, per 280 pounds	1 62½	@ 1 75
Rosin, fine, per 280 pounds	2 00	@ 2 12½
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6	@ 12
Seed Do.	6	@ 12
American Fleece Wool	42	@ 45
Do. pulled	30	@ 35

The Live Stock Markets have been more freely supplied with Beeves, which have declined slightly.....Milch Cows have been in fair demand, and prices are unchanged.

Sheep and Lambs have been more sought after..... Swine have been in limited request.

The following is a correct account of the Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday and Monday:

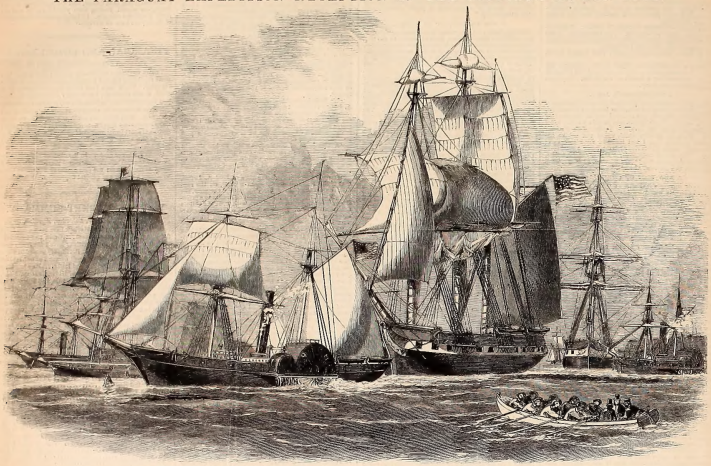
	Wednesday.	Monday.
Ordinary to Premium Beeves, per pound	$ 6@ 8	$ 6@ 8
Cows and Calves, per head	30 @ 60	30 @ 60
Veal Calves, per pound	— @ —	— @ —
Extra Veal Calves, per pound	8 @ 9	8 @ 9
Do. per pound	7 @ 8	6½ @ 7½
Live Swine	— @ —	— @ —
Dressed Do.	— @ —	— @ —
Sheep, each	1 00 @ 3 00	— @ —

The Country Produce Markets exhibit no really new features. Supplies good; prices consequently moderate.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$2 50	@ $6 00
Dried Apples, per pound	7 @ 9½
Peaches, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Pineapples, per 100	4 00	@ 6 00
Pineapples, per dozen	1 00	@ 1 50
Onions, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Potatoes	4 00	@ —
Sweet Potatoes, per barrel	2 50	@ 3 00
Turnips	1 00	@ 1 25
Ducks	1 00	@ 1 75
Hens	1 00	@ 1 75
Chickens	1 00	@ 1 25
Cabbage, new, per 100	4 00	@ 8 00
Cabbage, old, per 100	2 00	@ 3 00
Pumpkins, new, per 100	10 00	@ 40 00
Pumpkins, old, per 100	5 00	@ 10 00
Green Peas, per bushel	2 00	@ 3 00
Green Corn, per 100	6 00	@ 8 00
Chickens, per pound	15	@ 18
Fowls	7	@ 10
Turkeys	15	@ 17
Ducks	15	@ 17
" black, per pair	60	@ 75
" white, do.	75	@ 1 00
canvas back	1 00	@ 1 50
" red head	1 00	@ 1 50
grey	50	@ 62½
Venison, per pound	10	@ 12½
Hares, per pair	1 37	@ 1 50
Wild Pigeons	1 00	@ 2 00
Gray Squirrels, per pair	75	@ 1 00
English Snipe	87	@ 90

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION--RECEPTION OF THE OFFICERS AT SAN JOSE.



THE PARAGUAY SQUADRON AT ROSARIO.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WE are happy to be enabled to engrave herewith, from photographs and sketches furnished us by our correspondent on board the Paraguay squadron, some interesting pictures of the bloodless encounters which have been happily substituted for the conflicts that were expected when the expedition set sail.

One of our engravings represents the fleet at anchor at Rosario on Washington's birth-day. The Commodore returned from Asuncion on 18th February, and peace having been settled, all the ships of the squadron proceeded down the river, anchoring at Rosario on 23d February. In honor of the day salutes were fired, the ships dressed out, and the usual ceremonies observed.

It was while the fleet was there that the gallant hero—José Justo de Urquiza—whose portrait we gave in a recent number, invited the Commodore and the Commissioner to pay him a visit at his palace at San José. Accordingly the Fulton and the Water Witch left the squadron at the mouth of the Uruguay, and proceeded up stream to Concepcion. The voyage was difficult. The Uruguay is even shallower than the Parana, and is full of sand-banks. After one day's steaming the Fulton began to ground frequently. At the Tala Pass, six miles below Conception, there was found to be only nine feet of water on the bar, which, as the Fulton draws eleven, was conclusive against her reaching Conception. The Commodore accordingly shifted his flag to the Water Witch, and, in company with Mr. Bowlin and his Secretary, proceeded up the river to Asuncion. General Urquiza's invitation was only addressed to the Commodore, the Commissioner, and his Secretary; and Commodore Shubrick was unwilling to take the responsibility of extending it to any of the officers. On the arrival of the Water Witch at Conception, however, he was assured that the American dignitaries were expected to arrive with the largest possible suites, and that quarters had been provided for the whole party in the town. The Water Witch was accordingly sent back for the officers of the Fulton, and the number of American guests was accordingly swelled to some eighteen or nineteen.

GENERAL URQUIZA'S PALACE AT SAN JOSE.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

LASSOING BULLOCKS AT SAN JOSE.

In the afternoon of that day some half dozen vehicles, and as many saddle-horses, were provided by General Urquiza's aids, and the whole party started for San José, some twenty miles distance. The correspondent of the Times gives the following anecdotes by the way:

"On our way out of town, a guacho on horseback rode up to our carriage and hailed Dr. Victorica, the private secretary and son-in-law of General Urquiza. 'How is your horse?' asked the latter. 'Good for the next pass!' 'Ride on, then, and tell the President we shall arrive by half past six o'clock.' 'How long,' I inquired, 'will he be on the road?' 'An hour. He has been to San José twice already since the Water Witch announced you; that canina seventy-two miles he has ridden since ten this morning, and with eighteen more, which he will finish shortly, making ninety, he will have earned his carne con cuero.'

"The chasqui dashed his spurs into his horse's flanks, and disappeared like an arrow. Our carriage was drawn by two wheel horses, and by three others mounted by guachos, with hide lassos fastened to the tongue and to their saddles.

"At a half-way station we stopped to change horses—a corral full of animals stood near a couple of low thatched huts, from which, as we got down to stretch our limbs, there came two women and a pretty, bright-eyed child, to offer mate, foaming from the udder, hot sweet, and cold water. On a veiling awale a flock of 3000 sheep attested our arrival upon the premises of the richest man south of the Equator.

"While they were hitching up we had leisure to examine our guacho cavalcade. They were picturesque objects as they dashed about like centaurs, lassoing the horses and bringing them up to the wagons: their crimson and black ponchos fluttering in the wind, and their light ahotes tied beneath the chin by a handkerchief, which gave their swarthy faces a gipsy look. The emblem was drawn by six of them with no other harness than the lasso with which they capture horses and cattle."

The party arrived at the palace at San José—of which we give an engraving from our correspondent's sketch—about nightfall. They drove in through two lines of troops—cavalry, artillery, and infantry—and were received at the door by a group of handsomely-dressed aids-de-camp, who presented each guest to General Urquiza himself. We can not help copying a correspondent's account of the guests' fare that night and next day:

"The dining-hall reminded one of the banquet-room at Apsley House. The table reared to sink under the profusion of flowers and fruits. We sat down thirty, and you may judge of its width by the fact of there being four comfortable seats at each end. The dishes were carved by two side-de-camp, seated at small separate tables at either end of the room. I counted nineteen courses besides fruits, the first day. At ten we addjourned to the drawing-room for coffee, and toward midnight we broke up for an early start on the morrow. During dinner a military band in patio, or interior of the first quadrangle, entertained the repast with martial and patriotic strains, and as I gazed through the door beyond the arches of the interior portico into the green floor whence the sounds of trumpets and shawms proceeded, and caught a glimpse of a tar, duck-jumper musician and sweet soldier, I hoisted myself in the Alhambra before the days of Isabella the Catholic.

THE GUACHO DANCE.

"At daybreak next morning a group of sleepy aquaintances, with white teeth and coral lips, prevailed the bed-chambers with maid and coffee, at the request of the drowsy guests. Then came other damsels less obscure with toilet of the guests, and presently we were mounting with the dews of night."

It had been arranged that next morning the guests should be shown how bullocks are lassoed, and by 7 A.M. the whole party were in the saddle. Madame Ujueliqui, whose beauty and good nature our friends never tire of praising, accompanied the party in a light spanish quarre, and Isabel was left with her father; all the young men lost their hearts to her, and even Judge Bowling was uncommonly attentive. The following account of the sport, of which we give an engraving herewith, we take from the Herald:

"After passing in review the troops, two thousand strong, by which we had been saluted on the previous evening, and received for the nation the usual twenty-one gun, we proceeded as a gallop to the cattle ground, where about a thousand head of wild cattle had been assembled for our entertainment. There we saw for the first time the celebrated Dressed in the fantastic costume of the country, proud of his spurs and his horse, and holding in his hand the lasso of his country and ranch, he presented a perfect picture to the various performances in which he was now called upon to engage. Selecting one of the freshest bullocks, chase was given, the wild beast with all his might, the lasso whirling round in the skies of the animal of which he almost seemed part and parcel, and away they scampered like whirlwinds. The bullock ran with surprising rapidity for half a mile, seeming to defy pursuit, when suddenly the lasso which had been swirled, when a fellow splendidly mounted on the captain of the cattle—we see now gaining upon him at a pace I will not venture to calculate—the lasso whirled, fairly over the animal, the noose contracted at the critical moment, and there, with a proudish air, our cowboy lies around the neck, checked his course with a violence that threw him completely on his haunches. Up he reared, bellowing, kicking, while the gaucho unexpectedly held him to the fact—and the fact was considerable—that while his companion had similarly entangled the legs of the victim, and secured them all tight to the saddle girth, he was like a prisoner struggling with double irons. The animal had been thrown down, and in a few seconds giving him the full length of their lassos from his head and feet, said his captors were ready to be introduced to the ground. The enthusiasm increasing with this first success, chase was given to another animal. The field was covered with the freshest horses and the boldest horsemen, and the challenge to ride down bull to their old captivity. The admirers of these riders to the use of the lasso in the management of their horses, looking not a little romantic in their wild costume, with shaggy beard and fierce visage, certainly afforded infinite interest to those to whom such sports are new, and who felt saintly helpless in any effort to convey it in its reality and greatness. It is but weak to compare them to South American horsemen. It is a picture for the most vigorous and imaginative pencil—full of action and a poetry that is rude but fascinating."

There was a grand state dinner that day—"twenty-one courses, some one cannot tell how many, barbe profusion of viands and flowers," another correspondent says. Occupation in the garden of Paradise for flowers and fruits. They grow in the open air, not only the finest oranges, figs, and other tropical fruits, but grain and apples are among the best thing produced in this State. Our countrymen—from from sailor's fare—do not seem to have fared badly at this banquet.

In the evening there was a gaucho dance, which we give on page 301. "The gaucho, the national dance to be observed, are the peasantry of the country—fine brave fellows, full of life, and fond of riding untamed horses, great lovers of dress and fair ladies, and unrivaled with the lasso or the bolas. The Times correspondent thus alludes to the dance:

"After dinner we had a gaucho ball by torchlight in the second patio. The music was the guitar, and the player was a man of no mean performance, and the accompaniment with the tuneful voice of an Italian organ-grinder. The dancers were in couples as nearly as possible of Mexico and Chili. The waving handkerchiefs played an important part, and the whole display it seemed a trial of endurance. But the dances and the crowd, absorbed in their enjoyment of the music and dancing, seemed quite unconscious of our presence, so that their peculiarities were not constituted."

Next morning the guests left San José for their vessels. They bade adieu to their amiable hosts with many regrets, and earnest hopes of meeting them again. If General Urquiza should visit this country, he would find that we are neither a forgetful nor an ungrateful people.

FIVE YEARS AGO.

ONE cold, blustering, snowy night in December, I had reached my office utterly tired and exhaust, and with my day's labor; and as I threw myself into the great easy-chair before a blazing fire, the bituminous coal, and felt the cozy comfort of my room, the luxury of the warm dry stockings and slippers, the grateful fumes of the tea and steak standing before me on the table, I could not but feel great happiness in the thought that I had nothing further to draw me away from the home that night. I had often and often of my pathing in a state that my services could be dispensed with till morning; but it is a circumstance so seldom enjoyed by a physician in good practice, that when it does occur it is looked upon as no common holiday.

I could listen to the mutterings of the wind, and the tapping of the frozen snow against the window-pane, almost with enjoyment, or rather with a feeling that added a zest to what I was partaking of inside.

A blazing fire is provocative of thought, and a cup of tea is no preventive; I sat, therefore, and sipped and thought. I was leaning into the blaze, and recalling a hundred days in the past—a hundred incidents, having a chain that led invariably from my first thought. I recalled the night when I sat in my humble lodging the first day of my arrival in New York, fresh from the small town where I was accounted of some importance among my peers; and how my self-esteem was taken from me by one day's experience of the great city. I recalled my first entrance in the Medical School, and the high ambition, and the noble struggling; how from the half rude country lad to the rather stylish city student—young men in the leaping into society, and the first and last real passion of my life, Marianne Graydon, that more than sacred name for the space of twenty years—an agony for which I sit here a solitary, solemn man, wifeless and childless—for—for—but before the blazing fire that night and thought of it all.

I met her first at a musical soiree. Some way Marianne's face I heard during the time She was surrounded by a crowd while she was at the piano, rolling out with a careless abandon, one of the popular ballads of the day. I was not sufficiently critical to know whether her voice was of the highest cultivation or not; I only knew that, but I did know there was a spell in it to me that send me, and I was in a moment in a state almost a quarter of a century, ringing through my heart and brain. I stood with the crowd about the piano, and my eyes were those of his lady love, of middle height, quiet in appearance, save only when she turned them full upon you, and the eye to a face as she passed slowly up the room. I felt strangely that some portion of my soul had gone with her—something that I could recognize for the great body. It must have been so, for, reason as I would with myself, I could not love at sight. I could not exercise the strength to deny myself watching her in every movement, and finally seeking her.

I felt that room with the great problem of my life solved. Here was Marianne Graydon, the one whom I felt and acknowledged as my superior. Though I had scoffed at belles, and put forth in fashion's vestments, and been called such a one a brilliant belle—and yet she was not beautiful—and a blonde beauty was not my ideal of a belle. She had fine eyes, a wealth of very light brown hair, and then all was told. Nor was she rich, though she had the appearance of her set—not the most extravagant, but dressed with the most exquisite taste. She was a perfect gentlewoman. Don't great success was earnestness, which, whether it be affected or real, rarely fails to achieve great ends. I knew her destiny. She was created for the lived years. It was this love that caused me, on my graduation, to establish myself in practice in New York, rather than return to my native place. It would light the battle not upon the spot where she could see me struggle, and I could not be by for her sake. I am told that I am undemonstrative. To this, however, my professional success and my failures in life—failures to make myself understood, to attack those to me for whose affection I would have risked every sacrifice. If I am cold now in ordinary, I am sure it was not with approaches to Marianne Graydon. If I had concealed my ardor, I was laid aside, and with every wild word that passion could utter I pressed my suit.

I am sure she felt that I was not alone upon her telling. But the years went quickly away, and I still remained a poor physician, working among the thousands who possessed all the requisites of myself with more ability to make them known than myself, and who were rich and not marry. I knew it must be so. I could not bring her down from her position to mine. How were I willing—which God forbid!—I knew well that she would never consent.

My best friend was dead, she was mercenary, and I drove them away in derision. They said she never thought seriously of me, and I persuaded myself think now perhaps they were right and I was blind. They said Marianne Graydon only waited a wealthy lover to show me out of the house with a word garment. To this I knew they were right too now. Nine months after my first declaration and protestations of lasting friendship—amidst pleas for pardon and regrets that we had ever met—amidst entreaties entreaties that we might remain friends on my side, we parted, she to become Mrs. Robert Harrison, the son of a wealthy Philadelphia banker, and I to plod away on my daily round and build up that position before the world for which I had not all ambition.

It was upon this night, five years ago, I sat in my office reviewing my life and its prospects by the blazing firelight, and thinking for the thousandth time how strange it was since that time I had lost all desire for power, and never ambitioned even the eye of love again upon woman. Years enough had rolled away that I might know what the true ultimate destination, or whether she was yet living. I had made the wealth for which I had sacrificed herself and me had within one year of the great fire of '35. I had heard that her husband had left New York immediately after—I knew not whether he would I suffer my heart to ask. But upon this cold night in December all this past came back to me, and I reviewed the life that had, without my seeking, brought me reputation, wealth, and calm, quiet contest, more, perhaps, than I deserved. I thought of the husband of Marianne Graydon.

"Doctor, there's a man in the hall says he wants you."

I did not much like this interruption to my reverie. It came from my housekeeper. I have no doubt I spoke rather petulantly when I asked what the man wanted.

"He says he wants a doctor."

"Can not he find one somewhere else?"

"So I told him; but he says he won't go to any other this night—he has been to three without success already. And there he sits by the hall stove warming himself, quite comfortable like."

"Send him up to me."

I did not like to be interrupted, and much less I liked the idea of going out; and if the last could by any means be avoided I was resolved to do so. The man was ushered in. A miserable, squalid-looking wretch he was, and whom my housekeeper stood guard, not seeing disposed to trust him alone with me.

"What do he want?" I asked.

"A doctor, to be sure; what else do you think I came for?"

This was not a very encouraging beginning.

"For yourself?"

"No, I'm not," he grinned the man; "d'ye think now I look as if I wanted a doctor. No, Sir-ee! What I want is a doctor, and wants you."

"Who is Blind Mag?"

"Why, she's a woman, of course; she says so, anyhow."

"Where is she, and what is the matter?"

"Down here in Dutty Dick's, dying."

"Dying! what of?"

"Oh! what's the use asking a feller sich questions? I'm no judge what people does of. They dies—that's all I know."

I had got on my overcoat and boots as the man delivered this last address, and in a few minutes I was on my way, he trotting on a few steps in advance, and I following. We went on through blind entrances, over a heap of rubbish, groping up some flights of stairs, and entered in a room in one corner of which was a cot heaped with a parcel of dingy, dirty bed-clothes. A chest, a chair and table, with a clay furnace, a tinder wheel, a handle, and a few chunks of wood completed the furniture, the only light proceeding from one tallow candle burning from the neck of a bottle standing on the floor.

On the bed was my patient, introduced by the messenger as I entered, with—

"Who is you, Mag? Here's the doctor. That's Blind Mag, doctor." With this he disappeared.

The woman turned in the bed as I approached. Her light eyes were blind, but I could see that her hair was gray, and the spot where ours were the eyes was frightful to look upon. The lids were closed. She put out her hand with the peculiar manner of the blind.

"Where are you, doctor? May God bless you for coming to me, though you can do no me good in this world or have, perhaps, to smooth my path into the next."

The woman spoke well, and I knew directly had been best of education. I felt her pulse, and recognize that she should be able to fall lower in poverty than I thought. She was dying, in the last stages of consumption, hastened by foul air, bad food or no food, and exposure.

"I do not think you will go west on," But I sent for a physician—all of that profession are alike to me now. "I know, doctor, I can trust you. I have been blind now for years—I do not know for how many. Draw nearer, doctor; I wish to speak you."

I said something, entreating her to be still. For moment she was silent, and then breaking out again, she said:

"This world will soon close on me, doctor, and I have been blind and poor all till before a man enough to think that none could be so base as to cast any discredit with a dying woman. I like the sound of your voice; there is something in it that assures me you will serve me. Will you do me a last service, doctor?"

She had raised herself in the bed, and was sitting with her eyelids face turned toward me.

"If it is in my power, certainly."

In a half whisper she asked me:

"I have heard that the physician would buy a body for dissection. What is the price they generally give for?"

All my familiarity with sickness and death, with anatomy and the dissecting-room, could not save from the horror of this question. Was not the dying woman mean? From the hollow, black spots that once held eyes, she seemed to gaze at me with an intensity of horror. It was a question I dreaded to answer, and yet feared to leave unanswered.

"The medical schools buy subjects, not the physicians. They give generally from twenty-five to thirty dollars for a good, healthy body."

"Is that all?" she answered, and a deep shadow passed over her face, and then a contemptuous offering, she stretched forward. "Doctor, do you think I shall live?" I shook my head. "I am healthy, you mean I have not fallen away much yet are kept in a continued round of intoxication and glare—where thought is debarred, and tears are irresponsible—where she is the most worthy who is the most sinful; and talent is counted to her by the power she may possess of tossing down bumpers of Champagne, and persuading the half or wholly drunken men with whom she meets to do the same. A touch of paint to hide the ghastly pallor of the cheek; a little opium to brighten the eye; and an gorgeous folds over the corroding heart; jewels to flash under the glare of the gas—and you have a woman, and not merely a creature, with an immortal soul, made up for sale, and thrown out in the market to the highest bidder—sold for what you pay for her satin and silk, her jewels and gold, and—bread.

Bad enough! but worse! Is it while the poor intoxicated wretch is surrounded by splendor and plenty; but beauty can not last always—she must come one step down to the dirty shabby finery and the faded, grasping landlady, to the streets, and the theatres. Oh! that terrible seventeen years' history.

"And further still, if imagination can picture any thing worse. The garret and the corner grocery; the cellar, and the eager grasping hierarchy for rent. All these I have known, doctor—all these I have known in their bitterest way. I have been beaten, spat on, kicked, starved. The law has no protection for the abandoned woman. I am blind from the blow of a ruffian, who laughs when he sees me. Blind! Mag! I have been taken from the streets at night to be paraded in the morning with half a hundred fallen, shameless creatures like myself, to be mocked at, reviled and a jeering crowd. I have known the prison walls, and the prison fare. And all this, doctor—all these I have known in their bitterest way. I have been beaten, spat on, kicked, starved. The law has no protection for the abandoned woman. I am blind from the blow of a ruffian, who laughs when he sees me. Blind! Mag!'

ABEL'S LITTLE GO.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XIII.

A MORNING WALK.

The trick of which Gabriel had been the victim was, of course, an open declaration of war. It was curious how much he saw to be looked for a moment at Alfred Newt, while the shouts of the boys were yet tingling in his ears. Perhaps, however, not more than Abel heard as he listened to Gabriel's laugh.

The next morning Abel was early awake, pondering many things.

It seemed to him that it ought to be a very easy thing to know Miss Hope Wayne, and yet it perplexed him to see precisely how he should accomplish it. The heroes with whom he was familiar in romance never had any such trouble—at least, the troubles seemed to be only the rounds of the ladder by which they climbed up to bliss: and if those rounds were iron and were red-hot or white-hot to the soles of the heroic feet, what was that to the resolution to move more rapidly? Nay, and who knows that the eager, feverish feet themselves had not heated the ladder?

"Hallo! Gyles," cried Abel, "there goes the getting-up bell! Are you awake? Come! come!

"Awake! my Gyles, and with the sun
Thy daily course of duty run."

"Heigho! that infernal bell! What an outrage it is!" responded Gyles Blunding, as he yawned and stretched.

"My dear young friend, let me beg you to moderate your language: let me urge you not to use such words upon your first awakening in the morning; let me exhort you to a more serious frame. Listen to the little birds singing their matin hymns. Why carols not my Gyles his matins?"

The two boys laughed together as they sprang out of bed.

"Are you really going to study for the minister, Abel?"

"No, my Christian friend, I fear I am not worthy. Enough for me to sit under the teaching of the Reverend Gabriel Bennet."

"What's the matter with that boy? why are you always pitching into him?"

"Wasn't he a pleasing spectacle last night!" said Abel, chuckling, as he sat on the bed-side pulling on his stockings. "What! he did stand staring at us! What a simple, silly fool the fellow is to be caught in such a trap! He blushed like a girl! Hope Wayne, indeed! Hope Wayne's old enough to be his mother. Gabriel Bennet is a good boy," said Abel, with drawing sarcasm. "Oh! so good! Butter wouldn't melt in his mouth. Arn't good boys," he concluded, with bitter emphasis.

Gabriel Bennet's no coward, though," replied Gyles, as he stood in his drawers looking out of the window. "Last Saturday when the baker came, little Mahrens bought some sweet stuff as usual, and as he was putting off he met Green Maddock. He made him stop and deliver just as Gabriel was going by. Little Mahrens was ready to fight, but he wouldn't stand much chance with Green. So Gabriel steps up and says, 'Green Maddock, don't steal those cookies.' 'Steal! you little scamp, says Green; 'hold your tongue, or I'll speak to you.' 'Come, Abel, you should have seen Gabriel go in. It wasn't a fury, for he was sort of quiet in it, but was tremendous. Green got a plunk in his belly and a side-winder over the head before he knew where he was. He was down in a minute; and Gabriel played away on his great fat corpus like trip - hammer. Whew! I tell you what it was a real, regular licking. We all swit. At Green, which looked on, ready to help Gabriel if worst came to worst; and I think we were all satisfied to see Green catch it for once. He's always picking on those smaller boys."

"I wish I'd been there," responded Abel.

"What would you have done?" asked Gyles.

"I'd have stood by my order, Gyles. I wouldn't have seen a small boy flog a big one. My own boy, keep up our dignity, my good fellow," said he, half smiling, half sneering. "Yes, on the whole, I should like to have polished off the Reverend Gabriel Bennet—not that I adore Mr. Green Maddock, mind. I swear, is the greatest ass that ever went to breeches. Ass sine cibbus abbye, Gyles."

"What's that mean?"

"It means, my dear, that the big boys must not let the little boys be troublesome."

And the two chums went down to breakfast.

"Mr. Gray," said Abel, "may I go out of bounds after school?"

"What for, Abel?"

"I expect my aunt at the tavern to-day, Sir, on her way to Boston."

"Yes, Abel, and present our compliments, and beg your aunts to come to tea."

"Yes, Sir, I will, Sir, if I find her."

When school was out Abel strolled out of the yard and took the village road that led past the tavern. Abel, like the street, also passed; but also like the street, he made a little bend toward the door, and said to the landlord:

"Dibbery, if my aunt arrives before I return, ask her to step in and wait for me. Mind, Dibbery, on no account let her set out to find me. I don't want to have an aunt of mine falling into the pond. I love my aunts, Dibbery—particularly the one whom I expect to-day, will you remember? Let her have a cup of tea, a little go of rum and molasses."

And the boy turned again on the porch and stood at the bar-room window.

"Will your uncle come with your aunt, Mr. Abel?" inquired Dibbery, as he looked out with him the drink.

"Dibbery, my respected uncle is detained by business."

"At the sign of the three balls?" continued the landlord, unwearyingly.

Dibbery and Abel looked gravely at each other for a moment; and the youth, with his eyes still fixed upon the landlord, tossed off the mixture; then paying, and bowing soberly, turned away and walked up the village.

Mr. Dibbery, holding the empty glass in his hand, looked curiously after Abel. He gazed at his large foot upon the floor, and shut up one eye: then laughed a little, in a doubtful way, and whistled a few, long blasts, as if to make way for his mind to see something. He then turned slowly from the window, and leaning down upon the counter, saying, in an uncertain, amused way to himself:

"That's a queer chap. Now, Mange," he continued, addressing one of the stock company of the bar-room—a man lugged into the room by the ear, who sat winking his bleared eyes over an old newspaper—"Now, Mange, I rather guess I shouldn't like to have that youngster spin me any how. He's smart, I tell you!"

Mr. Mange looked up, blinked in his chair, and grunted. Meanwhile Abel pushed along the road, whistling cheerily, whipping the road-side grass and weeds with his little rattan, and all the while approaching the foot of the hill up which the road wound through the estate of Pinewood. As he turned up the hill he walked more slowly, and presently stopped and leaned upon a pair of bars which guarded the entrance of one of Mr. Burt's pastures. He gazed for some time down into the ugly green field that sloped away from the road toward a little bowery stream, but still whistled, as if he were looking into his mind rather than at the landscape.

After leaning and musing for a quarter of an hour, he leaped up the hill and continued upon his walk.

At length he reached the entrance of Pinewood—a high iron gate, between huge stone posts, on the tops of which were urns overflowing with vines, that hung down and partly tapestried the columns. Immediately upon entering the grounds the carriage avenue wound away from the gate, so that the passer-by could see nothing as he looked through but the hedge which skirted and concealed the lawn. The fence upon the road was a high, solid stone wall, along whose top fastened in stone fragments, so that, although the land rose from the road toward the house, the lawn was entirely sequestered; and you might sit upon it and enjoy the pleasant rural prospect of fields, woods, and hills, without being seen from the road. The house itself, about ten years old, was a stately, rather formal mansion, such as rich gentlemen built in the New England city neighborhoods forty years ago. Its light color contrasted well with the lofty pine-trees around it. But they, in turn, invested it with an air of secrecy and gloom. The cold sobriety of evergreens, that defy the soft influences of the year, carries with it inevitable awe; and under the steady, dark, heavy boughs lurks the mystery that trees which mark the seasons with shifting beauty never know.

These were the pine-trees that Hope Wayne had heard sing all her life—but sing like the ocean, not like birds or human voices. In the black autumn midnights they struggled with the north wind that smote them fiercely and filled the night with uproar, while the child cowering in her bed thought of wrecks on pitiless shores—of drowning sailors and hapless children. Through the summer nights they sighed. But it was not a lullaby; it was not a screaming: it was the crooning of a Norland enchantress, and young Hope sat at her open window, looking out into the moonlight, and listening.

CHAPTER XIV.

CASTLE DANGEROUS.

Abel Newt opened the gate and passed in. He walked along the avenue, from which the trees were still hidden by the skirting hedge, went up the steps, and rang the bell.

"Is Mr. Burt at home?" he asked, quietly.

"This way, Sir," said the smiling Hiram, going before, but half turning and studying the visitor as he spoke, and quite unable to comprehend him at a glance. "I will speak to him."

Abel Newt was shown into a large drawing-room. The furniture was draped for the season in cool-colored chintz. There was a straw matting upon the floor. The chandeliers and candelabras were covered with muslin, and heavy muslin curtains hung over the windows. The tables and mantel were of a clumsy old-fashioned pattern, with feet in the form of claws clasping balls, and a generally stiff, solid, and uncomfortable air. The fire-place was covered by a heavy painted fire-board. The polished brass andirons, which seemed to feel the whole weight of responsibility in supporting the family dignity, stood across the hearth, belligerently bright, and there were sprays of asparagus in a china vase in front of them. A few pictures hung upon the wall—family portraits, Abel thought; at least old Christopher was there, mounted on the top of ten, standing in very clean attire, holding a book in one hand and a hoop in the other. The picture was amusing, and looked to Abel wholesomely, representing the model boy, equally devoted to study and play. That simpering smile flitted over his face as he muttered, "The Reverend Gabriel Bennet!"

There were a few books upon the centre-table, carefully placed and balanced as if they had been portentously numerous. The bindings and the edges of the leaves had a fresh, unworn look. The outer blinds were closed, and the room received a chilly formality and dimness which was not hospitable nor by any means inviting.

Abel had seated himself in an easy-chair, and was still smiling at the portrait of Master Christopher Burt at the age of ten, when a tall gentleman, at the age of seventy-three, was heard in the hall. Hiram had left the door open, so that Abel had full notice of his approach, and rose just before the old gentleman entered, and stood with his cap in his hand and his head slightly bent.

Old Burt came into the room, and said, a little fiercely, as he saw the visitor:

"Well, Sir?"

Abel bowed like a gentleman, and looked like a beggar. Old Burt, accustomed to men, perceived the difference — besides, Abel was a handsome youth.

"Well, Sir?" repeated old Burt in a tone more lenient.

"Mr. Burt, I said Abel, "I am sure you will excuse me when you understand the object of my call, although I am fully aware of the liberty I am taking in intruding upon your valuable time and the many important cares which must occupy the attention of a gentleman as extensively known, honored, and loved in the community as you are, Sir."

"Oh!" replied Mr. Burt, with an ironical tone, "honored and loved, am I?"

"A gentleman in your position, Sir, who commands such means of helping others, not only with money, Sir, but by counsel and example, by showing them how to be economical, and—and—other things, Sir —such a man must be a very foolish man if he is not respected and loved by his neighbors, Sir."

Abel made this little speech with the candor which is so becoming in handsome boys. The old gentleman looked at him inquisitively, but not altogether displeased.

"Did you come here to compliment me, Sir?" asked he.

"No, Sir," replied Abel; "I was merely saying that my conduct in venturing to take up the time of a man of important affairs—"

"Well, Sir, what do you want? You've got some kind of subscription paper, I suppose." The old gentleman began to warm up as his mind struck a new idea. "But I can't give any thing. I never do—I never will. It's an infernal swindle. Some decayed Missionary Society, or Tract Society, or Bible Society, some damnable doing-good society, that bleeds the entire community, has sent you up here, Sir, to suck money out of me with your smooth face. They're always at it. They're always sending boys and ministers in the milk, by Jove! and women that talk in a way to turn the milk sour in the cellar, Sir, and who have already turned themselves sour in the face, Sir, and whom a man can't turn out of doors, Sir, to wrestle money out of innocent people! I tell you, young man, 'twon't work! I'll be cursed if I give you a solitary red cent!" And the old gentleman, in a fine wrath, seated himself by the table and wiped his forehead.

Abel stood patiently and meekly under this gust of fury, and when it was ended, and Mr. Burt was a little composed, he began quietly, as if the indignation were the most natural thing in the world:

"No, Sir; it is not a subscription paper—"

"Not a subscription paper!" interrupted the old gentleman, lifting his head and staring at him. "Why, what the dickens is it, then?"

"Why, Sir, as I was just saying," mainly assumed Abel, whom no petulance could distress, "it is a personal matter altogether."

"Eh! eh! what?" cried Mr. Burt, as if he were just on the edge of another paroxysm, "what the deuce does it mean then? Who are you, Sir?"

"My name is Newt, Sir—Abel Newt."

"Well, Mr. Abel Newt, where do you come from?"

"My home is in New York."

"Well," roared the old gentleman, "suppose it is! Have you been two-and-an-Eye want with me? That's what I want to know."

"Well, Sir, I have been for some time at Mr. Gray's school, Sir—"

"What! what!" thundered Grandpa Burt, springing up suddenly, his mind opening upon a fresh scent. "One of Mr. Gray's boys? How dare you, Sir, come into my house? Who sent you here, Sir? What right have you to intrude into this place, Sir? Hiram! Hiram!"

"Yes, Sir," answered the man, as he came across the hall.

"Show this young man out."

"He may have some message, Sir," said Hiram, who had heard the preceding conversation.

"Have you got any message?" asked Mr. Burt.

"No, Sir; but I—"

"Then why, in Heaven's name, don't you go?"

"Mr. Burt," said Abel, with placid persistence, "being one of Mr. Gray's boys, I go of course to Dr. Peewee's Church, and there I have so often seen—"

"Come, come, Sir, this is a little too much. Hiram, put this boy out," said the old gentleman, quite beside himself. "Seen, indeed! What business have you to see, Sir?"

"So often seen your venerable figure," resumed Abel in the same tone as before, while Mr. Burt turned suddenly and looked at him closely, "that I mistrually asked who you were. I was told, Sir; and hearing of your wealth and all family, and of your services to the village and State, I was interested—it was only natural, Sir—in all that belongs to you."

THE BATTLE.

"Eh! eh! what?" said Mr. Burt, quickly.

"Particularly, Mr. Burt, in your——"

"Sir, you're young man, you'd better go if you don't want to have your head broken." Do you come here to bend into my own house? Do George? your impudence positively surpeties me, Sir. I tell you go this minute!"

But Abel continued:

"In your beautiful——"

"Don't dare to say it, Sir!" cried the old man.

"Place," said Abel, quietly.

The old gentleman glared at him with a look of mixed surprise and suspicion. But the boy wore the same look of candor. He held his cap in his hand. His black hair fell around his handsome face. He was entirely calm, and behaved in the most respectful manner.

"What do you mean, Sir?" said Christopher Burt, in great perplexity, as he seated himself again, and drew a long breath.

"I mean only, Sir, that being attracted by your appearance in church, which you will grant, Sir, is not like that of the other gentlemen in the congregation, I asked about you, and I heard of your beautiful place. It has long been my favorite walk, Sir, but I could only pass by outside, and I never saw a gentleman in the place, not even Hiram," said Abel, gravely, turning slightly toward Hiram, with a very slight very fond of sketching, Sir. My teacher says I drew very well, and I have had a great desire to draw your place, Sir. And I did draw it one day. There is a tradition in school, Sir, that you don't like Mr. Gray, Sir, and I hope the boy who could introduce me, Pardon me, Sir, for saying that I was afraid of you. I looked at you in church, and I saw that your face was full of kindness, but it was also a little severe, and—yes, Sir, it was severe. So I did not, as came by, every thing looked so beautifully, and I was so sure that I could make a pretty picture if I could only get it here to come inside the grounds, that almost unconsciously I found myself coming up the main road and jogging the bell. That's all, Sir; and I'm sure I beg your pardon for troubling you so much."

Mr. Burt listened to this speech with a puzzled air. He was perhaps a little ashamed of his furious outburst, and was disposed to be more graciously inclined toward the request of the young man. Besides, testy old queens or grey hairs are not proof against flattery. Are they not the parents of pretty ribbons and excellent looks?

So the old man said, with tolerable grace:

"Well, Sir, I am willing you should draw my house. Will you do it this afternoon?"

"Really, Sir," replied Abel, "I had no intention of asking any favor; and as I have drawn out merely for a walk, I did not bring my drawing materials with me. But if you would allow me to come at any time, Sir, I should be very deeply obliged. I am devoted to my art, Sir."

"Oh! you mean to be an artist?"

"Perhaps, Sir."

"Phit! phit! Don't do any such silly thing, Sir. An artist! Why how much does an artist make in a year?"

"Well, Sir, the money I don't know about, but the fame!"

"Oh! the fame! The fiddle, Sir! You are capable of better things."

"For instance, Mr. Burt—"

"Trade, Sir, trade—trade. That is the way to fortune in this country. Enterprise, activity, shrewdness, industry. That's what a man wants. Get rid of your fol-de-rol notions about art. Be useful. Why don't you go into my office? but he was an exception, and besides, he lived in England. I respect Benjamin West, Sir, of course. We all do. He made a good thing of it. Take the word of an old man who has seen life and knows the world, and remember that, with all your fine fiddling, it is money makes the mare go. Old men like me don't mince matters, Sir. It is money—money—money."

Abel thought old men sometimes minced grammar a little, but he only bowed, and Mr. Burt looked respectful and said, "Yes, Sir."

"About drawing the house, come when you choose," said Mr. Burt, rising.

"It may take more than one, or even three or four afternoons, Sir, to do it properly."

"Well, well. If I'm not at home ask for Mrs. Simcoe, d've hear? Mrs. Simcoe. She will attend to you."

"Sir Burt, I'm sure I am very grateful for your kindness."

"Oh well! well! no matter. Good-by, Sir."

"Good-by, Mr. Burt. Thank you, Sir."

Abel bowed very respectfully to me of 'he were controlling a strong desire to kneel and kiss the hem of his garment. Christopher Burt, but he mustered himself, and Hiram opened the front door. As he was going out the old gentleman called to him, standing in the doorway of the drawing-room.

"Look here! young man; don't you be an artist. Trade's respectable. Artists, authors, and actors, are all alike. Don't like to have 'em in my house. There may be good ones among 'em. No matter—" the old man slapped his pockets. "Be a merchant prince, by Jove, Sir, then you have things as you want 'em."

Abel bowed as before, and said, "Thank you, Sir."

"Good-by, Hiram," said Abel, putting a piece of money into his hand.

"Oh no, Sir," said Hiram, pocketing the money.

Abel walked sedately down the steps, and looked carefully around him. He scanned the windows; he glanced under the trees; but he saw nothing. He did every thing, in fact, but make sure that Melissa he had been asking permission to draw. It must be confessed he felt a little chilled. But then Napoleon after Marengo was not depressed, although he had been at one moment nearly defeated.

And Next walked, faster as he approached the gate. He opened it; flung it to behind him, broke into a little trot, and almost tumbled over Gabriel Bennet as he did so.

CHAPTER XV.

A CRISIS.

Gabriel and Little Malacca had strolled out together. Little Malacca he was called, and the tradition of the school would have given him the same sobriquet had he been fifty inches of thirteen. The two boys had been drawn together by some kind of sympathy, which neither of them thought of explaining, and after Gabriel had so gallantly given battle to Green Maddock, in behalf of his friend, the tie was closer than ever.

During all this day Gabriel Bennet had been very silent. Little Malacca he was called, and the tradition of the school would have given him the same sobriquet had he been fifty inches of thirteen. The two boys had been drawn together by some kind of sympathy, which neither of them thought of explaining, and after Gabriel had so gallantly given battle to Green Maddock, in behalf of his friend, the tie was closer than ever.

During all this day Gabriel Bennet had been very silent. He was thinking, and thinking very sorry to see the shock of astonishment with which the trick had smitten the boy on the previous evening. And now after all other people's sorrows with great ease, and he had forgotten it most completely, he could not sleep at off. A boy's love is a holy secret, and to be cheated out of it by a wretched trick!

"Oh! I do wish," said Little Gabriel to Little Malacca as they rambled by the tavern, bending their steps toward the hill of Pinewood.

"Yes," laughed the other.

"What do you wish?" said Gabriel.

"I wasn't thinking of him," said Gabriel, in a tone that implied that he was not quite intently of some one else. After a few moments he continued, indignantly.

"A fellow that wants to fag another is a mean coward."

"So he is," echoed his companion.

"He'd throw a fly into a spider's web for the fun of it."

"Of course he would," said Little Malacca, who implicitly believed that whatever Gabriel Bennet chose to say was true.

The two boys turned up the hill, Gabriel left the way, sometimes kicking a little stone into the road, sometimes muttering to himself ejaculations: altogether angry, mortified, and surprised. He had involuntarily learned the tragic password which opened his secret treasury. It was secret no longer.

They stopped at the bars upon which Abel had leaned a little while before, and the trustful tendency not to think evil of the world been so ready to believe that Abel threw open the gate, began to run, and came directly upon Hiram and Abel in full talk.

The collision was rude, and the three boys stopped.

"You'd better look where you're going," said Gabriel, sharply, his cheeks reddening and swelling.

Abel's first impulse was to strike; but he restrained himself, and in the most contemptuous way asked:

"Ah, the Reverend Gabriel Bennet?"

He laid especial emphasis on Gabriel felt upon him like a young lion. So sudden and impetuous was the attack that for a moment Abel was confounded. He gave way a little, and was well bettered almost before he could strike in return. But he was a young lion began to tell. He was confident of victory, and enlivened than his antagonist. It was almost like fighting a flame, so fierce and rapid were Gabriel's strokes.

Little Malacca looked on in amazement and terror. "Don't! don't!" cried he, as he saw the fierce rage of Gabriel. "Oh, you'll hurt, you'll kill him!" For Abel was now fully aroused. He was seriously hurt by Gabriel's strokes.

"Don't! there's somebody coming!" cried Little Malacca, beginning to cry, for the fear of the sound of a carriage was heard driving down the hill.

The combatants said nothing. The faces of both of them were bruised, and the blood was flowing. Gabriel struck Abel savagely; and Abel's face was furious as he struck his heavy blows, under which the smaller boy staggered, but did not fall.

"Oh, please! please!" cried Little Malacca, imploringly. "Oh, please somebody come! Oh!"

At that moment Abel Next drew back, aimed a tremendous blow at Gabriel, and delivered it with fearful force upon his head. The smaller boy staggered, reeled, threw up his arms, and fell heavily forward into the road, senseless.

"You're killed him! You've killed him!" sobbed Little Malacca, piteously, kneeling down and bending over his friend.

Abel Next stood bareheaded, frowning under his bruises, with his hands clenched, his face bruised and bleeding, his mouth sternly set as he looked down upon his opponent. Suddenly he heard a sound close by him—a half-mothered cry. He looked up. It was the Burt carriage, and Hope Wynn was looking on from the window.

MY BABY.

BY W. C. BENNETT.

Cherubs as soft as July peaches—
Lips whose velvet scarlet touches
Poppies paleness—round large eyes
Ever great with new surprise—
Minutes filled with shining gladness—
Minutes just as brimmed with sadness—
Happy smiles and wailing cries,
Crows and laughs and tearful eyes,
Lights and shadows, swifter born
Than on windswept autumn corn,
Ever soon and ever late,
Making every limb all motion,
Catchings up of legs and arms,
Throwings back, and sallyings,
Clutching fingers—straightening jerks,
Twining feet whose each toe works,
Kickings up and straining rings,
Mother's evenow surprisings,
Hands all warm and looks all tender
At all things the heavens under,
Tiny scorns of smiled reprovings
That have nothing of love dim lovings,
Mischiefs done with such a winning
Archness that we prize such sinning,
Breakings dire of plates and glasses,
Graspings small at all that passes,
Pullings off of all that's able
To be caught from tray or table,
Silences—small meditations
Deep as thoughts of cares for nations
Breaking into space secretive
In a tongue that nothing teaches,
All the thoughts of whose possessing
Must be wooed to light by guessing,
Slumbers—such sweet angel-somings
That we'd ever have such drowsings,
Till from sleep we see them waking,
And we'd always have thee waking,
Wealth for which we know no measure,
Pleasure high above all pleasure,
Gladness brimming over gladness,
Joy in care—delight in sadness,
Loveliness beyond completeness,
Sweetness distancing all sweetness,
Beauty all that Beauty's made of,
That's May Bennett—that's my baby.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

The Weather—Spring in Paris—The Bois de Boulogne—Concert at the Duchess of Gonnet's—Symbolic Pictures of Mars—Jupiter—Saturn—Hermes—Sermon by Dr. Cumming—The Opera of Herculaneum—Paris American Society, &c.

Paris, April 6, 1859.

The cold winds of last week had but a brief dominion. One almost wonders where they have gone to so suddenly;—rather, where are the ones the extreme warmth of the last few days. Last year summer-like days were supposed to be accounted for by the influence of the coming comet; but that has wandered too far off now to occasion us fears to throw off winter garments, to avoid the sun, and to open the windows—ay, even to the evening breeze, if it may be found. But if found, it is not of the sweetest in these dreadful Paris streets, which seem this year hopelessly given over to the smells; for the drainers, digging, and turning them upside down, for the cleaning process, are always going on without any prospect of being finished. So "the evening wind" among these is not quite what one poet, Bryant, might be supposed to have in his mind when he composed the exquisite poem bearing that title.

But what a pleasure to escape from all this to the pure air and lovely verdure and flowers of the Bois de Boulogne! The peculiar beauty of the season of spring in Paris has been often remarked. It has been even to the Bois, and yet much more genial and unchoked than that of England. And then it is so animated! All the people so love the sunshine and fine weather that, when they return, they rush at once abroad—at least, all those who can afford it. Every one seems to think of those who can not, and who are left in the dreary workshops and unwholesome streets; and those who are often obliged to earn their daily bread. But it seems that the lengthening days mean bring comfort even to the poor, in the convenience of increased light and warmth. Let us think of such as these, though, when we are rejoicing ourselves with the young and the thoughtless to enjoy these best blessings of health-bestowing air and sunshine.

There is something no doubt exhilarating in being able to go out in the open air, and to see and hear and smell. Only this one feels now in the Bois de Boulogne, whether riding a good horse with those who can afford it, or walking, or sauntering in carriages with some one of those kind ones who are good-natured enough to wish their enjoyments shared by those less favored by fortune. "To the Bois," then, we will go this afternoon, and every one that can, for there are not many visits paid now, at least, by one; and those ladies who think themselves obliged to remain at home for their "receptions" are much to be pitied. I am sorry for them; just as there is "a time for all things," certainly that for amusement is now and then due to the year. Those of the evening still go on, and the concerts continue as frequent as ever.

I was at a magnificent entertainment of this kind on Monday last at the Duchesse de G——a's, where one heard all the best Italian singers now remaining in Paris (for Maria has gone to England, and there is a painful rumor in circulation that he has succeeded to a rich inheritance, and intends to retire and sing no more in public), and one wishes it, for the first time then this year, the decided adoption of spring toilets by the fairer portion of creation (for men, of course, can never change from their sombre uniformity). The chief criticism of these is the substitution of natural for artificial flowers by the young. These are worn into coiffures of the same form and fashion as the artificial, and with light, flowing garments of muslin, Tarlatane and gaze de Chambery compose a toilet appropriate and becoming.

The prevailing tints in these are delicate greens and lilacs, or white; pink, blue, and yellow being worn in tones of color contrasts. It is the same in bonnets; but before I describe them I must leave the Duchesse de G——a's gilded salons and brilliant company, and go to the Bois, where, from the promenades being so well watered, the new bonnets may be exhibited without fear of dust; and I am bound to say they are often fresher than the faces they shade—for three or four months of bleak east winds and unhealthy cold can not be indulged in with impunity. These bonnets are extremely small, and, in one respect, follow the lead of the Empress, whose dress is always distinguished by that truest taste—simplicity. They are made of crape, white or colored, covered with black or white lace, and a bunch of flowers without foliage just on the top. The "Easter" bonnets will not appear until "after Easter," but then they will be the most worn. The gowns seem to be all variations of material and trimming. The skirts, with several narrow flounces, are perhaps the newest in fashion; but the full trimmings of those of my readers who prefer something less elaborate. I may say that plain skirts, made very wide, and with a row of flat bands at the foot, are very much worn, and are very elegant. The mantelets are of the short kind, with full back, trimmed with a round frill of the same material; and the long tabbed silk pelisse is also much worn, fitting tightly to the waist.

Now I have taken more of this information from the Journal des Modes than I like, for the benefit of my own pains-taking observation, put into technical language by the feminine lips; and I think I am entitled to some gratitude on the part of my fair readers for my trouble. But my fear is that you have all these fashions already in New York, and know more about them there than I can tell you from Paris. Still, I am a determined one in feminine extravagance, where the ladies have "Nothing to wear," and yet spend more money upon their dress than ever did the Parisians.

But I have done with this theme for the present, for I must turn in a moment to the Bois on Saturday afternoon I and the gratification of hearing the celebrated Dr. Cumming preach in the Church of the Oratoire. Of this I am aware that there have been many opinions, and are very much read among the English and great part of the Protestant creed with great facility of language and some natural and habitual eloquence. Neither here was nothing new, or original, or persuasive in it—and with not a little of what may be called claptrap and seeking for effect. There was the same sovereignty of lateness, for his reputation is greatly extended, and the Oratoire, English, and Americans thronged to hear him, and so they did yesterday, when he preached again in the same place. Poor Mr. Bryant, might be supposed to have in his mind when he composed the exquisite poem bearing that title.

But what a pleasure to escape from all this to the pure air and lovely verdure and flowers of the Bois de Boulogne! The peculiar beauty of the season of spring in Paris has been often remarked. It has been even to the Bois, and yet much more genial and unchoked than that of England. And then it is so animated! All the people so love the sunshine and fine weather that, when they return, they rush at once abroad—at least, all those who can afford it. Every one seems to think of those who can not, and who are left in the dreary workshops and unwholesome streets; and those who are often obliged to earn their daily bread. But it seems that the lengthening days mean bring comfort even to the poor, in the convenience of increased light and warmth. Let us think of such as these, though, when we are rejoicing ourselves with the young and the thoughtless to enjoy these best blessings of health-bestowing air and sunshine.

There is something no doubt exhilarating in being able to go out in the open air, and to see and hear and smell. Only this one feels now in the Bois de Boulogne, whether riding a good horse with those who can afford it, or walking, or sauntering in carriages with some one of those kind ones who are good-natured enough to wish their enjoyments shared by those less favored by fortune. "To the Bois," then, we will go this afternoon, and every one that can, for there are not many visits paid now, at least, by one; and those ladies who think themselves obliged to remain at home for their "receptions" are much to be pitied. I am sorry for them; just as there is "a time for all things," certainly that for amusement is now and then due to the year. Those of the evening still go on, and the concerts continue as frequent as ever.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MANY and varied are the female charms that conquer us. Here we find a woman whose strength, like Samson's, is in her hair; a second holds your affections by her teeth; and a third is a Cinderella, with a foot, followed by her pretty little foot.

THE LEGAL ALPHABET.——"It is very odd," said one counsel to another, "that the judge should have decided against me on that point of law which, to me, seemed as plain as A B C." "Yes," replied the other, "but of what use is it that it should have been A B C to you, if the judge was determined to be D E F to it?"

WHEN Judge Howell was at the bar, Mr. Burgess, a barrister on circuit, to play a joke, wrote on the lining of his hat, and upon various empty bowls, "The best calculated about, smiling a smile on every countenance except that of the sergeant, who deliberately took it up and repeated the words, and, well knowing the author, addressed the Chief Justice as follows: "I move, my lord, your Lordship, I ask protection" (holding up his hat); "for I find that Master Burgess has written his name in my hat, and I have reason to believe he intends to make off with it."

"LIKE A DUKE."—When Suwarrow was defeated in fortification, some persons told the King of Prussia of the bombastic proclamation which that general had issued. "Ah!" said this King, "Suwarrow resembles a drum: he makes no noise until he is beaten."

THE Union Herald says that Luke Nolan has for nearly a week been on trial here, on a charge of murder. The Judge charged the jury, and they retired to deliberate. During the memorable confusion the prisoner escaped by the close of the trial and the jury leaving the room, the prisoner, who sat within the bar, arose and walked out of the court-house. The constable very politely opened the door for him, and asked him if he would like a cab or a wood? He declined, and soon stalls the whole town went—nobody knows where.

WE understand that the jury, after being out five minutes, found the prisoner guilty. On their return, they could not read their verdict, of course, and had to dispatch the prisoner to be present, and they were discharged from that duty in consideration of his age.

In those good old times when Dicky Rixer was Recorder of New York, a man by the name of Wilson was put on trial for his life for murder. The evidence was of no conclusive character, but Mr. Cromwell, with an opportunity to have a word with him in private, agreed to get the latter appointed for ten dollars. The lawyer told him not to say a word but "aquoss" to all inquiries put to him. Wilson was acquitted. "Prisoner, what is your counsel?" The Recorder asked. "Sposse!" said Wilson. "Have you counsel?" the Recorder demanded with irritation. "Sposse!" replied Wilson. Mr. Graham interposed: "Your honor sees that the prisoner has a fee-fee, and by no means in a fit state of mind to be tried." The Clerk put the usual question, "Guilty, or not guilty?" to which the prisoner stoutly answered "Sposse." The Recorder was astonished at the fellow's stupidity, and said that it was time enough when the case was ended. The fellow was only half-witted, but like to go. Graham followed him out and demanded the ten dollars. "Sposse!" said Wilson, and to all the lawyer's demands he answered only "Sposse!"

JOE and Bill Benson went to New Orleans with a flatboat of corn. Joe wrote to his father thus:

"MY FATHER: Come Joe—Dear Dad, sarkets is dull corn is mighty lo and Bills dead

Your affectionate son J. B."

The following is a specimen of Hibernian epistolary composition:

"O'Regan Tiretury, march 29—Tim if you did write me how it happened you got the money to have this case sent here immediately or sooner. In farnin 80 acres a land an have 5 acres of clover grass given and Yer own brother. PAT HOULIHAN."

An epitaph in the church-yard of Morton-in-the-Marsh, runs thus:

"Here lies the bones of Richard Sawton,
Whose death, alas! was strangely brought on.
Trying, one day, his corns to mow off,
He cut his toe off, and killed his boy off.
His toe, or rather what it is, he's off.
An inflammation quickly flew to his head,
Which soon, alas! to mortifying
And was the cause of Richard's dying."

A lady sent for a new velvet mantilla at her dressmaker's.

"John," she said, "if it rains, take a coach; I had rather pay the hack hire than have my velvet spoil."

When the man handed her the mantilla it was ruined, the paper which covered it being completely wet with rain.

"Why, John," she said, "I told you to take a cab if it rained."

"Sir I did, mum; but sure you wouldn't have your footman a ridin' inside. I got on the box with the driver."

ATTRACTIVE.—It has been said that ladies have generally a great fear for lightning, and that they are perfectly ascribed to their natural timidity; but the truth is, that it arises from their consciousness of being attractive.

Dr. Quincy tells an anecdote of a man, who, on being threatened by an assault by a dozen and a half of tailors, cried out, "Come on, both of you!"

ABSURD.—An English justice has laid it down as a principle of law, that a physician is not entitled to payment if his patient dies under his treatment.

The whole duty of man is frequently only to please himself.

When two men dispute, you may be sure that there is a fool upon one side or the other.

A beautiful brunette said her brown complexion was owing to her being so often toasted.

Why is a widower so much like a house in dilapidation?—Because he wants to be repaired.

An awkward man, attempting to carve a goose, dropped it on the floor. "Sorry, sir!" exclaimed his wife, "we've lost our dinner." "Not at all, my dear," replied he, "it's safe enough; you can pick it up again."

It is not every man who can laugh up his sleeve when he happens to be out-at-elbows.

LOOK OUTSIDE YOUR LEAF.—Yet all the molestations of marriage, which are usually recognized as such, are trifles which God bestows with us them who make a wise choice of a wife.—T. Fuller.

"John," said a father to his son one day, when he caught him sharing the "dowry" off his sugar-tip, "don't throw your shaving-water out where there are any barefooted boys, for they might get their feet scalded."

A Scotchman having hired himself to a farmer, had a chance set down before him; but he might help himself. The master said to him, "Sandie, you take a long time to breakfast." "Weel, hoth, maister," answered he, "a skonce o' this size is nae soon eaten as ye may think."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A compound of COCOA-NUT OIL, &c., for dressing the HAIR. For efficacy and agreeableness, it is without an equal.

It prevents the hair from falling off.
It promotes its healthy and vigorous growth.
It is not greasy or sticky.
It leaves no disagreeable odor.
It softens the hair when hard and dry.
It soothes the irritated scalp skin.
It effects the richest lustre.
It remains longest in effect.
It costs fifty cents for a half-pint bottle.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

TESTIMONIAL.

BOSTON, July 20, 1857.

☞ MESSRS. J. BURNETT & CO.—I can not refuse to state the salutary effect in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Burnett's Cocoaine.

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became scaly and my scalp more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain camphene spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that others, similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,
SUSAN E. POPE.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded by all who have used it to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.
For sale by dealers generally at 50 cents a bottle.

NEW PUBLICATIONS
FROM THE PRESS OF TICKNOR & FIELDS,
Boston.

Memoir of Chief Justice Parsons. $1.50.
Owen Meredith's Poems. Blue and Gold. 75 cents.
Studies and Stories, by Mrs. Jameson. Blue and Gold. 75 cents.
The Avenger, &c., by Do Quincey. 75 cents.
Percival's Poetical Works, 2 vols. Blue and Gold. $2.75.
Securing of the White Horse. $1 50.
Douglas Jerrold's Life and Letters. $1 00.
Motherwell's Poems. Blue and Gold. 75 cents.
Argo's Biographies. 2 vols. $2 00.
Lord Dufferin's Yacht Voyage. $1 00.
Thorndale. $1 25.
Life of Sir Philip Sidney. $1 00.
Fretful Comet. 25 cents.
Christmas Hours. 50 cents.
Fanny Kemble's Poems. $1 00.
Willis Winkie's Nursery Songs. 75 cents.
Longfellow's Mine Standish. 75 cents.
Bulwer's Journey Into North. $1 00.
Kingsley's Water Raleigh. $1 25.
The Age, by "Festus" Bailey. 75 cents.
Life of George Sand. 2 vols. $2 00.
Douglas Jerrold's Wit. 75 cents.
Dante's Classic Designations. $1 00.
Tom Brown's School Days. $1 00.
Trelawny's Recollections of Shelley and Byron. 75 cents.
Ban away or Sea, by Mayne Reid. 75 cents.
Charles Reade's White Lies. 75 cents.
Robertson's Sermons. 1st Series. $1 00.
Robertson's Sermons. 2d Series. $1 00.
Robertson's Sermons. ALL 2d Series. $2 00.
Robertson's Lectures and Addresses. $1 00.
Charles Kingsley's Andromeda. 50 cents.
Parthia, by Mrs. Lee. $1 00.
Coale's Hints on Health. 63 cents.
Mrs. Mauer's Cook Book. 62 cents.
Household Waverley Novels. 50 vols. 75 cents each.

In a few Days:

L. A. Varnton Voyage to Cuba and Back. By R. H. Dana, Jr. Illustrated.

P. S. Kingsley's Recollections of Geoffry Hamlyn. A Novel.

☞ Any work published by TICKNOR & FIELDS will be sent, free of postage, on receipt of advertised price only.

"Love Me Little, Love Me Long."
A NOVEL.
By Charles Reade,
Author of "Christie Johnstone," "Peg Wolfington," "Never too Late to Mend," &c.
12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Bronchitis.
BRONCHITIS, Clergyman's Sore Throat.—A Chronic Inflammation of the Small Mucous Glands connected with the Membranes which line the Throat and Windpipe; the approach of which is often so insidious as scarcely to attract notice—an increase of Mucus, and a sense of weariousness and loss of power in the Throat, after public speaking or singing. It arises from cold or any unusual exertion of the Vocal Organs. The Glands become enlarged by using Brown's Bronchial Troches, which, if neglected, an entire loss of voice is often experienced.

"Pre-eminently the first and best."

DR. J. F. W. LANE, Boston.

"Great benefit in affections of the Bronchial Organs."

DR. J. F. W. LANE, BOSTON.

Economy in Writing.
Phonography increases the speed of Writing from five to six hundred per cent. It may be easily learned, without a teacher, from GRAHAM'S HAND-BOOK OF STANDARD PHONOGRAPHY, the complete Encyclopedia of the Art. Post-paid, $1 25.
Bold Logic and Interest, with the use of the common letters only, the speed of writing one hundred per cent. This may be easily learned in a week from "Graham's Brief Long-Hand." Postpaid, 63 cents.
A. J. GRAHAM, Box 4590, P. O., 345 Broadway.

Now Published,

From Wall Street to Cashmere.
A JOURNAL OF FIVE YEARS IN ASIA, AFRICA, AND EUROPE.
CONTAINING
Visits during 1851, '2, '3, '4, '5, and '6, to the Dancenra Iron Mines, Plains of Troy, the "Seven Churches," Palmyra, Jerusalem, Petra, Thebes, Cairo, Memphis, Sebastopol, Constantinople, and Smyrna.
With all the Incidents of the Recent Mutinies.
CASHMERE,
Peshawur, and the Khyber Pass to Afghanistan,
Java, China, and the Mauritius.
With many hairly-fair Illustrations from the self-same.
By JOHN B. IRELAND, ESQ.
Price in Muslin binding, $4 00; Half Calf extra, $5 00.

This is a reliable book of travels, and a valuable contribution to the literature of the day. From the pen of a polished scholar, who has looked at the country through which he travelled with observing eyes, and given in lucid descriptions of the habits, manners, and customs of the people. The author's position in the East Indies, as written in the Wall Street Journal, was a world-ory-day life of those three hundred millions of people has not been exaggerated. He has given to the public a most ridicing devotion of the American Missionaries to the Great Cause they have undertaken. It is one of the most fascinating books of travel that has ever been published in the English tongue.

S. A. ROLLO & CO.,
29 Park Row.
Opposite the Astor House.

Complete Manual of Chess.
C. SCRIBNER, 154 Grand Street, New York, has now ready Dr. STAUNTON'S NEW AND ENLARGED ART OF CHESS." 1 vol. 12mo, $1.
The Spirit of the Times says: "Just such a work as will become popular with beginners. We recommend it to students as one of the most satisfactory treatises yet issued. All lovers of Chess should add it to their library."
"A complete history of every thing appertaining to Chess. No Chess-player's library will be complete without it."—Mobile Register.
"Mr. Willis's New York—THE CONVALESCENT."—Albany Evening Journal.
"Willis's Rural Letters."—THE GENERAL HAVELOCK." 1 vol., $1.
"THE LAST OF THE KETCHUMPE SPRINGS." By Professor Bentalou. 1 vol., $1.
These books are sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, PEARTREES,
COFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, &c.
381 Broadway, 6 doors from Franklin Street.

THOMAS HOOPER, No. 109 Fulton Street, Manufacturer and Dealer in Looking-glasses, Picture Frames, Oil Paintings, Engravings, &c. A word to the wise, &c.

CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.
The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna.
Is a simple, palatable and effacious laxative medicine, good at all times.
Sold by druggists every where.
J. W. NORCROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

Nature's True Restorative.
SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
THE GREAT
AMERICAN REMEDY
FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.
THE BEST, SAFEST, AND PUREST
TONIC AND ALTERATIVE EVER PREPARED.
Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street (cor. William), N. Y.

$32 50 ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, CASHIL FER QUARTER, 3 Mountains. Both sexes. Summer term commences May 1. For circulars, &c., address the Rev. HENRY J. FOX, A. M., Ashland, Cresse Co., N. Y.

To all who use Horses.—DR. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN LINIMENT is just found to be a perfect cure in only 50 cents, is warranted cheaper and superior than any other Liniment in the world, for sore Throat, Colds, Galls, Lameness of all kinds, Cuts, &c. Sold at 25 cents, 50 cents, and $1 per bottle. Depot, 56 Cortlandt Street, New York. See genuine signed "H. T. TOBIAS." Depot, 56 Cortlandt Street, New York.
Sold every where.

CLOVE ANODYNE
TOOTHACHE DROPS
Acting upon the nerve, imparts instantaneous relief, without disordering the teeth or unpleasantly affecting the breath or pallet. Will not injure the most delicate; try it, and be convinced.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York. Price 25 cents per Vial.

The Best Encyclopædia in the English Language.
PUBLISHED BY Little, Brown & Co.,
112 Washington Street, Boston.
THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA;
—OR—
Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, and General Literature.
EIGHTH EDITION.
Revised, enlarged, and brought up to the present time.
Edited by THOMAS STEWART TRAILL, M.D., F.R.S.E., Professor of Medical Jurisprudence in the University of Edinburgh.
With upwards of five hundred Engravings on steel, and many thousand on wood. To be completed in 22 vols. 4to. Vols. I to XVII now ready.
Cloth, $5 50 per volume.

The publication of Eight Editions with successive improvements, and the sale of more than 40,000 copies, during an excitement raised by a factitious reputation, but during a succession of years, in which the work was tested and approved by the most accomplished and scientific scholars, is an irrefragable proof of the unquestionable merit of the work. These circumstances have given it so decided a preference in public favor, that its popularity of the Eighth Edition continues steadily to increase, and never stood higher than at the present time.

It has been the leading object of the editors and conductors of this work, to combine abstract with practical, and solid with pleasing information, in such proportions as would be most useful and most acceptable to the public; to deliver the truths of Science in the most serious and intelligible form, and at the same time to pay due attention to those graces of style which, though not admitting of a scientific shape, are yet deservedly popular, and have a powerful influence on the taste, habits, and character of the individual reader. In order to do the work at once a DICTIONARY OF SCIENCE, a Complete Literary Repertory and Philosophy, and a Book of Universal Reference.

This edition has undergone careful revision and extensive alterations, in order to accommodate it to the improved taste and advanced intelligence of the times. The editor has secured the cooperation of the most eminent living authors, who have contributed treatises on the various departments of Science, Literature, the Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, which have been of great service to supersede those now rendered obsolete by the progress of discovery, improvements in the arts, or the general advancement of public knowledge.

The following is a list of some of the principal contributors to this edition:

Rev. Baden Powell, Savilcian Professor of Geometry in the University of Oxford, &c.

Rev. Thomas Rennell, Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, &c.

Rev. Charles Kingsley, Author of "Hypatia," "Westward Ho," &c.

J. D. Forbes, Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, &c.

Rev. Thomas Chalmers, D.D., President of the Institution of Civil Engineers, &c.

Richard Owen, M.D., F.R.S., M.P.

J. Y. Simpson, M.D., Professor of Midwifery in the University of Edinburgh.

Thomas de Quincey, Esq.

R. G. Latham, Esq., M.A., M.D., &c.

W. E. Aytoun, Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh.

J. R. McCulloch, Esq., Member of the Institute of France, &c.

Dr. Doran, Author of "Habits and Men," &c.

J. H. Balfour, M.D., Professor of Botany in the University of Edinburgh.

J. S. Blackie, Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh.

William Gregory, M.D., Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh.

Alexander Smith, Esq., Author of a "Life Drama," &c.

Sir David Brewster, LL.D., F.R.S.E., &c.

E. G. Squier, Esq.

Richard Hildreth, Esq.

Nearly two thousand copies of this great work are already ordered to supply the subscribers in this country, and the number is continually increasing. It is believed that no publication of the kind, so extensive, has hitherto commanded so large a sale, or been so deserving of the patronage of the reading community.

Vol. XVII, now daily expected, contains articles on PHOTOGRAPHY, by Robert Hunt, F.R.S.; GEOLOGY, by Sir David Brewster; PHRENOLOGY, by the Lyceum; PHYSIOLOGY, by Dr. Bennet; A Life of Pitt, by Macaulay; Life of Sir Robert Peel, by Goldwin Smith, &c., &c., &c.

Most Patent Medicines are Humbugs; but DR. TOBIAS warrants his VENETIAN LINIMENT to be a cure in every case. Sold by druggists, or a bottle, it stops pain instantly. Price 25 and 50 cents. Depot, 56 Cortlandt Street, New York.
Sold by all the Druggists.

LITTLE BOYS and THEIR SORROWS. By PHILIP CARY BRIDGHARDT.

What ails thee, my brother—
What makes your knee so sad
That all your jocund playmates
In this merry month are glad?
Reveal to me, your sister,
The trouble in your face,
And if within a sister's power,
I promise you a cure.
Quoth the gallant youngster,
"I can not part or rest,
While, of all my young companions,
I alone am left bereaved!
They play me and pat me;
But the dearest one is dead!
Oh! 'tis torture, torture, sister,
And the hardest thing to bear!"
And proud, young spirit suffers,"
Said the sister, kind and true,
"But the grief is very foolish,
And I'll tell you what to do—
I'm very lonely, brother,
Tho the Sarrins we will repair,
And there buy a Spring and Summer suit,
Such as a Fashion Mighty wear!"
The suit was bought, and Harry
Is now the gayest of the gay—
The foremost in the ball-room,
And the merriest boy at play.
Oh, southern Fashion Mighty,
Which thus made simple home convey,
And in garments by Sarrin Brothers made
Your little boys array!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140
Fulton Street,
Between Broadway & William St.,
THOMAS SMITH, Jr., } NEW-YORK.
ROBERT L. SMITH, }
J. SMITH RICE. }

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.
The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

The Great French Novel
Now Ready.
THE ROMANCE
OF A
POOR YOUNG MAN.
By OCTAVE FEUILLET.
Translated from the Author's Paris Edition.
12mo, Muslin, price $1 00.

"The Romance of a Poor Young Man' has recently appeared in Paris, and has been hailed by both French and English critics as the most delightful, pure, and artistic work of fiction that appeared in any country during the year 1858. Indeed, since 'Jane Eyre' touched the aroused reading world, we can not remember another production of the kind which, for beauty and interest, can be compared with this."—Boston Evening Gazette.

"Booksellers are requested to order the $1 00 edition, which is the correct translation, published and sent by mail, postage free, by
RUDD & CARLETON, PUBLISHERS,
130 Grand Street, New York.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.
We are sorry to perceive that dealers have stooped to the unfairness of attempting to deprive Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co. of the just reward of their skill and enterprise. An article is offered in the market as the justly celebrated and very valuable "Cocoaine," while it is in quite another affair, made in New York, and called, to avoid a positive imitation, "Cocoine."
This is a poor subterfuge, and should not be suffered to be practiced to the injury of the very respectable and responsible gentlemen who have devoted so much time, care, and capital to inventing and making known the genuine article.—Boston Post.

PHELAN'S CHAMPION HAT.
SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW, AT White's,
216 BROADWAY,
under Barnum's Museum.

RICHARDSON'S New Method for the Piano.—This much-lauded work, by the Notice of "The Modern," is rapidly approaching completion, and will soon be issued. "WAY AND SAY ON time."
OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

PICTURES FOR GRECIAN AND ANTIQUE PAINTING,
ARE ONLY published by
T. E. TILTON & CO.,
161 Washington Street, Boston.
Who forward their lists, post paid (with full and special directions how to paint), for any address. Send for a list and other information, gratis.
Dealers and Teachers supplied.

"MASSER'S"
Patent 5 Minute Freezers.
OPERATION SIMPLE. RESULT CERTAIN.
The increasing demand and the unrivaled popularity of "Masser's" Ice-Cream Freezers prove them to be the best Ice-Cream Freezers now sold.
Purchasers and Dealers are cautioned against imitations. Freezers that are offered as those of the above "Get it of 'MASSER'" (meaning that have been thoroughly tested for the last five years.
Sole Agents,
E. KETCHAM & CO.,
Manufacturers of Japanned and Tinplated Tin Ware,
207 Front Street, New York.

Rockbridge Alum Springs, Va.
A detailed Advertisement of this celebrated watering-place, with letters of eminent gentlemen, will appear in the next issue of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," (May 14th).
THE PROPRIETORS.

SPRING FANCY GOODS.
L. J. LEVY & CO.,
Nos. 809 and 811 Chestnut Street,
Adjoining Bailey & Co.'s,
PHILADELPHIA,
Are now opening a large and very choice assortment of
NEW GOODS FOR SPRING,
Selected for the most parts in Paris and Lyons for this RETAIL SALES from the choicest productions of the looms of France.
They invite the inspection of Wholesale as well as Retail customers to one of the most beautiful assortments in extent of new fabrics for

LADIES' SPRING DRESSES
which can be found in this country.
In all the richer articles of DRY GOODS, such as
INDIA CASHMERE SHAWLS,
CHOICE SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS,
PARIS PRINTED FOULARDS,
SUPERB ORGANDIE AND BAREGE ROBES,
NEW SPRING AND SUMMER SHAWLS,
their assortments are constantly being increased by the arrivals of the Steamers from Europe.
PHILADELPHIA, February, 1859.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,
822 Chestnut Street,
Opposite Girard House,
Philadelphia,
Fine Watches,
Rich Jewelry,
Silver Ware, Sterling,
Clocks and Bronzes,
Chiefly of our own importation and manufacture.
Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.
We would call the attention of Druggists and the public to the merits of Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co.'s, expressing an imposition to which the public are liable, from an imitation of their celebrated "Cocoaine." Their reputation for the hair has decidedly obtained a high reputation, and the spurious preparations which have been put into the market have a tendency to detract from the high reputation of the genuine article.—Boston Journal.

FRED. S. COZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,
Offers for sale Pleasant Valley Wine Co.'s fine qualities of his own importation,
SAINTE CRE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
No. 6 BARCLAY STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

New York Purchasing Agency.
No. 17 NASSAU STREET, N. Y. (Up Stairs.)
Persons desirous of making purchases in New York of any articles, large or small, of use or luxury, from a Book to a Steam-Engine, a Shawl to a Carpet, can have their orders filled promptly, and goods sent as directed, at 5 per cent. commission charge. Refers to G. L. Stimpson & Son, Cashier Import. Bank, Boston; Hon. Merritt & Sons, Hastings, Plimpton & Co., New York: J. D. Dawson & Co., New Orleans.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed.
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO'S
LIGHTNING RUN.
Trains leave our Hudson Street Depot at 4.45 and 11.16 A.M., 5.15, 8.15 and 11.15 P.M.
Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and are in 24 hrs or less at any point.
The regular time by the Fast Run is

To Chicago	48 hours	To Boston	In 30 hours
" Cincinnati	" 36 "	" St. Louis	" 72 days
" Cleveland	" 34 "	" Louisville	" 48 "
" Columbus	" 32 "	" Indianapolis	34 hours

And all other WESTERN TOWNS in like proportion.
Goods for points on Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, Boston, &c., will also have shipping by rail.
Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.
VEILS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.,
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $890,000.
This Company continues to do an exclusive marchandise business, and confines its operations to the safest, and the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has reduced the Capital stock to the basis of 1850.
ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LECONEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. OGDENSBURGH, Secretary.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.
In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations. This work will be issued in Numbers, each containing 64 pages, at the special price of 25 cents, and will be delivered to subscribers only. Applications should be made to the Canvass they would render. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

COCOAINE.
From the high respectability and great skill of Mr. Burnett as a chemist, we herald with pleasure the introduction of any thing coming from his hands. His celebrated toilet preparations have already extended his popularity from one part of the Union to the other; and one result of their excellence is that those who use them once are always sure to give them the preference as standard articles for the toilet. Aside from their elegance, they are believed to be positive specifics for the purposes for which they are recommended.—Athenæ Gazette.

Singer's Sewing Machines.
PRICES REDUCED to $50, $75, $110, and $125.
SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,
the price of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly decorated Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the work of a private family.
SINGER'S TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE MACHINE, to be sold at $75, is a Machine entirely new in its arrangement: it is very beautiful, moves rapidly and very quietly, and, in its ease and adaptation to various purposes, is the very best and cheapest Machine ever offered to the public.
SINGER'S No. 1 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE, formerly sold at $130, but now reduced to $110, is known all over the world. Every sort of work can be done with it.
SINGER'S No. 2 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE,
This is the favorite manufacturing Machine every where. Price, with table complete, $125.
Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which is a beautiful pictorial paper, entirely devoted to the subject. It will be supplied gratis.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
458 Broadway, New York.

"THAT STANDARD MEDICINAL ARTICLE, the Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam, prepared by the well-known Dr. Wistar Swayne, Messrs. Demas, Taylor & Co. of this city, is we have good authority for stating, one of the most popular in the United States, and all Druggists very Confidently offer it to the public. It has stood the test of all tests, time, and a reputation of twenty years' standing."—Boston Post.
"Physicians of the highest respectability prescribe it, and thousands of families keep it on hand as a standard family medicine."—Boston Journal.
Inquire for the genuine article by WISTAR SWAYNE'S "VEGETABLE PULMONARY BALSAM."
Prepared by DEMAS, TAYLOR & CO., Druggists, Boston. Price, large, $1; small, 50 cents.
HARRIS & EVANS, Agents, New York.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
Cure Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Indigestion.
Cure Heart-burn, Heart-burn, Acidity.
Cure Water Brash, Water Brash, Jaundice, Jaundice.
Cure Liver Complaint, Liver Complaint, Debility, Debility.
Cure Fever and Ague, Fever and Ague, Bilious Complaint.
Cure Headache, Costiveness, Flies, Nervousness.
Cure Flatulency, Dizziness, Female Complaints.
This remedy is so well known, as the most remarkable and efficient remedy yet discovered for the absolute and rapid cure of the above diseases, that it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon its merits.
B. W. FOWLE & CO., Proprietors, Boston.
Sold every where.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!
LYON'S KATHAIRON FOR HAIR
USED BY ALL WILDLY EVERYWHERE
ONLY 25 CENTS, PER BOTTLE.

Who Invented the Sewing Machine?
Keep this fact in view when you purchase, that
A GOOD SEWING MACHINE
is an article much to be desired.
An inferior one is a pest, and is to be avoided.
THE HOWE MACHINES—THE ORIGINAL—
Established in 1846—are for sale at No. 577 Broadway.
Prices—$50, $60, $70, $80, $100, $125, $150.

To Teachers.
My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, to the "Care of LIBRARY & BROTHERS, New York City." School Catalogues and Circulars, Names of Principal Addresses of Schools, Educational Reports, &c., are solicited.
MARCUS WILLSON.

STATEN ISLAND
Fancy Dyeing Establishment.
Barrett Nephews & Co.,
No. 64 and 1 John Street,
(5 doors from Broadway),
New York.

To Housekeepers!!!—To prevent your house from being entered by burglars, use the Patent Rotary Lock, which is universally admitted to be the most convenient as well as secure lock ever invented.
VALENTINE & HUTLER, No. 537 Broadway.

MAGNETIC Organization and Medical Treatment of Consumption, Neuralgia, Paralysis, Functional Disorders, and Chronic Diseases generally, at the Clinic and Office of DR. NEWTON M. D. The scientific work will be sent free to all who apply by letter, inclosing a stamp. Office, 5 New York Life Insurance Building, 346 Broadway, N. Y., with postage stamp.

Catarrh! Catarrh! Catarrh! Catarrh!!
What is it? How Cured?
Thousands of persons suffer all sorts of annoyance from Catarrh. Most people know what the inconveniences and results are, yet but few know how it can be cured. It is simply a chronic irritation, and often only one element of filthiness and consequent thickening of the mucous membrane, lining the nasal cavities, frontal sinuses, and posterior nares, and sometimes extending into the throat and lungs. From this result inflammation and other vitiation of the blood, obstructed nose, or a profuse flow of mucus, with offensive smell, taste, and odor, often impaired hearing and sight.
The old-school remedies have never been able to do more for this than Nasal inhalations and inhalations are as painful and expensive as they are inefficient. Dr. Hull Hydrostatic Catarrh Remedy, or Simple Vapor Pill, taken two or three times per day, will relieve at once the loathsome nature of the disease in the head, and radically cure, by persevering use, the most obstinate cases, as proved by the cures of hundreds of hundreds.
Price, with full directions,
Fifty Cents per Box.
N. B.—A full set of Humphreys' Homeopathic Specifics, with book of Directions, and twenty-four different Remedies, in large vials, morocco case, $5; do., in pocket case, $3; do., in case of fifteen boxes and book, $10.
These Remedies, by the single box or case, are sent by mail or express, free of charge, to any address, on receipt of the price. Address
DR. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 502 Broadway, New York.
Sold by all Druggists.

ELIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office building, Washington City, D. C.

The Every Number of Leslie's Magazine contains from 70 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half is illustrated. It is the cheapest monthly publication in this country.

Close of the Eighteenth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR MAY.
The Publishers believe that the Eighteen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of valuable and interesting matter than can will be found in any other periodical of the day.
Each Number has contained a part of "Nicholas Nickleby," printed from copy furnished by the Author, in advance of its publication in London, for which he receives a liberal compensation. With this exception, the whole of the Literary Matter is contributed expressly. Tale, "Cupid's Revenge," every article in this volume has been written by an American author for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
With the present the commencement of the Magazine is a New Volume and artists and engravers are employed and varied; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the Number for the past as a fair specimen of what for future claims upon the patronage of the American public.
From the London Athenæum and European Literature, London, 1859.
"We must refer in terms of eulogy to the high tone and varied excellence of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, a Journal with a monthly circulation of about 200,000 copies, in whose pages are to be found some of the choicest light and pressing reading of the day. We look upon this work as an evidence of the American people, and the popularity it has maintained for 17 years. Each Number contains 144 pages of instructive matter, appropriately illustrated with fine engravings. It is the cheapest work in the way monthly and the more philosophical quarterly, blended with the lighter literature of the day, which it has great power in the creation and dissemination of a love of pure literature.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.
The Volume of "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-five Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIFTH CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

The Publishers have the pleasure of announcing that they have completed, at a cost of Five Thousand Dollars, the early proof-sheets of MR. CHARLES DICKENS' New Story of "TWO CITIES," or "THE TWO CITIES," Splendidly Illustrated by McCLEAN, the publication of which they are now commencing in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.
The Publishers also take pleasure in announcing that they have secured the services of the celebrated Historical Tale of American Life, entitled "TRUMPS," by GEO. WM. CURTIS, Editor of "The Potiphar Papers," "Nile Notes of a Howadji," &c. The first Chapters appeared in HARPER'S WEEKLY for July 3.
As HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, the back Numbers are being constantly replenished and may be obtained at any time.
A portion of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be devoted hereafter to the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the week, and to the interests of the people at large, so as to COMMAND MATTER, or to fully illustrated a history of the progress of events as they occur. More than a dozen ARTISTS ARE ENGRAVERS for illustrating this publication, and in Literature every other paper in the United States. This is the CHEAPEST and most family illustrated journal in the world, and its circulation will need only observe that supervision and energy to make it the most popular and the most effective—because fairly and widely circulated—journal throughout the country, from North to South—that advertisements in any other paper command.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 10 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.
The Postage is Twenty-five Cents a year if New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their address to the Office of Publication, or by letter addressed to the Office of Publication.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

SYMPTOMS OF HARD READING!

STUDENT. "Oh, Mary! have you taken up the Lamp and the Cigars?"

MARY. "Yes, Sir."

STUDENT. "—and the Whisky, and the Sugar, and the Lemon, and Boiling Water?"

MARY. "Yes, Sir!"

STUDENT. "Then come, Jack! suppose we go into the STUDY!"

SCOTT GENT. "Dear! dear! to be has formed an Attachment that you don't approve of! Ah! well, there's always something. Depend upon it, Maame, there's A SKELETON SOMEWHERE IN EVERY HOUSE!"

409 BROADWAY. 'OLD DOMINION.'

If you want DELICIOUS COFFEE always, and at a saving of from forty to fifty per cent., get an "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT. Over forty different styles and varieties are manufactured. The "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT takes only half the usual quantity of Tea. You will save the price of either in two months, and they will last nearly forever. Sold by Grocers and Crockery dealers in Housekeeping articles, and Storekeepers generally.

ARTHUR, BURNHAM, & GILROY,
117 and 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia,
Manufacturing under the Patent for the United States.
Also, Manufacturers under the Patent of ARTHUR'S SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS AND JARS.

F.Y.S.

BALLOU'S FRENCH YOKE SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway,
Premium Shirt Manufacturers.
Shirts made to order from Scientific Measure, of the best materials, sewed by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the usual prices.
BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

PHALON & SON'S
COCOÏNE
FOR DRESSING AND PRESERVING THE HAIR.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Price 25 and 50 Cents per Bottle.

P. P. P.
PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.
They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the congealed impurities and poisons from the system; they impart strength; they are divided to assist and yield to the motion of the body; they are pungent, but impure excretions pass off, and they can not become offensive. Hence, worn an hour or four times longer than any other plaster, and are cheaper at 25 cents than others at 10. Where these Plasters are, pain can not exist. Weak persons, public speakers, delicate females, or any affected with side, chest, or back pains, should try them. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp with the name.
PARK, BRADEN & PARK, 13 and 15 York Row, N. Y.
JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Howe's Unrivaled Elliptic Spring Bed
Bottom, from $4 50 to $6, at retail at No. 375 Broadway. Examine or send for circular.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.
488, 490, and 492 BROADWAY,
Corner of Broome Street,
Steam Fitters, Gas Fitters, and Plumbers,
Builders of Gas Works.
Hotels, Steamboats, Stores, Public Buildings, and Private Dwellings, fitted throughout in a workmanlike manner, and on reasonable terms.
Steam Fitting and Plumbing Factory,
438 Broome Street.
Gas Fitting Factory,
438 Broome Street.
ALSO, IMPORTERS, MANUFACTURERS, AND DEALERS IN
CHANDELIERS & GAS FIXTURES,
China, Glass, Bronzes, Clocks, Cutlery, Silver and Plated Ware,
AND
GENERAL HOUSE FURNISHING GOODS.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S ROSEMARY

ROSE MARY

In the best dressing for the hair known.
The Rosemary will restore hair to bald heads.
The Rosemary will remove dandruff.
The Rosemary is the best thing for ridding's hair.
The Rosemary has not been and can not be surpassed, securing to all a clean, healthy scalp and beautiful hair.
The Proprietor can furnish proof to attain the assertions above. Those will not admit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.
Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 17 Tremont Street, Boston.
Sold by Dealers generally.

PRINCE IMPERIAL
CHAMPAGNE.
FROM
DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,
As sold at the
IMPERIAL TABLES ON THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE,
Can be had at all the leading hotels, and from all its principal dealers throughout the country.
E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Importer,
CORNER OF BROADWAY AND BROOME STREET.

Strangers Visiting New York
SHOULD
VISIT GENIN'S BAZAAR,
507 & 513 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel,
Comprising Twenty Departments in every kind of business essential to the outfit of Ladies and children, and every article for the equipment of Gentlemen and Men of Fashion.
IT IS TRULY
ONE OF THE LIONS OF NEW YORK.
Communicating with the Bazaar, and forming its fourth Department, is
GENIN'S HAT STORE,
The largest Hat Store in America.
The GREATEST VARIETY of ORIGINAL STYLE to be found on this Continent.
Strangers coming to the city as buyers, or sojourners as in Visitors, should visit the Bazaar.
ONE OF THE CURIOSITIES OF TRADE,
having no parallel or rival on either side of the Atlantic.

CHANDELIERS & GAS FIXTURES

Our magnificent Stock of New Styles of Chandeliers and Gas Fixtures will be sold during the Spring Season
At a Small Advance on Cost.
E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,
Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

GRADUALLY BURNING UP.—Geographical and geological science induces the belief that the volcanic fires of the earth are gradually exhausting! We know of no remedy against a fire so as large a subject for it you should scold yourself, have corns, cut-ed limbs or bruises, get a 25 cent box of Baldwin's Balsam Salve and cure yourself. You can get it at

BARNES & PARK,
13 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.

GET SO OVER.—If you are suffering from any wounds, sores, burns, chapped hands, ringworm, corn chilblains, etc., procure a lot of Redding's Russia Salve, the greatest healing remedy ever discovered. And if all druggists, 25 cents a box.

The Adulterations of Food,
A series of popular illustrated articles on one of the most important subjects to the general well of our country, beginning with ADULTERATIONS OF BREAD in the next number of The Romance of a Poor Young Man.
A Page Full Story of Life in Paris, by one of the greatest of living Authors, and handed by European critics equal to the best productions of
DICKENS AND THACKERAY,
Are contained in the next number of the Knickerbocker Magazine
Terms, 25 cents a Number, or $3 00 per annum in ADVANCE.
Postage prepaid, by the Publisher, to any part of the United States. Subscriptions received by Post Office order, post-paid, Two Copies, $5 00; Three Copies, $7 00; Five Copies, $10 00; Ten Copies, $20 00.
A SPLENDID OFFER.—A Specimen Number of the May KNICKERBOCKER, containing the first and concluding portions from Dr. Gosrod, Jr.'s, N. Y. Police, Park Row, and Fifth Avenue, and a splendid article on Iowa, by a resident Missionary, with Female Characters, Full Page STEEL-PLATE ENGRAVINGS, worth AT LEAST $1 00, will be sent on receipt of 20 cents in postage stamps at the office.
JOHN A. GRAY, Publisher, 16 & 18 Jacob St., N. Y.

PIANO FORTES, MELODEONS, AND HARMONIUMS of first-class makers at the lowest terms. J. PELTON, 511 and 513 Broadway, N. Y.

Heimstreet's Hair Restorative.
This Article has now been before the public for the past fifteen years. We give below a few opinions of the Press relative to it.
"A Superior Hair Restorative."—Boston Journal.
"It takes precedence of all others."—Springfield Republican.
"Has triumphantly won for itself the name 'Indestructible.'"—Spectator.
"We would advise our readers to buy nothing but this original and genuine Hair Restorative."—Troy Whig.
"A truly valuable preparation, tested by time and experience."—Boston Ledger.
"It is the only reliable article for restoring gray hair to its original color."—Friendly Journal.
"Bristled up with gray hairs and bald heads, for the 'Inimitable' will restore the former to its original beauty and cover the latter with a luxuriant growth."—Troy Budget.
"If you wish to have the hair color, instead of the dull, rough look which hair dye imparts, use Heimstreet's Restorative, which invigorates the roots of the hair, and makes it young again, no matter how much it may be changed by age."—Home Journal.
Price 50 cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS
Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the House.
The importance of a reliable article of this kind to industrious families, in the vicinity of Insects, cannot be estimated. The Magnetic Powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the forest of Asia, observed that all insects fighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found a positive insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to resist the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, Russia, Austria, Prussia, Spain, and all the principal nations of the world, from individuals and companies.
Letter from the President of the U. S.
"EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1859.
"MR. E. LYON—Dear Sir: I have much pleasure in informing you that the Board of Commissioners of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.
"MILLARD FILLMORE, Chairman."
The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.
IT IS FREE FROM POISON.
"NEW YORK, October 1st, 1855.
"MR. E. LYON,—Dear Sir: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.
"JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.
"LAUGHLIN ROYS, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital.
"M. JOHN L. ROMAN, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, 'he has expelled all the bugs, roaches, and ants from his beds, with Lyon's Powders, and finds it of immense value.'"
Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct remedy in a article of this kind. Reference can be made to the Astor, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge MITCHEL, President of the American Institute; James GORDON BENNETT, Gen. WINFIELD SCOTT, Capt. W. FITCH, L. M. FLOOD, of the New York Hospital, &c., &c. Judge MITCHEL says, "This discovery of Prof. LYON is of unrivaled importance. We cannot but believe tested it thoroughly. It will destroy insects, grasshoppers, &c., and preserve fruit trees, vines, &c., from blight to the greatest degree."
Arrangements are now made through Messrs. BARNES & PARK, of New York, to have it sold throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!
"NEW YORK, November 5th, 1858.
"In retiring from business, I have sold my Insect Powders and Pills, Letters-Patent, and the secrets pertaining thereto, to Messrs. BARNES & PARK. Their order is a discovery made by myself, and brought from the interior of Asia, and in no manner to any other person. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name.
"E. LYON."
Rats and mice can not be reached by a powder, and are killed by a MAGNETIC PILL. Order them through any merchant.
The Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
But Lyon's Pills are raised for rats and mice.
Each Powder, 50 cents; regular size, 75 cents and $1 00. Pellet eliminators, Eye Pencils and Thoroughly.
BARNES & PARK,
13 and 15 Park Row, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 124.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

☞ Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK I.

RECALLED TO LIFE.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PREPARATION.

WHEN the mail got successfully to Dover, in the course of the afternoon, the head-drawer at the Royal George Hotel opened the coach-door, as his custom was. He did it with a deferential air of consequence, for a mail journey from London in winter was an achievement to congratulate an adventurous traveler upon.

By that time there was only one adventurer left to be congratulated; for the two others had been set down at their respective roadside destinations. The mulberry inside of the coach, with its damp and dirty straw, its disagreeable smell, and its obscurity, was rather like a larger sort of dog-kennel. Mr. Lorry, the passenger, shaking himself out of it, in shakes of straw, a tangle of shaggy wrappage, flapping hat, and muddy legs, was rather like a larger sort of dog.

"There will be a packet to Calais to-morrow, drawer?"

"Yes, Sir, if the weather holds and the wind sets tolerable fair. The tide will serve pretty nicely at about two in the afternoon, Sir. Bed, Sir?"

"I shall not go to bed till night; but I want a bedroom, and a barber."

"And then breakfast, Sir? Yes, Sir. That way, Sir, if you please. Show Concord! Gentleman's valises and hot-water to Concord. Full of gentleman's boots in Concord. (You will find a fine sea-coal fire, Sir.) Fetch barber to Concord. Stir about there, now, for Concord!"

The Concord bed-chamber being always assigned to a passenger by the mail, and passengers by the mail being always heavily wrapped up from head to foot, the room had the odd air of being occupied by a large invisible person. This was confirmed by the disappearance, on the part of the drawer, of all vestige of the two gentlemen who had alighted from the coach.

And confirmed yet more by the handsome head of hair that had been combed and brushed all night, and had evidently been shaken out of two great coats and a comforter.

Yes, Sir, the bedroom was in that condition of universal neatness which results from an elaborate smoothing of the sheets and blankets by the brushing of the hair of the pillows, and the setting of the chairs against the wall. Mr. Lorry looked round him with an appreciative eye, and seemed quite to enjoy the air of the room, though it was pervaded by a fine mist raised by the brewing of the tea that stood hissing on the hearth.

Mr. Lorry sat before the fire, leaning an arm on each knee, and spreading himself out pretty broadly to the genial influence, while his thoughts were busy on the bygone. Over the mantel-piece hung a small looking-glass in which he could see reflected so much of himself as was then visible. He did not contemplate himself with a satisfied air, but he thought his reflection looked very well. He thought it looked remarkably well, considering what he had undergone since he had left it in the morning.

Mr. Lorry had been shaved in the course of the journey, and he had washed himself at the Star and Garter at Dartford, and he had washed himself at the Ship at Dover, and he had washed himself at the Royal George at Canterbury, and he had washed himself at various roadside places where he had changed horses. He had washed himself carefully at all those places, and he had washed himself with particular pains behind the ears, and he had washed himself well with hot water at the Royal George before sitting down to his breakfast. He had then washed himself again, and had just finished washing himself for the fourth time, when the waiter had announced that the mail was ready.

The bedroom had an odd earthy flavor on it that was not unpleasant, but was perceptible even to the frequent sipping of tea and crunching of toast that Mr. Lorry was now applying himself to. He had got his feet upon the fender, and was spreading himself out pretty broadly to the genial influence, when he heard a rustling at the door, and turned his head.

There was an old woman standing there, curtseying. He had seen her curtseying herself in on the previous night, but had forgotten her.

"Yes, Sir. Mrs. Jarvis Lorry, Sir, that was. Before she went to the land of her husband's forefathers, Sir."

"Yes. Mrs. Jarvis Lorry, Sir, that was. Before she went to the land of her husband's forefathers, Sir."

"Yes, Sir. Mrs. Jarvis Lorry, Sir, that was. Before she went to the land of her husband's forefathers, Sir."

"Yes

He did not begin, but, in his indecision, met her glance. The young forehead lifted itself into that singular expression—but it was pretty and characteristic, besides being singular—and she raised her hand, as if with an involuntary action she caught at or stayed some passing shadow.

"Are you quite a stranger to me, Sir?"

"Am I not?" Mr. Lorry opened his hands, and extended them outward with an argumentative smile.

Between the eyebrows and just over the little feminine nose, the line of which was so delicate and fine as it was possible to be, the expression deepened itself as she took her hands thoughtfully in the chair by which she had hitherto remained standing. He watched her as she must, as the moment did not escape her eyes again, went on:

"In your adopted country, I presume, I may not do better than address you as a young English lady, Miss Manette?"

"If you please, Sir."

"Miss Manette, I am a man of business. I have a business appointment to-day with a gentleman recognition of a duct I heed me any more than if I was a speaking machine—truly I am not much else. I will, with your leave, relate to you, miss, the story of one of our customers."

"Story!"

He seemed willfully to mistake the word she had repeated, when he added, in a hurry, "Our customers; in the banking business we usually call our connection our customers. He was a French gentleman; a scientific gentleman; a man of great acquirements—a Doctor."

"Not of Beauvais?"

"Why, yes, of Beauvais. Like Monsieur Manette, your father, the gentleman was of Beauvais. Like Monsieur Manette, your father, the gentleman was of repute in Paris. I had the honour of knowing him there. Our relations were business relations, but confidential. I was at that time in our French House, and had been—ah! twenty years."

"At that time—I may ask at what time, Sir?"

"I speak, miss, of twenty years ago. He married—an English lady—and I was one of the trustees. His affairs, like the affairs of many other French gentlemen and French families, were entirely in Tellson's hands. In a similar way I, and a few partners in my house, are trustees for scores of our customers. These are mere business relations, miss; there is no friendship in them, no personal interest, nothing like sentiment. I have passed from one to another in the course of my business life, just as I pass from one of our customers to another in the course of my business day; in short, I have no feelings; I am a mere machine. To go—"

"But this is your father's story, Sir; and I begin to think"—the curiously roughened forehead was very intent upon him—"that when I was left an orphan, through my mother's surviving my father only two years, it was you who brought me to England. I am almost sure it was you."

Mr. Lorry took the hesitating little hand that confidingly was offered to take his, and he put it with some ceremony to his lips. He then conducted the young lady straightway to her seat again, and, holding the chair-back with his left hand, and using his right by turns to rub his chin, pull at the ears, and smooth the crease in the mind, stood looking down into her face, while she sat looking up into his.

"Miss Manette, it was I. And you will see how truly I spoke of myself just now, in saying I had no feelings, and that all the relations I hold with my fellow-creatures are mere business relations, when you recall that I have never once seen you since. No; you have been the ward of Tellson's House since, and have been busy with the other business of Tellson's House since. Feelings! I have no time for them, no chance of them. I pass my whole life, miss, in turning an immense pecuniary Mangle."

After this odd description of his daily routine of employment Mr. Lorry flattened the palm of his top upon his head with both hands (which was most unnecessary, for nothing could be flatter than its shining surface was before), and remained his listener attitude.

"So far, miss (as you have remarked), this is the story of your regretted father. Now comes the difference. If your father had died when he did—Don't be frightened! How you start!"

She did indeed start. And she caught his wrist with both her hands.

"Pray," said Mr. Lorry, in a soothing tone, bringing his left hand from the back of the chair to lay it on her agitated fingers, "pray do not let your father's calamity have its influence upon your life. Keep it apart. Manage it."

"Manage it!" Mr. Lorry, in a soothing tone, bringing his left hand from the back of the chair to lay it on her agitated fingers, "pray do not let your father's calamity have its influence upon your life. Keep it apart. Manage it."

"I am trying to see how you would manage it, Sir?"

"I am going to see his Ghost! It will be his Ghost—not him!"

Mr. Lorry quickly chafed the hands that held his arm. "There, there, there! See now, see now! The best and the worst are known to you now. You are well on your way to the poor youngest gentleman, and, with a fair seat on your saddle, a fair hand bridling it, and a good mount at his side."

She raised her face in the same tone, sank to a whisper, "I have been free, I have been happy, yet his Ghost has never haunted me!"

"Only not haunted now," said Mr. Lorry, laying stress upon it as a wholesome means of inducing her attention, "for his Ghost walks another nanner, his own long forgotten or long concealed. It would be worse than useless now to inquire wherefore or by what miscarriage to seek to know whether he has been for years dreaded by his fellow-prisoners, and shunned by his fellow-men. Even his own child—"

"My father has no child: I have been an only child from my birth."

"Pardon me, my dear young lady, your father was not long a widower, and he would be sure to marry again, and have other children. But, even if he had not, even if those conditions had not been made, as they were made, you cannot be that child's parent. Your parents are dead, you were brought to England by a kind friend to be placed at school, and you grew up an orphan. Mercy on me! I am wandering!"

"Why, look at you all!" bawled this figure, addressing the inn stewards. "Why don't you go and fetch things, instead of standing there staring at me? I am not a show, that's what I am! Why don't you go and fetch things? I'll let you know, if you don't bring something, cold water, and vinegar, quick, I tell you!"

There was an immediate dispersal for these restoratives, and she softly laid the patient on a sofa, and tended her with great skill and gentleness: calling her "my precious!" and "my life!" and fondling her golden hair, pushing it over her shoulders with great pride and care.

"And you in front there, sir," said indignantly turning on Mr. Lorry; "couldn't you tell her what you had to tell her without frightening her to death? I told you I should be back presently. Now, recollect yourself. You can tell her by degrees."

Mr. Lorry was so exceedingly disconcerted by a question so hard to answer, that he could only look on, at a distance, with much feeling and sympathy and humility, while the strong woman, holding intuitive authority as servants and physicians and midwives do, when they get it, over all other people, sometimes even over mothers and fathers, who have not it, and must resign themselves to be ordered about, presently had her charge breathing and patting her hands herself.

"See there! You are better now, dear. Be a little stronger. And don't tremble so. Why, you are a shivering woman altogether. Now, will you go and fetch those things I told you of, or will you not?" To Mr. Lorry, in the same imperious manner.

"I will go myself," said Mr. Lorry, starting up from confusion.

"Then do," said the strong woman, "and don't stand there staring and doing nothing. Nothing will come of nothing: you must know that. Wait a minute. Is there any lodging in a court over the way there?"

"There is, to be sure," said Mr. Lorry, "but"—

"Then," said the strong woman, "go and secure it, and go and fetch it. Now, you stay there; and as you are not to be trusted to bring what is wanted with any sense, I'll go myself."

With an exclamation of thankfulness for this welcome relief, Mr. Lorry immediately hurried out to secure the court-yard lodging, and to perform the other offices he had been directed to perform. He discharged them with great zeal and success, and returned to the young lady, whom he found recovered, but greatly alarmed indeed by the strong woman's sternly reproving her for being so missish, and for making such a fuss about a mere fainting woman, as if she were a fine lady from the court. The strong woman was now arranging the patient's dress and her golden hair, before binding it up; and she looked so well in the task, that Mr. Lorry felt it a pity to disturb her.

"Is she sufficiently recovered to bear removal to the lodging that I have secured?" he ventured to ask.

"Yes, I should hope so," was the answer, "if she can bear anything. But the question is, whether she can bear this journey back to the hotel?"

"I should think she might bear it extremely well."

"Perhaps you think nothing of journeys?" said the strong woman, bestowing upon him a rapid glance of contempt.

"My journeys are always made at the rate of fifty miles an hour."

"Hah!" said the strong woman, more contemptuously than before.

"I should recommend," Mr. Lorry proceeded, with some hesitation, "that she be not kept long in this place, and that she be taken to the lodging that I have secured. It is very good, and I can recommend it to be airy and quiet."

Both patient and counsellor looked doubtfully at him, as he stood with his hat in his hand, at a little distance, proposing this.

"What do you say, my dear?" said the strong woman, finally.

"I should prefer to be taken to the lodging you recommend, if I am sufficiently recovered."

"Then," said the strong woman, bending her head in token of assent to Mr. Lorry, "I will take you to it. Lean upon me."

"No thanks to you in brown, if she does. My darling pretty!"

"Dear," said Mr. Lorry, after another pause of feeble sympathy and humility, "that you accompany Miss Manette to France?"

"A likely thing, too," replied the strong woman. "If it was ever intended that I should go across sea on any account, you may be sure Providence would have cast my lot in an island?"

This being another question hard to answer, Mr. Jarvis Lorry withdrew to consider it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1859.

WAR IN EUROPE.

IT seems that the die is cast. Austria, fortified in her position by the unequivocal sympathy manifested by the leaders of the British Parliament, and by the delay sought by the Emperor of the French, is not satisfied with Sardinia's promise to disarm in the manner pointed out by the Austrian Minister, and has her troublesome neighbor shall disarm within three days; and further, that she shall send home her volunteers, and that she shall reduce her war standard for many weeks from all parts of Italy. Whether Sardinia could take steps toward a general disarmament in so brief a period of time is a question of some difficulty; there is none whatever in deciding that, in the present state of affairs, it is impossible for the Sardinian Government to send home the volunteers, or, indeed, to take any retrograde step whatever. Matters have reached such a pass that the temper of the Italian people has been roused to such a pitch, that the most probable result of any attempt to recede on the part of Sardinia would simply be the overthrow of the royal government and an outbreak of revolution.

The prospect, therefore, is decidedly warlike —more so than at any previous moment since New-Year's Day. The shadow cast by this time the cannon are firing on the Ticino.

That Austria had no choice but to take the bull by the horns and move, after the declaration of war by Sardinia, the latest news from Italy goes far to prove. From Naples to Milan the Italian people were ready to rise, and the hundreds of men were leaving the large cities daily for the Sardinian head-quarters. As usual in such cases, the excitement was contagious, and nothing short of martial law could have long kept the citizens of Lombardy Venetia from bursting into armed resistance. Any of these events would have aggravated the danger. Should the first blow struck in a war be damaging to the Italian cause, Italy would be lost to the Austrians. Austria will then be in a much safer condition to negotiate than she is now. These reasons, combined with the encouragement afforded by the late debate in the British Parliament, are quite adequate to account for the bold step taken by Austria.

Should it lead—as it seems it must—to a war, we stand on the verge of the most terrible conflict the world has known since the days of the elder Napoleon. At the outset a war would involve only Austria, Sardinia, and France. But before it ended many other European nations would necessarily be directly or indirectly engaged in it. The policy of England is entirely sympathizing with Austria, and quite prepared to take the field against the Emperor of the French. Russia's position is not to be remembered in Germany, and the memory of the humiliations he imposed on the Germans is so vivid, that it would need but a slight pretext to induce the entire German Confederation to join Austria against his nephew. England and Russia occupy, thus far, a neutral position. Neither is interested in the settlement of Italy. Neither has motives of fear, favor, hate, or affection toward either of the great belligerents, to sway her policy. But should victory incline to the side of France, neither Great Britain nor Russia could be indifferent to the result.

Statesmen are well aware—and if they were not, history is there to teach them—that the conquest of Italy and the humiliation of the many would render France a very dangerous Power indeed. The Emperor Napoleon—notoriously the master of Spain and Switzerland—would, if he added Italy and Austria to his vitual empire, become a position too powerful for the safety and the peace of his neighbors. To prevent that consummation, therefore, it may be fairly expected that Great Britain and Great Britain would consent to see the humiliation of Austria; and as any such intervention on their part would be the signal for revolt in the last successes on that of the French, it would not be surprising if the first result of such intervention was simply a European war of invasion—leading, necessarily, to a renewal of the European war what decided Europe half a century since.

Such themes are both painful and disgraceful to contemplate. If any thoughtful person will take the trouble to estimate the amount of sacrificial suffering that would be the result of a two years' general war—to figure up the homes devastated, the families deprived of bread, the money which should have given daily bread to the millions squandered in military engines and soldiers' pay, the men taken from peaceful occupations to be made food for powder, the injury done to commerce, manufactures, the check given to civilization and progress of all kinds—he will assuredly be appalled at the prospect.

THE THROAT PLAGUE.

A SINGULAR variety of ulcerated sore throat has been prevailing in some parts of the North. Iowa and Middle States for the last year, is an epidemic. In the town of Orange, Connecticut, for instance, eight persons have died of this throat plague. It commences with a violet-colored plague spot on each side, in the deep hollow of the throat, covering each tonsil. These dark ulcers spread, and in a few days many yellowish pustules, which ripen into mortal ulcers, appear on the sloughing out, and the process of putrid inflammation is the result of the flesh mining cavities in the soft tissues.

The throat plague has destroyed a number of children in New York within the last two months, and we have had some painful and melancholy instances of its fatal observing its progress. It commences somewhat like the attack of scarlet fever, with nervous excitement, on the day previous to the actual disease, by rigors, or even shaking of the body, with melancholia, and after that the evening flush, irritability, and all the ordinary symptoms of scarlet fever. The plague spots in the hollow of the throat are first bright-red, but darken and extend more rapidly as the disease in more malignant. A false membrane, in most cases, lines the interior of the throat, which makes some persons resemble a bag of bones. In the most virulent and malignant disease, the prostration of the nervous system is sudden and extreme. Death may ensue from suffocation by the throat, causing asphyxiation, or from the rupture and discharge of deep ulcers, with the same results.

The fatal cases are generally due to merely an escape of the colorless portion of the blood from the sides of the weakened vessels of the throat. It hardens and forms a false membrane, and oozes extended. When the plague spots extend over the root of the tongue the disease is called by a blank tongue. In that form is confined to certain neighborhoods.

In this, as in other cases of malignant and prostrating diseases, stimulants are the cure by the patient increases the vital powers or diminishes the strength of the body. Applications of lunar caustic—a solution of nitrate of silver—in cases of sore throat—do not seem to retard the progress of disease, but the poison of the malady being, in fact, diffused through the whole system, and fixing upon the throat merely as a point of ease.

In a tropical climate, or in high, mountainous regions, removed from the raw, variable winds of the east and the still more fatal damps of river valleys, the atmospheric poises or malaria that generates throat plague in our climate would produce diseases of a very resembling that malady. The general or proliposing cause seems to prevail over entire continents for a number of years. The form of the pestilence being determined by the condition of the population in certain places and regions.

It is a common and not merely a popular error to suppose that epidemic diseases are either of a contagious or infectious nature, or appreciable and disappearing like comets, and by many attributed to the influence of those irregular numbers of the solar system. Epidemics, however, are not, like gout or the painters' colic, produced by the habits of individuals or families, are, in fact, epidemics of more or less virulence. At one time there will be a general prevalence of a certain form of disease, like dyspepsia, for a series of years among all classes of society. It will be modified or aggravated by the habits of societies or individuals, but seems to prevail universally in the mass of human beings, as if they were all of one flesh, and the condition was not so much communicated as belonging to the one great human body of that year or century.

Eight forms of what are called "colds," for example, which commence with itching, prickling, and tickling in the eyes, nose, and throat, irritations of the skin, of the nerves, of the lower parts of the intestines, an immense variety of inflammations and intestinal and glandular fluxes prevail epidemically, changing suddenly from one form to another, affected by place and habits, or by the prevailing practices of nurses and physicians. These, though less fearful, are as truly "pestilences" and "pestilential scourges" as the most fatal plagues on record. Melancholia, itself a partial obscuration of the mental powers, with depression of spirits, seems to be, at times, an epidemic causing over prosperous communities to take a cloudier view suddenly and unaccountably, changing into a sharper and more cheerful epidemic, which people can talk of and prescribe for.

Epidemics, although to all appearance light and harmless, destroy the feebler part of communities, wasting and exhausting children, the diseased, superannuated, and vicious life. If there is a disease which can be properly called old age, it is so rare as to make but a trifling figure in the bills of mortality. The majority of human beings die by reiterated attacks of rotting maladies, which gradually break down the system to a point when it is unable to contend with atmospheric poisons or inherited causes of decay. Cholera infantum, the damps of the morning, the night breath of plants, and the foul air of bedrooms, workrooms, and filthy streets, are constantly taken with adulterated food and drinks: these are, in fact, the real destroyers—ten times more destructive than plagues and pestilences, however sharp and formidable they may appear for a season.

The Spartan code of nature exposes and destroys the feeble and malformed of animals and man; preserving the vigor and beauty of the race by an early and merciful removal of the inferior kind. If medical and dietetical science have accomplished any permanent good for civilized society, it must be found in pointing out and removing the causes of disease in families and communities, much more than in casually assuaging them in the case of a few: the "cure," i. e., care, nursing of the sick. Human life is multiplied and improved by the gradual progress of art and science; but while diseases like the three plagues are in the practice of our physicians and nurses, and the fashion of another comparatively harmless in the same neighborhood, we may doubt whether the cure of human life is advancing as rapidly as we are to the dignity and merit of a science.

In England, during the past year, 100,000 persons, chiefly among the young, died of diseases over the calculated and regular mortality, from causes unexplained; but by some attributed to the comet; by others to the severity of the last warm season; both being conjectural. The epidemics among children have been excessive as well as, and in nearly the same proportion the same. An equal loss by war would have been regarded as a special calamity, demanding the prayers and intercessions of all the churches; and yet the loss of 100,000 youth and children is perhaps a much greater evil, as removing so much of the future strength of the state and industry, and robbing the future of its hope.

The proper aim and purpose of human science, strictly considered, seems to be not so much the warding off of sudden calamities as it is the steady and progressive improvement of the general condition; so that the destroying causes that have at present so much to do in the Spartan work of keeping down the race may be continually declination, may have less of this to accomplish. The bringing up to adult age of generations of decayed and diseased children, who are only able to continue their own feebleness into a second generation, does not seem to be a desirable end for society or governance. Diphtheritis, or throat plague, may keep off an entire generation of children, and natural savans are in despair, and fall back upon Providence as usual; the world moves on in the same course, inmost unaware of the poisonous, poisonous food and air; and these, in the latter sum, are swept away and forgotten.

When men rightly weigh and estimate such things, it appears as though the true ends of government and social organization have not yet been discovered; existing governments have a farcical and absurd aspect. All evils seem to be natural, and actually reared at, by moralists and the press, and not the true means to remove the causes of moral and physical decay.

THE LOUNGER.

AT THE ACADEMY AGAIN.

It seems to be agreed that there was never an exhibition by the Academy which indicated such growth in the fine arts as the present one. This is shown not as much by single works of great excellence as by the greater variety in choice and treatment of subject. We seem to be nearer of general approximation that "a lady" and "a gentleman," who have so profusely ornamented previous exhibitions with their portraits, have grown modest with age, and now more sparing of their presence.

And yet, when "a gentleman" is a Pope Julius the Less, a Charles First, a Doge of Venice, when "a lady" is an Infanta of Spain or a "Bella Donna," we often ask the portrait-painter is Raphael, Vandyke, Titian, or Velasquez, as so often chances in the finest foreign galleries, the mind does not rise at looking at portraits. Portrait-painting is, in truth, one of the highest possible departments of art. Many of the most celebrated pictures are portraits, and that not because the subjects were heroic or beautiful, but because the painters were portrait-painters, i. e., they were men who saw character and were able to express it.

There are admirable portraits this year in the Academy, and in various styles. It must be allowed that some of the most ambitious are not the best; and yet some of the most ambitious portraits have never been better represented. Elliott, Huntington, Cox, Baker, Hicks, Healy, Rossiter, Wenzler, and the others, were never, upon the whole, more successful than this season. Shall we add that some are more so? Why certain types of the artists are crude or pale or awkward? Shall we say that Elliott's figure is too light and that too low? Shall we indicate woolliness and muddiness?

No, no! Let tranquillity pervade these columns. Silent as the Laocoon in the one gem the Apollo or the Laocoon in that marvelous court of Sculpture, which leads to the Transfiguration and the Communion of St. Jerome, should be asserted the leg or the arm. And the grace! the beauty! the drapery! the drawing! Why, there is Lavinia, of the lovely face, gazing at No. 321. The admiring spectator is not there her, only plainly enough that fascinating irregularity of features. Shall he go home and say, "I saw Lavinia to-day. Ugly her face is, and the drawing! It is not a pity.

It is the spirit of that last sentence let us look at the portraits of Lavinia, and eke of John and James.

The crayons, too, muster strongly. There were never so many crayon heads on this year. Lawrence and Mr. Rowse are the chief contributors. We think the latter gentleman would have shown us his heads of Emerson, Longfellow, and Bryant, —heads not so well known as they should be to New York people,—

The landscapes are many and good. Church and Kensett, Durand, Gignoux, Casilear, Shattuck, in fact, only a study of a sunset. In the pictures which Mr. Sayden exhibits he shows that he has gained from the study of nature. Mr. Lang's compositions and sunsets have a truthfulness and firmness and delicacy which we have not before seen in him, whose works are honored every year. Mr. Gay, a pupil of Troyon in Paris—not William Allen, as the Catalogue says—sent Washington's Last Day —makes his effort upon these walls in a landscape with White Mountains—considering the subject the thoroughness of his training, and enables us to count another admirable landscape painter in the Gays, which, like the Lawrences, are a real audience. He is one of the artists whose career in Europe has been watched with interest by Americans sympathy and appreciation.

In the pen and ink picture Mr. E. Johnson is the most distinguished name of the year. His "Negro Life at the South" has attracted universal attention and admiration. It is a picture of genius, finished with a Dutch fidelity, but with much more than Dutch slightness and vivacity. Humor, variety, the detail, the picturesqueness, and the naturalness of this work deserve the praise they have received on every hand. It is not a caricature, as such pictures usually are. It is a palpable hit at Slavery in a characteristic American, and yet to which our literature and art have only very recently seriously addressed themselves. And how many pictures of negro life are there, painting silently upon these walls, and of which no critic has spoken! Johnson's and yet how much remains thing to many a spectator. Life is full of unseen influences all the time, as the air is full of invisible and blessing or bane we breathe. Every where characters are springing up moulded by these influences, unseen by us, and unknown to ourselves spring from that seed. A man writes a book which the critics may praise or blame or pass silently over; and whether it succeeds or fails, it succeeds it, and a light of sympathy suddenly bursts on the hearts of thousands, or a cloud of doubt, or the sudden brightness of a light-house secures the mariner drifting toward a lee-shore. So a singer sings a song, and it lives, or it perishes, and of which there is no audible echo in praise, or in blame even; but perhaps that song has entered some hope, and the poor poet or painter whose heart pines over what he thinks a talent lost or unloved, has found his talent recognized and made lovely.

Let this thought console the artist who puts all his conscience, all his skill, into a work which may not excite a single word from any of the critics.

In one artist Emerson has met with what a profound and marvelous sympathy Robert Browning has written of artists, entering into the very character of different men and times, and expressing the most subtle and morbid moods? One of his finest dramatic lyrics is the "Soliloquy of Spain," in the musing of a proud, solitary painter of three centuries ago over the point at issue. It is asserted in Aristotle's Rhetoric,' argued a pedantic lawyer —"I don't want to hear what is asserted in Aristotle's Rhetoric!" exclaimed Tenterden. "It is laid down in the Pandects of Justinian"—Where are you got to now?" "It is a principle of the civil law"—Oh! Sir, we have nothing to do with civil law in this court."

But Baccalaureatus must remember that Tenterden Doodle has never forgiven the historian of Charlemagne for his biting sarcasms upon this peculiarity, and be very wary. The Lounger, being a Yankee himself, will check what it does as much as he chooses.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

The new story by Dickens, commenced in Household Words of last week, will justify its title in one way at least, for certainly it will be a tale well read in two cities. The Weekly has only had the advantage of advance sheets, but it is the only illustrated edition. Even the author's, in his own paper, is not illustrated.

This, we believe, is the first instance in which any of the chief English novelists have tested a story in weekly numbers, except Charles Reade, whose "White Lies" was published in the London Journal from week to week; and it is incident indication of the tendency of literature to the most popular and also the cheapest form. Such a style of publication has of course very serious inconveniences, but they are those of the author rather than the reader. It forces a stereotyped attention, which is dangerous to the perspective of the story. But if any one is convinced of the inevitable tendency he has but to inform himself of the number of novels that are now publishing in serial forms. So great is the demand that even some daily newspapers have followed the lead of the weeklies and issue semi-weeklies, and even a quarter or more of a new tale.

In France this custom is older. George Sand and Dumas, and others of less note, have published their novels in the feuilletons of the leading papers. Lamartine's "Confidences," and Chateaubriand's "D'outre Tombe," were first issued in the same way; and Alexandre Dumas's "Vicomte de Cascasan" is to be published also in thirty numbers, for which he receives two hundred dollars each.

As for the proceeds of serial publication, Thackeray received from his London publishers, according to authentic report, rather more than a thousand dollars for each monthly part of the "Virginians." It is stated that the first four articles seventy-five thousand dollars from his last novel, "What will he do with it?" which we think is incredible, but which shows the immense sale upon which his publishers count. So universal is the demand that the author is besieged by thousands and millions of people what the troubadour and minstrel used to be to the people. But the same charms with the type, not with the tongue. The Wartburg has expanded into the civilized world. Literature is a perpetual pilgrimage and festival and contest of the modern Minnesingers.

But to return to the chief of cities.

It was hinted, editorially, last week that peculiar circumstances would probably make this new novel of Dickens's one of his least read. The reason of all. This is unquestionably true; for there can be no doubt that the stories of which the scene is only told about the man will have aroused the author to show himself in all his splendor and power. The tale is one of the most interesting period—the two cities are doubtless Paris and London on the eve of the French Revolution, the bold glare of whose approach gleams fitfully through the earlier chapters. The opening scene is characteristic. A brooding mystery and gloom and sharp relief upon the personages; and whoever begins to read will find that he has only to wait a week for what follows.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—P. W. G. and S. M. S., Lawrence County, Alabama, must be content with a weekly illustrated history of the times, since it can not illustrate every thing, and persons, and events, and scenes in the multitude that we must also see that the choice of subjects will be, at least sometimes, controlled by the comparative sale of the paper. It is the interest of every such paper—to say nothing more—to report the public taste of its readers.

—T. D. J., Christian County, Virginia, can procure Harper's Weekly for 1858, bound neatly in muslin, for $3 00. All such orders should be addressed to the Publishers.

—Curious, Rodney, Mississippi, wishes to know whether villages can be decimated by shooting every fifth man. He is evidently confounding that word with decimate as to punish with death every tenth man.

—G., Lynchburg, recurs to the discussion upon the letter i, and inquires whether it is not actually as spelling the name of that city. "If you give it the yuh, then it is very plausible it will take that form."

—Caddis, Fleasant Corner, who asks a question in orthodox verse, must remember that a gentleman is always to be addressed in a low, and not vice versa.

—Talbot, Trenton, but his umbrella to a luckless party caught in the storm. Sensible fellow! Hats are hideous, and got "sopping wet," and the umbrella is not returned. Your question is, Who is the author of the appearance of one? That involves the inquiry whether the party did or did not try to return the umbrella. If she did not—why, then—!

—E. B., Cleveland, Ohio, in reply to the question, What was it he said? Why, he said that even young medical students eat that it was Charles XII., of Sweden, who, after the battle of Pultowa, retired to Bender, Turkey, went to bed, and played chess for several years. Charles XII. is allowed to have been a remarkable man.

—Querist, Boston, asks if it were Dryden or Milton who wrote the famous line,

"The constant lover arm'd me with a lie and blushed."

It was neither. It was Richard Crashaw, whose poems were published in John Russell Bartlett's library of Old Authors. He was a proselyter when the revolution of 1645 was in full career, and became and became a Roman Catholic. Finally he was a Cardinal's secretary and a canon of the church of Loretto, where he died about 1650. He has acknowledged he published a volume of Latin poems and epigrams, and in one of them occurs the line in question.

—"Lympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit."

Querist asks whether Bacon or Addison said it. Both Bacon is styled the eloquent in the Essay on Man:

"If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined,
The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

The couplet that follows is not less critical, quoted,

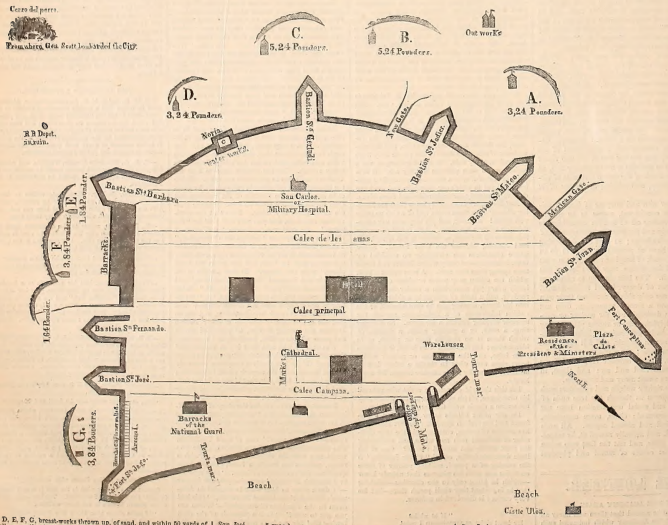
"Or ravished with the whistling of a name,
See Cowley strive to sound the inspiring theme."

—J. H. H., Tennessee, asks for the author of

"Oh! a wonderful stream is the river Time."

The quotation has just once it credited to a Mr. H. W. Taylor. Who is he?

THE NEW UNITED STATES STEAM-SLOOP "IROQUOIS."—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]



A, B, C, D, E, F, G, breast-works thrown up, of sand, and within 50 yards of the wall—mounting in all about 50 guns of large calibre.

Santiago, 10 guns, fronting the harbor, and commanding the beach down to Sacrificio.

San José, 8 guns
San Fernando, 4 " } Ranging to the Cemetery and Alameda.
Santa Barbara, 6 guns, pointing to railroad station and aqueduct, also to Cerro del Perro (the position of gun-boats).
Santa Gertrudis, 3 guns.

San Javier, 4 guns
San Mateo, 3 "
San Juan, 3 " } Commanding the whole, back of Vera Cruz, this side of Sand Hills.
Concepcion, 30 guns, harbor, beach, and road to Bergara. The Castle's guns command the beach north and south at Vera Cruz.

PLAN OF THE FORTIFICATIONS OF VERA CRUZ.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

SLOOP-OF-WAR "IROQUOIS."

On 12th ult. the new sloop-of-war Iroquois was launched at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. She is described as a neat, trim vessel, over 200 feet long, and drawing only eight feet of water. She is to be armed with a two-bladed screw, measuring 12 feet 3 inches in diameter, and 20 feet pitch; her engines, of which she will have two, will be direct back-acting engines, with two cylinders, each 54 inches in diameter, and 28-inch stroke. She is to be fitted out directly for sea.

It is evident that future wars are to be carried on mainly with this class of vessels. Small craft, drawing but little water, and enabled by steam to defy wind and tide, are infinitely superior for the practical purpose of warfare than line-of-battle ships and heavy frigates.

The British Government has for some time been busily engaged in the construction of gunboats drawing from 3 to 8 feet of water, and each carrying one gun of the largest calibre. Their gun-boat flotilla now numbers several hundred vessels, and has already proved of the highest value in both the Crimean and the Chinese wars. It would be well for us to follow the example. Meanwhile the construction of such ships as the Iroquois costs less, and will probably do more real service than any line-of-battle ship afloat.

PLAN OF THE FORTIFICATIONS OF VERA CRUZ, MEXICO.

We gave some time since a picture of the harbor of Vera Cruz, with the foreign fleets at anchor there for the protection of foreigners. We now subjoin a plan of the fortifications of the city, from a sketch for which we are indebted to the New York Herald. The outer works were erected by the garrison, in anticipation of the threatened attack by General Miramon.

It is not likely that any very great period of time can elapse before Vera Cruz is again a scene of warfare. For years to come it looks as though Mexico could not but remain the prey of bandits, who, under various high-sounding names, profess one or another set of political principles for the purpose of robbing the people. Vera Cruz—the New York of Mexico, the greatest port of entry, and the strongest place on the sea-board—must naturally play a prominent part in future contests. Our plan is worth keeping for future reference.

STRUGGLE WITH A BUCK.

LIFE-SCENES IN THE SOUTH.

STRUGGLE WITH A BUCK.

THE gentleman who related to me the following narrative is a man of the strictest veracity—an honorable gentleman. He is also a relative of mine, and a personal friend; and I feel assured that I will by no means wound his feelings by making public his terrible and almost fatal rencontre with the wild stag of the South. But first let me describe to the reader his physical organization, that he may know that he is "a man, every inch of him." And, in the first place, I will merely remark that at the period to which I refer he was considered the most active man in the district. On one occasion he consented, after much persuasion, to run a foot-race with a very fast little man, who had often boasted that he had never found his match, and did not believe he had an equal in the State either in speed or activity. Our hero refused to run with him on equal terms, but proposed to give his antagonist ten paces, with the additional odds of tying flat upon his face. The proposition, after much opposition on the part of his rival "as unfair, too unequal," etc., was at length received with contemptuous laughter. The result of the race, however, was that the little man was fairly "distanced" in one hundred yards; and he never raised his head again (as a racer). His pride was completely humbled by one who had never boasted.

And well might our hero be a swift runner and an active man; for I have never seen one who possessed keener limbs and more perfectly developed muscles. Like a full-blooded racer, there was no superfluous flesh about him; he was all bone and muscle—perfectly formed by the hand of God. His nose is Roman; and his eye, though kindly blue, is as keen as a hawk's. In his younger days he was all energy; and twenty-five years ago—the period of which we are now writing—he held his rifle with a sure hand and deadly aim. But he never used it in any unholy warfare. He would have been brave, even terrible, in battle; but his spirit was too genial then, his heart too benevolent now, to entertain for a single moment the deadly spirit of the duelist. Having promised thus much, we will let him tell his adventure in his own words; and though I have suppressed his name, many of his personal friends and old admirers will recognize his portrait.

"It was in the latter part of September that I strolled into the woods one morning, with my rifle on my shoulder, little dreaming that I would meet such noble game so near to my homestead, but hoping that I would tumble a fox squirrel from some lofty pine or venerable old oak. I had not walked more than half a mile before I saw two old bucks, with huge antlers rising as stately trees from their brows. They did not perceive me, and seemed to be too intent upon a strange occupation to observe surrounding objects—except my path, and for a while watched their singular motions, which were too systematic to be playful. They seemed to be greatly agitated, making the forest ring with their loud snorting, while they ran toward each other from opposite directions, meeting and passing each other almost invariably at the same spot. And when they arrived at this common centre they would gather up their keen, supple legs quicker, then rising several feet higher in the air, with their heads lowered, and with a loud snort of savage terror, their sharp, razor-like hoofs, pointed downward, were plunged quick upon some object upon the ground. Then, quick as lightning, they would rise into the air again, and, as if husbanding their strength, they would regain their starting-point, some thirty or forty yards distant, in opposite directions; then wheel about as trained soldiers, and again approach each other at a more rapid pace, leap high into the air at the given point, with a loud snort drive their hoofs downward, and then regain their stations leisurely as before, each one occupying the other's place alternately.

PANTHER HUNTING IN AFRICA.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"I stood silently watching this strange proceeding for several minutes, when, thinking it was too good a chance to be thrown away, I leisurely raised my rifle, took deliberate aim, and fired at one of the noble-looking animals—for they were equally splendid in appearance, and I had, therefore, no choice to make between them. I selected the one farthest from me, by a few paces, because it was, at all events, sure of my money. My ball entered just behind his shoulder, and passed through his heart. He made one convulsive bound into the air, and fell heavily to the earth; he never reached his goal, for he was dead! But, strange to say, the remaining buck seemed not to hear, or was utterly indifferent to the report of my rifle. With nervous haste I reloaded my weapon, and, as quick as such cases, she was hastily loaded. I have never loaded a weapon before or since so quickly as then; it was the work of a few seconds only. The remaining buck had wheeled, and was on his return during the shot, and neared the centre of his pen; he had leaped into the air and made his snort just as my hand was upon the trigger. My sight covered a spot near the centre of his forehead just as he made his upward bound, and at the sharp crack of the rifle he fell heavily to the earth, and his knees desolded under him, as an ox that has been felled by a blow from an axe wielded by a strong hand.

"Drawing a long dirk-knife which I usually carried with me, I hastily approached the fallen monarch of our Southern forests, and was surprised to see no wound on his forehead. Had my shot not have killed him, therefore, I thought and said aloud, without actually entering his brain.

"Then the idea of committing such a foul act very much as he was, I determined to kill it. I therefore with his knife drew open the nostrils of his head, and I not seen as active as a cat; and I thank God that His Providence was, for otherwise my life would have been spilled upon the ground then and there.

"I never gave up my hold upon his horn with my left hand; but in that first fierce leap I lost my knife, and in attempting to save it with my other horn the enraged animal pierced my hand clean through with one of the sharp points of his antlers. But I did not feel my pain at the time, so now a death-struggle, and God alone knew who should prove victorious. I found it a hard one with me, and I hurriedly but earnestly commended my soul to the keeping of a good and a merciful God. Oh! this was an awful time for me, and I can mark hour—a fearful struggle for life! I seemed to be already passing through the valley and the shadow of death.' The dying man—the condemned criminal standing upon the scaffold—could not realize more vividly than I did then what I did. And though years have passed away, and I am getting old, when I think of that struggle I can feel with the enraged stag my heart eases its throbbings, and my blood almost freezes in my veins.

"We had been thus struggling, 'foot to foot, and hand to hand,' as it were, for a considerable time—I know not how long, for to me it seemed an age. My strength was almost exhausted, but I did not feel like letting my hold; and as I was the taller of the two, the deer's strength seemed exhausted, too, about the same time as mine, and he ceased for a moment flagged. He ceased his struggles and looked earnestly with a long and a fixed gaze into my eyes. There was no longer rage in his countenance: it was simply an earnest, almost human look of entreaty or of inquiry. It seemed as if to be gazing down into the caverns of my soul, as if taking observation of my thoughts and reading my ultimate intentions. He seemed to be putting the question to me in distinct terms; and although he possessed not the gift of articulation, yet his look could be plainly interpreted as though he had spoken it in audible voice, and was simply inquire, 'Who shall be master? Shall I give up to you, as the 'lord of creation,' or are you some cowardly spaniel whom I shall trample beneath or beneath my hoofs? Come, Sir, speak! Who shall be master?'

"But there was no response from me to his mute appeal, for I had none to give. There was nothing but death in my heart. I had no faith in the deer tribe, and dreaded to see a renewal of the conflict. He seemed to understand my hesitation, and to regain my weakness, for his upper lip began to tremble again with a strange nervous, tremulous twitching, while his eyes expanded wider and wider, and glared at me fire-balls upon me. His back rose up like a bow bent for the target, and he reminded me of an unerring marksman; his frame grew larger and more portentous with evil; while his mane bristled up, seemingly, as still a greater passion, rage, and wrath possessed him.

"But, strange to say, this terrible onset of defiance, this nervous tremor of the upper lip, which had cost a shivering chill through my frame, produced now a contrary effect, and nerved rather than depressed my resolution to conquer or to die. My previous exhaustion, my almost lethargic indifference to my fate had passed away in a moment. All his breathing spirit had rested him if he had rested me also; if he was determined to renew the battle, I was none the less nerved for the contest; and if the issue was doubtful, I was resolved to hold on, and if I fell I should die gloriously, and with 'colors nailed to the mast.'

"The very first lunge that he made I avoided by stepping adroitly to one side, and by a sudden and a dexterous twisting of his horns just at the moment when his head was bent down with savage intent I fortunately succeeded in tripping him from his heels, and he fell heavily to the earth. Although we had struggled over much ground, and had removed many paces from the place where the battle first began, strange to say we had now returned to the identical spot, and the body of my antagonist pressed down the very grass that I stood down before. And oh! happy recollection! there lay my glittering knife, as bright as the day it brought to my hand, and shouted help in my ears—help for the widow's son. Quick as thought I seized the knife, and plunged it into the side that his head fallen animal's throat. It was enough; I had severed the carotid artery in this instance was a lion, who had eaten the flocks of a whole tribe of Arabs. I reached him to his lair, and asked Gérard to kill him.

"The Frenchman went out toward nightfall. An hour, who accompanied him, found him dead, quite on the mouth of the lair. Then the hunter lay watching behind a screen. He had not long to wait before the lion's head made its appearance. The coast began to shiver and tremble; its efforts to free itself were tremendous. The lion were natural and quite feeble. Presently the lion emerged from his lair and began to walk slowly toward the post. When within a few paces he stopped. He was reconnoitring. He lay down and winked at the hunter, and died.

"There were, a few minutes ago, a man and a wild beast. Now there is the quiet of death in a man! Ha! there is another man, watching me, and looking as if he wanted to speak. I am beyond his reach. I was killing myself to save him, as a general rule I prefer man; but this fellow seems to me that I should have killed on the spot.

With such reflections, saith the Frenchman, the lion advanced on the quivering goat. At twelve paces from the post Gérard was struck with terror that the forehead was the only safe shot, and broke the brute's right shoulder. A second shot laid him again, and broke his left. The lion, strange to say, escaped into the thicket and had to be hunted over again. He was killed with a long chase; but in dying he munched the shoulder of a poor Arab who had given the first shot, and killed him.

Panthers are not so terrible as lions; but even they, stealing along treacherously and noiselessly on their victim at night, must need a great deal of nerves thrill as they approach the point when he must pull the trigger and take the consequences of a bad shot.

LITERARY.

LOVE BE LITTLE, LOVE BE LONG, is Charles Reade's last novel published by Harper & Brothers.

It is much in advance of his late works, and takes rank with "Peg Wellington" and "Christie Johnstone" in the delineation of character. In that the process from the natural style of Mr. Reade, which makes his men and women seem to be actually speaking and acting. He does not choose such words, but matches his people talk as people ordinarily talk. He does not put a word in the present volume in simply: A young lady—a distinct sort of a person, of course—comes upon a uncle on one side and an aunt on the other, each of whom selects a different husband for her, and go on a struggle of each other. The lovers represent two great classes of English society—the middle and upper part of the latter—and the author had rich banker. But a bluff, frank sailor, mate of an East Indiaman, a veritable man, in his own proper style, and the lovers are united after a long struggle. Perhaps the finest portion of the story is the admirable delineation of the sailor's character, position in society and love for the sailor. It does not appear to be a contest. It is not once spoken of as a struggle or sacrifice—the event; but the struggle is visible nevertheless, and forms a fine and striking part of the book. We have only to add that, like all of Reade's novels, it is of peculiarly absorbing interest; so that, once taken up, it is difficult to lay down until finished.

We have received from Van Benthuysen, Albany, the Annual Report of the Canal Board for the year 1859—a little volume whose value and necessity is well known throughout the State

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM UTAH.

We have one week's later news, to April 9, from the Mormon territory, and the intelligence spiritual as to the state of affairs there. The court at Provo had broken up, and Judge Cradlebaugh, up the north end of Utah Floyd, with the prisoners in charge, some of whom, not to be tried at the present session, were to be taken down to Camp Floyd.

ATROCITIES OF THE MORMONS.

Extract from a letter dated Camp Floyd, April 9, written by an officer of the army at Camp Floyd, Utah:

"We have one week's later news, to April 9, from the Mormon territory, and the intelligence spiritual as to the state of affairs there. The court at Provo had broken up, and Judge Cradlebaugh, up the north end of Utah Floyd, with the prisoners in charge, some of whom, not to be tried at the present session, were to be taken down to Camp Floyd. Among this last guild, and the Mormons found no difficulty in finding them.

"The cause of this handsome young lad excited our sympathy much. He had, it seems, been married to a young Danish girl, who had emigrated here with him, whom he had known from childhood, with a view to marriage. The attachment was mutual, but some bourgeois, and some-other-of-a-more-refined-ilk, wanted the girl for his harem, and, pretext of the handsome youth, had thrown him into confinement, and given him a chance to work out his salvation.

MORE ABOUT SICKLES.

The Tribune correspondent says: "The Hon. Daniel E. Sickles will make choice in a few days between his participation in which he has just been tried, convicted, and pardoned by the Executive, and resignation of the different indictments took place, and submitted his intention to kill Mr. Key. The testimony excluded by Judge Crawford at the trial would have established the fact that Mr. Sickles was engaged in an intrigue which was in during the month of January, and the gist of its admissibility in evidence was avoided in order to prevent retaliatory exposures on the part of Mr. Key's friends. The facts must all, however, come out eventually. The letter in which Mr. Key, Jan. 29, was found on his body and produced on the trial, contained declarations of love for Mrs. Sickles.

THE EXCLUDED EVIDENCE.

The grounds of which the evidence rejected existed in the Sickles case was, we hear, together with the testimony corroborative of it, carefully preserved, and sent to the Court, which decided that the proof would be inadmissible.

We now offer evidence, the particulars of which we are unable, if possible, to state. It is contained in a letter, and was immediately preceding the homicide, and subsequent to the publication of the letter. It is satisfactory because the deceased and the prisoner's wife, and because it is not to be disputed, when produced, that it was said and written by the deceased concerning marriage relations; and this is offered to rebut the charge of adultery with the wife of the prisoner by the wife.

That the accused reached Barnum's Hotel, the city of Baltimore, on the evening of the 16th of January last, and that he was engaged a room; that he had said hold at or about three o'clock on the following morning; that he was found dead in his room, quite dead, and was at said depot on the arrival of the Philadelphia train, and that he was then and there killed by the prisoner, and that the prisoner was then taking by the defence, shall not be disputed; when we offer to add that the letter of the deceased concerning marriage, and with whom then and there he had address, and that the prisoner, and in different language, has been married his the accused committed other acts of adultery.

The Court having already permitted the defense to show that the deceased had written a letter to a certain alleged acts of adultery between the deceased and the prisoner's wife, and having excluded the letter, might tend to prove the insanity of the accused, the intimacy of the deceased with the wife of the prisoner, &c.

"First—Because its tendency, if not its necessary effect, is to contradict the testimony which the Court has listed on by the defense.

"Second—Because such evidence, though consistent with a state of anger or revenge upon the part of the accused, is inconsistent with a state of insanity.

"Or, in other words, that such evidence tends to prove any proposition which is relevant to the issue. In a case of communications made to the accused relative to the conduct of his wife, which are false in fact, &c.

The Baltimore Exchange says: "It is understood that, in addition to the above, the defense will would have been followed up by other evidence from New York, having upon the same point.

HOW A BOAT IS BUILT ON LAKE ERIE.

The Detroit Free Press says: "A horrible occurrence happened at the Detroit depot of the Grand Trunk Railway on Wednesday, by which the wife of the engineer, Thomas Sprey, was killed. As the train approaches direct from that place, are as follow: Some passengers were standing on the platform, and among them was Mary Gregory, who was waiting to meet a friend on their oil for the purpose. A large kettle or caldron is erected in the centre of the bottom of the station, which they had filled with oil and were boiling. They had left it for a moment, and the oil was at a high heat, when some part of it ran over and took fire on the stove, which was near by. The flames caught the station-master, was the only person in the house at the time, and he, with a boy, attempted to put out the fire. In so doing he was burned, and the oil was thrown over the floor. Her clothes caught fire, and she was in a terrible plight. She then got a chair, and placing it beside the stove, she fell down upon it, and was burned to death. She was a fine, full-blooded woman, and was 30 years old.

"The oil that was dispersed by the insurrection of the flames soon communicated to the upon the wood, but the flames soon communicated to that upon the floor, and the room was immediately in a blaze. Sprey, on the train announced screaming with terror, and ran out of the house. Her clothes were burned entirely off her by the flames, who were no great distance away, and who ran to her assistance. He succeeded in putting out the fire by a few buckets of water, however, speedily put out the fire by a few buckets of water, however, speedily put out the fire by a few buckets of water, however, speedily put

PERSONAL.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune gives the following sketch of Juarez, the Constitutional President of Mexico:

"He was fourteen fifty-three years ago, in a mountainous district of Oaxaca, and, as he blood a poor boy, he had to earn his bread by first herding a few sheep and cattle, and gathering and husking corn for the sake of their skins. At the age of ten years Juarez ran off to attend a school, being afraid on returning to return, he hired himself to a mule-driver, from whose service he passed into the service of a priest, who, pleased at his intelligence, caused him to be taught to read and write. Astonishing the progress of his employer's pupil, sent to the College of Oaxaca, and having chosen the profession of lawyer, he was placed under the tuition of a man of his own race, who was one of the best lawyers in Mexico, with the triumph of Alvarez, was made Chief Justice, and continued to possess that office at the time of Santa Anna's usurpation."

A correspondent of the Washington Star contradicts the statement that the Hon. Leon Sayre is dying at the point of his residence in Georgetown. He says that he has accompanied by his wife and son, has been at Philadelphia for eight days, and that he is not dying, as eminent physicians, has been prescribing for him, and entertains the hope that he will soon be restored sufficiently recovered by the 1st of June so to be able to participate in the session at Nashville.

The number of American travelers on the Nile this year is more considerable than ever. Among the party are Mr. Cheverus, ex-Minister to Portugal, and family, of Connecticut, celebrated for the collection of Egyptian antiquities in New York, and numbering 1,000 pieces.

The Rev. Theodore F. White and lady, of Mendham, New York, were "surprised" on the 20th ult. by a party who poured into their parsonage, numbering about fifty persons, filled the larder and cellar with good things, and on the return of the party presented the pastor with a purse containing over $200 in gold. Their spokesman informed Mr. White that they were surprised at their appreciation of his fidelity and worth as an evangelist; after which they all shook hands with him, and left a happy time for all present.

The Toledo (Ohio) Blade says that "twenty Toledo Misses" can, with six months' training, perform as well as Frenchmen. Will the Misses please to send us some of their hair Tribunes?

The Rev. Dr. Edward E. Bolmer Lytton will make about $10,000 of his late novel, "The Coming Race." It is to be published, first the larder and cellar with good things, and on the return of the party presented the pastor with a purse containing over $200 in gold. Their spokesman informed Mr. White that they were surprised at their appreciation of his fidelity and worth as an evangelist; after which they all shook hands with him, and left a happy time for all present.

The Toledo (Ohio) Blade says that "twenty Toledo Misses" can, with six months' training, perform as well as Frenchmen. Will the Misses please to send us some of their hair Tribunes?

The Rev. Dr. Edward E. Bolmer Lytton will make about $10,000 of his late novel, "The Coming Race." It is to be published, first in London, then in Boston, and then in Philadelphia, for eight months, by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, and will be issued in the Sea Shores series, and also in cheap paper for the million.

Colonel Dan Pike, of Kentucky, has just started a new paper at Mount Sterling, Kentucky, being the forty-ninth paper he has had the honor of founding in that State.

The Count de Survigny has received his long-desired seat, and will sit for Pontarlier in the Corps Legislatif. The election has been discharged unanimously, but with great discretion and secrecy. The Count's opponent, it is said, has been more respected and esteemed than Madame de Survigny.

Tuckiandi, the father of Madame Persiani, and one of the most distinguished of the Italian bards, died in the early of Florence, where he has lived since his retirement from the stage. He was born in the year 1776, and once, when on the stage at one of the theatres at Rome, the audience insisted that Napoleon, residing at Tuckiandi, Tuckiandi looked at the laughers a minute, and when silence was restored, said, "Gentlemen, I have come here to be heard and not stared at." He was eighty-four years old when he died.

The Republic of Hayti has commissioned two colored gentlemen, Tennison and Bird, to proceed to Africa, to see, where they have been sent, to negotiate a treaty.

The Memphis Avalanche has the following interesting reminiscences concerning the brothers of the late Mike Walsh:

"The children consist of two boys and a girl, the eldest of whom Mike was the youngest, that had been scattered in all directions upon the death of their parents. The eldest remained with his mother. A most singular fatality befell them also. One of the brothers went to sea, and had across a table in a Southern city; another fell by the hand of a fellow-sailor; and a third was murdered in a shop; the third brother was buried in the Sea Shores, and his sister perished in the flames of the Lexington. The brother soon followed her children, leaving poor Mike to mourn a death, under the circumstances more sorrowful than any of the rest."

The New York correspondent of the Charleston News says: "Daniel E. Sickles, on 4th ult (who is back from Europe), called on Mr. Buchanan, and, after a cordial interview of some hours, he and the President quietly repaired and reappeared in the street at about 4 o'clock. The report that he is about to challenge Mr. Forney, to display a cane phrase, all 'bunk.'"

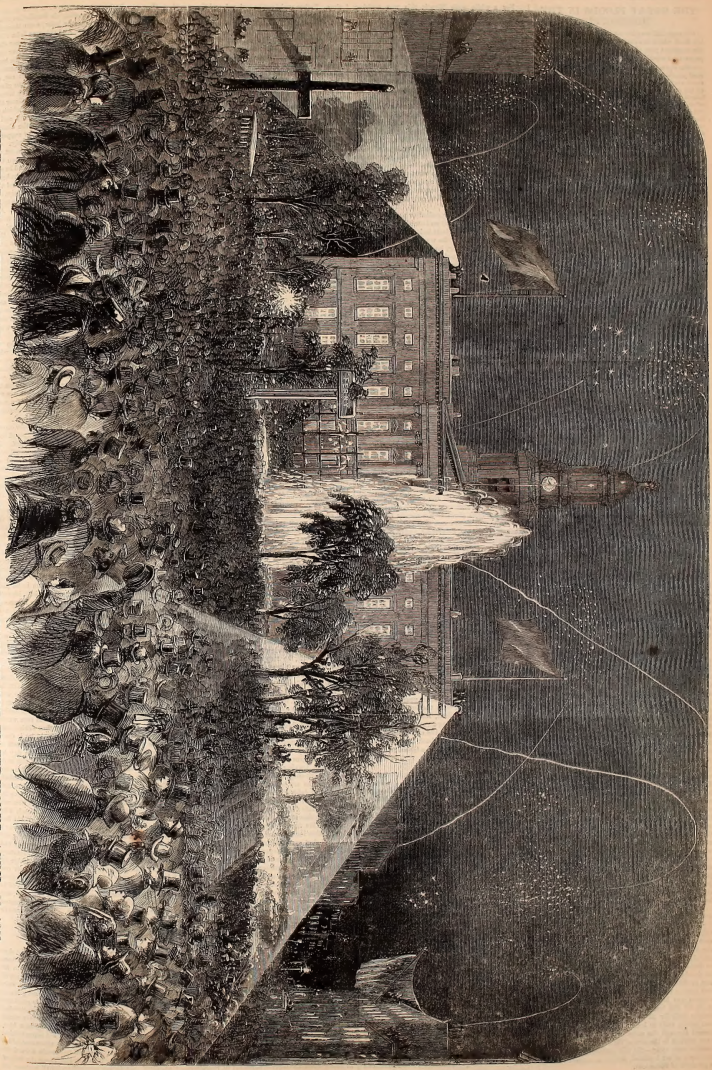
The Albany Argus says that Henry W. Preston, once a favorite actor, and for some years manager of theatres in Albany, was drowned on the night of the 4th inst. He was on the deck in the vicinity of the steamboat landing, and being under the impression that he was going home, replied, "I have no home this woman here to-night." He was drowned in the North River before it was in." The next instant his acquaintance heard a fall and a splash in the water. He is now on the list of lodged in drink to excess, and was very poor. His body has not yet been found.

A man living near Nashville, Tennessee, who had been living in California and made a fortune, returned to his native county, found a baby only three months old lying in the road. He took it home with him, and on the death of the child he adopted it, and gave it the name of Lafayette. The revenue of the little suffer called in the family, "then the stranger departed, and was seen no more." He was going home, replied, "I have no home this woman here to-night." He was drowned in the North River before it was in." The next instant his acquaintance heard a fall and a splash in the water. He is now on the list of lodged in drink to excess, and was very poor. His body has not yet been found.

A man living near Nashville, Tennessee, who had been living in California and made a fortune, returned to his native county, found a baby only three months old lying in the road. He took it home with him, and on the death of the child he adopted it, and gave it the name of Lafayette. The revenue of the little suffer called in the family, "then the stranger departed, and was seen no more." He was going home, replied, "I have no home this woman here to-night." He was drowned in the North River before it was in." The next instant his acquaintance heard a fall and a splash in the water. He is now on the list of lodged in drink to excess, and was very poor. His body has not yet been found.

The Rev. Dr. Hawks, of Brooklyn, delivered a sermon last Sunday in the Parish of Sea, had been engaged in the Parish of Sea, had been engaged in the Parish of Sea, had been engaged

THE FLOOD IN THE MISSISSIPPI.—[See Page 314.]



FIRE-WORKS AT THE BROOKLYN CITY HALL, ON THE INAUGURATION OF THE WATER-WORKS, APRIL 28, 1859.

THE GREAT FLOODS IN THE MISSISSIPPI.

On page 317 we give an illustration of the terrible flood which is causing so much devastation in the southern part of the Mississippi. A Southern paper thus describes the scene:

"The sights that met our eyes at intervals were of the most painful description. Plantations and village were every where overflowed, and wet and miserable looks of the overflow—every where in and about the houses. The houses themselves were either in or over the water; when built on pillars, the water was flowing beneath, and the tenants poltroons either, the skill or dogged being the only valuable for going abroad. Almost every one seated was deserted, and the universal flood was carrying desolation, decay, and misery into every every apartment.

"In many instances flat-boats were moored beside such habitations, ten-thirds of which were occupied by horses, hogs, and cattle; a portion of the family thereafter was roofed over, and there lived the negroes, and there the fowl and poultry, perched down by passing boats, were preserved. Every boat is hailed with earnest anxiety for news of the state of the river above. Many of the citizens show signs of great depression; they bore up bravely against the calamities that fell on the summer, but a second affliction of the same kind, following so closely on the heels of the first, has proved too much for their courage, and heartrending complaints are made of difficulty and privation. This is, however, not the case universally the case: there are brave hearts that bear their misfortunes manfully. We have heard of one of the deserted out who energetically hailed a boat, if there was any children there? were answered, he said he would have a bishop, having nothing to do when he wanted a breakfast but to let down a rail and permit a cat-fish to enter."

THE ILLUMINATION AT BROOKLYN.

THE illustration on page 313 will convey to the beholder a fair idea of the illuminations at Brooklyn, on 26th ult., in honor of the Water-Works. A reporter thus describes the scene:

"The festivities of the day were closed by a splendid display of fireworks on the City Hall square, which was witnessed by a crowd of people estimated at from twenty to thirty thousand. The hall and the streets surrounding it were densely packed, and the 'sea of upturned faces' extended in long and wide swells as far as the eye could reach up and down the various streets converging to this common point. The scene from the steps of the City Hall was of the most magnificent description. The beautiful edifice was handsomely illuminated, and the eight hundred colored Chinese lanterns, suspended in the elm trees around the square, and in the roof and the various column lights, shedding their powerful white gas glare over the whole crowd. Another light of the same description was mounted on the top of a building at the northern end of the park, fronting the City Hall. The park fountain was playing a large stream, fifty or sixty feet high, which descended in circle and sheet of spray, and through which the lights danced and glimmered with indescribably fantastic hues. Most of the buildings surrounding the park were handsomely decorated interiors and candles; and altogether the scene was grandly exhilarating."

NOT AT ALL STRANGE.

JOHN PIERRE MANOLT was a good, likely fellow, with a jovial face, a snapping dark eye, an abundance of curly hair, and a hard head. He was an engineer by trade, hard working, steady, and reliable, and a comfortable home to his wife, mother, and loved and obeyed her in all things save one. This single disobedience a thousand wild parties did not entirely withhold.

Let us tell how.

When John Pierre Manolt had reached the age of twenty-five chance threw in his way Esther Ford.

To say Esther was pretty would be dismissing her description with much less than justice than it deserved. She was young; too young for a wife. Sixteen or her age, but she was very pretty beyond her years. Manolt, in the days of their courtship, had called her his doll, and in her wife-hood the name stuck to her. She was a "doll" in the full style of beauty—a full blue eye, curling flaxen hair, a prettily rounded arm and shapely hand, which to the day of her marriage were displayed by low-necked and short-sleeved dresses. She was not wild or assuming with strangers; but it required not long to win Esther's confidence and thus it was that Manolt, years after they had been married, Esther Ford, brought her home as his wife, though he felt entirely the inferiority of her mother to the mother. The elder lady had been strictly of the old article school as maid, wife, and widow, to believe that the age and fashion of the time could change, and that young girls should not be the same as they had been and had ever before. She could not realize that at fifteen or sixteen, which was only an emergence from childhood, they should attend balls, drink wine, dance the waltz and polka dresses, go on steamboat picnic parties away into the country with entirely young men, and still make good wives and good mothers. Perhaps she was right theoretically, but, practically, she may have been wrong.

Esther Ford—who was the only child of a widow, and was allowed to do, as her mother expressed it, "just as she pleased"—pleased to do all these things. And though she would have shrunk in terror from making or encouraging an evil thought, she thought it entirely right, on the strength of an introduction at a public ball, by the dancing master, to dance many times with Manolt, to consent that he should call upon her next evening, and to aid him in that end by giving her address. And from this sprang the union of these two. The girl of sixteen was brought home to be attended like a child by the husband's aged mother. She was totally unfit for all the duties of the household, and totally unfit to learn. Whatever might have passed through the mind of the mother, no word ever escaped to the wife of the children, and so the months were away—the wife remaining an idler in the home of her husband, and, as a natural result, a gatherer of discontents.

For a while with Manolt this was nothing. When at night he came wearied from his work, he found every thing as it had been in other days: he found a cheerful supper, a cleanly house, and a look of thrift. And then he blamed his wife a few pleasant words, and a kind embrace or two, he could remove the pettish, peevish manner of the young wife. But he lacked the power of blowing lasting the surface. He did not notice that on the face of the water there was a certain sameness—a surface that fitted not before his pleasant words, or became less in his embraces.

It was by no way. Manolt did not see all this: but when one day the firm for whom he had worked for years, and from the balance from which he never would compel them to part with him, and Manolt found himself with nearly a week's notice unemployed and wearing any immediate chance of occupation, he had a good opportunity of seeing all the little discontents of his home—of seeing that those under circumstances of the most unfavorable nature, and of remonstrating against them, as a matter of right, or pointing out a remedy, who saw what staring him daily in the face, only a short distance removed.

He had never been a prudent or provident man. Now, when he could find no immediate market for his services, and the ten balance Manolt had been paid him on the day he was discharged melted away, Manolt felt, for the first time, the full evil and many were the good resolves he made that the future should see it bettered.

Months after month passed by, and still he wandered wearily from shop to shop, at times aroused with the hope of obtaining work, but when he and his head would commune a price. His name and residence lay on the books of a score of shops, waiting a time when unemployed artisans of value would create a necessity for more labor, when he was promised that his application should receive a first attention. His money had melted away, his watch had gone, all the little ways of obtaining small sums had become exhausted, and there was already pressing heavily on the idle man. It should not be supposed that Manolt's wife, under these circumstances of misery that might be in the man's nature should show itself.

It was then the true ministering of woman could have elevated her to an angel. But oh! that such things will be, that the fond, the loving, the deep, the oppressed, almost despairing man, should return to his home only to be met at the threshold by the gloomy face of his boastful wife, and to hear from her lips childish complaints of their poverty, and her deprivations, and to find that her dress and dress or luxury that she had enjoyed in their days of prosperity. If she had, as had been, that her complaints could be stopped with a kiss and her wants with a promise. The kisses, she said, but promise or duty and the husband would look for fulfillment. There were no more balls, no more theatres, no more picnics—no money that once went to these pleasures now was expended in the stern facts of food and necessities, and of late nearly in those. Because Manolt's wife's mother-in-law position would not go forth on his daily tramp through the workshops, and thus he would have his wife dress prettily, and they would walk together, and while gazing into the shop-windows he would draw a smile to her lips at an instant by telling her that he would buy her but he but the money; and then had her hang upon his arm, and kiss her was, and always had been, Esther's passion, and even under their poverty many little struggles were made that the wife should not sense that the husband was to gratify a suddenly conceived wish, and perhaps the husband spring to a pawn-shop walk beside his baby-looking wife gazing upon her beauty, and seeing nothing in all the world equal to it—feeling that he could give every comfort and luxury to make her happy, and a frown never set upon her face.

That fatal passion, that fostering insanity of woman, nurtured by the father, brother, and the husband, that hurries more victims, yearly, to a terrible end with her than the fiercest pestilence, and with the other; the silent, insidious fiend that tempts, step by step, from virtue to vice, from honor, and virtue, leaving only in the end a pale, ghastly, painted spectre to point back upon the road, over which it has come—a—Ghoul: for what was once a Woman—Dress!

II.

It was on one of those walks that Manolt passed Greer, of the firm of Greer, Brothers, machinists. Thomas Greer was a boy when Manolt left the shop toward Manolt, was looking steadily at the lady who walked with him. As he quickly raised his eyes to Manolt's face he seized a pencil and wrote a few words.

John thought next day, and told his wife so, that it was a most fortunate circumstance that had happened to him that day, thereby bringing Manolt's name to his memory, and thereby enabling Manolt's him, that, if he would come to Greer's shop next morning, there was a job of work waiting his acceptance.

Next morning, then, John congratulated his wife on his good fortune; and more on the fact that Thomas Greer seemed to take an especial liking to him, making all sorts of kind inquiries relative to his gratifying to Manolt. Gradually this acquaintance ripened into friendship, and in a few weeks John Manolt and Thomas Greer could be seen together in the evenings, and on Sundays; while Esther was a visitor to the house of Greer, and with a quiet, open manner, seemed to gain the sufferages of both wife and mother. There was but one drawback to all this. It was the presence of debt upon John, who, notwithstanding his employment, did not extricate himself from the weight. There were so many schemes of pleasure, so many days for enjoyment during which John was excused by Greer from the shop, and Greer made one of the party to picnic, for a ride, or an excursion, for which none was more ready than John Manolt, that it was not only impossible for John to relieve himself from debt, but they were still accumulating. Esther could not be satisfied, and Greer said, "Let her have pleasure; she is young, and should enjoy herself." The old mother never spoke of all this, but John could not fail to see that she was failing fast, and sadly lacked that spirit which was so kindly on her in other days. And so the parties of pleasure were continued, and John was excurrying on in the old, but now fatal, manner, when he counted the same as though he had been faithful. Though he could not see the coming date, what day so lost, he spent three times what he could have earned in that time. But Esther was happier, it seemed to her, in this cent he had raved so dearly were indeed lost to him for years if not forever. Oh! the agony of the thought of the future. Five years in the gloom of a prison was nothing, but what would become of his wife and child, what of his poor old mother?

He tried now to interest those about him with his offer. "You," one said, "it was very bad, but you must make the best of it." Another told him: "We have a good deal of that kind of thing."

A third said: "Perhaps his friends were going to get a pardon." Another replied: "Oh! the agony of hope with the eagerness of despair. Yes, it must be so, they would not desert him. They were no doubt moving for a pardon. Yes, he would be pardoned. There was no doubt of it; and pondering on the hope until he had built it almost to a certainty, he was carried away to Sing Sing. He was clipped and cut, and became No. 123; and in time, like all the human machinery about the terrible place, he went about his work, walked when commanded, and still when commanded, and drank like a machine, and was never known to speak unless spoken to. For the first few months after coming to his dungeon No. 123, by a system of conduct having won the favor of the officers having him in charge, was removed to his cell, which was committed by these officers to the mail, but no answers ever came. Nor yet did any inquiry or visiting friend ever come. No. 123, and then Maudit cursed his wife in his heart and openly, and resisted the low person his guards placed near for swearing aloud in the midst of his work that if his life were spared to go out of that prison he would kill the hideous woman who, by her extravagance and folly, had brought him there only to cheat him. After No. 123 never was punished. A better man never was in the workshop, or one more reliable and trust-worthy. So said the superintendent, who never failed to say to No. 123 overwork, and show him whatever favor could be shown consistent with rules. No. 123 clung to the work-shop. He never lost a moment which he could devote to work. He must make all he could. It was very little, but it was all he should look forward to the time of coming away from the prison, and he would vindicate, by that, his had a great end to achieve, and he must be industrious.

One day while in the work-shop he took up a bit of newspaper that had come wrapped about a parcel of sewers. It was a relic in the prison, and he eagerly devoured every word upon it. But what is the matter with No. 123? His suddenly clenches his hands, and he bites his lips, and his eyes grow back upon the floor. They pick up the man and carry him out to the cell, and the superintendent looks over the bit of newspaper to see if he can find any thing that may have affected No. 123, as the men worked at his side. And then he thinks the paper was the cause. The superintendent reads this paragraph:

"DEATH FROM A BLOW.—A woman known by the name of FLOSS BOSS, but whose real name was thought to have been Maudit, and who was tried and convicted not a term in the State Prison at Sing Sing, was killed by a blow from some heavy instrument, supposed to be a dance-house, No. — West Broadway. The Coroner will sit upon the body to-morrow."

No. 123 was back at his work next morning. He worked away as sternly as ever; but now he never spoke of his fortune. The fact was known, and had been opened, and this great horror had been thrown into it, and then he had closed it in, allowing none to look upon it. He seemed to forget whether it lived there, or whether he had smothered it. Nearly four years of this entombment had passed on the day when he read that paragraph, and there was talk of a pardon to be gotten by the officers of the prison. The story of the newspaper awakened the interest in No. 123, and within a month he walked forth upon his dungeon-yard, a man, with money enough in his pocket to support him in idleness if he chose it for three months. He went forth hurriedly, asked the nearest person with whom his crime had brought him in contact; and as he walked from the prison to the house of Floss, John Pierre Maudit bent down his head and shed the first tears he had shed since his boyhood.

IV

THE man must have altered much when he could go among those who had known him and loved him before, when he could sit by them, and talk to them, and still be unrecognized; and so thought Maudit himself, when for the first time in four years, he had an opportunity of seeing his whole self in a glass. He knew that he had grown ten years older, perhaps more. Exactly thirty he was, and more than forty he appeared. That black hair was streaked with gray so strongly as to be perceptible at a long distance. The eyes that once were so full and clear were sunken and almost bloodshot, and had learned a way of looking down. His was bent; years of close labor above the workbench without exercise had done that. And these were hard lines in the face—lines that no time would smooth out; and the hands were coarse and unmanly. John Pierre Maudit was no longer a handsome man.

